One of the biggest tests of management is how it copes with a crisis. For a tech start-up the issue might be a failed product introduction, a big move by a competitor or fund-raising problems that necessitate layoffs; for a campaign it might be the loss of a major primary or the emergence of an unflattering videotape.
Both types of organizations are built on momentum, and both risk a vicious cycle when something goes wrong. Negative headlines can be self-fulfilling, as would-be campaign supporters or a company’s customers and investors flee.
Leaders in either world must rise to the occasion. Mr. Plouffe, for example, described how the Obama 2008 campaign weathered a loss to Hillary Clinton in the New Hampshire primary, which sapped the campaign’s momentum.
“You make clear that you will diagnose what went wrong, and have a sense that this is a tough blow,” Mr. Plouffe said. “You have to tell people how you’ll get through it.” In that case, he said, he had to explain how the campaign intended to win future states and ultimately enough delegates to capture the Democratic nomination.
“Without that it would have seemed like happy talk,” he said. “But the first time you deal with a setback and recover, those bonds between people on the team really strengthen. When you show the ability to fight through it, you become a band of brothers and sisters.”
The best-managed campaign won’t necessarily win the presidency. The political winds, the skills and positions of the candidates and the state of the economy all help determine that. Similarly, the best-run company doesn’t necessarily prevail against a competitor with a better product.
Leading a start-up effective enough to win the presidency is no easy task. But it may pale next to the challenge and opportunity ahead: reconstituting a successful management team to steer the 2.7 million civilian employees of the executive branch. Having mastered the high-speed start-up, in other words, the candidates and their lieutenants may get to apply their talents to running the government of the United States.

Appealing to Union, Hillary Clinton Calls Teachers ‘Scapegoats’ // NYT // Maggie Haberman – June 4, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton made an appeal for an endorsement from the American Federation of Teachers this week, suggesting in a private meeting with union officials that critics have turned teachers into “scapegoats for all of society’s problems.”

“From what I’ve seen, all of the evidence, and my own personal experience, says that the most important and impactful thing we can do for our public schools is to recruit, support and retain the highest-quality educators,” Mrs. Clinton said before a question-and-answer session with teachers, according to the union, which released her remarks.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"It is just dead wrong to make teachers the scapegoats for all of society's problems," she said. "Where I come from, teachers are the solution." Mrs. Clinton's remarks were first reported by BuzzFeed.

Mrs. Clinton, as well as two other Democratic presidential hopefuls, former Gov. Martin O'Malley of Maryland and Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont, appeared at the union's executive council meeting this week. But even allies of Mr. O'Malley and Mr. Sanders acknowledge that Mrs. Clinton is likely to earn the federation's backing.

Still, Mrs. Clinton is under some pressure from advocates of an education overhaul, who have been at odds with the teachers' union for several years and believe President Obama has been a supporter of their issues. Representatives for teachers have publicly denounced Mr. Obama's education agenda and programs like "Race to the Top," which awarded bonuses to school districts based on performance markers. That makes Mrs. Clinton's comments about teachers as "scapegoats" all the more striking.

In an interview in March, Ann O'Leary, who has since become a senior policy adviser for Mrs. Clinton's campaign, indicated that the candidate planned to engage in a dialogue with both the teachers and advocates of an overhaul, something Mr. Obama has been accused of not doing.

Lea Crusey, of the group Democrats for Education Reform, who called Mr. Obama "a consistent champion for reform," said advocates had "been in contact" with Mrs. Clinton's team, and that they hoped to hear from her on issues such as college affordability, charter schools and "continued support for accountability."

Mrs. Clinton has a long record on the subject, including on efforts to overhaul public education. In Arkansas, when she was first lady, she was part of a task force that tried to improve the state's poor-performing schools.

Hillary Clinton, in Texas, Tries to Win Over Forlorn Democrats // NYT // Amy Chozick – June 3, 2015

It's lonely to be a Democrat in Texas these days.

As Hillary Rodham Clinton makes a two-day swing through the state mostly to raise money, even swaggering Texans with gold belt buckles and ranches that sit behind gated expanses are beginning to feel a little, well, used.

Last year, liberal groups like Battleground Texas sold local Democrats a tall tale that turnout would spike in the midterm election and that the state would show it still had hints of blue. Then, Wendy Davis, the Democratic candidate for governor, lost in a landslide to Greg Abbott, a Republican.

Adding insult to injury, many of the Hispanic voters who were supposed to help turn the tide either didn't vote or favored Mr. Abbott.

Democrats had hardly licked their wounds when Mrs. Clinton and the outside groups that support her came knocking for money for 2016, when the state is all but certain to keep its solid red streak. "All Texas is to anyone is a stop to pick up money," one disillusioned donor said.

Mrs. Clinton's decision to deliver a substantive, high-profile speech on voting rights here on Thursday — in addition to fund-raising stops in Austin, Dallas and San Antonio — can do much to assuage those concerns.

(She will most likely tell her usual story about the summer she spent in Texas in the 1970s helping to register Hispanic voters on the George McGovern presidential campaign.)

The speech was not made final until last week, and the site, Texas Southern University, had to find a larger auditorium to accommodate the local officials, supporters and national news media who would attend, Democrats involved in the planning said.

But immediately after Mrs. Clinton's plea to increase access to the polls, she will head to (where else?) a fund-raiser in a gated community in this city's upscale Memorial area. (Guests were told they would receive details and the address after delivering their $2,700 checks.)

Texas Democrats are a nostalgic clan, still basking in the legacy of such homegrown firebrands as Lyndon B. Johnson, Ann Richards, the columnist Molly Ivins ("Real Texans do not use the word 'summer' as a verb," she famously wrote of the elder George Bush) and Barbara Jordan, the congresswoman and civil rights leader after whom the award Mrs. Clinton will accept here on Thursday is named.

It makes sense that Mrs. Clinton chose the home state of L.B.J., the architect of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, to talk about voting rights. She will also condemn Republican rivals, including former Gov. Rick Perry of Texas, who have supported laws increasing requirements for voters. The restrictions, voting rights activists say, prohibit minorities, the poor and young voters — groups that tend to vote Democratic — from casting ballots.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Texas has among the strictest voting laws of any state in the country, and turnout is generally abysmal, particularly among its Hispanics.

“I hope it’s in Texas because Texas is a microcosm of all of this,” Representative James E. Clyburn, Democrat of South Carolina, said in an interview, referring to Mrs. Clinton’s voting rights speech. “She is going to where the problem is.”

It’s not just the voting laws that have the state’s Democrats feeling down. Recently, the Texas Legislature supported bills that would allow residents to openly carry handguns and permit students to carry concealed weapons on college campuses, policies most Democrats abhor.

An exasperated Arthur L. Schechter, a Houston-based donor whose support for Bill Clinton earned him an ambassadorship, pointed to the recent shootout at a Waco bar between rival biker gangs.

“It’s like the days of Wyatt Earp are back,” he said.

Hillary Clinton declares war on Voter ID // WaPo // Janell Ross – June 4, 2015

When Hillary Clinton gave her speech Thursday on voting rights, her campaign staff had already given a pretty ample set of previews to publications across the country.

No one was expecting fire. But Clinton’s speech – focusing on some of what Clinton presented as the ugliest truths about voting in the United States – was no boilerplate stump speech. Clinton went big. She called for universal and automatic voter registration and a 20-day (or more) period of early voting in every state, before every election. Clinton's speech identified the work of protecting and expanding voting rights as a critical part of her campaign.

Clinton talked about the fact that African Americans consistently rank among the most deeply affected by the contours of Voter ID laws, must wait in the longest lines on Election Day and cast ballots at polling sites that very often house fewer machines and poll workers than other sites. That, Clinton told the crowd, “is no accident.”

Then, her campaign sent out a tweet that drove the point home.

In case you don’t know, a student ID can’t be used to vote in Texas, but a concealed carry permit can. The implication: the Democratic Party’s base of young and minority voters are far more likely to be rendered unable to vote than the GOP’s gun-loving base. For Clinton, that's a situation that inherently ties her political fate to groups of voters she says are imperiled.

It was also no accident that Clinton’s carefully stage-managed speech was scheduled for Texas Southern University, a historically black college in Houston. After all, the current Voter ID law that governs voting in Texas was initially blocked by federal officials. Then, within hours of the U.S. Supreme Court’s June 2013 Voting Rights Act decision eliminating the requirement that states like Texas run voting changes past federal authorities, the state put the law into effect.

African Americans, even in big red states like Texas which the most hopeful Democrats insist sits on the verge of turning purple, remain a core part of the constituency that Clinton needs. But Clinton needs to more than attract African-American voters to her campaign. She needs them fired up to vote.

Consider this. Black America’s first record-setting turnout for Barack Obama in 2008 might have been about making history. But in 2012, when a larger proportion of blacks voted than any other group for the second presidential election in a row, plenty of the nation’s political prognosticators attributed that to the sense that black access to the franchise was under active attack.

And so, Clinton came to Houston. She declared war on Voter ID and other Republican efforts to rein in things like early voting. And she asked the audience to join her.

The day before Clinton waged her frontal attack, New York University’s Brennan Center for Justice issued a report offering a far more subdued but equally cautionary look at the nation’s voting rights situation. And the center's assessment of 2015 is, well, nuanced.

The most stringent Voter ID laws could disenfranchise anywhere from 8 to 12 percent of the population in these states, the Brennan Center’s Myrna Pérez, deputy director of organization’s Democracy Program, told me.

That’s also a group disproportionately made up of people of color, very young voters and the very old, the poor and women. These groups are less likely to have one of the forms of ID these laws require and more likely not to have the kinds of underlying documents needed to obtain them such as a birth certificate or passport. For women, the common practice of changing one's last name can seriously complicate the work of obtaining ID needed to vote.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

After a raft of bills around the country in 2011 aiming to require ID to vote, and several legal challenges, some have been put in place. Fourteen states have passed voting law changes that if not overturned by a court will be in place for the first time on Election Day 2016. North Dakota also passed its own Voter ID law this year. But only some of these laws include the kind of narrow lists of acceptable forms of ID like the law in Texas, according to that Brennan Center report. And those are the laws voting rights organizations are fighting in court.

In the court of public opinion, fighting these laws is arguably more difficult. That's because polls show huge majorities of Americans agree with the concept of requiring ID to vote. So when Clinton pushes for more early voting, it's likely to be popular; when she warns that voter ID disenfranchises African Americans, it's a tougher sell.

But Clinton isn't the only one taking up the cause, and the movement isn't all in one direction.

At the other end of the spectrum, a small group of states that will likely surprise people in the political know – Florida, Oklahoma and New Mexico – have seen bipartisan groups of legislators create laws to make online voter registration a reality. Maryland and Minnesota came close to overturning laws that bar convicted felons from voting, a practice that excludes millions of citizens around the country from voting booths.

And in Oregon, Democrats pushed through a measure that will come very close to Clinton's universal registration idea. The state will register anyone with an Oregon driver's license who is eligible to vote. Oregon license holders will have to take steps to opt out of registration if they are adamant about it. The law is expected to add anywhere from 300,000 to 400,000 voters to Oregon's rolls.

These fights have largely happened off the front page and in the little-watched state Houses of America. Clinton is trying to put them on the national radar -- with a clear eye toward getting key demographic groups geared up to elect another Democrat as president.

51 percent of Democrats say Benghazi is a legitim ate issue for Hillary Clinton // WaPo // Amber Phillips – June 4, 2015

Most voters aren't paying much attention to Republicans' ongoing investigation into the Benghazi attacks that happened during Hillary Rodham Clinton's tenure as secretary of state. It's a political witch hunt, Democrats cry.

But more than any other problem she's faced so far, the 2012 attack on U.S. diplomatic compounds in Libya that killed four Americans, including ambassador J. Chris Stevens, is seen as fair game for 2016.

In a Washington Post/ABC News poll released Tuesday, 55 percent say how she handled Benghazi is a legitimate issue for the 2016 campaign. Most interestingly, it's far from a partisan issue; that number includes 51 percent of Democrats and half of independents.

The Benghazi attack ranks slightly higher as a legitimate issue for voters than other, more recent negative headlines for Clinton: The Clinton Foundation's fundraising from foreign governments (53 percent) and her use of personal e-mail while she was head of the State Department (48 percent). Both those numbers break down along much more partisan lines, too.

Of course, the fact that voters think Benghazi is a legitimate issue doesn't mean they think it's a negative one for Clinton.

In total, half of voters disapprove of the way Clinton handled questions about the deadly attack, with 33 percent approving. But that breaks down much more along partisan lines; 82 percent of Republicans compared to 23 percent of Democrats disapprove of her response to the questions. So many/most Democrats who see it as a legitimate issue don't necessarily see it as a negative.
This would seem to be good news for Republicans, who have been hammering away at Clinton on Benghazi for three years now, accusing her of getting a free pass and skirting tough questions. In Congress, House Republican lawmakers are on their eighth sanctioned investigation into the incident, with their findings expected to be released in the throes of the presidential election in 2016.

On the presidential trail, GOP candidates have mostly stayed away from the touchy subject, preferring to attack Clinton on other issues, including the money she took for very well-paid speeches since departing as secretary of state (among other problems for the Hillary camp).

Attacking Democrats on Benghazi can be tricky, though. The GOP's 2012 nominee, Mitt Romney, faltered in a debate against Obama on the question.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Clinton isn't the only presidential hopeful with a complicated issue in the Middle East. The Washington Post/ ABC poll also asked voters whether Jeb Bush's hypothetical handling of his brother's Iraq war was a legitimate issue. The former Florida governor's stumbles over the question have produced arguably his most negative headlines thus far.

But the issue seems to be less of an issue for Bush than Benghazi is for Clinton. More voters (48 percent) say no, what he would have done in Iraq is not an issue, while 44 percent say it should be part of the 2016 debate. Again, things aren't as partisan as you might expect -- 44 percent of Republicans say it's a legitimate issue, for example -- but overall, people don't seem as interested in hypotheticals about what George W. Bush's brother would have done if he had been in Dubya's shoes (and with more information).

But perhaps that's because it is precisely a hypothetical question. In the same poll, just 23 percent of Republicans said they think Bush would continue the same policies as his brother if elected.

No one can say for certain whether either Benghazi or the Iraq war -- which recently matched its lowest approval rating in ever among the American public -- will sway voters next November. But these latest numbers should serve as a reminder to candidates that the past is never really in the past.

Hillary Clinton Calls for Automatic Voter Registration // WSJ // Laura Meckler – June 4, 2015

Hillary Clinton proposed Thursday that Americans be automatically registered to vote when they turn 18, unless they opt out, one of a series of voting-law changes she said would expand access to the ballot box.

In her remarks to a largely African-American audience in Houston, she accused Republicans of making voting harder, particularly for minorities and young people. Republicans say they are focused on rooting out voter fraud.

The front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination also proposed expanded in-person early voting, called on Congress to restore parts of the Voting Rights Act struck down by the Supreme Court in 2013 and said felons who have served their sentences should have voting rights restored.

The speech marked the latest in a series of policy announcements likely to be popular with core Democratic voters. Democrats also see voting rights as critical to helping them win elections.

“We have a responsibility to say clearly and directly what’s really going on in our country. Because what is happening is a sweeping effort to disempower and disenfranchise people of color, poor people and young people from one end of our country to another,” she said at Texas Southern University, a historically black college.

Many candidates for office currently expend significant energy helping register people to vote who they hope will vote for them. This work is particularly urgent for Democrats, as young people and minorities are less likely to register but more likely to vote Democratic. In his two presidential victories, Barack Obama’s campaign worked to “expand the electorate” in key states by registering likely supporters. Universal registration would obviate the need for these efforts.

The proposals contrast with Republicans, who have worked to require photo identification at the polls and purge registration lists of those ineligible to vote. They argue that these steps are necessary to combat voter fraud, and that early voting isn’t worth the cost.

Hans von Spakovsky, manager of the Election Law Reform Initiative at the conservative Heritage Foundation, said the Clinton plan wouldn’t succeed in expanding voter turnout and could result in people being put onto the rolls more than once.

“Americans feel one of their rights is the right to be left alone by the government,” he said. “People should be able to make the voluntary decision as to whether they want to participate or not.”

Mrs. Clinton cited a law enacted in Oregon this year to automatically register eligible citizens who have driver’s licenses, as long as they don’t opt out. Lawmakers in 14 other states, plus the District of Columbia, have introduced similar proposals, according to a count by the Brennan Center for Justice, which is advocating for universal registration systems. The proposals vary; some also register people who have conducted business with other government agencies as well.

“The biggest obstacle to free and fair elections is the ramshackle voter registration system,” said Michael Waldman, president of the Brennan Center. The center estimates that at least 50 million eligible citizens aren’t registered.

Under the current system, he said, people fall off the voter rolls when they move and remain there after they die. He argued that a stronger government hand would lead to more accurate voter rolls. He said the government would have to conduct checks to make sure people who aren’t eligible to vote, such as noncitizens and, in some states, felons, aren't registered.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mrs. Clinton's speech comes at the same time her campaign is supporting Democratic efforts to challenge voting rules in Wisconsin and Ohio, which allege GOP-backed laws are restricting people's right to vote. The campaign isn't a party to the suits, but its top election attorney is working on the cases.

The Wisconsin rules being challenged in court include a photo-ID requirement, reduction in the early voting window, an increase in the in-state residency requirement and elimination of weekend and evening voting times. Courts have found voter-ID requirements to be constitutional.

Mrs. Clinton also sold herself as an early champion of voting rights. She pointed to her work registering voters in Texas in 1972 for Sen. George McGovern's presidential campaign, and to legislation she introduced while in the U.S. Senate to make Election Day a national holiday, expand registration and increase early voting.

In her speech, Mrs. Clinton urged Congress to pass legislation restoring federal oversight of elections in states that historically discriminated against minority voters, after a 2013 Supreme Court decision found Congress hadn't adequately justified that supervision when reauthorizing the Voting Rights Act in 2006.

Mrs. Clinton also called for a national standard of at least 20 days of early, in-person voting in every state, with early polls open on some weekends and evenings. She said this standard would reduce wait times at polling places and give more people the chance to vote, particularly those who work or have family obligations on Election Day. The campaign said that a third of states have no early voting.

Why Hillary Clinton is pushing early voting in 2016 // AP // Ken Thomas – June 4, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton is calling for an expansion of early voting and pushing back against Republican-led efforts to restrict voting access, laying down a marker on voting rights at the start of her presidential campaign.

The Democratic presidential candidate is using a speech Thursday at historically black Texas Southern University to denounce voting restrictions in North Carolina, Texas, Florida and Wisconsin and to encourage states to adopt a new national standard of no fewer than 20 days of early in-person voting, including weekend and evening voting.

Clinton is plunging into a partisan debate in many statehouses, which have pitted Democrats who contend restricting voter registration aims to suppress turnout among minority and low-income voters against Republicans who say the steps are needed to prevent voter fraud. The issue is closely watched by black voters, who supported President Barack Obama in large numbers and will be an important constituency as Clinton seeks to rebuild Obama's coalition.

Democrats have signaled plans for a large-scale legal fight against new voter ID laws and efforts to curtail voting access. Party attorneys recently filed legal challenges to voting changes made by GOP lawmakers in the presidential battleground states of Ohio and Wisconsin. One of the attorneys involved in the lawsuits is Marc Elias, a top elections lawyer for Democrats who is also serving as the Clinton campaign's general counsel. The campaign is not officially involved in the lawsuits.

Clinton will also urge Congress to take steps to address a 2013 Supreme Court ruling striking down a portion of the Voting Rights Act. Clinton said at the time of the decision that the court had "struck at the heart" of the landmark law and warned that it would make it difficult for the poor, elderly, minorities and working people to vote.

She is also expected to urge the full adoption of the recommendations of Obama's bipartisan commission on voting administration.

Raising the voting issues allow Clinton to draw sharp distinctions with the potential Republican presidential field, which has largely endorsed the changes.

Three potential GOP rivals — Govs. Scott Walker of Wisconsin and John Kasich of Ohio and former Gov. Rick Perry of Texas — helped overhaul their states' election laws. Democrats, meanwhile, still blame former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, another likely GOP candidate, for purging his state's voting rolls of certain eligible voters prior to the 2000 election, which ended with his brother, former President George W. Bush, narrowly winning the state following a lengthy recount.

"Time and again, members of the 2016 Republican field have put partisan political interests above the fundamental American right to vote," said Donna Brazile, a Democratic strategist and longtime Clinton adviser.

Republicans have defended the changes, saying they ensure the integrity of the voting process. Under Walker, Wisconsin's changes included requiring a proof of residency except for overseas and military voters, reducing the early voting period and increasing residency requirements.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Any measure that protects our democracy by making it easier to vote and harder to cheat is a step in the right direction. This is a bipartisan issue and Hillary Clinton and the Democrats are on the wrong side," said Kirsten Kukowski, a spokeswoman for Walker's political action committee.

About 20 million people voted early in the 2014 elections. However, about one-third of states do not have any early voting. Republicans note that Clinton's home state of New York is one of the states that lack early voting.

Thursday's event will be hosted by Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee, D-Texas, and Clinton will be honored with an award named after Barbara Jordan, the late Texas congresswoman and civil rights leader.

The former secretary of state has been actively raising money for her campaign and the speech is part of a two-day trip to Albuquerque, New Mexico, and Texas, where she is holding private fundraisers in Dallas, San Antonio, Austin and Houston.

Dem ocrats fret over recent Hillary Clinton polling // Politico // Katie Glueck – June 5, 2015

Despite polls, many early-state insiders say there's enthusiasm for Hillary's presidential bid — especially among women.

Early-state Democrats are evenly divided over whether Hillary Clinton's campaign should be worried about recent polls showing her highest unfavorability ratings in years.

Exactly 50 percent say there's cause for concern while the other 50 percent saw no reason for alarm.

That's the assessment of this week's survey of the POLITICO Caucus — a bipartisan group of influential activists, operatives and elected officials in Iowa and New Hampshire.

"Twenty-plus Republicans beating her up, Elizabeth Warren talking about the working man issues that terrify her, a couple of candidates like Bernie [Sanders] and Martin [O'Malley] to fill in her policy blanks and a media that feels stiffed by her lack of access, so all we can focus on is emails and the notorious Clinton Foundation and newly acquired wealth that suggests, at a minimum, the appearance of impropriety," one Granite State Democrat said, offering an explanation for her sinking favorability. "Frankly if Hillary could step back at look at herself she would rate herself unfavorably as well."

That remark comes during a week in which two major national polls delivered troubling results, including a CNN/ORC poll released Tuesday that showed Clinton with her highest unfavorability ratings of the past 14 years. A separate poll released Tuesday by The Washington Post and ABC News found that Clinton's favorability was just 45 percent — her lowest in that survey since April 2008, when she was in the middle of a nomination battle with Barack Obama.

Caucus participants largely chalked those numbers up to a spate of unflattering stories about donations made to the Clinton Foundation, as well as scrutiny of Clinton's email practices when she was at the State Department. Some blamed the media — the "drumbeat" of negative headlines was a common explanation for her slide in popularity. But others argued that she should engage more with the press about those subjects.

"She is not proactively addressing the issues of concern to Americans," said an Iowa Democrat who, like everyone in the POLITICO Caucus, was granted anonymity in order to speak freely. "Her refusal to take questions is taking a toll. These polls indicate that she needs to take a more proactive role. Not that she needs to be completely responsive to the media, but she can't ignore them."

"Emails, Clinton Foundation, etc," one New Hampshire Democrat responded. "She is taking the initial barrage from the punditocracy trying to frame the narrative of the race — which is largely about process and character, not very much about issues — and because she is not taking the bait she's in a little bit of a roper-doper strategy right now. I think she needs to go on offense."

But many Democrats also attributed falling poll numbers to the fact that she is now a partisan candidate for political office, rather than secretary of state, and noted that she still outpaces the Republican candidates in polls. And several who responded that the Clinton campaign should be concerned by those surveys said the information should be used only to make minor adjustments.

"Any candidate facing waves of partisan attacks for weeks on end sees the impact in their numbers, but the list of folks capable of sustaining this kind of a barrage and still looking this good is very small," said a Granite Stater.

Another New Hampshire Democrat, who believes the Clinton campaign should be concerned about the polls, explained, "Hillary Clinton generates extremely strong passions, both positive and negative. She needs to be completely candid and transparent about the [Clinton] Foundation's dealings and accomplishments and cannot engage in either spin or obfuscation. As long as she is straight, truthful and credible, she will be fine."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Despite the rising negative ratings and polling suggesting high numbers of voters question her trustworthiness, three-quarters of early-state Democrats say Clinton is generating sufficient excitement about her presidential bid — especially among women.

"Regular people, particularly women of all age groups are beyond excited about this candidacy," a New Hampshire Democrat said.

"Sufficient is the right choice of words," said another New Hampshire Democrat. "Hillary is, and remains, solid in the eyes of Democrats."

Some respondents, however, wondered whether there's enough energy and enthusiasm for the long haul.

"There is almost "forced" excitement from establishment types trying to sell the Clinton brand as the perfect standard bearer for rank and file Democrats," said one New Hampshire Democrat. "In New Hampshire, there does not appear to be a barrage of new Clinton supporters; rather, just the usual Clinton supporters."

An Iowa Democrat cautioned, "Sufficient to win a primary yes, a general election right now — we aren't there."

On the Republican side, unsurprisingly, 94 percent of insiders said her campaign should be concerned by the polls, and 91 percent said they're not seeing much enthusiasm about her candidacy. Several insiders likened Clinton to former Sen. Bob Dole, who won the 1996 GOP nomination but lost to Bill Clinton.

"Hillary Clinton is this cycle's version of Bob Dole. It's her turn but holy sh!" one Granite State Republican said.

Here are three other takeaways from this week's POLITICO Caucus:

Expectations are high for Clinton's June 13 announcement rally

Hillary Clinton has been a candidate since April, but she will officially kick off her race on June 13 at a rally in New York. That's a good time for her to spell out exactly why she's running, Democratic insiders say — it's a way to show skeptical voters that she's pursuing the White House because of an issue set or philosophy, rather than out of a sense that she's inevitable or entitled.

A New Hampshire Democrat suggested Clinton answer these questions. "Why is she the best person out of 320 million people to be President? Where's the passion? And what can you say that will truly inspire non-base voters? "

"She needs consistency of effort in transferring attention from herself to the issues on which she is running," an Iowa Democrat said. "June 13th plays an important role in putting the attention on her priority issues."

A New Hampshire Democrat added that Clinton should try to explain that the campaign is bigger than she is, and bigger than the Clinton brand: "That this campaign isn't about her and it isn't about Washington, that it's about Manchester and Davenport and other communities and the issues that matter there — a quality education for your kids, safe neighborhoods, good roads and bridges, confronting the drug epidemic, lowering the costs of healthcare, childcare, student loans and energy prices. Don't make this campaign about the Clintons, but about families all across the country who are just trying to do the right thing everyday."

Other non-Democrats — Republicans and a handful of nonpartisan respondents — indulged in some wishful thinking.

Clinton should say "I am not a crook," suggested at least two insiders.

"I have decided to spend more time with my family and thus I am resetting my priorities and going to devote my life to the Clinton Foundation," deadpanned a New Hampshire Republican.

As Warren fades, Sanders rises

Supporters of Sen. Elizabeth Warren are increasingly taking her at her word that she won't run for president — which makes room on the left for Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders. Fully 100 percent of Iowa Democrats, and 72 percent of New Hampshire Democrats, see Sanders as the heir to Warren's support, rather than former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley or former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee.

"The lane is on the left," an Iowa Democrat said. "There's not enough room for Left of Hillary but Right of Bernie. Why settle for a mainstream liberal when you can have a lefty dream candidate?"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Bernie is taking it to the streets. He’s calling for political revolution. While he is not the picture of change one might imagine, he has the ability to reprise the role of Howard Dean in 2004 in the Democratic primary,” an Iowa Republican said.

A New Hampshire Republican, questioning enthusiasm for Clinton, said, “Hundreds of people are turning out for a socialist from Vermont!”

But an Iowa Democrat noted, “Sanders is the flavor of the month in [Iowa]. He has connected with the [Dennis] Kucinich and Dean supporters from years ago. The big question is whether they are curious or committed.”

Carly Fiorina is on fire — for now

One hundred percent of New Hampshire Republicans and about 80 percent of Iowa Republicans say GOP candidate Carly Fiorina is gaining traction.

“People love Carly when they see her. Momentum in Iowa is real,” a Hawkeye State Republican said.

A New Hampshire Democrat added a word of support: “She is different from all the other candidates in the Republican field, and for more than her gender. Her business background, her communication style, her willingness to talk like a general election candidate right now, her never holding office, and her personal story, are all interesting. If she is not one of the 10 people on that debate stage, the process is not working.”

An Iowa Republican noted that Fiorina’s status as the GOP field’s most frequent critic of Hillary Clinton is going a long way for her candidacy.

“Fiorina has been wowing crowds and exceeding expectations wherever she goes in Iowa,” the insider said. “It’s one part love for the Clinton zingers, one part excitement in a charismatic Republican woman, and one part interest in the unknown, but she is making headway in Iowa in a real way.”

But, a New Hampshire Republican said of the former Hewlett Packard head, “she’s had a free ride so far attacking Hillary, which is easy, with no critical review of her record or policies. That will change.”

Clinton calls out GOP opponents by name on voting rights // CNN // Dan Merica & Eric Bradner – June 4, 2015

Hillary Clinton accused four potential GOP presidential rivals by name of being "scared of letting citizens have their say" as she called Thursday for every American to automatically be registered to vote.

Clinton told an audience at the historically black Texas Southern University that she supports the concept of signing every American up to vote as soon as they're eligible at age 18, unless they specifically opt out. She called for expanded access to polling places, keeping them open for at least 20 days and offering voting hours on evenings and weekends.

For the first time in her campaign, she attacked her likely opponents by name as she laid into four GOP governors -- Texas's Rick Perry, Wisconsin's Scott Walker, Florida's Jeb Bush and New Jersey's Chris Christie -- telling them to "stop fear-mongering about a phantom epidemic of voter fraud."

"All of these problems voting just didn't happen by accident," she said. "And it is just wrong -- it's wrong -- to try to prevent, undermine and inhibit Americans' right to vote."

The former secretary of state's move to put voter access front and center in the 2016 presidential campaign highlights a contrast with laws implemented by GOP-controlled legislatures in states like North Carolina, Texas, Wisconsin and Florida that cut down on early voting times and tighten voter identification rules.

The Supreme Court also ruled in 2013 that a key aspect of President Lyndon Johnson's Voting Rights Act of 1965 is no longer constitutional.

"What is happening is a sweeping effort to disempower and disenfranchise people of color, poor people and young people from one end of our country to the other," Clinton said.

In her 2008 campaign, Clinton rarely addressed voting rights. But Democrats have fretted that policies imposed by GOP state legislatures in recent years could dissuade African-Americans and those in urban areas from voting, cutting into crucial blocs of Democratic support in swing states.

The Democratic frontrunner highlighted the issue in a heavily political speech as she received an award in the name of Barbara Jordan, a pioneer African-American lawmaker and civil rights leader.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Forty years after Barbara Jordan fought to extend the Voting Rights Act, its heart has been ripped out," Clinton said. "I wish we could hear her speak up for the student who has to wait hours for his or her right to vote; for the grandmother who's turned away from the polls because her driver's license expired; for the father who's done his time and paid his debt to society but still hasn't gotten his rights back."

Her complaints about the Republican governors: Perry signed a law that courts later ruled intentionally discriminated against minority voters; Walker signed one that made voting more difficult for college students; Christie rejected an expansion of early voting; and Bush oversaw a purge of the state's voter rolls.

And she attacked the nation's high court for its 2013 ruling on the Voting Rights Act as well as its 2010 decision on campaign finance laws.

"We need a Supreme Court who cares more about the right to vote of a person than the right to buy an election of a corporation," Clinton said.

While the speech appears to be good politics, the likelihood of achieving universal voter registration is questionable even to people who support it.

Rob Richie, the executive director of the Center for Voting and Democracy, a group in favor of universal registration, said Thursday that the "very decentralized" voting systems in the United States make it "feasible" but "difficult."

The primary problem: The United States does not have a national ID system like other countries that have universal voter registration.

"There is not a simple single approach because we do not have this simple, singular ID that connects us," said Richie, noting that instead of registering to vote nationally, in the United States, you register with your state.

One solution to the problem would be to implement a national identification card, said Richie. The problem: Groups like the American Civil Liberties Union and others are vehemently against a national ID, calling it a "slippery slope" to surveillance and monitoring citizens.

Clinton supports the concept of universal registration, but not a specific method, an aide said.

The former first lady has long been a supporter of voting rights: She helped register voters in Texas' Rio Grande Valley during the George McGovern's failed 1972 presidential run and as a senator introduced legislation to make Election Day a national holiday and reduce lines at polling stations.

Clinton's top campaign lawyer, Marc Elias, has also taken on the fight by filing lawsuits challenging voter restriction laws in Ohio and Wisconsin. He told The New York Times on Wednesday that "we should all want to ensure that all eligible voters can exercise their right to vote and have their vote counted."

Clinton's aides have said that they are aware of the lawsuits and are supportive of their goals.

Obama won 93% of African-American voters in 2012 and 95% in 2008, according to exit polls. Some Democrats worry that Clinton needs a similar performance with African-American voters and disenfranchisement is an issue that Democrats hope will activate that base.

The first few months of Clinton's campaign have seen a number of events and trips focused on African-American voters.

In her first speech as a candidate, Clinton called for mandatory police body cameras across the country and end "era of mass incarceration," an issue that connected with African-American activists concerned about black men dying at the hands of law enforcement.

Clinton also focused on a minority-owned business in her first trip to South Carolina, a state with a sizable African-American population that overwhelmingly picked Obama over her in the 2008 primary.

Hillary Clinton's Call to Ease Voting Impacts Growing Latino Vote // NBC News // Suzanne Gamboa – June 4, 2015

Although the setting for her voting rights speech was a historically black college, presidential hopeful Hillary Clinton's call for making it easier for Americans to vote has implications for the political involvement of Latinos.

Every year, at least 50,000 Latino youth turn 18. Pew Research Center has projected that Latinos would account for 40 percent of the growth in America's eligible to vote through 2030 and in that year, some 40 million Latinos would be able to vote.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Speaking at Texas Southern University - established in Houston in 1927 as Colored Junior College to educate blacks - Clinton proposed automatic voter registration for young people when they turn 18, unless they opt out. She also proposed a national standard of no fewer than 20 days of early voting in every state.

Clinton added that she'd push for Congress to pass a bipartisan bill hammered out in the last Congress but never voted on that would restore Voting Rights Act protections from voting discrimination.

"I believe every citizen has the right to vote and I believe we should do everything we can to make it easier for every citizen to vote," Clinton said.

Although the Supreme Court decision gutting protections against discrimination in the Voting Rights act is often discussed in the context of black voters, the decision has significantly impacted potential Latino voters, said Maria Teresa Kumar, founding president of Voto Latino, a group that works to get young Latinos to vote.

For example, the county that brought the lawsuit that led to the Supreme Court decision on the Voting Rights Act, Shelby County, experienced a 297 percent growth in its Latino population during 2000 to 2010.

"Most folks think the Voting Rights Act (challenge) was to disenfranchise blacks," Kumar said. "When you look at the states that started implementing voting restrictions after the decision - Texas, Alabama, Georgia, North Carolina - the voting restrictions paralleled the states with the fastest Latino growth."

A Texas voter ID law that was rejected by a federal court in Washington, D.C. was deemed racially discriminatory, which Clinton mentioned and used to take a swipe at former Texas Gov. Rick Perry, a Republican who announced his presidential bid Thursday.

Since President Barack Obama's 2012 election, a number of Republican-controlled state legislatures and governors have passed or signed laws instituting restrictions on voting.

Supporters of the restrictions have said they are aimed at curbing fraud, but opponents have tagged them as a response to the coalition of black and brown voters who heavily supported Obama in both elections.

While requirements for specific forms of identification at the polls have gotten the most attention, a slew of other laws have been instituted on voting, including reductions in early voting periods, elimination of election day voter registration, cuts in voting hours, elimination of laws allowing young people to register when they get driver's licenses (though they could not vote until they turned 18) and more.

"We should be clearing the way for more people to vote, not putting up any roadblock anyone can imagine," said Clinton, who received an award at the event. The award is named after Barbara Jordan, whose legislation in Congress broadened the Voting Rights Act's protections to Latinos and other groups.

The Republican Party criticized Clinton's comments saying she was "misleading" and "divisive."

"The vast majority of Americans - including minority voters - support commonsense measures to prevent voter fraud," said Orlando Watson, an RNC spokesman. He said Clinton's home state of New York does not allow early voting while dozens of Republican-led states do. "Her exploitation of the issue underscores why voters find her dishonest and untrustworthy," Watson said.

But Pratt Wiley, the Democratic Party's national director of voter expansion, said people are kept from registering to vote in other ways. About 60 percent of all Americans are registered to vote when they get their driver's licenses, through what is known as motor voter laws, Wiley said.

Groups all over the country are asserting that state departments that oversee driver's licensing are falling down on the job of giving people the opportunity to register to vote by not asking if people want to register, he said. Also, counties are not processing applications when they get them, are slow to do so or are losing applications, Wiley said.

"Voter ID is part of a whole suite of restrictive laws and tactics" that Republicans have employed to keep people from voting, Wiley said. "These laws are not passed to make our system safer. They were not passed to save money ... But that's what you do if your election strategy is to have as few people vote as possible. That's what the Republican strategy is."

He provided quotes from some Republicans that he said demonstrated the strategy:

_ "I guess I really feel we shouldn't contort the voting process to accommodate the urban - read African-American

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- voter-turnout machine," Ohio GOP Chairman Doug Preis said.

_ "I've had some radical ideas about voting and it's probably not a good time to tell them, but you used to have to be a property owner to vote," Rep. Ted Yoho, R-Fla. said.

_ "If it hurts a bunch of lazy blacks that want the government to give them everything, so be it," Buncombe County, North Carolina GOP Precinct Chair Don Yelton said on The Daily Show about the state's voter ID law.

Daniel Garza, executive director of LIBRE, a conservative group that wants to increase Latino voting, said he has no problem with requiring identification to vote because his group believes in preserving the "integrity" of the vote and the principle of "one man, one vote."

"I've never been in a meeting where people have said we need to suppress the vote. I've never heard a conservative in a room saying 'What can we do to keep Latinos from voting? It doesn't occur, it doesn't happen," Garza said.

Garza said he did not know enough about the other voting restrictions passed in states, so could not comment on that. But he said his group puts a priority on informing Latinos and wants them to be informed and is not trying to keep people home.

"The left has worked hard to suppress our voice. We've been slammed by the left to shut up to not do outreach, to not engage," Garza said.

In her speech, Clinton recalled her days working to register voters in the Rio Grande Valley 33 years ago.

"Some of the people I met were understandably a little wary of a girl from Chicago who didn't speak a word of Spanish, but they wanted to vote. They were citizens, they knew they had a right to be heard. They wanted to exercise all the rights and responsibilities that citizenship conveys," she said.

Clinton is scheduled to speak next week before the National Association of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials (NALEO), a bipartisan group. Any increase in getting young people to register and turn out to vote would benefit Latinos because it is a young population.

The Supreme Court's decision on the Voting Rights Act removed protection for 7 million Latino voters, said Arturo Vargas, NALEO's executive director.

"We would want to have those protections restored," he said. "But we are very interested in a modernized Voting Rights Act that looks to prospectively protect the rights of all voters."

Hillary Clinton lays out sweeping voting rights vision // MSNBC // Zachary Roth – June 4, 2015

In a major speech on voting rights Thursday, Hillary Clinton laid out a far-reaching vision for expanding access to the ballot box, and denounced Republican efforts to make voting harder.

Speaking at Texas Southern University in Houston, Clinton called for every American to be automatically registered to vote when they turn 18 unless they choose not to be. She backed a nationwide standard of at least 20 days of early voting. She urged Congress to pass legislation strengthening the Voting Rights Act, which was gravely weakened by a 2013 Supreme Court ruling. And she slammed restrictive voting laws imposed by the GOP in Texas, North Carolina, Ohio, and Wisconsin, which she said affect minorities and students in particular.

“What is happening is a sweeping effort to dis-empower and disenfranchise people of color, poor people, and young people from one end of our country to the other.”

“We have a responsibility to say clearly and directly what’s really going on in our country,” Clinton said, “because what is happening is a sweeping effort to dis-empower and disenfranchise people of color, poor people, and young people from one end of our country to the other.”

“We should be clearing the way for more people to vote, not putting up every road-block anyone can imagine,” Clinton added.

From a political perspective, forthrightly calling out Republican voting restrictions and advocating greater access to voting will likely help Clinton shore up key sections of her base – minorities and students in particular. And it could put the GOP on notice that further efforts to make voting harder may backfire by giving Democrats a tool to motivate their supporters.

Clinton, the prohibitive front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination, called out by name several of her potential 2016 rivals – Rick Perry, Scott Walker, Jeb Bush, and Chris Christie – for supporting restrictive voting policies. She said Republicans should stop “fearmongering about a phantom epidemic of voter fraud.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton said relatively little about the most hot-button voting issue, voter ID – an approach that also appears politically savvy. Despite evidence that as many as 10% of eligible voters, disproportionately minorities, don’t have the ID required by strict versions of the law, polls show voter ID is generally popular.

Instead, Clinton sought to move the voting rights debate for 2016 toward more advantageous terrain for Democrats and voting rights supporters: expanding access to voting and voter registration, to make it easier to cast a ballot and bring more Americans into the process.

Noting that between one quarter and one third of all Americans aren’t registered to vote, Clinton called for an across-the-board modernization of the registration process. The centerpiece: universal automatic voter registration, in which every citizen is automatically registered when they turn 18 unless they affirmatively choose not to be, effectively changing the system’s default status from non-registered to registered. Oregon passed such a law earlier this year, and several other states, including California, are considering the idea.

“I think this would have a profound impact on our elections and our democracy,” Clinton said.

Clinton also said registration should be updated automatically when a voter moves, and called for making voter rolls more accurate secure. And she said Republican efforts to restrict voter registration, seen in Texas, Florida, and other states, disproportionately affect marginalized communities, and students.

Around 50 million eligible voters aren’t registered, according to a recent study by the Center for Popular Democracy, based on Census Bureau data. That’s three times as many as the number who are registered but stay home.

Clinton said the nationwide early voting standard of at least 20 days should also include evening and weekend voting, to accommodate those with work or family commitments.

“If families coming out of church on Sunday are inspired to go vote, they should be free to do just that,” Clinton said, in a reference to the Souls to the Polls drives that are popular in Africa-American communities, in which people vote en masse after church.

Wisconsin, Ohio, and North Carolina — all Republican-controlled states — have cut their early voting periods in recent years, with the latter two states also eliminating same-day voter registration. And a third of all states offer no early voting at all. Democratic efforts to create or expand early voting have been killed, or allowed to languish in committee, by Republicans in at least 15 states, eight of them in the south, according to a tally compiled by the Democratic Legislative Campaign Committee.

In addition, Clinton called for Congress to fully implement the recommendations of a bipartisan presidential panel on voting released last year, which included online voter registration and establishing the principle that voters shouldn’t wait more than 30 minutes. And she suggested that laws barring ex-felons from voting should be liberalized, adding her voice to a growing push against felon disenfranchisement laws.

And Clinton lamented the Supreme Court’s weakening of the Voting Rights Act.

“We need a Supreme Court that cares more about protecting the right to vote of a person to vote than the right of a corporation to buy an election,” she said.

Asked by msnbc on a call with reporters whether it was realistic to propose legislation, given the record of the Republican-controlled Congress, a senior official with the Clinton campaign pointed to ”encouraging signs” in the states, arguing that such changes could be implemented at the state level with federal support.

On voter ID, Clinton’s criticism of Texas’s law was centered on a provision that allows concealed gun permits but not student IDs, suggesting partisan bias. She didn’t offer the kind of broader condemnation of ID laws per se often voiced by voting and civil rights groups. And in criticizing Wisconsin and North Carolina’s slew of voting restrictions, she focused on cuts to early voting rather than those states’ ID laws.

Hours before Clinton spoke, a de facto arm of her campaign that provides pro-Clinton information to the media sent out an email documenting the GOP 2016 hopefuls’ records of supporting restrictive voting policies, which it contrasted with Clinton’s expansive approach.

Clinton’s speech comes less than a week after her campaign’s top lawyer, Marc Elias, filed suit to challenge Wisconsin’s voting restrictions. Last month, Elias filed a similar lawsuit challenging Ohio’s early voting cuts.

Ohio Secretary of State Jon Husted called the lawsuit “frivolous” in a statement to msnbc and said Elias is wasting Ohioans’ tax dollars. “Hillary Clinton is calling for a national standard for early voting that is less than what Ohio currently offers," Husted said. "Given this fact, I call on her to tell her attorneys to drop her elections lawsuit against Ohio."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Clinton campaign has said it's not officially involved in the lawsuits but supports them.

In choosing to give the speech in Texas, Clinton was going into the belly of the beast. In addition to the ID law, which has been struck down as racially discriminatory and is currently being appealed, Texas also has the strictest voter registration rules in the country. And last week, a voting group alleged that the state is systematically failing to process registration applications, msnbcreported.

Clinton has long had a strong record on voting issues. As a volunteer for the 1972 George McGovern presidential campaign, Clinton worked to register Latino voters in Texas. And in 2005 as a senator, she introduced an expansive voting bill that would have made Election Day a national holiday and set standards for early voting.

At Texas Southern, Clinton received the Barbara Jordan Leadership Award, named for the crusading civil rights leader who was the first southern black woman elected to the U.S. House of Representatives.

Hillary Clinton Calls For Automatic, Universal Voter Registration // HuffPo // Ryan Reilly – June 4, 2015

Hillary Clinton in a speech on Thursday called for universal, automatic voter registration, saying every citizen in the country should be automatically registered to vote when they turn 18, unless they opt-out.

Clinton spoke at Texas Southern University in Houston, where she was receiving the Barbara Jordan Public-Private Leadership Award. She also said Republican-led efforts in several states to further regulate voting and voter registration disproportionately harm both underrepresented communities and young people.

Clinton also called for a national standard that would require every state in the country to offer at least 20 days of early in-person voting, including keeping polling stations open on weekends and evenings.

During her speech, Clinton also called on Congress to pass legislation to give the federal government power to review changes to state voting laws before they go into effect. A Supreme Court decision in 2013 struck down a key provision of the landmark Voting Rights Act that required certain states to have their voting changes pre-cleared by the Justice Department or by a panel of federal judges before they were implemented.

The Robby Mook Playbook // Buzzfeed // Ruby Cramer – June 4, 2015

Eight years ago in Nevada, on the first race he managed for Hillary Clinton, Robby Mook provided everyone on the team with a copy of his 175-page training manual. Some staffers, the field organizers, received a second item: one standard-issue composition notebook, bound in black-and-white marble, the kind kids use in school.

These were "organizing books." They were considered vital to the field operation, or as Mook called it, "the program." And like everything pertaining to the program, the organizing books came with a system, and the system with instructions. In this particular case, they could be found in the manual. (Page 110, "Getting Organized.")

Your notebook should be divided into three sections per day: calendar, notes, and action items…

Every morning began with a new calendar entry — a simple table, two columns. Down the left-hand margin, organizers wrote out 24 timestamps, one for every half-hour interval in the day. (Twelve hours, minimum.)

To the right, they scheduled and recorded their activity.

You will track progress to goal using the tools provided by the campaign including maintaining your organizing notebook…

For eight months, it went like this. They started in desert summer, 100-degree days. For eight months, they logged every half-hour of every hour of every long and hot day. For eight months, time passed in 30-minute intervals — from the statewide call (which got earlier as the caucuses got closer), to the single break in the daily schedule (lunch, 12:30 to 1 p.m.), to the long slog of the afternoon (the one-on-one meetings with volunteers, the call-time, the house meetings in the evening), to the final, most important task of the day.

At 9 p.m., it was time to report.

All Hillary Clinton for President-Nevada staff are expected to report nightly by 9:15 p.m.… These reports are vital to ensuring that our strategy is succeeding and an important recognition of the tremendous contribution staff are making…

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Organizers went first, entering the results of their day into a finicky computer system called the Donkey. Next, the regional directors. Then the field director. It was his job to take their aggregate data and combine it all into one last report. And that went to Mook.

Then the day was over.

All of this — the ledgers, the reports — was in service of the goals. Mook laid them out in the training manual, his initial plan. To beat Barack Obama in Nevada, the Clinton campaign would need to enlist exactly 2,475 volunteers, train 1,744 precinct captains, and generate 24,751 caucus-goers. And to meet those goals, the team would have to meet their smaller daily goals.

The benchmarks underwent constant examination and adjustment. They were continually evaluated, tweaked, and reset, all based on data from the field team's nightly progress reports. It was a three-part process, played out ceaselessly, day after day — as if the heartbeat of the campaign.

On Jan. 19, 2008, that's how Clinton won. There was some initial confusion about the national delegate count. Because of his victory in a more heavily weighted district, Obama walked away that night with an extra delegate. But Clinton carried the vote. Mook, at 28 years old, delivered the campaign's first caucus win — and at a time when they needed it badly. He then took his playbook to Ohio, Indiana, Puerto Rico. Most of his team came with him — and they beat Obama there, too. The operative, clean-cut and unassuming, was Clinton's most winning state director. He came out of 2008 a star.

But working for Mook was hard. The days were long and unrelenting. The structure was rigid.

Failure to report nightly will have serious consequences and may be grounds for dismissal.

They were exhausted all the time. And yet, the next morning, they woke up and did it all over again… They wanted to.

Some members of the Nevada field team struggled to explain why in interviews — though most pointed to Mook. It's not that he wasn't regimented, they said. He was. All the time. But there was something else that kept them going. And it was essential.

In 2010, Mook helped write another manual — this one for Democrats hoping to run a race like Nevada. They called it the "Engagement Campaign." There, a manager's job is plainly described as winning: "setting clear, measurable, WINNING campaign goals and creating a culture of excellence and commitment to meet those goals."

But the other required component, the manual says, is "motivation."

Since one of your major resources is people — and since people are the resource that generate your other key resource, money — an Engagement Campaign is all about motivating people…

Brian DiMarzio, the deputy field director in Nevada, described it another way. There was one night on the campaign, he said, that didn't end the way it always did. Clinton happened to be in town, and it was thunderstorming badly. After her event, the staff dragged everything back to headquarters in the pouring rain. The power was out, and they sat there in the darkness, dripping wet.

Then, from the silence, they heard clapping.

It was Mook. He was going into his routine.

It started slow at first. Then other people joined in and the pace picked up and the clapping got louder. It was still dark in the office — and they were still wet. But soon everybody was clapping. They clapped faster and faster, and then they were cheering too, and the sound in the room got so loud and fast it was almost frenzied.

Finally they went still… and Mook started to speak.

"Everyone was back in that place he gets you in," said DiMarzio. "He'd talk about the event you just did, and about how it's neck-and-neck, and it's so close, and" — he slipped into a Mook impression — "'do you want to look back at the end of this campaign, if we lose by 1,000 votes and think, I could have maybe pulled in a couple hundred votes myself if I'd just done 15 minutes harder each day?'"

It was contagious, DiMarzio said. Former colleagues described similar moments. Sometimes on a staff call — other times in the office. (One referred to it as "the preach.")

It's about motivating staff, volunteers, and voters… To do that, you must do more than merely talk about the candidate's biography and policy positions…

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"He could get you to give everything that you had, you would give it, and then thank him for it later," said DiMarzio. "When you're working more than 12 hours every day and it's 10:30 p.m., you finish and think, I'm gonna strangle Robby. But at the end of the day, you'd be clapping with everyone else — and you believed it."

… To engage people, you must inspire them.

"By the end of it, you're on Team Robby, and you're not getting off."

A lot of people are on Team Robby.

It is a big team, full of committed teammates. By the time Clinton lost 2008, it had a name: the "Mook Mafia." Its members share one thing. They have witnessed or experienced firsthand a campaign with the 35-year-old operative.

In the Mafia group, Mook is equal parts friend, mentor, and figurehead. But for many of the affiliated, Team Robby is as much about its leader as the political philosophy he champions: namely, the power of "organizing."

Mook is now at the helm of Clinton's second presidential campaign — and that model will be tested like never before, on the biggest stage there is. In each of the early states, he'll construct what he did eight years ago in Nevada: a true organizing program.

It will be the biggest challenge of his young career. Mook has managed plenty of races since 2008. Most recently, he helped Terry McAuliffe, the longtime Democratic fundraiser and Clinton family friend, become governor of Virginia. But now Mook is running a campaign larger than his background in field. And to accomplish what he does best, he'll have to foster the environment his campaigns require.

At the center of the intractable, messy thing known as "Clintonworld," Mook needs another Nevada: that rare mix of discipline and accountability with enthusiasm and encouragement that makes his field programs possible.

It will be a momentous first — for Mook, for his followers, and for a generation of operatives who see themselves as organizers. Never before has a manager constructed a national campaign operation like this, so deliberately or so squarely, under the banner of organizing or in the mold of the so-called "Engagement Campaign."

Hillary Clinton delivers a speech at a high school in Las Vegas in 2007. Isaac Brekken / AP

About 10 years ago, Clinton was pitched on an early version of this strategy. It was, she was told, a "new kind of organizing" — and it was going to change politics.

This was the summer after the 2004 election, when a collection of campaign aides from that cycle got the chance to attend a private gathering of Democratic senators. It was an audience with some of the party's top legislators — and a rare opportunity to speak directly with the senator many in the room viewed as the party's next nominee.

So when the moment came, they talked to Clinton about organizing. Howard Dean's presidential campaign had done something special in New Hampshire, they said. And there were technological advances rapidly changing the face of elections. Imagine the gains Democrats could make, the operatives told Clinton, if they could weave it all together.

Dean, of course, didn't make it past February in the primaries. But for many of the operatives and activists who came up in politics around the time of his brief rise, the former Vermont governor helped redefine the very concept of "field."

Most campaigns focused almost exclusively on building supporter lists, often from scratch. The effort requires identifying voters — supporters, undecideds, backers of the opponent, and various shades in between. The process, called "voter contact" in field-speak, is simple, time-consuming, and necessary. And it happens only one way: door by door, call by call, for hours and hours, every day. Campaigns can use staff and volunteers — but often, they pay a team of canvassers to do the work.

In New Hampshire, Dean aides flipped the traditional field operation on its head.

They pulled people off voter contact — away from the doors and the phones — and instead trained them as organizers in the tradition of the '60s and '70s. Using techniques from the protest and labor movements of that era — one-on-one meetings, house meetings — the Dean campaign set out to build a volunteer army.

The idea went was this: Organizers sought to cultivate relationships with voters, enlist them as volunteers, and then develop those volunteers into "volunteer leaders" — who would invest even more time, take on even more responsibility, and recruit even more volunteers. The objective was an organization of devoted supporters, not cogs in the machine or paid labor. And the result, ultimately, was far greater capacity for voter contact.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The volunteers, together, could do more at the phones and the doors and on Election Day than the campaign ever could have otherwise. Or at least, that was the bet. Each half-hour spent on organizing — finding, meeting with, or training volunteers — was a half-hour that could be spent simply identifying voters.

But the risk was worth pursuing, the Democratic aides told Clinton in 2005.

Zack Exley, an adviser on the Dean race who attended the meeting with the senators, said that he and the other operatives urged Clinton to embrace the organizing practices of 2004 — and to push officials at the Democratic National Committee to do the same.

"We were saying to her, 'Senator, you need to take care of that,'" Exley recalled of the exchange. "'This is a new kind of field organizing that's possible. If you connect it with the right online stuff, it'll change everything. You gotta get on this.'"

Clinton was a receptive listener — but remained unconvinced.

"The organizing takes care of itself," the senator told the operatives, according to Exley. "Once you have that clear message, then organizing just takes care of itself."

She believed organizing would "rise up around a good message automatically," Exley said. "Kind of like if setting up a field campaign was like placing a media buy."

Three years later, Clinton lost on message and on organizing.

Barack Obama captured Democrats' eagerness for something different. And in both Iowa and South Carolina, despite pressure from headquarters to keep up with voter-contact metrics, aides were given the room they needed. Many were among the upstarts of the 2004 races, an ascendant new class of operatives-as-organizers.

Clinton had some of them, too. Mook won in Nevada — and his mentor, Karen Hicks, the engineer of Dean's New Hampshire program, oversaw the early states. But aides at headquarters hardly made a full-scale commitment to organizing. Even as Mook went to work building his field program, his operation remained badly under-resourced.

"Robby ran a very organized campaign on a shoestring in Nevada," as Hicks put it.

One summer day, as temperatures climbed into triple digits out West, a Clinton aide back in Virginia sent a staff-wide email to say: There's ice cream cake in the freezer.

"We never got any of the resources we needed," said one former Nevada staffer. "We have 75-year-old ladies we're sending out to canvass in the 110-degree heat… and somebody in Arlington is saying there's ice cream cake in the freezer?"

This time, Clinton has made organizing the priority.

Campaign officials have said that the state directors in Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina, and Nevada will not only have the resources they need — but they'll also get the candidate often, and in settings tailored to benefit their organizing efforts. Internally, they have even replaced the word "field" with "organizing" in staffers' titles.

As Exley put it, with Mook in charge, "she's not making the same mistake this time."

But there will be challenges. One question is whether the organizing model can actually scale effectively across the board in a presidential campaign. Obama came close in 2008. But before that, there were only isolated cases: John Kerry did it in Iowa in 2004. And Dean, whose campaign helped introduce organizing conceptually to a national electoral audience, really only did it in one state — New Hampshire.

Hicks, the operative who pulled it off, said the approach "lends itself to a primary" — and to a presidential candidate capable of exciting volunteer support. But there are two things organizing requires, and they stay the same, she said, "no matter what the campaign." First is a commitment to disciplined goals. Second is a commitment to the "shared values" — the methods and the principles that guide the campaign.

Mook has excelled at both. But it doesn't happen on its own. His campaigns come with requirements — a particular kind of leadership and a particular kind of anatomy.

If there is a prototype of the Mook campaign, it is Nevada in 2008.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For the evangelical belief in data — look to the sign that hung on his office wall, a reminder to himself and the staff of the three steps in their ongoing, data-driven process. “Set Goals, Experiment and Learn, Celebrate and Appreciate,” it read.

For the sense of “accountability,” fostered by the subculture of field and all its peculiarities — look to his idiosyncratic shorthand. One favorite: “No silos!” (Always said as if with an exclamation point.) The meaning: Keep communication open between departments. Another Mook term was the “plus delta.” (A twist on the “action item.”) This one, derived from the Greek letter denoting change, was a word for something specific that a staffer could improve or incorporate into his or her goals.

For the self-discipline — look to his fascination with “personal mastery,” which he preached to some of his staffers. It’s a concept from The Fifth Discipline, a 1990 book by MIT’s Peter Senge. Personal mastery is defined as a lifelong practice, divided into three parts: redefining and deepening your personal vision, focusing your energy, and “seeing reality objectively” as it pertains to others and, most important, to yourself. (The book touches on other Mook tropes: Senge writes that organizations are best built around a “shared vision,” not a leader’s goals or personality. And teams, he says, develop “extraordinary capacities” beyond the sum total abilities of individual members.)

And for his precise focus on the thing this was all for, the final goal — look to Dec. 12, 2007, when just one month before the caucuses, Mook got his regionals together to deliver big news. The numbers they’d all been working toward, the ones in the manual, wouldn’t be enough. They needed to double their goal — from 24,751 caucus-goers to 60,000.

Most of the team was alarmed. There’s a photo of two field staffers, Stuart Rosenberg and Dan DeBauche, as they listen to Mook in the meeting. (It still makes the rounds every few months.) Rosenberg is dismayed, bent over in his seat, head in hand. “Stu looks like he’s about to have a coronary,” said DeBauche, the regional field director for South Las Vegas, Henderson, and Boulder City.

DeBauche is shown leaning back in his chair, hands clasped behind his head. He looks fine. “Everyone was freaking out, but internally we already had a plan,” he said. A couple nights before the meeting, Mook and Marlon Marshall, the field director, had pulled DeBauche in to help game out the new numbers. The expression, he said of the photo, reflected the calm of the boss. Mook knew it was possible, so long as they could answer the one question that mattered: “How do we get to 52% with this new reality?”

DeBauche, left, with Rosenberg, right, in the meeting with Mook and Marshall in December 2007. Courtesy of Zack Exley

That’s the thing, essentially, they were asking, of themselves and of one another, with every meeting, every organizing-book entry, every nightly report. And the answer — it was another question, one written in all caps on printouts, taped to the office wall:

“DID YOU REPORT YET?”

When organizers fell short, managers consulted the data — or the marble composition books — before advising adjustments. (This is phase two: “Experiment and Learn.”) If organizers were holding a good number of one-on-one meetings with potential volunteers but barely recruiting any, they’d get help on their asks. If they weren’t scheduling enough, they’d get help with time management.

“If your numbers weren’t good, we needed to understand why,” said DiMarzio, the deputy field director, of the organizing books. “That means you are going to use every minute of every day as effectively as you could be to elect Hillary Clinton.”

Mook made clear that meeting daily goals, even for the most junior members of the organizing team, was essential to 52% in Nevada. Three hours of call-time wasn’t three hours at a desk with a phone and a list of numbers — it was three hours for which you were beholden to your teammates, accountable for winning.

“He ensures that everyone understands their part in achieving our shared goal,” said Mara Lee, who served as Mook’s caucus director in Nevada.

The work itself was a grind. Field staffers on the campaign recalled daily disappointments: It wasn’t uncommon to invest hours in a volunteer who would then flake on a commitment. Or to spend a day working the phones with little success. (Consider the numbers: Say an organizer makes 150 calls to potential volunteer recruits. From those calls, the organizer might schedule 15 volunteer shifts. Of those shifts, 10 volunteers might show up. And in that small pool, the organizer might find one potential precinct captain. It’s hours of work for the possibility of one precinct captain.)

Once, as a “trial by fire” for a new batch of organizers, DeBauche asked they make phone calls for 12 continuous hours, from 9 a.m. “straight through until 9 p.m.,” he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He still hasn’t forgotten one. Lisa. She made 681 calls that day.

“Of course I remember,” he said. “That’s just ridiculous!”

Through the hot slog of Nevada, Mook worked just as hard as his team.

Eight years later, the old staff still expressed disbelief at his schedule: He did things like arrive at the office at 6 a.m., leave at 3 a.m., and then do it again the next day, they said.

Mook wanted the office to see him share in the work. He made it a frequent practice, across departments, to take on jobs here and there, said Lee. “He is notorious for doing the work himself: making fundraising calls, knocking on doors, marching in the parade, separating literature — or whatever task is needed.” Field staffers said Mook would jump into a regional’s office, grab a call list, and run down 10 or 15 names.

He wanted to show them, Lee said, that “no one is too senior or too important.” He also wanted to set the bar high for work ethic, another former field staffer said. “He wanted us to see that he was always working so that we would do the same.”

And he took every opportunity: At headquarters, a business center in Las Vegas, the campaign occupied two ground-floor suites separated by a narrow courtyard. Mook chose an office with large plate window that provided a view outside — and into the other office suite across the way. Members of the field team recalled a ubiquitous image from their time in Las Vegas: Mook at his desk, always working, always within view.

The plain details of the Nevada campaign could sound grim: a strict, grinding affair, all in service of a losing candidate whose primary defeat meant her staffers could never completely share in the Democratic euphoria of election night 2008.

And yet, the large share of the field team talks about their time in the desert, living in 30-minute blocks, with warmth and zeal.

There is a second necessary piece to Mook’s campaign: It is cultural, and it begins with him. There’s no easy explanation of the tone he sets, how he sets it, and keeps it, even as the demands of the work grow. (“He’s just one of those people,” offered Exley.)

Not everyone left Nevada as devoted to Mook as his team of organizers. There were other departments — communications, operations. Mook ran them, but his mind was always on the program. And his core following was there, in the field department.

Those who worked as his organizers struggled putting into words exactly what draws people to the young campaign manager. But many are, and have been for years. Mook showed that from the start, in the summer of 2003, when a group from Howard Dean’s campaign spent a sweltering weekend in Durham, N.H., learning how to organize.

Hicks, leading the New Hampshire operation, had asked a veteran of the trade to act as their teacher. And so Marshall Ganz, a Harvard professor who worked as an organizer with Cesar Chavez and the United Farm Workers in the ’60s and ’70s, spent those few un-air-conditioned days going over the basics: the relationship-building, storytelling, the one-on-ones, house meetings, and the nuts and bolts of the quantitative side.

That was the part Mook liked — he was, as Ganz observed, “the data guy.”

But to colleagues, he was just as skilled with the interpersonal element. “He was the best at people. Everybody coming out of the New Hampshire experience was a mad genius at field. He was a mad genius but didn’t come across that way,” said Exley. “People talk about the way Bill Clinton makes you feel like you’re the only person in the room — Robby has that.”

“I think people felt genuinely loved by him. He exuded this love of individuals.”

Some former staffers described him as they might a well-loved camp counselor. He was serious about the work, but could be goofy. He had an infectious enthusiasm for campaigns. And he put others at ease, old Nevada colleagues said, because he was comfortable with his own eccentricities — of which there were many.

He’d walk into the campaign office, and to greet the staff, let out one long “TEEEEEAAAAAAAAAMM.” There were state-specific variations, too. One former aide recalled him once yelling out to the Ohio office, “APPALAAAACHHIA WOOMMENNN.” (They’d been targeting female voters in the state’s Appalachian communities.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When an organizer submitted his nightly report on time, without first needing a reminder, Mook might offer his praise by spelling out a fake URL — "www.accountability.com !" — as if a lighthearted pat on the back.

And then there were the nicknames. Everyone in Nevada had one. (Brian DiMarzio was "Bri Guy." Dan DeBauche, "De-Boo," pronounced DEE-boo. And Mara Lee, "Nobody Does It Like Mara Lee," rhyming, of course, with the Sara Lee jingle.)

Creating the right culture, Ganz said, ultimately becomes the "central skill" required of a manager on an organizing-based campaign. "The old school says there's a boss that shouts at everybody and tells them what to do," he said. "People are terrorized."

Mook makes his first television appearance as campaign manager last month. CNBC

"A campaign needs to be a story, a strategy, and a structure. The narrative is the values and the inspiration," said Ganz. "The reason you need the details and the numbers is not just so that you can watch people — it's so that you can learn."

"You have to create a spirit of learning and of support."

There was a larger effect in Nevada. People talk about the experience in personal, almost electrifying terms. Some are eager to explain, to try to tell you how it all felt in the end — the conditions, the exacting work, the shared culture, just being around him. It was something close to whatever they felt that rainy night in Las Vegas, soaking wet and clapping — something close, a few said, to "inspiration." It was heightening.

"It's a crazy thing to be that inspired by somebody who is just a guy, you know?" said DeBauche. "He gets the most out of people. If you have any self-awareness, you leave that realizing that you accomplished things you didn't think were possible."

"I knew it was happening as it was happening."

For DiMarzio, Mook was like a coach. "He taught me how to organize my work, how to be disciplined and focused, to do things I didn't think I could do," he said.

"When someone teaches you, and empowers you, you start to think, I can do this. I can do amazing things. Maybe I can do anything. Robby said I could."

The mechanics of Mook's campaigns have produced an unusual thing. It has roots in Nevada and has grown in size and shape in the years since. It was, in the months running up to his job on the 2016 campaign, talked about in the media more than any of Mook's previous accomplishments or qualifications as a manager.

And it still is, many of its members say, badly misunderstood.

To observers, the Mook Mafia and an email listserv by the same name most resemble a "cult." The group is less an exclusive club, more a loose confederation of friends and former colleagues, men and women, from various campaigns, numbering around 150 people. The members are tight-knit enough to attend an annual reunion. They don't disagree it's cult-like. But they also don't mean it in a bad way.

It's just a by-product of the Mook experience.

They worked the hardest they ever had, felt more capable, more enabled than ever by a state director who didn't appear concerned with his own standing. Just the team's. And they bought into that, to the whole thing. They committed to the organization, to the process, the cause — the leader. It wasn't "just for the candidate" that they all worked like hell, as one field staffer said, "but for Robby and the whole team — because you really were a team."

The Mook Mafia has, in fact, been the most visible manifestation of that team — of the buy-in that produces what appears to be, to the outside, such strange devotion. The email list. The nicknames. ("Deacon Mook," "Reverend Marshall.") The hashtags. ("#Mafia4Life.") The reunion itineraries (with maps, pictures, schedules). The grainy website, a WordPress blog from 2009, featuring job listings and a Mafia logo. (The bubble lettering is, in place of a color, filled with an image of Mook and Marshall.)

There's been a conscious effort to keep the welcome feel of the campaign. But they haven't always succeeded.

In 2008, an invite-only offshoot group called the "Free Radicals" materialized briefly, somewhere out of Indiana. It was too exclusive, a "Mafia elite" for senior staff — and so they shut the thing down. The incident was "small," a former aide said, "but pretty big to a lot of people who weren't invited to join in."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The logo on the Mook Mafia's old website, now defunct. Wordpress

It's all very intense. And Mook is often the focus.

Members once printed Mafia tees that read "Est. 2004," not because the group dates back that far — but because that's the year Mook got his start in politics. And in 2009, when the WordPress blog went live, a member left a comment to congratulate the group: "glad Mafia finally got on the web. next feat: a facebook page for Robby Mook."

Marlon Marshall, his longtime right hand, emailed the list more often than his counterpart and played a heavier role in facilitating events like the reunions. Mook, meanwhile, is known as a private guy. He is social, but not a partier. He does interviews, but not if he can help it. And he is the first openly gay person to manage a major presidential campaign, but he won't be boasting about that or much else.

He is an unlikely fit for the figurehead role, and that may be why he's in it.

Peter Senge spends a good deal of his management book, The Fifth Discipline, describing the qualities that make an effective leader. ("Personal mastery," the concept Mook mentioned to other staffers in Nevada, plays a major role.)

There are leaders who are "heroes in their own minds," writes Senge, and they will never successfully lead an organization. True leaders don't think of their own interests: "Their focus is invariably on what needs to be done, the larger system in which they are operating, and the people with whom they are creating — not on themselves as 'leaders.'" True leaders have shared vision, and that results in a loyal following.

As Senge puts it: "Leaders with vision are cult heroes."

It was November 2014, and it looked like he was going to get the campaign manager job, when early one morning, Mook and his group ended up in the headlines. The first one, an ABC News "EXCLUSIVE," landed at 6:01 a.m., the same day the Clintons and their friends and former aides kicked off a big reunion weekend in Little Rock, Arkansas: "Read the Secret Emails of the Men Who May Run Hillary Clinton's Campaign."

The group hadn't been a secret. Neither was the Mook Mafia email list. But the article, quoting a set of largely innocuous messages, cast the group as controversial, maybe even salacious. (The most "eyebrow-raising" email was a mock press release quoting Bill Clinton: "This is even more exciting than walking through the back of the Bellagio.")

The Mook Mafia list was shut down that day.

At some point over the year, the group's WordPress blog was also removed, its various pages scraped from the Internet Archive. And the last annual reunion, one of the longest Mafia traditions, never happened. Since late 2008, when they all met up in Nevada, members of the group have made time once a year for a weekend away. This was a first.

At no point did the story put Mook's job in danger, but the incident rattled some Clinton advisers. There were theories about the leak: Some thought it came from a former staffer, one with an axe to grind against Mook. Some saw it as a move to boost another operative's chances at campaign manager. Whatever the reason, some of the emails were said to have been circulating among reporters for months. And when they made it into print, when the email list was deactivated — the Mook Mafia died a little.

Since the ABC News story, there has been no activity inside the group.

It was the earliest, starkest sign that Mook would have to work hard to create and preserve the very particular environment his campaigns require to succeed — and that building it in the middle of Clinton's world would be an exceptional challenge.

In the four decades since Bill's first run for office, he and his wife have acquired a tangled and unwieldy network of friends, associates, and confidants. Many worked on, advised, or meddled in unhelpful ways with Hillary Clinton's first presidential bid. The campaign's outstanding feature, in the end, was its dysfunction. The infighting tampered with the team's operation, and spirit, in a way Mook's system could not abide.

Two months into the 2016 race, Mook has put the mechanics in motion. There's no doubt they'll focus on organizing in this campaign. Senior campaign officials will tell you that Clinton is headquartered in Brooklyn — but that the lifeblood of the operation is in the early states. They'll tell you that the state directors are building a volunteer leadership organization, that digital will enhance but not replace the classic model. They'll tell you this is a campaign to win Iowa, the first of the caucus states.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But there's more to it than that. There's a difference between what Mook hopes to do and what Ganz, the organizing expert, described as a purely "mechanical" field program. People can "run around doing what they're told, reading scripts, getting responses."

Or they can participate in an organizing program. But to make it work, Ganz said, "people have got to support it, and protect it, and invest in it, and believe in it."

In the 2010 manual he helped write, "Campaigning to Engage and Win," creating a "deliberate culture" is ranked as the first task of any manager — ahead of the budget, of fundraising, of building the website, of developing trust with the candidate.

Every campaign has a culture — the way staff and volunteers engage with each other and with your opponent and their staff. The challenge is taking the time and creating the space to develop that culture deliberately… Create a culture of accountability, not rules… a culture of excellence… a culture of learning…

"Culture" is not a loose term. It is built into the program.

Strong campaigns are those where staff and volunteers are committed not just to the candidate, but also to each other in a common purpose to win.

Eight years ago in Nevada — in a one-page document about halfway through the training manual — Mook outlined his idea of the culture for the campaign, the "Team Values," in five categories: Respect, Accountability and Discipline, Communication and Honesty,Leadership and Creativity, and Teamwork and Loyalty. A string of bullet points follows the headings, expanding on the tenets and qualities behind each one.

The last in the list reads, "Know we are at our best when we are together."

There will be no shortage of resources for field in this campaign, no question that the organizers will get what they need, no resentment in Iowa or New Hampshire, Nevada or South Carolina, over ice cream cake in the freezer at headquarters.

The question is whether the entire staff — from the volunteers to the campaign chair to the most seniors advisers to Bill Clinton — will support, protect, and invest in what Mook does… Whether he can be the leader he was in Nevada, overseeing a growing staff in Brooklyn, at the top of a billion-dollar Clinton operation… Whether he can walk down the hallway and duck into an office and run down 15 names on a call list… Or head into the bullpen and let out one long, steady "TEEEEEAAAAAAAAAMM." Can he do any of that this time? Can he give a nickname to someone who's been in Clinton's orbit for a decade, or get them talking about plus deltas or personal mastery or setting goals — or ask them to use every minute of every day, ask them to work harder than they ever have?

Can he make them followers — can he push them, inspire them, get them clapping in the dark at night?

This is what the culture requires. Everyone in the campaign must give themselves over to the rules; the structure; the rigor of adjustment; the constantly changing goals; the trust in common, sincere shared values; the purpose. Everyone must be accountable and must believe. Everyone must buy in.

His success will depend on it.

Will Hillary Be Our 3rd Black President? // The Daily Beast // Michael Tomasky – June 5, 2015

Were Obama's 95-5 margins an aberration because of his race? So everyone says. But maybe 95-5 (or something close) is the new normal.

Here's one story I predict you're going to read (should you choose to) about 367 times over the next 17 months: that Hillary Clinton isn't going to do as well or maybe even nearly as well among African American voters, because, well, it's obvious. Black people, we'll be told, won't be enthusiastic about turning out to vote for her, because what's she ever done for them. And of course some portion of those 367 stories will feature breathless speculation that the Republican, whoever it is, just might surprise us among black voters, because remember what George W. Bush did in 2004, and the younger generation of African Americans don't feel the old loyalty to the Democrats their parents did, and, and, and, you can write the rest yourself.

It will be a key element in the "Hillary's in Trouble" meme that's going to dominate the coverage of her campaign in the mainstream media. But is there any truth to it?

Yes, a little. Clinton and John Podesta and her other strategists are acknowledging as much with the big speech she gave yesterday in Texas laying the lumber into Republicans about voting rights and recent GOP voter-suppression schemes. This was her first capital-P Political speech of the campaign, and the fact that she chose to make that speech about this topic and not a broader economic one, or one aimed squarely at women, say, demonstrates clearly enough that Clinton is concerned about getting out the black vote.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It was also a partisan speech, of the sort she doesn't usually give and most presidential candidates don't typically deliver this early in the process. If it's true that partisanship turns off centrist voters, and it is to some extent, then the Clinton camp obviously made the calculation that with respect to this issue and the larger goal of black turnout, alienating some white independent voters is a price worth paying.

But how much worrying does Clinton really need to do here? The standard media line, as suggested above, will be that Obama skewed things by being black and all, and that if you go back to 2004 and recall that George W. Bush got 16 percent of the black vote in Ohio, that was somehow a more "normal" state of affairs, since there were two white candidates.

So let's look at the numbers. Yes, Obama did skew things. He won the black vote 95-4 in 2008 and 93-6 in 2012. By contrast, John Kerry won the black vote 88-11. If you go back to 1964, that's exactly what the Democratic nominee averages, 88 percent. The Republican averages 10 percent.

Aside from head-to-head numbers, there's the matter of turnout. Obama also inspired blacks to vote in larger numbers, of course, so they made up 13 percent of the overall electorate in 2008 and 2012, as opposed to 11 percent in 2004. The increase in Ohio was particularly striking. In 2004, blacks constituted 10 percent of total Ohio vote. In 2012, they were 15 percent.

When Gerald Ford was getting 15 percent of the black vote in 1976, his party wasn't carrying out a jihad to make sure as few black people could vote as possible or uncorking champagne when the Supreme Court struck down the Voting Rights Act.
But here's the question. Are the Obama-era numbers an aberration, or are they more like a new normal? The near-universal assumption among journalists is aberration. But here's the case for why they might be something closer to the new normal, which rests on two points.

The first is the much-discussed demographic change. The white vote over the last three presidential elections has gone from 77 percent (2004) to 74 percent (2008) to 72 percent (2012). If the Obama era was an aberration, you'd expect that figure to bounce back up. But electoral demographers say quite the opposite. One comprehensive statistical model predicts that the white vote will just keep dropping, down maybe to 70 percent in 2016. The African American vote is expected to at least hold steady at 13.

But second and more important, it's about the Republican Party of then versus now. When Gerald Ford was getting 15 percent of the black vote in 1976, his party wasn't carrying out a jihad to make sure as few black people could vote as possible or uncorking champagne when the Supreme Court struck down the Voting Rights Act. Or, for that matter, trying to make sure as few working poor people as possible could have access to health insurance.

When I was young I thought Ronald Reagan's Republican Party was bad on race, and it was, but the GOP is a far more openly and aggressively anti-black-people party today. Back then, there were still a fair number of moderate Republicans in the House and Senate who voted for civil rights measures. Arguably the greatest legal crusader against segregation of the 1960s and 1970s was a Republican, the venerable John Doar. Heck, Republicans in Congress even reauthorized the VRA when Dubya was president! Those days are long, long gone. Maybe not forever, but certainly for the foreseeable future.

Clinton will have to work it. And she is—a proposal for automatic voter registration for every citizen who turns 18 (unless that citizen decides to opt out), which she called for in the speech, is great stuff. But her competition—unless they nominate Rand Paul, which seems increasingly unlikely—is making it easier for her. She probably won't duplicate Obama's numbers, but if someone wants to bet you that her black-vote totals will be closer to John Kerry's than to Obama's, that's a bet I'd advise you to take in heartbeat.

Hillary Clinton Cannot Afford to Lose Black Voters // The National Journal // Emily Schultheis – June 4, 2015

Barack Obama didn't need to do much—almost anything—to win record turnout from African-American voters. Hillary Clinton will need to pull out all the stops to score just a fraction of that support.

An exaggeration? Black political leaders don't think so.

"Make no mistake, there will be some drop-off," said Rep. Emanuel Cleaver of Missouri, a former chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, whose comments echoed those of other influential African-American Democrats.

Indeed, black leaders concede it will be nearly impossible for Clinton to replicate the level of turnout Obama's candidacy generated among this core demographic—a group of voters central to the national coalition necessary for a Democrat to win the White House. So she'll need to coax them to the polls by honing specific messages about policies relevant to the black community, something her team says she's preparing to unveil.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Thursday, Clinton will call for expanded early voting in every state, including weekend and evening hours over many days before Election Day—positions supported by Democrats who say working-class voters need greater access to the polls.

And she'll specifically criticize laws in North Carolina, Texas, and Wisconsin that, she argues, reduced rather than expanded access to the polls.

These are significant targets for Clinton. Democrats have their eyes on changing demographics in counties in North Carolina, Texas, and elsewhere that might begin to shift those states away from Republicans, perhaps as soon as 2016.

Black voters, specifically, are growing as a share of the electorate in many states. But while pollsters think Clinton will win them by similar margins to Obama—95 percent of African-Americans voted for the president in 2012—her team should not underestimate the challenge she will have motivating African-Americans to show up when the first black president isn't at the top of the ticket.

In 2012, the U.S Census Bureau estimated that just more than 66 percent of eligible black voters showed up at the polls—the highest turnout ever for this demographic group, higher even than turnout among whites. Indeed, Obama's support among black voters "went off the charts," said Brookings demographer William Frey—enough so that minority turnout, especially black turnout, was a deciding factor in the president winning a second term.

And in states like Virginia, North Carolina, and Florida, a difference in turnout of even a few percentage points could have big repercussions, Frey added.

"You could call it the excitement factor," he said. "At least in these states ... where blacks are a huge part of the minority population, she's going to need that."

In other words, unlike Obama, Clinton will really have to work for high black turnout.

"I can't in all honesty say that she will receive the same level of support as an African-American president," said Rep. Marcia Fudge of Ohio, "but clearly I do believe that if her message is strong she can get close."

Late last week, Clinton appointed LaDavia Drane, the former executive director of the CBC, as her African-American-outreach director. Drane joins a staff at Clinton's Brooklyn headquarters with several other high-profile African Americans among its ranks, including Marlon Marshall, the director of state campaigns; Maya Harris, a top policy adviser; and Karen Finney, a senior spokeswoman.

Harris, sister of California Democratic Senate candidate Kamala Harris and formerly of the Center for American Progress, has done research specifically on encouraging greater turnout of minority women, and she argued that they are a reliable voting bloc when they're given strong policy reasons to vote. That's true of black voters overall, she noted, and is part of the campaign's calculus.

"One thing we know is that issues matter—that at the end of the day, whether [African-American] voters are going to turn out is going to depend on whether they have been motivated to turn out," Harris told National Journal. "Secretary Clinton is well-situated to do that, both in terms of what she has already demonstrated in her life's work and in the issues she's talking about."

That motivation will come partly from policy proposals and partly from focusing on parts of Clinton's biography, the campaign says. Speaking in South Carolina last week, she put deliberate focus on her early career experiences at the Children's Defense Fund and her work for women and children. The campaign is also talking about specific policy positions that are relevant to the black community—health care, a minimum-wage increase, substance-abuse issues, and perhaps most noticeably, criminal-justice reform, which Clinton addressed in a speech at Columbia back in April. Clinton aides are quick to note that it was her first policy speech as a candidate—and with its proposals to provide body cameras for police officers nationwide and end the "era of mass incarceration," it was a direct response to unrest over police activity in Baltimore and other cities.

"Her speech in New York was amazing," said Bakari Sellers, a former South Carolina state legislator who backed Obama in 2008 but is now supporting Clinton. "It's a serious plank in terms of African-American outreach, it's one that can be developed, it's one that can help galvanize not just your typical participants ... but also a new generation of voices."

The other key piece of necessary strategy is the ground game. Cleaver said African-American leaders are welcoming signs from Clinton that her team will build a robust turnout operation in urban areas, which is something Obama—whose candidacy was naturally a source of excitement to many black voters—didn't need to do. Clinton's 2016 team, with campaign manager Robby Mook at the helm, is placing heavy emphasis on grassroots strategy; it has sizable field teams in the four early states.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The president did not have to do a lot in the urban core, and didn't—he used his resources elsewhere," Cleaver said. "So I think you're going to find elected officials celebrating the fact that there's a great deal of attention being paid to the ground game."

That starts in South Carolina, the only one of the four early states with a large African-American population. Clinton's campaign has hired a team of staffers and field organizers—including state director Clay Middleton and state political director Jalisa Washington, both of whom are African Americans with strong ties to the state's politics. A half-dozen field organizers are already in place in the state, focusing on traditionally African-American neighborhoods and gathering places as they start to introduce themselves and the campaign to the state's voters."We are going to where the voters are. So we are in faith-based communities, we are at churches, we are at several social-justice organizations," Middleton said. "We have field organizers that look like the community and understand the community and can relate to those individuals."

Bernie Sanders Is Surging Among White Democrats, Minorities Love Hillary // NBC News //
Perry Bacon Jr. & Dante Chinni - June 3, 2014

When Hillary Clinton gives a speech in Houston on Thursday at a historically-black college calling for 20 days of early voting in every state, she will be reemphasizing her long-held commitment to defending the voting rights of minorities.

She will also be appealing to some of her strongest supporters: non-white Democrats.

In the early stages of the Democratic primary race, one of Clinton's rivals, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, has drawn huge crowds and surged in polls, although he remains well-behind the former secretary of state.

Sanders appears to have been benefited from the much-discussed divide between traditional Democrats like Clinton and those who are more liberal on economic issues like Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren.

But another divide has emerged that favors Clinton: white versus non-white Democrats. In a new Washington Post/ABC News survey, 56 percent of white Democrats backed Clinton, while 14 percent supported Sanders. Among self-described liberals, Sanders had 17 percent support, compared to 63 percent for Clinton. (Vice President Biden, who has given no indication he will run, polled in double-digits among both groups.)

But among non-white Democrats (the survey did not break them down by ethnicity), Clinton had 72 percent support, compared to 5 percent for the Vermont senator.

This finding mirrors that of other surveys. As Dante Chinni wrote last week, Wall Street Journal/NBC News polling shows that 68 percent of non-white Democrats say Clinton does not need a primary challenger, while the majority of white Democrats (53 percent) want her to face other candidates.

Among white Democrats, 56 percent say Clinton will bring "real change," compared to a whopping 81 percent of non-white Democrats, according to the WSJ/NBC survey. A CNN poll showed Sanders with 14 percent of the white vote, compared to 5 percent among non-white Democrats.

A Pew poll in March, before Clinton formally started her campaign, showed that 74 percent of black Democrats said there was a "good chance" they would back the former first lady. Only 54 percent of white Democrats agreed with that statement, with many of them (34 percent) opting with the less enthusiastic "some chance."

Sanders disproportionate support among whites and liberals is an advantage early in the primary process because it starts in Iowa and New Hampshire, two overwhelmingly-white states. In Iowa, 93 percent of the Democratic electorate was white in 2008.

And caucuses in particular reward the kind of intense supporters who are drawn to a candidate like Sanders.

But he will need to vastly expand his base to become a true challenger to Clinton. More than 40% of the people who voted for Obama in 2012 were ethnic minorities. Blacks may be the majority of voters in some Democratic primaries in the South, as they were in 2008.

For Clinton, barring the entrance of a candidate who would have more appeal to minority voters (First Lady Michelle Obama would be very strong with blacks and Biden would be more formidable than Sanders), this advantage among non-white voters provides a kind of security blanket for her in the primary.

But the former secretary of state is likely to keep courting non-white voters, in part to prepare for the general election, where maintaining Obama's huge advantage among minority voters is a virtual requirement for winning.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While Clinton has said little to address economic liberals in her first few weeks as a candidate, she has strongly emphasized her commitment to creating a pathway to citizenship for undocumented immigrants and reforming America's criminal justice system, issues that are strong priorities for black and Hispanic activists.

Clinton has a long-standing and ardent opposition to some of the voting provisions adopted recently by GOP governors and state legislatures, such as limits on same-day registration and requirements to present a photo ID to cast a ballot. In one of her first political speeches after leaving the State Department in 2013, Clinton called a North Carolina law, "the greatest hits of voter suppression."

She is expected to use similar language on Thursday, as well as calling for Congress to write a new version of the Voting Rights Act, after one of its core planks was struck down two years ago by the Supreme Court.

Is Hillary Ready for More Debates? // US News // David Catanese – June 4, 2015

Since January, Republicans with dreams of occupying the White House have dutifully traipsed to a dozen gatherings before audiences eager to compare and contrast their options for the presidency.

In order, there was the Iowa Freedom Summit, the Freedom Partners Koch brothers summit, the Conservative Political Action Conference, the Iowa Ag Summit, the South Carolina National Security Action Summit, the New Hampshire Freedom Summit, the First In the Nation Republican Leadership Summit, the Iowa Faith & Freedom Coalition forum, the South Carolina Freedom Summit, the National Review Ideas Summit, the Southern Republican Leadership Conference and Florida Gov. Rick Scott's Economic Growth Summit.

And on Saturday, the GOP contenders will make it a baker's dozen by descending on Boone, Iowa, for Sen. Joni Ernst's "Roast and Ride," which is also, essentially, a summit. With motorcycles and barbecue.

These summits aren't debates, but they do allow likely primary voters to measure a contender's message, style and substance against his or her competitors. Additionally, they attract gobs of media attention for the slew of contenders seeking a breakout moment.

Yet so far, all of this action has taken place on the Republican side.

The Democratic field, which grew to four this week, has had no such platforms. Not one.

What's more, while Republicans have agreed to hold at least nine and up to a dozen primary debates, the Democratic National Committee is only sanctioning half as many.

All of this is resulting in an obvious dialogue disparity between the two parties, one that progressives are now moving to remedy, U.S. News has learned.

In a move which could potentially place pressure on front-runner Hillary Clinton to interact with her field of Democratic rivals sooner than expected, the Progressive Change Campaign Committee has made initial inquiries to Democratic campaigns about holding one or more additional debates, beginning as early as this August.

The PCCC, an ardent cheerleader of the Elizabeth Warren wing of the Democratic Party, is advocating what they're dubbing an "open debate" format, in which questions would be formulated by voters rather than media figures.

They've even begun a dialogue with conservative groups to organize a similar venture among Republican candidates, and are floating the idea of holding an "open debate" for the general election.

The initial test, though, will be whether the liberal group can foster agreement to participate from all camps on the Democratic side.

"Debates are absolutely essential if we want a race to the top with them racing with each other to support big ideas," PCCC co-founder Adam Green says. "There's going to be broad support among most progressives for more debates, not less."

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley signaled swift interest in the organization's pitch.

"It's a great idea," says Lis Smith, O'Malley's deputy campaign manager. "Gov. O'Malley enjoys taking unscripted questions from voters wherever he goes, and we think it's critical that Democrats have more – not fewer – debates."

Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, meanwhile, is circulating a petition and imploring the Democratic Party to begin holding debates this summer, seemingly eager to take part in any format.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"More debates will encourage more people to vote, and when more people vote, Democrats win," he wrote in an email to supporters this week.

But it's Clinton's participation that's the key to this effort, and so far her campaign has been quiet on the topic.

After the DNC announced its plan for six debates, Clinton tweeted that she's "looking forward to a real conversation," without making a firm commitment to the number proposed. Her campaign did not respond to multiple inquiries from U.S. News.

"We informed Hillary that this was brewing and let them know we'd like to talk to them about it," Green says. Asked if he thought Clinton would ultimately sign on to his idea, he replied, "We will find out."

As a historic party front-runner leading her field by an exorbitant margin in the polls, there may not be much incentive for Clinton to expose herself further.

But that's where pressure from interest groups and her rivals comes in. O'Malley, Sanders and newly minted candidate Lincoln Chafee have shied away from attacking Clinton directly so far, but that's prone to change if she's skirting engaging with them. In fact, this could become the first fault line in what's been a quiet primary.

And the PCCC isn't the only group that will be looking for facetime with all of the candidates.

"We'll look for opportunities, once the field is set in the fall, to have all the candidates engage with and make the case to our 8 million members on key issues they care about," Ilya Sheyman, executive director of MoveOn.org Political Action – one of the nation's leading progressive groups – tells U.S. News in an email.

During the 2008 campaign, the last time there was an open-seat race for the presidency, Democrats held more than two dozen debates between their candidates, which eventually narrowed from eight to only Clinton and Barack Obama.

Democratic presidential candidate and former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton speaks in Columbia, S.C., on May 27, 2015. Clinton plans to deliver the first major speech of her Democratic presidential primary campaign in New York City next week in a new phase of her campaign adding some fanfare and policy specifics to a White House bid marked by small events in parts of the country since its launch.

The glaring reduction this cycle may best be explained by the perceived lack of competitiveness on the Democratic side of the ledger. While a cast of more than a dozen Republicans are bunched up in national and early primary state polling, Clinton looms as the nominee-in-waiting, amassing a 46-point lead over her Democratic rivals in the latest CNN survey.

"I just don't see where there's an opening for anybody," Democratic pollster Celinda Lake says. "There's not a lot of Democratic primary voters looking for an alternative to Hillary Clinton."

Many progressives consider that argument irrelevant, though. They see early debates as the only way to pressure Clinton on their pet issues, such as college affordability, financial regulation and expanding Social Security.

Plus, Green thinks his unique format could be potentially advantageous to Clinton, because the questions will be driven by substance, not cable newshounds trying to advance headlines on topics like The Clinton Foundation or her email use.

"I assume they'd much rather talk about college affordability and Social Security than more petty things like the right-wing scandal of the day," he says.

Whereas Republicans worry a protracted debate schedule could damage their party brand and wear down their ultimate nominee, some Democrats see less risk in greater exposure of their national candidates.

"Our candidates, with the exception of Bernie Sanders, aren't a bunch of crazy people. I don't worry about them saying something that would hurt the party brand. I think getting our ideas out there in the mainstream would benefit," says Boyd Brown, a Democratic National Committee member from South Carolina and an O'Malley supporter. "The more debate, the better."

Now they wait to see if Clinton agrees.

IRS sends Congress unsigned form letter to brush off demands for Clinton Foundation investigation // The Washington Examiner // Pete Kasperowicz – June 4, 2015

The IRS responded to a Republican request for an investigation into the Clinton Foundation's tax-exempt status with a one-page form letter that starts with "Dear Sir or Madam."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In May, more than 50 House Republicans asked the IRS to review the Clinton Foundation's tax-exempt status, after it became clear that the foundation had failed to report millions of dollars in grants from foreign governments.

That letter, led by Rep. Marsha Blackburn of Tennessee, said a review was "appropriate" given that this money was accepted and not reported while Hillary Clinton was serving as secretary of state.

In response, the IRS sent Blackburn a form letter, which Blackburn received late Wednesday. The letter thanked her for submitting the request, and said the IRS has an "ongoing examination program" to ensure tax-exempt groups comply with tax law.

"The information you submitted will be considered in this program," it said. The letter was from Margaret Von Lienen, director of exempt organizations examinations, but she didn't sign it.

Blackburn said the perfunctory response is far below the level of customer service members of Congress should be getting.

"The IRS response is not acceptable and lacking in the requisite tact that should accompany a congressional inquiry," she said. "It is unbelievably disrespectful that Margaret Von Lienen couldn't even take the few extra seconds needed to sign the letter."

"It begs the question – do they even take our request seriously? This is exactly why people don't trust the IRS," she added, noting that 51 of her colleagues took the time to ask a series of questions that deserve an answer.

"We'd expect officials at the IRS, who also work for and are paid by the U.S. taxpayer, to take the same care and effort in crafting a response to our inquiry," she said. "The allegations swirling around the Clinton Foundation are very serious and raise issues of great public importance."

Clinton camp wants donors to contribute – by giving staffers a place to crash // Fox News – June 4, 2015

Apparently facing a space crunch at their new 2016 headquarters in New York City, the Clinton campaign has started asking supporters to pony up their Big Apple pads for the cause. An email sent Wednesday asks them to sign up to "host" Clinton campaign workers arriving to the city.

“Do you have a spare room – or just a spare couch! – where a new staffer could stay?” Marlon Marshall, director of State Campaigns and Political Engagement at Hillary for America, asks in the email.

Marshall, who did not respond to requests by FoxNews.com for comment, said in his email pitch: “You and I both know that finding a place to live in New York can take longer than an afternoon of apartment hunting.” But he wrote that the campaign needs its new hires to start "right away" at the Brooklyn HQ.

He then promised that the to-be bunkmates will most likely “be working long days, so they really just need a place to sleep, and they’ll be so grateful to be staying with someone who shares their beliefs and their goals.”

Of course, Marshall is right -- scoring an apartment in crowded New York isn’t easy or cheap. According to the April 2015 Elliman Real Estate report, Manhattan rents have gone up for 14 consecutive months, with the largest increases seen in entry-level apartments. Brooklyn rents rose to a new record in April as well apartments of all sizes in northwest Queens.

Whether droves of Clinton supporters are willing to go the extra mile and open their doors to her campaign staff, though, is an open question.

The host-a-staffer drive isn’t the first of its kind.

In September 2012, President Obama’s campaign supporters were hit with a similar request.

The pitch began by asking volunteers to open up their private residences to some “dedicated organizers” working on Obama’s re-election campaign.

The email asked: “A group of the most dedicated organizers and volunteers will be coming to Northern Virginia for the remaining weeks of the campaign. They heard we’re looking to run a fierce ground game for President Obama this fall – and they want to be a part of it. But here’s the thing: They need somewhere to stay. And I’m hoping you can lend them a hand with that.”

So what’s an apartment or house owner get in return? Tales from the frontlines of a reelection campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obama's pitch said: “I bet they’ll come back at night with some amazing stories about all the people they’ve reached and the energy they’re sparking – stories that you might not get to hear.”

Ohio secretary of state slams Clinton over voter access // Fox News - June 4, 2015

Ohio Secretary of State Jon Husted blasted Hillary Clinton's call for an overhaul of voter access laws Thursday, saying her proposals were less than what the Buckeye State already offers.

Clinton’s top campaign lawyer Marc Elias launched a court challenge to Ohio voting laws last month, claiming restrictions are designed to suppress minority and young voters.

In a speech at Texas Southern University in Houston on Thursday, Clinton blasted Republicans for “systematically and deliberately trying to stop millions of American citizens from voting” and called for universal, automatic voter registration for young people when they turn 18, as well as a new national standard of 20 days of early, in-person voting, including weekend and evening voting.

“What part of democracy are they afraid of? I believe every citizen has the right to vote and I believe we should do everything we can to make it easier for every citizen to vote,” Clinton said at the historically black university.

However, Husted took issue with Clinton’s remarks, saying her proposals are weaker than what Ohio already has on the books.

“With 28 days to vote and the ability to cast a ballot without ever leaving your home, Ohio voters enjoy some of the most generous voting options in the country. For this reason, and many others, our state is a national leader in voter access,” Husted said.

The complaint against Ohio, filed by a group of lawyers -- including Elias -- on behalf of The Ohio Organizing Collaborative and three individuals, called for an injunction on a number of measures passed in Ohio in recent years.

These included laws that limit the time and locations for early voting, such as abolishing an early voting period known as “Golden Week” in which voters could register and cast an in-person ballot on the same day.

The laws, passed by a Republican legislature and signed by GOP Gov. John Kasich, “were designed to and will disproportionately burden specific populations, including African-Americans, Latinos and young people – each of which are, not coincidentally, core Democratic constituencies,” the complaint said.

Husted mentioned the legal challenge in his remarks:

“Hillary Clinton is calling for a national standard for early voting that is less than what Ohio currently offers. Given this fact, I call on her to tell her attorneys to drop her elections lawsuit against Ohio. Stop wasting Ohioans tax dollars defending your frivolous lawsuits,” Husted said.

Attention, pundits: If the polls confirm Hillary’s slide, it must be true // Fox News // Howard Kurtz - June 05, 2015

But the evidence was hidden in plain view.

For many weeks now, it’s been clear that Hillary has had an awful campaign launch, that she has been submerged by an array of negative stories, and that her message has been underwater as well.

But when I’ve brought this up—on the air, in print, at social gatherings—what I’ve heard again and again is: It doesn’t matter. It’s not a problem. This is media-bubble stuff. She’s emerged unscathed. It’s not hurting her in the polls.

But now it is.

The pundit class is so poll-addicted that if something doesn’t show up in fav/unfav, or right track/wrong track, or cares-about-people-like-you, it didn’t happen. I know that journalists were just as aware as I was that Hillary has been hammered since the day her listening tour began. But most of them couldn’t believe their own eyes because, well, it wasn’t there in the data.

Of course, polls can be a lagging indicator, and the barrage had to be chipping away at Clinton’s image—especially among independents. And that’s exactly what happened.

In the CNN poll, 57 percent say she’s not honest and trustworthy, compared with 42 percent who say she is.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the Washington Post/ABC poll, 52 percent say she's not honest and trustworthy, compared with 41 percent who think she is.

Now polls bounce around, of course, but those are troubling numbers.

They show the combined impact of the private emails scandal, the ethical questions swirling around the Clinton Foundation, the six-figure speaking fees, and one more thing: the constant avoidance of the press.

It's not that people are up in arms about journalists getting stiffed. We aren't very popular either.

But by barely responding to questions about the negative stories, she ceded the turf to all the damaging headlines. Her operation seemed antiseptic and orchestrated. And by having bland conversations with small groups of voters, Hillary made no competing news. She left a vacuum filled by all the financial and email stories.

Perhaps that will change after Hillary does her Roosevelt Island kickoff in New York next week. But impressions about trustworthiness are hard to change, especially with a figure as well known as Hillary Clinton.

There is some truth to the spin that Hillary was always going to slip in the polls when she descended from the lofty perch of secretary of State to the grubby reality of campaigning. But that doesn't fully explain her slide on the honesty question in just the last couple of months.

Most political journalists are smart. They can see when a presidential candidate is struggling. And they don't need the latest pollster's survey to report what they're seeing and hearing.

This is what Hillary Clinton's campaign is saying about her poll numbers // Business Insider // Hunter Walker – June 4, 2015

Some negative numbers from a pair of recent polls on Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign have made headlines this week and caused some Democrats to express concern. However, Team Clinton has a different read on the numbers.

Business Insider had a lengthy conversation about Clinton's poll performance with a campaign spokesperson on Wednesday.

The spokesperson, who asked to remain anonymous in order to discuss polling and strategy, pointed out there have been several surveys in addition to the two that generated much of the hand-wringing, which came from CNN/ORC and The Washington Post and ABC News. Both of those polls showed Clinton's popularity is down, with about 50% of voters saying they have an unfavorable impression of her.

The other recent polls cited by the campaign spokesperson came from The New York Times and CBS News, the Des Moines Register, and The Wall Street Journal and NBC News. The spokesperson noted that all of the recent polls show Clinton well ahead of her Democratic primary rivals. Additionally, she is leading in head-to-head matchups with all of her presumed and announced Republican opponents.

While touting Clinton's lead on her prospective opponents, the spokesperson argued her standing has remained strong in spite of what they described as a period of sustained recent media scrutiny.

In the weeks surrounding Clinton's April campaign launch, there has been extensive press coverage on a series of controversies involving her personal finances, family charitable foundation, and her use of a private email address while she was secretary of state. Along with bad headlines, the spokesperson noted these flaps have fueled attacks from Clinton's Republican rivals.

Clinton's campaign believes there is one number that shows she has weathered the recent scrutiny.

The Des Moines Register poll, which surveyed Democratic voters in Iowa's influential early primary, contained a specific data point that the spokesperson said her team sees as evidence Clinton wasn't badly hurt by the recent controversies and scrutiny. That poll showed at least 70% of Democratic primary voters in Iowa are not bothered by the questions about Clinton's emails or foundation. According to the spokesperson, the campaign believes that proves various controversies that have emerged around Clinton won't factor into the Iowa caucus — and potentially other states' primaries.

One of the main negative numbers from the CNN/ORC and Washington Post/ABC poll concerned Clinton's trustworthiness. The CNN poll found 57% of voters do not think Clinton is "honest and trustworthy. According to the Washington Post/ABC poll, 52% of voters don't see Clinton as "honest and trustworthy."

The spokesperson pointed out the CNN poll did not ask voters whether they found any of the likely Republican candidates trustworthy. Because of this, they said there was no point of comparison for Clinton's numbers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Further, the spokesperson said Clinton's campaign believes a more important question is asking voters who they trust to address the issues they care about. They described this question as more finely tuned whereas a question about general trustworthiness can be more subjective.

Additionally, the spokesperson said this is the key question Clinton is trying to address with her campaign, which is designed to brand her as the candidate who can serve as a champion for Americans who will improve the economy.

The Clinton campaign spokesperson pointed out The Washington Post/ABC poll showed Clinton is doing eight points better on the more finely tuned question of whether she "understands the problems of people like you" than the general trustworthiness question. In that poll, they noted she was doing nine points better than one of her top Republican rivals, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R), on the more specific trustworthiness question.

Still, in spite of these arguments, there's no denying Clinton's favorability numbers have declined in recent polls.

The spokesperson suggested this was a natural part of Clinton's transition from being secretary of state to becoming a more apolitical figure, and then reentering the political fray. They said the American public is skeptical of the government and politicians. As a result, they argued anyone who made themselves an official 2016 candidate would have issues with trustworthiness and would not be able to avoid some decline in their numbers.

In the end, though they said Clinton's team is satisfied with where she is sitting in relation to her rivals, the spokesperson forecast the number of people who say they trust her to confront the issues they care about will improve. They identified this question as the key one her campaign is designed to answer and predicted it will begin to do so as Clinton unveils more specific policies following her relaunch event next week.

Why you might eventually like Hillary Clinton // The Chicago Tribune // Jonathan Bernstein – June 4, 2015

This Candidate, you're going to believe, can really connect with the American people. He/she is a new kind of [Democrat/Republican]. This Candidate's qualifications for the presidency aren't just impressive. It's uncanny how well This Candidate's skills and history seem exactly made for the challenges the U.S. faces in 2016. Most politicians just spout cliches, you'll think, but This Candidate talks with, not at, us.

Oh, and on a personal level: What about that heartbreaking anecdote about This Candidate's family history? Why didn't This Candidate talk more about the personal stuff earlier? People would have realized then just how special he/she is. And what a refreshing collection of technocrats, oddballs and respected veterans are running This Candidate's campaign!

Some things in elections are difficult to predict, but the cycle of enthusiasm for presidential nominees isn't one of them. It's real, foreseeable and practically irresistible. As John Sides said on Wednesday in the Washington Post, "campaigns almost always rally each party's voters behind their nominee." This is in the context of what he predicts will be a temporary (and modest) decline in Hillary Clinton's polling numbers among Democrats. But the ebb-and-flow pattern is even more relevant to the generally dismal polling numbers the Republican candidates have compiled in this presidential cycle.

The way we feel about politicians is affected by context. A good example is to look back at John Kerry's favorable/unfavorable ratings over time. Back before 2004, the year of his first presidential campaign, Kerry was mostly unknown, but those who knew him liked him. He has a rating of 30 percent favorable and 9 percent unfavorable.

As his campaign for the Democratic nomination began, his unfavorability spiked (with both Republicans and Howard Dean supporters learning who he was probably and not liking him), leaving him with a rating of 31 percent favorable and 32 percent unfavorable.

Then he won a bunch of primaries, and his "you'll love this candidate" moment arrived in spring 2004, when he peaked at 61 percent favorable. By the fall, his unfavorable rating had almost doubled from 23 percent to 44 percent, and after losing to President George W. Bush he fell further. By July 2005, he was at 42 percent favorable, 48 percent unfavorable.

Kerry's standing recovered once he returned to being a senator — with 48 percent favorability in spring 2013. After he became secretary of state, a (seemingly) less partisan position, he got a big bump up. Last time Gallup checked, in February 2014, he was at 55 percent favorable, 34 percent unfavorable. It isn't that Kerry became more appealing or less appealing. It's that we respond to political context more than we do to individuals. It just feels as if we're reacting to those politicians.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I don't mean to sound cynical. The temporary enthusiasm we will feel for our party's future nominee is healthy for democracy. It's healthy, too, when our critical faculties re-engage along with disillusion. It's even fine that most of us skip the critical stage by tuning out politics for a few years. After all, the ability of most citizens to safely ignore politics most of the time is a sign of the stability and success of the polity.

So there's no need to worry much about the favorability ratings of presidential candidates right now, especially with regard to the general election. And [This Candidate] shouldn't be worried, either.

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE

O'MALLEY

Ad Backing Martin O'Malley Jabs at Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush // NYT // Nick Corasaniti – June 4, 2015

A new TV ad from the "super PAC" supporting former Gov. Martin O'Malley of Maryland is titled "Wall Street's Public Enemy No. 1." But it seems the intended target of the ad is Hillary Rodham Clinton and Jeb Bush.

The ad from Generation Forward splices excerpts from Mr. O'Malley's recent presidential announcement speech, centered around his suggestion that the head of Goldman Sachs would be "just fine with either Bush or a Clinton." It then repeats his criticism that "the presidency is not a crown to be passed back and forth by you between two royal families."

Mr. O'Malley has focused his early campaign message on the anti-Wall Street sentiment popular among the Democratic left. But Generation Forward, while staying at least on the surface in line with that theme, framed the critique around political dynasties as well.

The $25,000 ad purchase will focus on the Iowa media markets of Cedar Rapids, Des Moines and Davenport, and will start airing with Thursday's evening news.

The title of the ad comes from a phrase uttered by the Fox Business Network correspondent Charles Gasparino, who said that Mr. O'Malley is "public enemy No. 1 in the halls of Goldman Sachs, in the halls of Black Rock, the big money management firm. All throughout Wall Street right now."

O'Malley's claim on unprecedented wage stagnation for 70 percent of Americans since World War II // WaPo // Michelle Ye Hee Lee O'Malley officially entered the Democratic presidential race last weekend, framing himself as a progressive alternative to front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton. His launch speech focused on economic inequality and attacked Wall Street and corporate power.

In describing the "growing gap of injustice in our country today," O'Malley said 70 percent of Americans are "earning the same or less" than they were 12 years ago, for the first time since World War II. Is he correct?

The Facts

O'Malley's staff pointed to June 2014 research from the left-leaning Economic Policy Institute and 1947-2013 historical Census data as sources of his figures.

The Economic Policy Institute (EPI) found slow and unequal wage growth in recent decades, and a "near stagnation" of hourly wage growth over the past generation for the majority of American workers. Hourly wage data compiled by the group, from the Census Bureau's Current Population Survey, show a breakdown by percentile from 1973 to 2013, adjusted to 2013 dollars. Hourly wages for the 10th through 60th percentiles in 2013 were lower, or relatively flat compared to their hourly wages in 2001.

The trend begins to change in the 70th percentile, whose 2013 hourly wages ($23.88) were slightly higher than in 2001 ($23.57). The increase in hourly wage becomes progressively bigger in the 80th, 90th and 95th percentiles. It is unclear exactly at which point between the 60th and 70th percentiles that the trend changes.

This spreadsheet dates to 1973, and there were two other 12-year periods when hourly wages fell or remained flat for the 70th percentile: 1973 to 1985, and 1979 to 1991.

EPI President Lawrence Mishel said the group does not track the information back to World War II. But given that wages grew after the war and through the 1960s, Mishel said he is confident there was not the same wage stagnation in the 1950s or 1960s.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The EPI data support O'Malley's general point that wage stagnation in the last 12 years has been broader than in other periods, including previous recessions, and occurred over two economic recoveries, Mishel said.

The 1947-2013 Current Population Survey data from O'Malley's staff show a breakdown of family income (not earnings) for each fifth percentile, adjusted to 2013 dollars. The table shows that family income at the 80th percentile is lower in 2013 than in 2001, and was the case for 12-year periods going back to 1999. It is important to note that according to experts, Census data prior to 1960s are not as reliable as more recent data.

The data support a "story of broad stagnation" for the American economy and American families, although the language in the speech is imprecise, said Gregory Acs, director of the Urban Institute's Income and Benefits Policy Center.

O'Malley says "70 percent of us" in America are earning the same or less. That can be interpreted to apply to 70 percent of individual Americans, or Americans at the 70th percentile.

The percentile data do not reflect individual Americans' wages, and instead shows the distribution of wages. The Current Population Survey does not follow the same people over time. So the people who were in the 70th percentile in 2001 may not be in the same percentile in 2013, even though his statement could mean that 70 percent of the same Americans earn less or the same 12 years later.

The Panel Study of Income Dynamics does measure that information. The ongoing study began in 1968, of nationally representative sample of individual Americans. But such longitudinal study would not support O'Malley's claim, according to Urban Institute's Stephen Rose. Tracking individual wages this way would show growth in majority of 12-year periods, if only for the life cycle effect: people tend to earn more money up to about 50 years old, then even out until retirement.

O'Malley spokeswoman Haley Morris said the point that he is trying to make is about broad and evident trends, not specific families or individuals.

The Pinocchio Test

O'Malley's general point has some merit — that wages for the bottom 70 percent of Americans fell in the past 12 years. But neither dataset provided by his staff supports the specifics in his claim, especially that this is the "first time that that has happened this side of World War II." (PolitiFact rated this comment "Half True.")

The EPI table dates to 1973, and the most recent 12-year period (2001 to 2013) was the third time wages fell between 1973 and 2013 for up to the 70th percentile. Census data from the campaign show the same trend started in the 12-year period beginning in 1999, for family incomes at the 80th percentile.

The 12-year decrease began in 1999, and the data do not exactly refer to "70 percent of us" in America nor to earnings.

We wavered between Two and Three Pinocchios. But the details matter — especially when making such a specific statement in a speech as significant as the announcement of his run for president. So O'Malley earns Three Pinocchios.

Eight years ago, O'Malley argued that Democrats needed to focus on the center, not the left // NBC News // Chuck Todd, Mark Murray, & Carrie Dann – June 4, 2015

Martin O'Malley is running as a progressive with a gubernatorial record to back it up. The latest example came yesterday, when he vowed he "would never give up" on efforts to pass comprehensive immigration reform, per NBC's Leigh Ann Caldwell. But contrast today's Martin O'Malley with this 2007 Washington Post op-ed he co-wrote with Harold Ford Jr. (!!!) entitled: "Our Chance to Capture the Center." In the op-ed, the two said, "Some on the left would love to pretend that groups such as the Democratic Leadership Council, the party's leading centrist voice, aren't needed anymore. But for Democrats, taking the center for granted next year would be a greater mistake than ever before." More: "Contrast the collapse of a conservative president with the success of the last centrist president. Bill Clinton ran on an agenda of sensible ideas that brought America a decade of peace and prosperity. He was the only Democrat to be elected and reelected president in the past seven decades, and he left office more popular than almost any other president in recent memory."

Remembering the context of that 2007 op-ed

Don't forget the context of that Aug. 2007 op-ed: It came when Hillary Clinton (whom O'Malley had already endorsed) was facing Barack Obama and John Edwards from her left. What's more, that entire message -- Democrats must stick to the center to win the White House -- was pretty much undercut by Obama's successful presidential victories in 2008 and 2012. One of the reasons why some progressives haven't been jumping on the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

O'Malley bandwagon was the sense that he ALWAYS hasn't been a progressive. And this 2007 op-ed, plus his endorsement of Hillary over Obama in 2008, only adds to that sense, despite his progressive record as Maryland governor. First Read reached out to O'Malley's campaign for comment on the '07 op-ed, but we didn't hear back by our publication time.

Lincoln Chafee hits Hillary Clinton on war, trustworthiness // CNN Jeremy Diamond – June 4, 2015

The latest Democratic presidential candidate is running to Hillary Clinton's left on foreign policy, but when it comes to questions about her emails and foreign donations to the Clinton Foundation, Lincoln Chafee sounds like a Republican.

Chafee pointed to what he described as Clinton's "long record just going back over decades of questionable ethical practices," pointing not just to recent questions over Clinton's tenure as secretary of state, but also to the decades-old Whitewater scandal on Thursday in an interview with CNN's Chris Cuomo on "New Day."

"It seems like it just never stops," Chafee said. "Anytime you're running for office...trustworthiness is a main concern of the voters," Chafee said Thursday on CNN's "New Day."

Chafee hinted at a recent CNN/ORC poll that showed 57% of Americans believe Clinton is not honest and trustworthy, up from 49% in March.

Those numbers came as Republicans have continued to hammer Clinton on her use of private email housed on a personal server during her time as secretary of state and over foreign donations made to the Clinton Foundation during that same time.

"Those poll numbers and that perception of untrustworthiness, it just cannot sweep away. It's something very, very important no matter what office you run for," Chafee said.

Clinton's other two primary opponents, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, have looked to set up a contrast with Clinton but have been warier of attacking Clinton, notably on the questions swirling around the Clinton Foundation and her email use.

But Chafee hasn't hesitated, even before he formally announced his candidacy Wednesday.

Chafee is also going after Clinton's record on foreign policy, calling her a "hawk" in the interview Thursday. And he is saying that Clinton's vote in favor of the Iraq War in 2002 -- which she has since called a mistake -- should disqualify her from carrying the Democratic Party banner into the 2016 general election.

"I would submit to the Democrats across the country we are going to be compromised in trying to win the election in 2016 if our nominee supported the war in Iraq," Chafee said Thursday. "In 2016, this should be a republican war, a Republican mess (in Iraq)."

He said he plans to raise questions about how the U.S. got "into this endless tragic quagmire" in Iraq and "who made the mistakes that got us there."

Not Chafee, he would argue, as he voted against authorizing military intervention in Iraq when he was a U.S. senator.

Chafee said he would present himself as the candidate who wants to "wage peace," not war.

He is also running on a less common presidential platform: bringing the metric system to the U.S., which he said would ring "big economic benefits" to the country.

Martin O'Malley Just Took His Populist Pitch Full-Throttle // ABC News // Ali Dukakis – June 4, 2015

The Democratic Party's newest candidate on the block, Martin O'Malley, took his Wall Street offensive full-throttle Wednesday, attempting to capitalize on signs that questions about the Clintons' personal earnings and the dealings of their foundation could mean a fall from grace for presidential front-runner Hillary Clinton.

In his first public engagement as a presidential candidate, the former Maryland governor joined the U.S. Hispanic Chamber of Commerce at the Newseum in Washington, D.C., for 45 minutes of questions and answers with the chamber president and CEO Javier Palomarez. O'Malley then took a handful of questions from reporters who had been pre-selected on a first-come basis.

O'Malley launched his populist appeal right out the gate, answering Palomarez's first question asking him to describe who he is and why he should be president after a recent CBS News poll found 72 percent of Democrats don't know him well enough to decide whether they'd support his bid for president.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I am one of six kids born to Tom and Barbara O'Malley who are two Americans born into The Depression," O'Malley said.

He added that his father was only able to afford college thanks to the G.I. Bill, and "the generous country that understood that the stronger we made our citizens, the more we made it possible for more families to send their kids to college, the stronger we would be as a nation."

Citing chatter that O'Malley, 52, has shown reluctance to take on Clinton directly, Palomarez asked, "So the question is, and no pun intended here governor, are you, as they say, 'Ready for Hillary'?"

O'Malley remained steadfast in painting himself as a candidate of the people looking to save the American Dream, which he said "is in deep trouble."

"Other candidates in this race have come to the conclusion that they have that combination of experience and vision to be able to do this and so now the way it works is now that we've made up our minds, now the public gets to decide, and that's the way it's supposed to work," he said, striking Clinton.

While answering a questions about whether he'd accept contributions from big businesses to his campaign, O'Malley said, "I understand I've been named public enemy number one by Goldman-Sachs, so while I'm three days a presidential candidate, I am one day a public enemy of Goldman-Sachs."

O'Malley, also a former mayor of Baltimore, hit populist high notes as he charted the history of America's workers and wage from its high-functioning peaks during the New Deal, citing a sea change 30 years ago that brought the U.S. economy to the perilous state it's in today.

"We need to realize that our economy is not money, our economy is people, and we need to put wage policies at the center," he said.

He later added, "No state and no city is an island, we need to get our national economy functioning again by getting wages to start rising instead of declining."

Even in response to questions unrelated to America's economic climate or Clinton herself, O'Malley seemed to work income inequality and the importance of taking down big money giants into many of his answers.

When faced with a damning statement from the Maryland ACLU that named his legacy as governor, specifically his "zero tolerance" policing strategy, as a culprit in creating high tension and distrust between the citizens and police in Baltimore, O'Malley cited his record of cutting the crime rate and number of police-involved shootings "to the lowest level I think in modern times," but ultimately brought his message back to income inequality.

"These policing incidents are the spark, but the rage that erupted in Baltimore that night was not only about policing, and not only about race – it was about the fact that our economy is leaving huge portions of our population behind," he said in reference to the April rioting after the funeral of Freddie Gray, the man who died in police custody.

Of course, the populist message isn't unique to O'Malley. Also playing on the Democratic primary field is Sen. Bernie Sanders, I-Vermont, who solidified his reputation as a fierce critic committed to taking down Wall Street fat cats far before he set his sights on the White House.

And with the effort to draft perhaps big business' greatest watchdog in government, Sen. Elizabeth Warren, D-Mass., to run for office officially coming to an end this week, it seems O'Malley may be sensing it's his time to distinguish himself on one of the issues that matter to the party most – and that happens to be an area of weakness for his main opponent, Clinton.

O'Malley Is Running To The Left, But In 2007 He Urged The Center // NBC News // Mark Murray – June 4, 2015

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, who has tried to seize the progressive mantle in his White House bid, wrote an op-ed he eight years ago where he argued that the center - not the left - should be the Democratic Party's focus.

The 2007 Washington Post op-ed he co-authored with former Congressman Harold Ford Jr., then the chairman of the centrist Democratic Leadership Council was entitled "Our Chance to Capture the Center."

The two men wrote, "Some on the left would love to pretend that groups such as the Democratic Leadership Council, the party's leading centrist voice, aren't needed anymore. But for Democrats, taking the center for granted next year would be a greater mistake than ever before."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The op-ed is a contrast with what O'Malley has been promoting in his presidential bid.

At his speech officially announcing his presidential candidacy last Saturday, O'Malley said, "Our economic and political system is upside down and backwards and it is time to turn it around."

In his eight years as Maryland governor, O'Malley racked a record with progressive achievements on gay marriage, gun control and immigration.

But the context of that 2007 op-ed is striking: It came when Hillary Clinton (whom O'Malley had already endorsed) was facing Barack Obama and John Edwards from her left in the 2008 contest. What's more, that entire message - Democrats must stick to the center to win the White House - was pretty much undercut by Obama's successful presidential victories in 2008 and 2012.

O'Malley and Ford also wrote: "Contrast the collapse of a conservative president [George W. Bush] with the success of the last centrist president. Bill Clinton ran on an agenda of sensible ideas that brought America a decade of peace and prosperity. He was the only Democrat to be elected and reelected president in the past seven decades, and he left office more popular than almost any other president in recent memory."

Reached for comment about this 2007 op-ed, the O'Malley campaign cited a 2002 Baltimore Sun article with O'Malley calling himself a "progressive liberal." The article, however, also recounts O'Malley's appearance at a Democratic Leadership Council event.

"O'Malley said he was recruited to join the DLC soon after he was elected mayor three years ago. He said that although he enjoys debating strategy with the organization, he doesn't subscribe to all the positions of its leadership," the Sun article says. "He said he made clear his differences in discussions that included leaders such as Sens. Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut and Evan Bayh of Indiana and focused on what the council calls the 'battle over the soul of the Democratic Party.'"

Martin O'Malley going after 'bullies of Wall Street' in campaign, but he has ties to big banks too // NY Daily News // Cameron Joseph – June 4, 2015

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley has been bashing Hillary Clinton for being too cozy with Wall Street, but he's got some ties of his own to financial big-wigs.

O'Malley has been looking to show he's a populist warrior in the Democratic presidential primary, hoping he can get to Clinton's left and capitalize on the anti-Wall Street mood coursing through the progressive base while ripping Clinton for her well-heeled support.

"When you have somebody that's the CEO of one of the biggest repeat-offending investment banks in the country telling his employees that he'd be fine with either Bush or Clinton, that should tell all of us something," O'Malley said on ABC Sunday, pointing out that Goldman Sachs CEO Lloyd Blankfein has said he'd be happy with either Clinton or former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush in the White House.

O'Malley also warned the "bullies of Wall Street" during his Saturday campaign announcement that "the presidency is not a crown to be passed back and forth by you between two royal families."

But while he was the finance chairman of the Democratic Governors Association in 2008, Goldman Sachs gave $100,000 to the organization.

O'Malley admitted on Wednesday that he "probably" had asked for big checks from financial giants in the past before refusing to rule out soliciting more from the financial industry for his presidential bid.

"I probably have. I was the chair of the Democratic Governors Association. I'm quite sure I've called everybody that they've put up sheets in front of me," he said when asked about past donations during an event in Washington with the U.S. Hispanic Chamber of Commerce, referring to the fundraising call sheets candidates dial through looking for donations.

"I'm not prone to call up the head of Goldman Sachs or those individuals, nor am I inclined to tell those people in the financial industry that they shouldn't be involved in my campaign, in fact I think they should," he continued. "There's a lot of good people who work in our financial industry."

Hillary Clinton has been slammed by O'Malley for her ties to Wall Street.

That's a different tune than a Wednesday fundraising email from O'Malley's campaign that asked for donations to "help us fight back against Wall Street."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

According to CNBC, O'Malley wined and dined with Wall Street leaders including Robert Wolf, president and chief operating officer of UBS Investment Bank, and Marvin Rosen, a corporate and securities lawyer, at the swanky Lever House in November 2013.

Some of O'Malley's current campaign supporters have ties to big banks as well.

George Appleby, who introduced him last weekend in Iowa, is a registered Des Moines lobbyist who counts Wells Fargo and OneMain Financial, formerly the Citigroup Management Corporation, among his clients.

O'Malley began his career as a member of the business-friendly Democratic Leadership Council, and his current rhetoric runs counter to a 2007 op-ed he coauthored with the group's then-leader and former Rep. Harold Ford (D-Tenn.), who currently works for Morgan Stanley and at the time was at Merrill Lynch.

The two wrote then that Democrats must seek a "centrist agenda" and praised Bill Clinton's presidential campaign for its "sensible ideas."

And when O'Malley was governor, he appointed former Legg Mason CEO Richard C. Mike Lewin to the Maryland Transportation Authority and former Deutsche Bank Alex Brown managing director Mark Kaufman to head Maryland's committee on financial regulation.

Kaufman helped O'Malley keep banks from foreclosing on families during the financial crisis and was named the 2014 consumer advocate of the year by the Maryland Consumer Rights Association.

O'Malley is now calling to break up the big banks and reimpose the Glass-Steagall Act, which would impose tighter restrictions on the banking industry.

Professor Adam Sheingate of Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore said O'Malley "never took a populist anti-Wall Street stance" when he was mayor or governor, though he pointed out that O'Malley successfully pushed through some new financial regulations while he was in office.

"He can say he took on the financial services industry, and he did some things that I don't think went very far in terms of curtailing payday loans and require banks to renegotiate mortgages instead of foreclose on people," he said.

O'Malley's campaign downplayed his ties to banks.

"Governor O'Malley's strong call to finally rein in Wall Street has clearly struck a chord with the powers that be. They can try to leak as many meaningless tidbits as they want, but Governor O'Malley has shown he will stand up to his own party to call for real structural and accountability reforms of Wall Street," O'Malley spokeswoman Haley Morris told the Daily News.

"Rather than engaging in this silly back and forth, every candidate should have the courage to say where they stand on this issue."

SANDERS

Bernie Sanders asks Congress to spend $5.5 billion on 1 million jobs for youths // WaPo // Aaron Davis – June 4, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Sen. Bernie Sanders on Thursday called on Congress to immediately fund a million jobs for disadvantaged young Americans, adding to a pile of high-cost plans that might only become reality if he prevails in his longshot bid for the White House.

Sanders's bill, which he introduced in a D.C. neighborhood with relatively high unemployment and crime rates, would send $5.5 billion to local and state governments to fund job-training programs. Much of the money would go to helping unemployed African Americans. Sanders suggested the investment could pay for itself if it keeps more young black men out of jail.

"If current trends continue, 1 in 3 black males born today can expect to spend time in prison during his lifetime. This is an unspeakable tragedy," Sanders said. "But this crisis is not just a destruction of human life. It is also very, very costly to the taxpayers." Sanders pegged the country's annual prison tab at $70 billion.

"It makes a lot more sense to me to be investing in jobs, in job training . . . than to be building more and more jails and to be locking more and more people up," Sanders said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The bill, introduced with longtime Michigan Rep. John Conyers (D), comes as declared Democratic presidential candidates Martin O'Malley and Hillary Rodham Clinton have tried to find the right tone to respond to riots from Ferguson to Baltimore over police tactics that stirred national debate over racial and economic inequality.

For Sanders (I-Vt.), the bill's introduction also highlighted the long and detailed — if highly controversial — policy plans he has put on the record over three decades on Capitol Hill. The Vermont independent has recently renewed legislative efforts for $1 trillion in infrastructure spending and $750 billion in new taxes on overseas profits to make all state college and universities free.

Announcing the policy in D.C. also marked a rare campaign-style appearance for a candidate in the nation's capital. While election-year fundraisers in the city abound and Clinton is expected to appear before a congressional committee investigating her e-mail retention as secretary of state, candidates usually seek backdrops as far from D.C. as possible.

On Thursday, Sanders traveled just three miles down Pennsylvania Avenue from the U.S. Capitol. Across the Anacostia River in a building atop a rundown strip mall, Sanders noted the unemployment rate, which hovers around 15 percent there and above 20 percent in the city for young black men.

The event raised the possibility that Sanders may embrace D.C. in his campaign, where he has readymade access to the city's large press corps, and his role as a current elected lawmaker is unique among Democratic contenders.

It was the third event Sanders has held in D.C. since the spring, including his announcement outside the Capitol, and a town hall meeting before he became a candidate. At that event, he warned of impending disaster in the next federal budget decided by congressional Republicans.

As he rushed back to the Capitol for a vote Thursday in a compact car with Vermont tags, Sanders declined to comment on whether President Obama had done enough on youth unemployment, or on the positions of his competitors. Clinton has spoken without specifics about addressing youth unemployment, and O'Malley has talked about using the fourth year of high school for skills training.

"This issue is a crisis facing American society. It is an international disgrace," Sanders said. "It has to be dealt with, and I hope every candidate feels that we have to address this issue."

Bernie Sanders, The Wide-Eyed Pragmatist // HuffPo // Sam Stein – June 4, 2015

With days to go before Congress adjourned for August recess last year, the prospects of passing a Veterans Affairs reform bill looked dim. Weeks of turmoil over long waits, cover-ups, and potentially avoidable deaths at VA hospitals had not produced a legislative agreement. Instead, the two lawmakers responsible with crafting one hadn't spoken in days.

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), who as chair of the Senate Veterans Affairs Committee was half of this duo, hastily organized a press conference to lash out at his House counterpart, Rep. Jeff Miller (R-Fla.), for pushing a proposal outside the agreed-upon parameters. Miller's office responded by leaking emails showing that Sanders' staff had refused to join a meeting in retaliation for not being given advance notice.

The VA reform effort seemed likely to end up in the same trash heap as all the other attempts to respond to the crises of summer 2014, from illegal border crossings, to lost IRS emails, to the dwindling highway trust fund.

And then, it was saved.

A phone conversation took place between Sanders and Miller. Their staffs held marathon negotiating sessions. And three days before the calendar turned to August, they finalized a deal. It permitted veterans to get care at private hospitals under certain conditions, spent $5 billion to shore up the VA's own system, allocated additional funds to leasing new facilities and implemented new policies to encourage doctors to work for the VA.

The revitalization of VA reform legislation is an unsexy tale. It is the story of two lawmakers who swallowed their ideological pride to make moderate progress. But it also illustrates a defining paradox of one of the more dynamic figures currently in politics.

Bernie Sanders, the wide-eyed socialist running for president in 2016, just happened to produce one of the few -- and perhaps the largest -- bipartisan legislative breakthroughs in the last Congress.

"I'm a pragmatist," Sanders said in an interview with The Huffington Post. "If I was a writer or paid to go around giving speeches, then that is something I could do. But I was elected by the people of Vermont to be their elected representative in Washington. And that requires me to shape and pass legislation."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Few people think of Sanders this way. His reputation -- reinforced by his firebrand speeches, rumpled suits and Dr. Emmett Brown hair -- is that of an uncompromising ideologue. And he often plays the part. He's been virulently opposed to Trade Promotion Authority for years and has an unbending view of Social Security: it should be expanded, not cut. This past week, he indicated on "Meet The Press" that he'd support a bill reforming the NSA's bulk data collection program, even if he thought it didn't go far enough. Days later, he voted against it.

But those who work with him in Congress see Sanders differently. Miller called him a "realist" whose inability to play coy was refreshing.

"He is very open and honest as he goes through the process," Miller said. "You know where Bernie is coming from."

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who helped write the Senate version of the VA reform bill, praised Sanders for having the gumption to drop F-bombs one minute and counteroffers the next.

"Negotiating with Bernie was not a usual experience, because he is very passionate and he and I are both very strong-willed people and we spend a lot of time banging our fists on the table and having the occasional four-letter word," McCain said. "But at the end of the day, Bernie was result-oriented."

Sanders rose through the political system, rather than entering it late. He was a mayor for eight years and a congressman for 16, during which time he figured out that protest votes and purity could only get him so far. He pursued smaller priorities to attach to larger pieces of legislation that he invariably found less than ideal. A Rolling Stone article from 2005 called him "the amendment king of the current House of Representatives," as he'd passed more roll call amendments than any other member.

This pick-your-spots approach extends to the current day. Sanders has routinely flouted the Democratic Party's agenda on gun control. He got $12 billion for community health centers included in the final version of Obamacare, which he ultimately voted for despite being an unwavering single-payer advocate. He secured a provision for an audit of the Federal Reserve in the final version of the Dodd-Frank financial reform law, which he voted for despite worries that it didn't go far enough.

The latter, in particular, separates Sanders from certain politicians to whom he's often compared. He helped strike a deal to make the Fed audit a one-time thing, which ultimately led to its passage. But it also ended up splintering Sanders from his collaborator on the issue, former Rep. Ron Paul (R-Texas), who had wanted the audit to be rolling.

"We were very disappointed when Sen. Sanders gutted Audit the Fed in 2010 and are even more disappointed that he has thus far refused to cosponsor Audit the Fed this Congress," said Megan Stiles, communications director for Paul's Campaign for Liberty.

Sanders' team doesn't mind such criticisms, in part because there's little risk that anyone outside Paul's universe will brand him a sell-out. Compared to other politicians running for president, Sanders is downright rigid. That he has pursued a few policy victories on the side just makes him a more open-minded member of that rigid class.

"After decades of Congressman Paul trying, Bernie was able to actually get a piece of legislation passed," said Michael Briggs, Sanders' long time aide.

The tougher criticism comes from those who argue that Sanders' victories aren't nearly as impressive as he wants voters to believe. Despite the praise from McCain and Miller, others ask how the VA was allowed to deteriorate so badly with him chairing the veterans' affairs committee.

"I think he is an ideologue and had a very difficult time getting anything done for vets," said Paul Rieckhoff, the founder and executive director of Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America. "Oftentimes he just viewed the criticism of the VA as an attack on the VA ... Saying he reached a compromise with John McCain after the whole world saw what happened is not a win."

To be sure, problems persist within the VA, even after last summer's passage of the law. Sanders said he wanted more money in the final bill to shore up long waits at VA hospitals. His staff, meanwhile, frames the legislation as reform-minded pragmatism rather than political ingenuity, though they do praise some of its smaller components, such as student loan repayments for VA doctors.

"The fact is, he was able to work with McCain across the party aisle and accomplish the most significant piece of legislation in the past year," Briggs said. "Yes, the bar is pretty low. But they got it passed, without much help from Paul Rieckhoff."

So far in his run for the White House, Sanders has spent little time talking about this or other elements of his legislative record. This is partly because producing legislation is an inherently unflattering process filled with messy trade-offs. But more to the point, it's not the most galvanizing part of his candidacy. It's better, after all, to warn of the ills of politics than to tout that you, too, know how to play the game.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"In given moments in my political career, we had to make compromises to get things done. And of course I've done that. And I will continue to do that," Sanders said. "But at the end of the day, the way we bring about real change and the way we are most effective is by rallying the people to stand up and fight back."

Bernie Sanders scrambles to build Iowa team to meet popular demand // The Des Moines Register – June 4, 2015

Campaign aides for liberal warrior Bernie Sanders are scrambling to hire more staff in Iowa and open an Iowa office to keep up with momentum as each of his events attracts a crush of hundreds.
"People are out ahead and we're trying to play catch-up organizationally to give these people a vehicle to participate in the campaign," Sanders' campaign manager, Jeff Weaver, told The Des Moines Register on Thursday morning.
Sanders is the no-party Vermont U.S. senator who's running for president as a Democrat. His rebel yell calling for a revolution — he wants to fight economic inequality and wrest control of the government from millionaires — has brought Iowans running.
Sanders's crowd-attracting abilities are reminiscent of another revolution-rallying, white-haired grandfather-like figure who was also famous for stemwinders on big change for the federal government: Ron Paul, the Republican who finished in third place just 3 points behind the leaders in the 2012 Iowa caucuses.
While Paul was a libertarian-leaning conservative who blasted U.S. intervention in the Middle East and the war on drugs, Sanders is liberal independent who supports the decriminalization of marijuana possession and says Muslim countries should be the ones who lead the fight against Islamic terrorists.
After Sanders' April 30 formal presidential campaign announcement speech yielded an estimated 5,000 in Vermont, he packed in roughly 700 for a Davenport town hall, 300 in the tiny town of Kensett and several hundred at a recreation center in Iowa City. When all the seats were full, Iowans grabbed exercise balls to sit upon.
Sanders is the rival-in-chief to Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton. He has seen his support triple with Iowa likely caucusgoers in the last four months, according to the new Des Moines Register/Bloomberg Politics poll. But he's the first choice of only 16 percent of Democratic likely caucusgoers, 41 points down from Clinton, who is currently the first choice for 57 percent.
During his speeches in Iowa, Sanders calls for guaranteed sick leave and vacation for workers, more cushion from Social Security for retirees, a reduction in unemployment, a minimum wage increase, free public college, free preschool to help reduce the need for expensive child care, government-run health care that covers the entire population, and other changes.
Weaver, Sanders' campaign manager, is in Iowa this week to sign a lease for a Des Moines campaign office and bring on more staff to help Sanders' Iowa director, Pete D'Alessandro, who has been almost single-handedly dealing with swarms of Iowans who want to connect with the campaign.
This is the first early state where Sanders has opened a headquarters; New Hampshire is next, Weaver told the Register.
"Iowa's a very important state to us. We're going to be competing here very aggressively. We won't have what she has," Weaver said, referring to the big staff and nine offices Clinton already has in Iowa, "but we'll be competing very aggressively."
On the same day Sanders drew 700 in Davenport, Ron Paul's son Rand Paul, who is running for president in the 2016 race, drew about 100 in Davenport. Politics watchers on Twitter argued that Sanders was offering "free money" while Paul was promoting hard work.
"This is not about handouts — people pay taxes in this country," Weaver responded Thursday. "We're talking about leveling the playing field so every person has the opportunity to succeed to their maximum potential."
Sanders is focused on the day-to-day lives of Americans who don't have enough money to pay the mortgage or send their child to college or to afford quality child care, Weaver said.
"The Republicans give lip service to this idea of everyone succeeding, but the deck starts so lopsided there's no way for people in many cases, especially for people from disadvantaged backgrounds, to succeed," he said.
Sanders intends to return to Iowa soon, he said.

The 1 percent's "centrist" propaganda war: Why Bernie Sanders & Elizabeth Warren are so threatening to the establishment // Salon // Conor Lynch – June 4, 2015

After last Novembers elections, the GOP had a bit of a revelation. Once they had gained control of the congress, bipartisanship suddenly became the mature and necessary thing to do. The people spoke, after all, and had given the go ahead for Republican's to push through their ideology, and it was now the responsibility of the Democrats to play along. "Serious adults are in charge here and we intend to make progress," said Senate Majority Leader, Mitch McConnell, with an air of superiority. Yes, this is the same fellow who made the following remark a few years back: "Our top political priority over the next two years should be to deny President Obama a second term." It is also the same party that has fought bitterly against nearly every policy that President Obama has advocated, like health care reform, the economic stimulus, immigration reform, etc.

Of course its all nonsense. The GOP is about as interested in bipartisanship as Reagan was interested in a balanced budget. They say one thing, and do something entirely different. They are politicians, this is what they do.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But still, this does lead to a different question that has been floating around lately, which is whether the Democratic Party should be embracing the liberal movement, led by people like Elizabeth Warren and Bernie Sanders, or falling back to a more centrist plan that Bill Clinton embraced back in the '90s. This question seems legitimate, but it actually is not.

In reality, it is a question that is subtly being posed by the right wing and Wall Street Democrats, in the hope of slowing down a movement that is quickly becoming a true force in American politics. Former speechwriter for George W. Bush, Peter Wehner, wrote quite an embarrassing piece last week in the New York Times that argued that the Democratic party has indeed gone too far to the left, saying that "Democrats believe that they are riding a tide of presidential inevitability. They may want to rethink that. They are placing a very risky bet that there are virtually no limits to how far left they can go."

I have discussed the article previously in more detail, but the gist of his argument is based on comparing the views of modern Obama with '90s-era Clinton, as if we have nothing to learn from time and evidence, lamely ignoring changes that have occurred over the past three decades, like the increasing scientific evidence of climate change, the skyrocketing rate of inequality, and the complete disaster that is the war on drugs.

These arguments for centrism are just red herrings cloaked as pragmatic advice, designed to distract people from real problems, like the fact the GOP is actually a dying breed, while the rise of the modern liberal movement is overwhelmingly associated with the millennial generation.

Indeed, the largest base for conservatism today will be, quite literally, dying off in the near future. The Republican party is the old white party, which is not a very good survival strategy, as white people will cease to be a majority in about three decades, and todays elderly will be dead. This seems to be a much more significant problem than the Democratic party going too far to the left, which is actually a wise strategy for the future, if we are to believe the data suggesting the millennial generation is the most liberal yet. In fact, a few years ago, a Pew poll suggested that millennials (18-29) view socialism more favorably than capitalism, which is quite astonishing for the United States.

Elizabeth Warren and the rising liberal movement have created a real fear within the Republican party and Wall Street. Certain right wing pundits paint Warren as nothing less than a radical socialist, aiming to overthrow the capitalist system. This is fear. Fear that the new liberal movement is not just a fad, and that the future is moving leftward.

The argument for centrism within the Democratic party is a distraction, but also a tactic. After all, what does centrism really mean in Washington? It means corporatism. It means the neoliberal alliance between Wall Street and D.C. that we have seen wreak havoc over the past 30 years. It means the Clinton administration signing financial deregulation into law, and refusing to regulate derivatives. It means the promotion of corporatist trade deals like NAFTA and the TPP.

Centrism also means "easily bought," and funded by the 1 percent. Take the "centrist" think tank, "Third Way," which was founded by former Clinton staffers. This organization has aggressively gone after Elizabeth Warren and the liberal movement, saying in a Wall Street Journal editorial:

"If you talk to leading progressives these days, you'll be sure to hear this message: The Democratic Party should embrace the economic populism of New York Mayor-elect Bill de Blasio and Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren. Such economic populism, they argue, should be the guiding star for Democrats heading into 2016. Nothing would be more disastrous for Democrats."

Its the same argument that Wehner made, this time from so-called (Clinton) Democrats. It may seem like they are stuck in the nineties, but it is more likely a result of their funding and history. Third Way's board of trustees is made up almost entirely of investment bankers and CEOs, and it is funded by the banking community.

So, is this group simply a DINO (Democrat in name only) organization? That wouldn't be entirely fair, as the Democratic party contains different factions, and neoliberal Democrats still exist — just look at Andrew Cuomo (and even Obama in some cases). The fact is, Wall Street is afraid of modern liberalism, and is working hard to kill it from within with the same arguments that were made in the eighties and nineties. The only difference is, today, we know just how bad neoliberalism has been for the majority of people, and how good it has been for folks on Wall Street.

The financial crisis and the current inequality we face discredits the neoliberal ideology of the past thirty years. Centrism tends to be promoted as pragmatism, and the only way to win national elections. This may have been true in 1992, but today it is false. Centrism is a wolf in sheep's clothing; a strategy for corporatism, to stop progress with a slogan of practicality. But giving in to the crony-capitalist status quo is not a practical move for the middle class, just the one-percent.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CHAFEE

Lincoln Chafee and the last mile // Politico // Adam Lerner – June 4, 2015

Announcing his quirky run for the White House Wednesday, Lincoln Chafee may have inadvertently touched one of the more obscure third rails of American politics: conversion to the metric system, or "metrication" to those in the know.

Touting his time as a farrier in kilometer-loving Canada, the Rhode Island Republican-cum-Independent-cum-Democrat called metrication a "bold embrace of internationalism" that, in due course, "will help our economy."

Political journalists chortled, and for good reason: More than two centuries of history show that Americans really can't be persuaded.

"Nobody is really interested in giving up their measurement systems," said Russ Rowlett, a retired professor of mathematics at UNC Chapel Hill who authored "How Many? A Dictionary of Units of Measurement."

In every country minus the U.S., Liberia, and Burma, the metric system has been applied via some sort of top-down coercion, said Rowlett. "We have such a large economy, we don't feel that same pressure."

"Ordinary people don't," he clarified. "Industry does."

The measurement question has surfaced and resurfaced in American politics since the country's founding.

Even the Articles of Confederation, the proto-constitution that was famously discarded because it did not provide the federal government with enough authority, allowed the central government the "sole and exclusive right and power" to fix the standard of weights and measures. The U.S. Constitution similarly then gave this power to the Congress in the same clause that allowed it the exclusive right to coin money and regulate its value.

In 1790, then-Secretary of State Thomas Jefferson issued a proposal to Congress to establish a base-ten system of measurement, less than a decade before the French First Republic adopted the metric system in 1799. Jefferson's system included ten inches in every foot, 10,000 feet in every mile and a whole host of new measurements like a ten-foot-long "decade," a 100-foot-long "rood" and a 1,000-foot-long "furlong."

In true congressional fashion, the legislature balked and did nothing, partly because subsequent bills relating to land acquisition depended upon the old mile measurement. Americans largely retained the system of English measurements established by the British parliament in prior centuries, including the inch, foot, mile, pound and gallon.
ARLINGTON, VA - JUNE 03: Democratic presidential candidate and former Sen. Lincoln Chafee (D-RI) announces his candidacy for the U.S. presidency at George Mason University June 3, 2015 in Arlington, Virginia. Chafee joins Hillary Clinton, Bernie Sanders and Martin O'Malley in seeking the Democratic nomination.

By the mid-1800s the metric system began to gain steam around the rest of the world, largely because of colonialism and the support of engineers, scientists and businesses who favored its easy conversions and internationalism. In 1875, 17 countries — including the United States — met in Paris and signed a treaty establishing the International Bureau of Weights and Measures that internationalized the metric system. The treaty is largely credited with giving the system the final push it needed to achieve near-universality.

But the U.S. and UK continued to resist.

By the 1970s, as globalizing forces picked up, both countries saw renewed pushes for metrication. The UK slowly but surely adopted the metric system as businesses switched over to meters and grams to secure access to European markets. And in 1975, the U.S. Congress likewise passed the Metric Conversion Act, which called for making the metric system the "preferred system of weights and measures for United States trade and commerce."

"To say that this legislation is historic is an understatement," President Ford said in a statement upon signing the bill.

Still, Ford and the Congress were reluctant to push metrication too hard. He added that "the conversion contemplated in this legislation is to be a completely voluntary one. The Government's function … will be to coordinate and synchronize increasing use of metric measurement."

Dr. Donald Hillger, president of the U.S. Metric Association, which advocates complete metric adoption, believes this word, "voluntary," was the nail in metrication's coffin. "If that word were not in there and if they had decided to fully support the issue" by giving the legislation "teeth," he said, "they could have [pushed conversion]."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ford's successor, Jimmy Carter, supported the 1975 legislation, but also did not push to make metric conversion mandatory. The bill established the U.S. Metric Board, and during Carter's presidency the group began sponsoring public service announcement to promote the metric system. One of these was a series of television shorts that aired alongside Saturday morning cartoons in 1978 called "The Metric Marvels." Produced by the makers of "Schoolhouse Rock!" the series featured superheroes like Meter Man, Liter Leader, Super Celsius, and Wonder Gram.

"Metric superheroes, fighting to stamp out metric ignorance and introduce the system that rules the world!" the theme song declared.

But the system never stuck. President Ronald Reagan began his tenure by overturning a law to promote teaching of the metric system in American schools, and in 1981 and in 1982 Reagan disbanded the U.S. Metric Board, citing his "program to reduce government spending and streamline its operations" in a letter to the board's chairman.

Reagan wrote that the secretary of commerce would continue to support "voluntary metrication" and that he would continue to support the 1975 law, but federal efforts to convert the public largely languished.

In 1988, Reagan did sign a bill requiring the federal government to go metric by the end of 1992, however, and in 1994 President Clinton signed a law requiring metric units on a variety of consumer products. But the public stubbornly refused to follow the federal push, and Congress declined to make adoption mandatory.

A 2010 survey by Consumer World found that, more than 30 years after the law's passage, up to 80 percent of those tested could not identify how much sugar was in a product when it was expressed in grams rather than in common household measurements like teaspoons.

Part of Americans' reluctance can be attributed to the fact that, even though supporters assure that metrication will ease barriers to trade and boost the economy in the long-run, in the short run converting all of the signs — not to mention hearts and minds — would be costly. For instance, in 1995 the GAO estimated the total cost of changing all of the nation's highway signs to kilometers to be between around $520 million and $650 million in today's dollars. Considering the clumsiness such a conversion would impose on older generations accustomed to the old system, the costs could skyrocket. From supermarket goods to construction sites to pants sizes, shifting to metric would require substantial changes.

So the United States has stayed a "soft metric" country, with both Democrats and Republicans content to let private industries decide which measurements they use. In response to a 2013 "We the People" petition, Under Secretary of Commerce Patrick Gallagher wrote that, since the 1970s, the U.S. has settled on promoting metric within the government while privately pushing a dual system that allows private citizens "the power to make this choice."

Even though the issue has lost steam with the U.S., plodding along industry by industry, immigrant family by immigrant family, Chafee apparently believes he can revive it.
At the very least, support for metrication provides a point of contrast with his Democratic rivals. The Clinton, Sanders, and O'Malley campaigns all did not respond to a request for comment on the issue (though O'Malley reportedly told the Atlantic's Derek Thompson that he's "not passionate about the metric system" when cornered on an Amtrak train).

But Republican Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal has already incorporated it into an attack. In an email to POLITICO, his spokesman Michael Reed said Chafee is a "Typical Democrat — wants to make America more European. Governor Jindal would rather make the world more American."

Dr. Hillger refused to assess the Rhode Island Democrat's chances against front-runner Hillary Clinton, though he is pessimistic about Chafee's ability to drive debate. "I don't think [metrication] will be the issue that will challenge her," he said.

But he's optimistic that, eventually, Americans will have to abandon their beloved inches for centimeters, and miles for kilometers.

"It's inevitable."

OTHER

Democrats Get a Primary // TIME // Joe Klein – June 4, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The zinger captured the current 2016 campaign zeitgeist on several levels. There is a yeasty popu-lism rising in both parties. Among the Democrats, it's anti-Big Business; for the Republicans, it is anti-Big Government (and labor). There is also a rising discomfort with the aforementioned royalist candidates, Jeb Bush and Hillary Clinton. Bush's relatively moderate conservatism separates him from the pack temperamentally, but he is hardly the front runner at this point. No one is. Clinton is very much the presumptive Democrat, but not a very dynamic or compelling one. Indeed, the entry of O'Malley and Vermont's Bernie Sanders into the race during the last week of May produced something of an energy jolt among Democrats, who have a preternatural need for a horse race, even when the horses are lame, and a long-festering desire for an ideological fight between left and center.

It should come as no surprise that Sanders seems to be catching fire among the leftish faithful, drawing big crowds and scoring double digits in an Iowa poll. He is a recognizable Democratic type–the prophet scorned, gushing rumpled authenticity. Usually, this phenomenon occurs when Democrats find themselves enmeshed in a foolish war: Eugene McCarthy in 1968, George McGovern in 1972, Howard Dean in 2004. Sanders' distinction is that he is an economic Jeremiah, pitchforking the depredations of Wall Street. This is fertile turf. It is a fight that has been coming since moderate Democrats began courting Wall Street donors in the mid-1980s. Bill and Hillary Clinton's wanton sloshing about in the plutocratic pigpen of their foundation makes it a particularly fat target this time. Sanders flies commercial.

But the populist case against the Clinton-Obama economic policies has real substance as well. It is no coincidence that the fundamental distortion of the American economy, with the deck stacked to benefit the financial sector, also dates back 30 years, when Democratic Congresses began to slip pro-bank provisions into the tax code, reaching a peak during the Clinton Administration with the demolition of the wall between commercial and investment banking and the flagrant refusal to regulate exotic derivative financial instruments—which, in turn, led to the Great Recession.

Both Sanders and O'Malley would take specific action against the Wall Street giants. They would break up the too-big-to-fail banks; they would reinstate the Glass-Steagall rules that used to separate legitimate banking from casino gambling. And if O'Malley got off the best zinger of the early campaign, Sanders has the best policy proposal: a tax on Wall Street transactions, tiny enough to impact only the computer-driven churning that makes the markets more volatile than they should be. He would spend some of the proceeds on a $1 trillion infrastructure-improvement program that would create, Sanders estimates, 13 million jobs—another good idea.

This should be a bright line in the primary, the most important substantive issue facing Hillary Clinton: How would she reform the tax and regulatory codes that unduly favor the financial sector?

I went to an O'Malley house party in Gilford, N.H., on the last day of May and met Johan Anderson, 68, who had been a successful sales executive but is now working two minimum-wage jobs to augment his Social Security. He had been a Republican and a town official in Stamford, Conn., "back in the days when you could be a Republican and a human being"—that is, before the party's rightward lurch. Now he was engaged in the ancient New Hampshire pursuit of candidate shopping. "I really respect Hillary Clinton," he said. "She's obviously very smart and experienced. But I wonder about her leadership abilities. She made a mess of her health care plan [in 1994], and she didn't organize her last campaign very well [in 2008]. My heart is with Bernie Sanders. I'd love to vote for him, but can he win? O'Malley is young [52] and brings a real freshness and energy to the race."

I'm not sure how many people like Anderson are out there: perhaps enough to make Clinton a better candidate, perhaps enough to give her a scare. But there will definitely be a Democratic primary.

Democrats' Supreme Court Litmus Test: Citizens United // Bloomberg News // Sahil Kapur – June 4, 2015

In past presidential elections, Supreme Court litmus tests were a Republican issue, with candidates vying for the evangelical vote by attacking the Roe v. Waderuling that legalized abortion nationwide. This year, Democrats have a litmus test of their own: Three of the four declared presidential candidates are suggesting they'll seek Supreme Court nominees who want to overturn Citizens United.

Martin O'Malley on Wednesday became the latest contender to jump aboard the bandwagon. In an interview with Bloomberg, he made it clear he will try to engineer a reversal of the landmark 2010 ruling, widely blamed for a new wave of big money in politics. The 5-4 ruling, which pitted justices appointed by Republican presidents against those appointed by Democrats, paved the way for super PACs and unlimited spending by corporations and unions to influence elections. In the 2014 election cycle, super PACs -- entities that can raise and spend political money in unlimited amounts -- raised close to $1 billion to influence Senate and House elections, according to the non-partisan Sunlight Foundation.

"I would appoint judges who don't think corporations are people. We need to overturn Citizens United," the former Maryland governor said after a Washington event hosted by the Hispanic Chamber of Commerce. "And we need to recognize that big money is having a corrupting influence on our politics."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders, long a vociferous opponent of the 2010 ruling, kicked off the debate May 10 in an interview on CBS. "If elected president," he said, "I will have a litmus test in terms of my nominee to be a Supreme Court justice and that nominee will say that they are going to overturn this disastrous Supreme Court decision."

One week later, Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton told activists in Mason City, Iowa that the Citizens United ruling was "a grave error" by the Court. "I will do everything I can to appoint Supreme Court justices who protect the right to vote and do not protect the right of billionaires to buy elections," she said.

A spokesperson for Lincoln Chafee, the former Rhode Island governor and U.S. senator who launched his campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination earlier this week, declined Thursday to weigh in.

A nationwide poll released this week by the New York Times found that a whopping 84 percent of Americans think money has "too much" influence in political campaigns. The survey found that 78 percent said political spending should be limited, while 19 percent said it should remain unlimited.

The Citizens United decision, prompted by a legal challenge to a documentary that took aim at Hillary Clinton during her 2008 presidential bid, has long drawn the ire of progressive activists and campaign finance reformers, upset over the seven-figure political donations it has enabled. It has sparked calls for a constitutional amendment to overturn the decision, an idea that has lacks support from congressional Republicans.

In Citizens United v. FEC, the justices overturned a provision of the 2002 Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act and struck down limits on political spending by corporations, unions and nonprofit groups as a violation of the First Amendment. Those groups can now give unlimited amounts to influence an election as long as they don't coordinate with the candidates themselves. In practice, however, most of the big-spending committees are closely linked to candidate committees. The court followed up in the 2014 McCutcheon v. FEC ruling by invalidating limits on the aggregate amount that people can give to candidates and political committees in a two-year election cycle.

Caroline Fredrickson, the president of the American Constitution Society, a progressive legal advocacy group, said the backlash has echoes of how conservatives responded to the 1973 Roe ruling, which remains deeply divisive today.

"I think it's happening," she said. "Whether it'll reach the level of fervency of Roe v. Wade, it's hard to say. But it certainly seems to be going in that direction."

GOP

As Republican Debates Near, Candidates Vie to Make Cut // NYT // Maggie Haberman & Jeremy Peters – June 4, 2015

Carly Fiorina is a woman on the clock, a nine-week clock to be exact. That is when the first Republican debate of the 2016 election will happen. And if she does not get her poll numbers up, she will not make the cut.

“I need your help to get on that debate stage,” Ms. Fiorina, the former Hewlett-Packard chief executive, wrote in an urgent plea to supporters the other day. “I need to grow my team of supporters.”

Rick Santorum, the former senator and two-time presidential candidate, also might find himself excluded. “If you’re a United States senator, if you’re a governor, if you’re a woman who ran a Fortune 500 company,” he vented to reporters recently, “then you should have a right to be on stage.”

The announcements by Fox News and CNN that they will limit the first two debates to candidates who rank in the top 10 in national polls has given the Republican Party a “Hunger Games”-type atmosphere. Facing the possibility of being excluded from the first nationally televised face-offs of the 2016 election – and deprived of the priceless media attention the events can generate – some of the lesser-known candidates are under tremendous pressure to raise their visibility.

They are imploring supporters to give more money. They are increasing their national television presence. And they are not waiting for the spotlight to find them.

Gov. Chris Christie of New Jersey, who barely cracks the top 10 in many polls, has spoken to Fox News at length twice in recent weeks, stressing conservative positions. Ms. Fiorina invited reporters and cameras last week to follow her to the same hotel in Columbia, S.C., where Hillary Rodham Clinton was speaking. She then stood outside and taunted Mrs. Clinton, landing copious headlines.

For Republicans in states like Iowa and New Hampshire that hold the first primaries and caucuses, the trend is troubling. They fear candidates are too focused on getting on television to enhance their poll standing, when they should be out meeting voters in town halls and greasy spoons. Making matters worse, they say, is that the networks are using only national polls to determine who makes the top 10 – not state-based polls — so a candidate who builds momentum in Iowa could still be left off the stage.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There are already signs that the early-state rituals are being neglected, with a number of candidates waving off traditions like the Iowa straw poll in August. Jeb Bush and SenatorMarco Rubio of Florida have said they will skip it, and representatives of Gov. Bobby Jindal of Louisiana and Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin last week declined to send anyone to an informational meeting on the poll.

Making the cut for the first debates is now "on everybody's mind," said Steve DeMaura, executive director of Carly for America, thesuper PAC working for Ms. Fiorina. "If you're currently at 5 percent or below, you have to know that everybody is trying to get in," he said.

Some Republicans said the traditional role of taking the measure of candidates has effectively been outsourced to the networks.

"The centralization of the presidential primary process is very concerning, especially when you have the very real prospect of network executives, not actual voters in an early primary or caucus states winnowing the field," said Matt Strawn, a former chairman of the Iowa Republican Party. "The strength of early states like Iowa and New Hampshire," he added, "is the fact that a candidate, no matter their station or title in politics, is expected to look voters in the eye."

Those at risk of being left out could include politicians who in any other election year would be competitive.

There is Lindsey Graham, a popular senator from South Carolina; two former governors of big states, Rick Perry of Texas and George Pataki of New York; and three sitting governors: Mr. Christie, Mr. Jindal and John R. Kasich of Ohio. In Mr. Kasich's case, exclusion would come with an added indignity: the first debate will take place in his own state.

The scramble underway shows the degree to which the Republican Party is still struggling to exert control over the debate process after the last election cycle, in which a series of debates — 20 in all — seemed to exasperate party leaders and, occasionally, candidates too. The Republican National Committee has sanctioned only nine debates this time, with the possibility for three more. But there are 15 declared or likely candidates, and each will be looking for ways to stand out in such a crowded pack.

Then there is the gnawing question of what to do with Donald Trump. Mr. Trump ranks high in national polls because of his name recognition. Many Republicans worry that the inclusion of Mr. Trump, who few believe will follow through with an authentic presidential campaign, will squeeze out someone like Mr. Kasich or Mr. Jindal.

Despite the frustrations of state officials and back-of-the-pack candidates, the party and the networks say there is no easy way to avoid leaving some people out.

"Nobody knows how to do this. Nobody," said Newt Gingrich, the former speaker of the House who saw his campaign for president in 2012 take off after he delivered two aggressive debate performances in South Carolina.

Chief among the concerns among the campaigns is the networks' methodology for selecting the top 10. Early polls have shown the contenders closely bunched together, with the differences in their ranking still statistically insignificant.

Mr. Santorum's top political adviser, John Brabender, likened the criteria set by Fox News and CNN to pulling numbers out of a hat. And Mr. Pataki's spokesman, David Catalfamo, said the criteria would have barred "Jimmy Carter, Bill Clinton and probably Abraham Lincoln" from the stage.

Network executives, who said they could find no precedent for a televised debate including more than 10 people, believe they have been as fair as possible under unusual circumstances. And they point out that they have long used national polls to narrow who gets on the debate stage. CNN has set up a two-tiered debate for Sept. 16, with the lower-polling candidates participating in a segment that will air before the main event. Fox said it would l offer airtime on the same day of its Aug. 6 debate to candidates who do not clear the top 10.

But these secondary debates – likely to be taken as consolation prizes for being denied a seat at the adults' table – may not mollify everyone. And that has raised questions about what candidates might do to get a piece of the spotlight.

"People got to do what they've got to do to draw attention," said Armstrong Williams, a friend and adviser to Ben Carson, the retired neurosurgeon who is a Republican candidate, adding: "I can see them just totally disrupting the rules and the process."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Gingrich offered one possibility. “So you don’t want me to be on the stage? Fine. So I’m going to be the guy who comments about dumb answers online,” he said. “You could imagine the social media around the debate being bigger than the actual debate.”

BUSH

How Jeb Bush made a mockery of ‘exploring’ a presidential campaign // WaPo // Chris Cillizza – June 4, 2015

Finally, after months and months of hand-wringing, fingernail-chewing and nervous pacing, the world will know June 15 whether Jeb Bush is going to run for president.

WHAT WILL HE SAY!?

He will say, of course, that he is running for president.* This is the same thing he has been doing, actively but unofficially, for at least the last six months. And we will cover it as though this is a breaking news event on par with a natural disaster or a 23-inning baseball game.

Here's some breaking news for you: It is not a breaking news event.

While all candidates -- and campaigns -- draw out their announcement schedule long after they have made up their mind in order to raise interest (and by interest, I mean money), Bush has taken the "exploratory" phase of a campaign to its logical extreme with his if-I-runsmanship over the last six months.

"Lawyers say Mr. Bush, a former Florida governor, is stretching the limits of election law by crisscrossing the country, hiring a political team and raising tens of millions of dollars at fund-raisers, all without declaring — except once, by mistake — that he is a candidate," wrote Eric Lichtblau and Nick Corasanti this week. The duo quote Karl Sandstrom, a former Federal Election Commissioner and a campaign finance lawyer, saying that Bush's approach "makes a mockery of the law."

Right. Here's the thing: The only reason Jeb hasn't announced for president is because by not doing so, he has allowed himself to raise oodles of cash for his Right To Rise super PAC. Once he says "I'm running," Jeb can't coordinate with the super PAC anymore, which takes the super PAC's fundraising power down several notches. But as long as Bush is "actively exploring" a candidacy, he can go to these events, talk about the platform he would run on and ask those donors to be supportive in the event he runs.

The reason Bush has drawn this process out even further than others: He has taken the novel step of essentially outsourcing much of his campaign to the super PAC, which can raise money in unlimited amounts. When he officially launches, he won't be able to control precisely what the super PAC does, but he gets the benefit of no contribution limits.

It's all very wink wink, nudge nudge, and it speaks to the ridiculousness of campaign finance law in the modern age. The idea that Jeb Bush is somehow not an official candidate because he hasn't filed his "statement of candidacy" with the FEC is absolutely ludicrous.

Ask yourself this: Is there any doubt in your mind that Jeb Bush will announce he is running for president in 11 days time? Any? And then ask yourself when the last time was that you had any doubt about him running? Four months ago? More?

This exchange between Bob Schieffer and Bush over the weekend on CBS' "Face the Nation" makes quite clear how thinly stretched Bush's equivocations on a candidacy are.

Schieffer: Do you think, in some way, you may be just at least violating the spirit of the law? Do you feel that you have violated the law?

Jeb: No, of course not. I would never do that. And I'm nearing the end of this journey of traveling and listening to people, garnering, trying to get a sense of whether my candidacy would be viable or not. We're going to completely adhere to the law, for sure. Look, politics is politics. There's always people that are going to be carping on the sidelines. And should I be a candidate, and that will be in the relatively near future where that decision will be made, there'll be no coordination at all with any super P.A.C.

Schieffer: Now, you're not telling me that there's a possibility you may not run?

Jeb: I, look, I hope, I hope I run, to be honest with you. I'd like to run, but I haven't made the decision.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Even Jeb had trouble selling that last line.

Bush is, of course, taking advantage of the holes in campaign finance law. Common sense makes clear he is running for president. But, campaign finance law isn't dictated by common sense -- obviously.

All advocates for common sense reigning in politics can hope for is that the way in which Bush has stretched the law will force the FEC (or Congress) to reconsider the way in which a candidate becomes a candidate. Judging from the level of activity out of the FEC (and Congress) in recent years, however, I wouldn't hold my breath.

Jeb Bush Facing Crucial Two-Week Stretch // Bloomberg // Michael C. Bender - June 5, 2015

Bush will visit Germany, Poland and Estonia next week, before campaigning in Florida, Iowa and New Hampshire.

When Jeb Bush returns next week from Estonia, the tiny, technologically advanced country that shares a border with Russia, he'll have about 48 hours to shake off the jet lag before a June 15 rally in Miami, where he formally announces his decision to enter the race for the Republican presidential nomination.

That will be the midpoint of a crucial two weeks in which Bush will first try to establish his foreign policy credentials, and then introduce himself to voters. The week before his campaign launch, the former Florida governor travels to Germany, Poland and Estonia; the week after, he will be stumping in Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina.

In case there's any doubt what Bush will be announcing later this month, his spokeswoman Kristy Campbell offered this Thursday: "Governor Bush is thankful for the support and encouragement he's received from so many Americans, and is excited to announce his decision."

“The Bush kids have had a chance to have a front-row seat in history.”

Jeb Bush
Bush's "decision" will come just two days after Hillary Clinton holds her much-ballyhooed first campaign rally in New York City. But if there were any concerns about sharing the spotlight with the other political dynasty in the race—or about the quick transition from Europe to a campaign announcement at Miami Dade College's Theodore Gibson Health Center (a complex that includes a 3,200-seat gymnasium)—they may have been overridden by other scheduling issues.

The fact is, Bush has waited so long to make it official that he's running into a bit of a calendar crunch: The last week of June is expected to bring highly anticipated U.S. Supreme Court rulings on Obamacare and gay marriage, both decisions that have the potential to dominate the political news cycle and force candidates off message as they respond. Then comes the long Independence Day holiday weekend and the start of family vacation season. And then, the first Republican presidential debate in Cleveland on August 6. To have any chance of getting a ticket to be on stage, a candidate has to be officially in the race.

Before Bush becomes the 11th major Republican candidate in the race, he'll have a chance to polish his foreign-policy résumé with a week in Berlin, Warsaw and Tallinn, Estonia. It's the kind of opportunity that some of his potential Republican rivals haven't been able to seize, especially the governors among them.

Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker has curiously claimed that President Reagan's firing of air-traffic controllers who went on strike in 1981 was the most important foreign policy event of the past five decades (and wrongly said the move influenced U.S.-Russian relations).

New Jersey Governor Chris Christie refused to answer questions about foreign policy issues while traveling to England in February. Asked by a Washington Post reporter during the trip about the terrorist threat from Islamic State, Christie said, “Is there something you don't understand about 'no questions'?”

Foreign policy prompted Bush's one major gaffe in the seven months since he served notice in December that he was serious about running for president.

In an interview with Fox News' Megyn Kelly on May 9, Bush said he'd have authorized the 2003 invasion of Iraq even knowing the intelligence was faulty. Bush struggled for the next week to give a clear answer, finally saying on May 14 that he “would not have engaged” in Iraq, knowing what he knows now.

“That's one that shook a lot of people,” a Bush fundraiser who requested anonymity to speak about private conversations told Bloomberg. “That's a question you know was coming. It should have been a slam dunk and gone, and it didn't happen that way. But even the most professional of these guys stumble from time to time.”

Bush has also incorrectly claimed that the Islamic state didn't exist when his brother, George W. Bush, was president, and that al-Qaeda had been wiped out.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But expectations for Bush should be high.

A fluent Spanish speaker who lived in Venezuela before entering politics, Bush led trade and advocacy missions to at least 18 countries as governor, including Peru and Israel, as well as a six-day trip in 2005 that included stops in Dusseldorf and Munich, two of Germany's largest cities.

As a former senior advisor to London-based Barclays PLC, Bush says he traveled overseas 89 times to 29 countries in the eight years after leaving office. Last year, Bush started an investment fund with backing from a Chinese conglomerate. He has said he had been traveling about four times a year to China, where his father, George H.W. Bush, served as U.S. ambassador before being elected the nation's 41st president.

"The Bush kids have had a chance to have a front-row seat in history," Bush said at a Republican National Committee rally during his father's 1992 re-election bid. "We've seen the tumbling of the Berlin Wall, the hammer and the sickle going down from the Kremlin on Christmas Day just a few years ago. We've seen so many incredible things happen."

In Berlin, Bush will participate in a question-and-answer session during an economic conference on June 9, where he'll have a prime speaking slot sandwiched between Google Inc. Chairman Eric Schmidt, and German Chancellor Angela Merkel.

Merkel supports the nuclear negotiations with Iran that Bush opposes, but Bush's father remains very popular in the country because of the role he took promoting German reunification while he was in the White House. Outside the former president's library in College Station, Texas is a statue of horses leaping over pieces from the Berlin Wall, a Cold War relic that came down during his term in the White House. Germany unveiled its own monument in Berlin in 2010, known as the "Fathers of German Unity," that includes bronze busts of Bush, former Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev, and former German Chancellor Helmut Kohl.

That legacy may help Bush counter the one left by his brother. The nation's 43rd president remains generally disliked in Europe because of his aggressive foreign policy and unpopular war in Iraq, said Alexander Privitera, a senior fellow at at the Johns Hopkins American Institute for Contemporary German Studies.

While Europeans are "going to be looking for signs of whether he's similar to his brother," Privitera predicted that "there won't be thousands protesting against Jeb Bush. A lot of people will associate him with memories that are overcharged with emotions."

In Poland, Bush will participate in a roundtable with the Polish-American Freedom Foundation, a pro-democracy, free-market group, and meet with senior members of the Polish government about efforts to support Ukraine.

In Estonia, where the Internet phone service Skype was born and where residents can vote and pay their taxes online, Bush will participate in a roundtable discussion about transatlantic security with the International Center for Defense and Security, a group focused on cyber attacks, social cohesion and energy policy in the Baltic-Nordic region. Bush will also tour NATO's Cyber Defence Center of Excellence, and meet Estonians from the e-Estonia Showroom, a briefing center that highlights the country's digital successes.

Bush called Estonia "this really cool, tiny country" during a speech in Florida on Wednesday. He held up the Balkan nation, population 1.3 million, as an example of a relatively simple tax code.

"You can fill out your tax return in Estonia online in five minutes," Bush said. "That should be a worthy aspiration for a great nation."

Bush leads GOP field in NC, Clinton up on most Republicans // Public Policy Polling – June 4, 2015

For the most part Jeb Bush has been struggling in PPP's recent Republican primary polling across the country- one exception though is the South. Bush leads our North Carolina polling for the second time in a row. He's at 19% to 12% each for Rand Paul, Marco Rubio, and Scott Walker, 11% for Ted Cruz, 10% for Mike Huckabee, 9% for Ben Carson, 8% for Chris Christie, and 2% for Carly Fiorina. Bush also led our most recent surveys in Florida and South Carolina.

Bush has the same problems with the far right in North Carolina that he does everywhere else- only 35% of 'very conservative' voters have a favorable opinion of him to 44% with a negative one and he's in 6th place in the horse race with that group. But Bush has a commanding lead with voters who identify themselves as being just 'somewhat conservative'- with them he's at 30% with the next closest Republican contender coming in at 13%. In 2012 the front runner with 'very conservative' voters shifted around a lot over the course of the cycle but Mitt Romney was generally leading the field with 'somewhat conservative' voters- who might be seen as the moderates at least within the confines of the GOP electorate- and that was enough to propel him to the nomination.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The candidates at the top of the heap in North Carolina in terms of their overall popularity are Mike Huckabee at 56% favorability and Marco Rubio at 55% favorability. We've found a similar story in a lot of places recently. Chris Christie continues to be very unpopular with only 29% of voters seeing him positively to 47% who have a negative view. All but two candidates are within 1 point of where we found their support in April- the exceptions are Scott Walker who dropped from 16% to 12% and Rand Paul who improved his support from 6% to 12%. Walker still leads with voters identifying as 'very conservative' despite his overall drop this month.

On the Democratic side Hillary Clinton continues to be as dominant as ever. 62% of Democrats say they want her to be the nominee to 14% for Bernie Sanders, 5% for Jim Webb, and 4% each for Lincoln Chafee and Martin O'Malley. Clinton polls over 80% with African Americans, over 60% with liberals, moderates, women, seniors, and younger voters, and polls over 50% with men. There's not much sign of her position for the Democratic nomination weakening at all.

Clinton leads 7 out of 9 Republicans for the general election in North Carolina, generally by modest margins. The two exceptions are Rand Paul and Scott Walker, who she's tied with at 44% and 45% respectively. Marco Rubio trails by only one point at 45/44, Ben Carson and Mike Huckabee are each down by 2 at 46/44, Chris Christie has a 3 point deficit at 43/40, Carly Fiorina is down 6 at 46/40, and Jeb Bush and Ted Cruz each trail by 7 at 47/40 and 49/42 respectively. This continues a string of polls showing that the Presidential race in North Carolina is likely to be close once again next year, following up on the state's being the second closest in the country in both 2008 and 2012.

Almost all the Presidential candidates have negative favorability ratings in the Tar Heel State- the only exceptions are Ben Carson and Scott Walker. All non-Clinton Democratic candidates trail by a wide margin in possible match ups with Walker- Bernie Sanders is down 10 at 43/33, Jim Webb trails by 11 at 42/31, Lincoln Chafee has a 13 point gap at 42/29, and Martin O'Malley is down 16 at 44/28. That's a function of only 54-59% of Democrats voting for their second tier candidates because of their current unfamiliarity with them but at any rate it makes it clear that for all the hand wringing about Hillary Clinton she is still by far and away the Democrats' strongest candidate.

PERRY

Rick Perry 'Super PAC' Ads Going Up in Iowa // NYT // Maggie Haberman – June 4, 2015

The "super PAC" supporting former Gov. Rick Perry of Texas has made a large reservation for television ad time in two Iowa markets, just as the former Texas governor has announced his second campaign for the White House.

Opportunity and Freedom PAC, which is being led by Austin Barbour, a Republican consultant, began placing nearly $170,000 worth of ads this week, according to a person tracking media spending, who was unauthorized to speak publicly.

Mr. Barbour did not respond to a call for comment. But the ad purchase is in two Iowa media markets, Des Moines and Cedar Rapids, for the first two weeks of June.

The amount of airtime is significant. Running ads this early is not particularly effective in terms of luring voters, since few are paying attention. But it is likely an attempt to raise Mr. Perry's profile to help him qualify for the early debates, hosted by Fox News and CNN, two networks that are trying to manage an unwieldy field of nearly 20 candidates and relying on polling performance to determine participation.

Follow the New York Times Politics and Washington on Facebook andTwitter, and sign up for the First Draft politics newsletter.

After 'oops,' Rick Perry is ready to try again // WaPo // Dan Balz - June 4, 2015

On Thursday, Perry made his candidacy official on his official Web site.

"I am running for president because I know our country's best days are ahead of us," said a message on the site, which included a video that stressed his ability to bridge political divides in Washington.

The post came hours before Perry was scheduled to announce his plans for 2016 at an airplane hangar in this northern suburb of Dallas, surrounded by military veterans and others in a patriotic display.

There is little suspense about what he intends to say, according to advisers, but there are plenty of questions about whether greater preparation, good intentions and personal determination are enough to overcome the impressions he left behind after his first campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When he first announced his candidacy for the White House in August 2011, he seemed almost the perfect candidate to compete seriously for the Republican nomination. He was a long-serving Texas governor in a party whose political base was in the South. He governed during a period of rapid growth and job creation in his native state. His anti-Washington instincts made him a tea party darling before there was a tea party. He had never lost an election.

Within weeks of his announcement, he was atop the polls, a major threat to the front-runner, Mitt Romney. But within weeks of achieving those lofty poll numbers, his candidacy was in a rapid descent, caused by his opponents' attacks and his own maladroit performances in a series of early debates.

By the time he said "oops" on a debate stage in Michigan (he couldn't remember all the agencies in Washington he planned to zero out as president), his candidacy was already history, as he has since admitted.

Now, as he prepares to announce his intentions, he is in an utterly different position — mired in low single digits in early polls, lightly regarded by many of his rivals, ignored or dismissed by many in the media and struggling for the kind of attention that a politician who served 14 years as chief executive of one of the nation's most populous states might normally command.

He and his advisers believe that, if he was overestimated but ill-prepared four years ago, he is the opposite now, underestimated and in their estimation readier for the challenges that a presidential campaign presents. They say he likes nothing better than to be underestimated.

These advisers say a second campaign is not simply for redemption but rather because Perry believes he has something to offer his party and his country. But the former governor also is eager to prove all the doubters wrong — and those doubters are widespread.

Talk privately to strategists working for other candidates and they say he is a likable politician and one who could cause problems for some other candidates, but not one they see as a genuine threat to compete for the nomination.

Many share the view of Matthew Dowd, who helped former president George W. Bush win two elections to the White House and is now an independent analyst. Dowd sees an extremely difficult road ahead for Perry, owing to the impressions he made four years ago.

Asked about Perry's prospects of becoming the GOP nominee, Dowd said: "I wouldn't say impossible but very difficult. . . . The caricature has been made of him and it's hard to get out of it."

But Matt Rhoades, who was Romney's campaign manager and who saw Perry as enough of a threat in the late summer of 2011 to move aggressively to bring him down, offered a dissenting view — suggesting that people are foolish to write off the former governor as an afterthought in the nomination battle.

"Gov. Perry has worked hard and done the right things to reposition himself for a run in 2016," Rhoades, the founder of the conservative political action committee America Rising, said in an e-mail message. "I believe his candidacy will have a major impact on the primary and voters will give him a second chance."

Perry long has been open about the mistakes of his first campaign, saying at one point last year that he was "a bit arrogant" in thinking he could suddenly jump into that race with minimal preparation. He also entered shortly after major surgery for a back ailment, and he was plagued by health problems for weeks that he said affected his candidacy.

In the intervening years, he has devoted himself to policy briefings, some foreign travel, trips to the early states — all in contrast to his previous campaign. Ray Sullivan, who served as one of Perry's senior advisers during the governorship and the 2012 campaign but who is not formally a part of the 2016 campaign, said he expects voters will take a fresh look.

"When he entered in 2011, he gave himself and our campaign team six weeks to prepare," Sullivan said. "He entered the race as a front-runner and had no ramp-up time and no room for really any error. He clearly learned from that experience and is a much better prepared, more informed campaigner for it."

In his season of preparation, Perry has offered himself as a fiscal conservative with a sterling record of economic success during his time in office; a social conservative in good standing with the Republican right; and an optimistic leader who will provide muscular leadership whether in dealing with the issue of immigration by securing the U.S.-Mexico border or taking on Islamic State militants and other foreign-policy challenges.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Many of the themes he has been talking about this year were the same ones that were supposed to boost him four years ago. “We did a horrible job of telling that story last time,” said a senior Perry adviser who declined to be identified in order to speak openly. “We jumped in and thought everybody knew that story. The American people are going to see a very different Rick Perry.”

Like his many rivals, Perry has taken part in candidate forums, done quieter trips to Iowa and New Hampshire and counts on his retail skills as a candidate to win over voters who still have negative impressions from 2012. He has won applause and some plaudits for robust rhetorical skills, and some voters who have seen him over the past year say he is not the same candidate they remember from 2012.

So far, none of this has translated into significant support. The latest Washington Post-ABC News poll, released earlier this week, showed Perry at 2 percent nationally among registered Republicans and Republican-leaning independents, tied for 12th place among 16 candidates tested. In the Real Clear Politics average of recent polls, he is 10th on the list of candidates.

The polls may be only an early snapshot, certain to change with time, but they are important now because they will be used to determine who is invited to participate in the first two GOP debates later this summer. Perry is at risk of not being among the 10 candidates on the stage, though his advisers say they are confident he will be among the candidates in the opening debate in Cleveland on Aug. 6.

Perry’s path begins in Iowa, seen by other Republicans as the linchpin state where he must finish in at least the top three. He is far from that today, standing 11th at 3.3 percent in the most recent Bloomberg Politics-Des Moines Register Poll, though history says there could be considerable movement among the candidates there before next year’s caucuses.

His advisers also concede that, after his 2012 campaign, there is little margin of error. Some other candidates have had small stumbles this year but have not paid a significant price. Perry can ill afford any such missteps.

In that sense, Perry will be running, at least for the time being, against the image of his last candidacy as much or more than against any of the others in the field. Said one Perry loyalist: “He has to continue to grind it out — and do well.”

Meet the people who are going to try to get Rick Perry elected president // WaPo // Patrick Svitek – June 4, 2015

Rob Johnson and Jeff Miller

Johnson and Miller are by far Perry's most senior advisers. Miller, who spearheaded Perry's 2012 bid in California, has long been expected to run his 2016 campaign, while Johnson, it is said, will eventually settle into a role as Perry's top strategist. Johnson ran Perry's 2012 campaign, a credential that makes him the highest-ranking holdover from the last bid. Miller has received the most credit for rehabilitating Perry's national image in the years since his 2012 campaign ended in embarrassment. The two are among Perry's closest confidantes.

In some ways, Johnson and Miller have filled the void left by Dave Carney, the veteran New Hampshire-based strategist who had been with Perry for years before orchestrating his 2012 run. This time around, Carney is not expected to be involved in Perry's presidential operation.

Abby McCloskey and Avik Roy

McCloskey and Roy likely will serve as Perry's top policy hands. McCloskey, a Dallas economist who used to work for the American Enterprise Institute, played a central role in organizing a series of briefings over the past several months aimed at bringing Perry up to speed on a wide range of issues. Roy, a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute and Forbes opinion editor, is among the most respected GOP voices on health care, though his work for Perry's 2016 campaign is expected to span a variety of issues.

Margaret Lauderback

Another holdover from Perry's 2012 campaign, Lauderback is expected to serve as his top fundraiser. Having also raised money for his 2010 gubernatorial re-election bid, she is well-versed in the vast world of GOP fundraising in Texas — and Perry's longtime connections to it. Her resume also includes finance consulting gigs for Republican Governors Association, National Republican Senatorial Committee and Greg Abbott's 2014 gubernatorial campaign.

Greg Strimple

A veteran Republican pollster, Strimple is completely new to Perry's orbit for 2016. Strimple, president of Idaho-based GS Strategy Group, has served as a senior adviser to Illinois Sen. Mark Kirk, New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie and Arizona Sen. John McCain. The top pollster on Perry's 2012 campaign, Tony Fabrizio, now works for another GOP presidential candidate, Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Barbours

The Barbour family, a big brand in GOP politics, has long been close to the Perrys. Brothers Austin and Henry, both Mississippi-based operatives, are poised to be the most involved in Perry's 2016 plans. Austin is running a pro-Perry super PAC called Opportunity and Freedom PAC, while Henry remains an informal adviser who reliably has the former governor's ear.

The early-state operatives

Perry's point men in the early-voting states have played especially active roles in light of his nearly nonstop travel to Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina since stepping down as governor in January. Calling the shots in Iowa is Bob Haus, the veteran GOP strategist who served in the same capacity for Perry's 2012 bid. Katon Dawson, Perry's top adviser in South Carolina, is another return player from the 2012 campaign. New to Perry's early-state crew is New Hampshire's Mike Dennehy, the longtime Republican strategist who helped engineer John McCain's come-from-behind win in the 2008 Granite State primary.

Lucy Nashed and Travis Considine

Having worked seven years in Perry's office, there perhaps is no other spokesperson on the campaign as well-equipped to discuss his gubernatorial record than Nashed. She is expected to lead Perry's press shop, which likely will also include Travis Considine, a former spokesman for former Lt. Gov. David Dewhurst. Considine and Nashed were Perry's most active liaisons to the press as he wound down his governorship and prepared for a 2016 bid.

Other people to know

— Erin DeLullo is handling Perry's outreach to the universe of conservative groups that promise to shape the 2016 primary. A Washington-based fundraiser, DeLullo has spent years introducing candidates to the outside organizations such as the staunchly limited-government Club for Growth.

— Jamie Johnson is an Iowa-based ordained minister with deep ties to the evangelical community who's helping connect Perry with social conservatives in the early-voting states. During the 2012 race, Johnson worked in Iowa for former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum, the eventual winner of the caucuses.

— Anita Perry, the former first lady of Texas, has long had a role in her husband's political life — and 2016 looks no different. It was she who broke the news this month on Twitter that Perry would announce his presidential plans Thursday in Dallas.

Rick Perry spent $350 per vote in 2012 // WaPo //Phillip Bump – June 4, 2015

Rick Perry's 2012 campaign went badly. I know that's not what he'd like us to talk about on the day that he announces his 2016 candidacy, and I am confident that some Perry supporters will pointedly request that we focus on his policies* and not his past performance. Well, too bad! Because his past performance was so bad -- historically bad -- that it's worth revisiting.

Particularly if you're thinking about giving him money.

Perry didn't actually spend that much, at least compared to other recent candidates. That's in part because he did badly enough, early enough that he stopped writing checks. According to FEC data, he ended up spending less than everyone on the graph below, save Mike Huckabee.

But he still spent a lot, in average-American terms. Nineteen million in 2012 dollars! And for that, he got ... very few votes.

And that 0.1 million votes was very close to being 0.0, because of rounding. According to U.S. Election Atlas, he earned 42,251 primary votes and 12,646 votes in the caucuses. That's 54,897 votes, which rounds up to 0.1 million by the skin of its teeth.

A lot of money spent for a not-a-lot of votes? That means Rick Perry's votes cost a lot more. A whole lot more.

(Now you see why we did that weird, drop-down format in the earlier graphs.)

We also conducted this exercise after Perry dropped out in 2012, at which point he had spent more than $1,000 per vote. He wound up getting enough votes after he dropped out of the race, though, to fall well below that threshold.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The fuller picture also means his campaign isn't quite the most expensive per-vote in recent federal primaries. That would have been Linda McMahon's 2010 Connecticut Senate campaign, at $454 per vote.

Anyway, this is Rick Perry 2016, a whole new guy! He's learned his lessons! He probably won't win this time, either, but at the very least, he'll likely end up with a slightly better cost-per-vote ratio.

Or so those people writing checks hope.

What Rick Perry thinks about the issues // VOX // Andrew Prokop & Tez Clark – June 4, 2015

Rick Perry is so conservative that when he ran for president in 2011, he proposed eliminating so many federal agencies that he couldn't remember them all.

In his 14 years as governor of Texas, Perry pursued a low-tax, deregulatory agenda. And as he launches his 2016 bid for the Republican presidential nomination, he's sure to lean on that record.

But like many politicians, when Perry had the responsibility of governing a state, he diverged from his party's national line on some issues. He tried to build new highways all over Texas. He let unauthorized immigrants get in-state tuition at colleges and universities. He mandated that girls entering the sixth grade be vaccinated for HPV. And he supported reforms of his state's criminal justice system.

In his campaign announcement speech Thursday, Perry unsurprisingly emphasized the most conservative parts of his record and agenda, saying, "We need to return power to the states and freedom to the individuals." And he tried to tout his credentials on foreign policy and national security, arguing that America needed to lead in a dangerous world.

Slash taxes and eliminate several government agencies

During his 2011 presidential campaign, Perry proposed slashing both federal taxes and federal spending. On taxes, his plan gave Americans the option of paying a flat tax rate of 20 percent with many fewer deductions, eliminating the federal estate tax, and cutting the corporate and capital gains tax rates.

On spending, he backed a cap of federal expenditures at 18 percent of GDP, and a constitutional amendment requiring a balanced budget. He proposed eliminating the Departments of Commerce, Education, and Energy, and repealing Obamacare and the Dodd-Frank financial regulatory reform law. He's no fan of the Federal Reserve either, saying in 2011 that its easy money policies might be "treasonous," and that if Ben Bernanke visited Texas, "we would treat him pretty ugly."

Mandated HPV vaccine, then disavowed it

One of the biggest controversies Perry was involved in during his governorship focused on his 2007 executive order mandating that sixth-grade girls be vaccinated for HPV.

Though there was an option for parents to have their children opt out of the vaccine, Perry was criticized by conservatives who thought the vaccine encouraged sexual risk-taking, people who doubted the science of vaccines and feared they could cause health problems, and others who thought Perry was serving the interest of pharmaceutical companies. (Perry's former chief of staff Mike Toomey was a lobbyist for Merck, and pushed for the executive order).

So as his presidential campaign geared up in 2011, Perry declared that the executive order was "a mistake" and backed the legislature's support for overturning it. "I didn't do my research well enough to understand that we needed to have a substantial conversation with our citizenry," he said. "If I had it to do over again, I would have done it differently."

Opposes same-sex marriage and supported Texas's sodomy ban

As governor, Perry supported Texas's law banning gay sex, which the Supreme Court overturned in 2003. He's also been an opponent of same-sex marriage, saying that "it's fine with me that a state is using their sovereign rights to decide an issue," but that "obviously gay marriage is not fine with me."

In June 2014, Perry reportedly made comments comparing homosexuality to alcoholism. He soon walked that back, saying, "I stepped right in it." His main interest, he said, was in talking about how "whether you're gay or straight, you need to be having a job."

Tough on border security, but let unauthorized immigrants get in-state tuition

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As governor, Perry has argued repeatedly for the importance of border security. During the summer 2014 child migrant crisis, he deployed the National Guard to his state's border with Mexico. On immigration reform, he's said, "I don't think anyone with a sense of reality thinks that we're going to ship 11 or 12 million people back to where they're from." But he's argued that border security has to come first.

As governor, Perry signed a law that let unauthorized immigrants pay in-state tuition at Texas public universities. And when he was questioned about it during a 2011 presidential debate, he said that if you oppose the law, "I don't think you have a heart." Lately, he's said that that "was a really bad choice of words," but that he stands by his support for the law. He said the choice he faced was, "Are you going to put these people in a position of having to rely upon government to take care of themselves, or are you going to let them be educated and be contributing members of society, obviously working toward getting their citizenship?"

His sweeping plan for new highways was blocked

Early in his governorship, Perry unveiled an ambitious plan to build a network of toll roads and rail lines that would be called the Trans-Texas Corridor. But as the New York Times's Deborah Sontag recounted, the plan became intensely controversial. What horrified some opponents, Sontag writes, "was the realization that the corridors were going to rip through the heart of rural Texas and require 146 acres of right of way for every mile of road — or 584,000 acres total." After public opposition grew, Perry's party abandoned the plan, and Perry himself eventually disavowed it.

Criminal justice policy shouldn't be driven by "fear"

Perry argues that under his leadership, "Texas fundamentally changed its course on criminal justice." He says the state started focusing "on diverting people with drug addiction issues from entering prison in the first place, and programs to keep them from returning."

Specifically, he touts his support for drug courts allowing some low-level offenders to avoid going to prison, and greater investment in treatment and rehabilitation programs for drug addicts. "I am proud that in Texas, criminal justice policy is no longer driven solely by fear, but by a commitment to true justice, and compassion for those shackled by the chains of addiction," he wrote in a 2015 essay.

A skeptic of climate science

Like many Republicans, Rick Perry questions the scientific consensus that humans are causing climate change. He's claimed that "there are a substantial number of scientists who have manipulated data," and that global warming is "a scientific theory that has not been proven" and "is more and more being put into question." He said last year that "calling CO2 a pollutant is doing a disservice the country, and I believe a disservice to the world," and that he was "offended" that skeptics of climate science were called "deniers."

Drastic overhaul of Social Security is necessary

In 2011, Perry said that our Social Security program is a "Ponzi scheme," and argued that the program needed a massive overhaul to survive. (PolitiFact rated the "Ponzi scheme" characterization as false.) He proposed letting younger workers have access to private accounts in Social Security, as well as letting some state and local government workers opt against paying into the program.

A foreign policy hawk

In the Republican Party's split between hawks and doves, Perry has sided firmly with the hawks. He's argued that ISIS "represents a real threat to our national security," and called on Obama to "do more with our military and intelligence communities" against them. The more non-interventionist policies of Sen. Rand Paul, Perry says, would "only endanger our national security even further."

In his announcement, he criticized President Obama for prematurely withdrawing troops from Iraq. "Our president failed to secure the peace," he said. He also said he'd withdraw from any nuclear agreement with Iran that "legitimizes their quest to get a nuclear weapon."

Tea Party Unloads on 'Complete Imbecile' Rick Perry // The Daily Beast // Olivia Nuzzi – June 4, 2015

When Texas Gov. Rick Perry was indicted last month on two felony charges stemming from how he dealt with a misbehaving Democratic state official, the image of the stuttering 2012 Republican primary challenger was replaced with that of a hero-cowboy in the eyes of many conservatives. Perry was under attack from the left wing, and his response was not to apologize but to walk through a hail of blue-hued bullets and emerge laughing, without a mark on him. But some conservative true believers have begun to notice something rather suspicious: The company Perry keeps seems more suited to a mainstream Republican—or a right-of-center Democrat—than to their hero-cowboy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Perry is associated with three operatives who have concerned some members of the die-hard right wing: lobbyist Henry Barbour, former Bill Clinton aide Mark Fabiani, and McCain-Palin campaign chief and MSNBC pundit Steve Schmidt.

Well, maybe "concerned" is putting it somewhat mildly.

"The only two options are that Rick Perry is a complete imbecile and he has no idea who these people are and what they've done and how the conservative base—who votes in primaries—feels about these guys, or he's doing it on purpose because that's the kind of message he wants to send," said Keli Carender, the national grassroots coordinator for the Tea Party Patriots. Either way, she assured: "It will be an issue. We will make it an issue."

Barbour is already working on Perry's 2016 bid for the White House. But conservatives know him best for his role running the political action committee Mississippi Conservatives, founded by his uncle, Haley Barbour, the former governor of Mississippi. In this year's Magnolia State primary fight—and "fight" is an understatement—between U.S. Sen. Thad Cochran and state Sen. Chris McDaniel, Barbour reportedly played an influential and controversial role. According to National Review, his PAC funneled money to produce ads against McDaniel that alleged he would set back "race relationships between blacks and whites and other ethnic groups." The ads, which seemed intended to drive African-American voters to the polls, enraged McDaniel's Tea Party supporters.

As reported by Breitbart News, some conservatives loathe Barbour so much that they tried to get the Republican National Committee to censure him, to no avail.

"Republicans should not hire Henry Barbour unless and until he apologizes for the tactics he helped fund in Mississippi…I don't think [keeping Barbour around] necessarily means Perry is endorsing what he did, but it means he's certainly not properly condemning it or taking it seriously enough," Quin Hillyer, a conservative writer and activist, told The Daily Beast. "What he helped finance was so far beyond the pale that he should be blackballed by conservatives, and if Perry wants to be considered a conservative, he should no longer employ Henry Barbour."

Rick Shaftan, a Republican consultant who involved himself in the Mississippi primary, offered a somewhat different view of Barbour to The Daily Beast: "I don't like what he did in Mississippi, but you know what? It shows he's a ruthless, cutthroat operative, and there's something to be said for that on the Republican side. Because we don't have enough of them. If the force of evil can be brought to do good, then that's a good thing."

Normally, staffers don't matter much to voters, Carender noted. But Mississippi is different for many on the far right. It's become the ultimate test of Tea Party fidelity, a measuring stick for whether a conservative will sell out his principles to inside-the-Beltway Washington RINOs or will stay true to the cause and the grassroots activists who are the heart and soul of the movement.

People don't recognize, Carender said, just "how plugged in the conservative base is to Mississippi…If you're a man of integrity, you don't associate with Henry Barbour as far as we're concerned."

Perry has associated with Barbour since at least 2012, when Barbour served on his ill-fated but memorable presidential campaign. (Haley Barbour, for his part, supported Newt Gingrich.)

Publicly, Perry may have shrugged at last month's indictment—but that doesn't mean he hasn't been taking Lone Star State-size measures to ensure it doesn't sink him for good.

As part of his legal team, Perry has hired the Harvard-educated Mark Fabiani, best known for his ties to the Democratic Party. From 1994 through 1996, Fabiani worked as special counsel to President Bill Clinton. He then served as Al Gore's communications director during his 2000 presidential campaign. Fabiani has worked for the Democratic former San Francisco mayor Gavin Newsom as well.

Perry also has hired Steve Schmidt, a Republican strategist and former consultant to John McCain in 2008. Schmidt has long enraged Tea Party conservatives with his candor about members of his own party. Schmidt has called McCain's VP pick, Sarah Palin, "someone [who] was nominated to the vice presidency who was manifestly unprepared to take the oath of office should it become necessary and as it has become necessary many times in American history." Asked whether Palin would have a future in politics, Schmidt once remarked: "I hope not…And the reason I say that is because if you look at it, over the last four years, all of the deficiencies in knowledge, all of the deficiencies in preparedness, she's done not one thing to rectify them, to correct them."

Then Schmidt described Palin's unflattering qualities, which could, unfortunately for Perry, double as descriptions for most members of the Tea Party: "She has become a person who, I think, is filled with grievance, filled with anger, who has a divisive message for the national stage…"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Conservative radio host Mark Levin wondered of Schmidt, "Why would Perry hire this conservative attacker and Palin hater?"

Schmidt made those comments on MSNBC, where he is employed as a political analyst. Shaftan said of Perry hiring the strategist: "If they have Steve Schmidt working for them, why are they telling people? That I don't understand."

Perry has been basking in the glory of the conservative credibility his fight with Texas Democrats has lent him—so much so that his mugshot features a prominent smirk, one you can wear on a T-shirt being sold by his PAC for just $25. Some Republicans made that same image their Facebook profile pictures in a show of support, in the way some do for gay marriage, or to end violence against children. But you're only as good as the company you keep, according to some members of the far right who have in the past proved themselves to be loud enough to get their way.

Conservative HQ columnist Richard Viguerie wrote of Perry's team: "When you hire a consultant, you hire his reputation, strategy, and tactics. We doubt that Governor Perry plans to win the Republican presidential nomination by race-baiting, recruiting Democrats to vote in Republican primary elections, and trashing as 'poisonous' conservatives such as Rush Limbaugh…"

Hillyer agreed: "A very important law of politics and government, as emphasized again and again by conservative movement leader Morton Blackwell, is that personnel is policy. If somebody wants to get a sense of how a political leader might govern, it certainly is important to see who he hires."

Rick Perry's second chance to make a first impression // MSNBC // Steve Benen - June 4, 2015

There was actually a point at which Rick Perry was a serious contender for the Republican presidential nomination. It was August 2011.
At the time, party activists and officials realized that Mitt Romney was well on his way towards dispatching weak rivals, but there were widespread fears that he would struggle in a national race. The then-Texas governor rode in on a white horse to rescue his party and very quickly took the lead.
Perry's support eroded quite quickly. Most remember his "oops" moment from November 2011, but the truth remains that the Texas Republican's campaign was already faltering. His first day as a candidate was a disaster, and the weeks that followed were no better. The more voters saw of him, the more Perry's support evaporated.
Four years later, Perry believes he's ready to be a far better candidate the second time around. MSNBC's Kasie Hunt reported today:
Now Perry is set to announce a second – and this time, long-shot – bid for president. He'll do so on Thursday from his home state of Texas, where he'll stand in front of an enormous airplane emblazoned with "Perry for President." Joining him is Marcus Luttrell, the Navy SEAL made famous in the movie "Lone Survivor," and by the widow of Chris Kyle, the focus of the film "American Sniper." It's all aimed at highlighting Perry's military experience – he served in the Air Force – at a time when foreign policy is at the forefront of the campaign.
Perry will also focus on his economic record as Texas governor; he says he created 1.8 million new jobs during his tenure. They're themes he's also been emphasizing on the campaign trail in recent months, especially in New Hampshire, where veterans are a key voting bloc.

Whereas Perry entered the 2012 race as a savior candidate, the Texan enters this year as an afterthought. Despite being well known to Republicans, Perry's national support is hovering below 3%, which may be enough to qualify for debate participation – though it'll be close. Perry's not even especially popular in Texas, where's he's running a distant fifth in a state he led for over a decade.
There's also the matter of the felony charges pending against him.
As Rachel noted on the show last night, Perry will become the first presidential contender to launch a campaign while under criminal indictment on corruption charge. Last summer, as regular readers no doubt recall, Perry was charged with two felony counts – the former governor faces the potential of jail time – which generally doesn't help presidential candidates get ahead in a crowded field.
There's also Perry's challenge overcoming his often bizarre ideological radicalism. ThinkProgress pulled together several examples of "completely bonkers things" Perry believes about constitutional law – the list didn't even include his flirtation with secession – and the Democratic National Committee followed up with a similar list of its own, noting Perry's opposition to the federal minimum wage and Social Security, among other things.
But even if we put aside the pending criminal charges, the weak support, and the radical governing vision, Perry's biggest problem may be the perception that he's just not a serious person. When Kasie Hunt asked the Texas Republican late last year, "Are you smart enough to be president of the United States?" the obvious answer should have been something along the lines of, "Of course I'm smart enough."
Instead, Perry replied, "Running for the presidency's not an IQ test."
It's safe to say the Texas Republican faces long odds of success.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GRAHAM

Graham: 'Don't vote for me' if you're 'worn out by war' // The Hill // Mark Hensch – June 4, 2014

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) told Americans on Thursday not to vote for him in the 2016 presidential election if they are worn out by war.

The 2016 GOP presidential candidate appeared on Fox News's "Fox & Friends," where co-host Steve Doocy questioned his past war hawk rhetoric.

"It's a tough message," he told Graham. "A lot of people are just worn out by war."
"Well, don't vote for me," the Republican senator responded. "Don't vote for me, because I'm telling you what's coming: Barack Obama's policies leading from behind are going to allow another 9/11."

"[ISIS] is large, rich and entrenched," he added, referring to the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria. "If I'm president they will be poor, small and on the run."

Graham also said that U.S. ground forces were necessary for defeating ISIS before they could reach targets on American soil.

"I'm trying to tell the American people and the Republican primary voter — the only way I know to defend this country is to send some of us back to Iraq and eventually to Syria to dig these guys out of the ground, destroy the Caliphate, kill as many of them as you can, hold territory and help people over there help themselves," he said.

Graham further tied President Obama's counterterrorism strategy to Hillary Clinton, his former secretary of State and the Democratic presidential front-runner.

"I think it's the lack of confidence in her ability to distinguish herself from Barack Obama," he said when asked about Clinton's lack of media availability on the campaign trail.

"Her biggest nightmare is for someone to ask her, 'Hey, do you think the war on terror is going well? Do you agree with Barack Obama's foreign policy?'" he said. "'If you don't, tell us why.' "

Graham added that Clinton's perceived secrecy would likely cost her voters next year.

"Well, it's easier to talk to the North Korean guy than it is her," he quipped, comparing Clinton to North Korean leader Kim Jong Un. "At the end of the day, when 57 percent of people don't trust you, you've got a problem," Graham officially launched his 2016 presidential campaign on Monday from his hometown of Central, S.C.

He has already made a muscular foreign policy a key theme of his bid. "I want to be president to defeat the enemies trying to kill us, not just penalize them or criticize them or contain them, but defeat them," he said on Monday.

Can Lindsey Graham Win His Home State? // Real Clear Politics // Caitlin Huey-Burns & Rebecca Berg – June 4, 2015

South Carolina has been good to Lindsey Graham.

The U.S. senator from the small town of Central has never lost an election in his home state over a two-decade political career. Last year, he was elected to a third term in the upper chamber after winning a six-way Republican primary with 57 percent of the vote.

This week, Graham became the ninth GOP aspirant to officially join the 2016 presidential race, and the Palmetto State's first-in-the-South primary will play an especially significant role in winnowing the most crowded field in memory.

But given the expansive roster of candidates, a competitive financial race, and two early states to get through first, there's a real chance Graham won't make it all the way home.

State strategists acknowledge their senior senator's political savvy and experience, and believe his foreign policy credentials will play a key role in the larger Republican debate about international affairs. But as Graham stands now in the polls, he won't likely make it onto the first debate stage in August.

Graham has been talking about a presidential run for a few months, but is polling third in his home state—nearly six percentage points behind Jeb Bush and Scott Walker, according to the Real Clear Politics average. And he barely registers in the first two voting states of Iowa and New Hampshire, where he is campaigning this week.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Given the way things are going, I’d be surprised if we get here in [February] and he was still alive as a candidate,” says David Woodard, a political science professor at Clemson and a former political consultant. “He's not a popular ‘favorite son’ in South Carolina and the idea he could be limping along and South Carolina can crown him is just not backed up.”

A recent Winthrop University poll found that while Graham has a 58.2 percent approval rating as a senator, 55 percent of survey respondents would not even consider voting for him as a presidential contender.

Even though seemingly every GOP politician is seeking the White House this cycle, Graham’s presidential campaign has sparked conspiracy theories. Is he in the race just as a foil to Rand Paul’s libertarian philosophy on foreign affairs? Is he eyeing a Cabinet post in 2017? Is he planning to make it through the first two primaries only to then throw his support behind a rival ahead of his home state contest?

Graham has insisted he can win South Carolina’s primary, telling Fox News in April, “If I didn’t think I could win South Carolina, I wouldn’t be talking to you. If I’m on the ballot, I’ll win South Carolina.”

This week, the Graham campaign signaled it is working to shore up support on his home turf, announcing a 100-person state finance committee.

“This list is a ‘Who’s Who’ in the South Carolina business and professional community,” said Graham’s Finance Committee chairman, David Wilkins. “Bringing this group together is a remarkable statement about how much these top leaders respect and support Lindsey Graham and the unique qualifications he brings to this presidential race.”

Graham has also been meeting individually with members of South Carolina’s congressional delegation, and has asked them to stay neutral if they are not supporting his bid for president, according to an aide for one of the members.

So far, the delegation has indeed kept quiet about Graham. Rep. Mark Sanford attended a South Carolina rally for Rand Paul earlier this year, although the Charleston-area congressman did not endorse the Kentucky senator. And conspicuously absent from Graham’s announcement Monday in Central was that district’s representative, Jeff Duncan, who recently hosted a Faith and Freedom forum, a cattle call attended by most of the presidential contenders.

Gov. Nikki Haley is remaining noncommittal for now as several candidates come through her state, but her eventual endorsement is highly coveted. And despite having a hometown pol on the ballot in 2016, Haley has said she would prefer that a governor get the GOP nomination.

“Even Senator Graham admits he’s running for president of the United States and not president of South Carolina,” says Matt Moore, the state GOP chairman. “Our voters here are savvy in terms of presidential politics. While he may have a little bit of home-field advantage, it won't be a deciding factor. He has to compete.”

Still, strategists say Graham’s connections are valuable in the state—as evidenced by the way in which he suavely cleared substantial challengers from his Senate primary in 2014—and can help him at least in the short term.

His candidacy has frozen some of the establishment wing of the party in South Carolina, including loyal donors, major business owners, and some older elected officials who do not necessarily believe he can win but have enough respect for Graham that they will not support other candidates for as long as he is in the race.

“People who support him now anticipate he will get out and they intend to be for someone else when it’s all said and done,” says one state Republican operative working for a rival super PAC. “There may have been a time way back in the day when primaries were smaller or more controlled that a favorite son could get in there and mess things up, but that’s not case anymore.”

If Graham does poorly in Iowa and New Hampshire, he will have a difficult time competing in his home state against one or two candidates who will have gained momentum from their performances in either state (or both).

“Graham's going to have his most loyal supporters, but the overwhelming majority of the state is still up for grabs,” said another state Republican operative. “The question would be whether, if Graham doesn't see this through to the end, he has the sway to take his block and send it toward a single candidate."

Some prominent Republicans who might have supported Bush have already stepped up to support Graham, such as Wilkins, who chaired George W. Bush’s South Carolina campaign in 2004 and was later appointed ambassador to Canada. Wilkins attended Graham’s announcement in Central on Monday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Marco Rubio is also seriously competing in the state. His campaign manager, Terry Sullivan, is a veteran South Carolina operative. In addition, the Florida senator's team is stocked with state operatives, and has cultivated significant business community support, according to a National Journal report on Rubio's emerging clasp on the state.

Walker, the son of a preacher, has been appealing to the state's Christian base in recent campaign stops. Rick Santorum, who announced his bid last week, also plans to compete in the state. He has made several stops there in recent months, and his son attends The Citadel. Rick Perry, who dropped out of the running before the South Carolina primary in 2012, has been visiting the state as well.

South Carolina, with roughly 600,000 primary voters, has picked the eventual Republican nominee almost every cycle since 1980, with Newt Gingrich's 2012 win being an exception. With so many candidates running this year, the Palmetto State could play a crucial role as the first deep-red state to weigh in on the primary field, and could help set the tone heading into Super Tuesday on March 1, where voters in a significant number of Southern states will cast ballots.

"If you can't win here, you probably can't win nationally," says Moore. "This [state] is a test of organization and message, and it's as important as ever."

An Adelson Backs Lindsey Graham for President // The National Journal // Adam Wollner – June 4, 2015

Sheldon Adelson, the Las Vegas casino magnate and highly sought-after Republican mega-donor, still isn't sure which Republican presidential candidate he will back for the nomination in 2016. But Adelson's younger, lesser-known brother has lent his support to Sen. Lindsey Graham's long-shot White House bid.

Graham named Lenny Adelson, along with 38 others, to his long-shot campaign's national finance committee on Thursday.

Lenny Adelson typically keeps a much lower political profile than his brother. While Sheldon Adelson and his wife Miriam gave nearly $100 million in disclosed contributions to conservative outside groups during the past two election cycles, the only disclosed federal donations Lenny Adelson made during that time frame were a pair of $2,600 contributions to two House candidates—one Republican and one Democrat—in his home state of Massachusetts, according to records maintained by the Center for Responsive Politics.

Sheldon Adelson's net worth currently stands at $29 billion, but little is publicly known about his brother's finances. A press release issued by the Graham campaign didn't specify Lenny Adelson's current occupation, and a 2014 Federal Election Commission filing listed "Adelson Graphics" as his employer.

Lenny Adelson does not tend to get involved with his brother's business affairs. But he did originally introduce Sheldon Adelson to Hong Kong businessman Richard Suen, who is now suing him. Suen claims Sheldon Adelson owes him more than $300 million for helping his company, Las Vegas Sands Corp., secure a license to operate a casino in Macau in 2002. The trial is still ongoing.

Lenny Adelson, as well as a spokesman for Sheldon Adelson, could not immediately be reached for comment.

Just about every GOP presidential hopeful has aggressively courted the elder Adelson, who bankrolled a super PAC during the 2012 primary campaign that kept Newt Gingrich afloat. But he hasn't committed to backing anyone just yet. Adelson did, however, co-chair a fundraiser for an exploratory committee Graham set up in March.

Aside from Adelson, Graham's list of national finance committee members features a few other notable names. Jeff Immelt, the chairman and CEO of General Electric, and Ronald Perelman, the CEO of MacAndrews & Forbes, Inc., are among the committee's co-chairs.

"We are thrilled to have such strong support from these individuals who believe that Senator Graham is the candidate best equipped to address the issues facing our nation," said Graham spokeswoman Brittany Bramell.

RUBIO

What happened when Marco Rubio spoke at a Bush awards dinner // WaPo // Sean Sullivan – June 4, 2015

As Republican donors sipped their wine and munched on their salads in a hotel ballroom here Thursday evening, a clip of Marco Rubio launching his campaign on the promise that "yesterday is over" played on the television screens around the room.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Then, the screens quickly cut to a message welcoming everyone to the Prescott Bush awards dinner, named for the late grandfather of Jeb Bush, Rubio's likely presidential rival and a man seen by many as an implicit target of Rubio's generation-centric rhetoric on the campaign trail.

In his 25-minute speech at the fundraising dinner for the state GOP named after the former Connecticut senator and Bush family icon, Rubio never once mentioned the Bush name. But the elephant in the room was not lost on the crowd.

"It is interesting because it's Jeb Bush's grandfather and now it's a guy running against him who also happens to be from Florida," said Jay Sheehy of Stratford.

Rubio had ventured into the heart of a state where the Bush family has deep roots. Still, the crowd was mostly welcoming, applauding at several points in his speech.

As he does often on the campaign trail, Rubio started by mentioning his parents, who came to the United States from Cuba. He called for a muscular national security strategy, slammed President Obama's signature health-care law and took a swipe at the Clintons for making millions from paid speeches, among other things.

Like former Florida governor Bush, whose father and brother were president, former secretary of state Hillary Rodham Clinton is also seen as a target of Rubio's "new generation" argument.

"The time has come for a new generation of leaders to guide us in our transition from the past we are so proud of to the exciting future that awaits our country," Rubio said.

He also cited John F. Kennedy's famous line from his inauguration speech: "Ask not what your country can do for you, ask what you can do for your country."

"The truth is that for far too long, leaders in both parties have asked for your vote on the promise of what our government can do for you," said Rubio. "But I'm asking for your vote on the promise of what together we can do for America."

The Prescott Bush dinner is state GOP's largest annual event. Jeb Bush keynoted the dinner in 2014. Tickets for this year's event ranged from $199 to $5,000.

As the donors gathered inside the hotel ballroom to hear Rubio speak, about three dozen demonstrators lined up outside to protest the Florida senator's position on immigration.

"Up up with liberation, down down with deportation!" they chanted about 45 minutes before the dinner as a uniformed officer looked on and black cars pulled up to the hotel. Some held up signs labeling Rubio the "anti-immigrant."

Rubio pushed a sweeping immigration reform bill that included a path to citizenship for undocumented immigrants in 2013 before backing away from it. He's faced criticism from both conservative and liberal activists on immigration. Rubio now favors a piecemeal approach to reform that prioritizes border security and enforcing current laws.

Rubio will campaign in Idaho on Friday. On Saturday, he will make his second appearance in Iowa since announcing his campaign in April.

Carol Way of Fairfield, Conn., said she has been impressed by both Bush and Rubio. But Rubio has to prove himself to her, she said, citing an infamous moment from his 2013 State of the Union response.

"I was one of the ones that watched the water bottle thing," she said.

Rubio: Hillary, Dems will struggle to convince Americans they're about the future // The Washington Times // David Sherfinski – June 4, 2015

Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida said former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton and the Democrats are going to struggle to convince Americans they're part of a movement about the future, as he continues to fine-tune his pitch for a "new generation of leadership" in the country.

"I believe Hillary Clinton and her whole party, for the most part, is going to struggle to convince Americans that they are a movement about the future," Mr. Rubio, a 2016 GOP presidential candidate, said Thursday on Fox News' "Outnumbered" program.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Asked if he thought Mrs. Clinton, 67, is too old to be president, Mr. Rubio, 44, said it doesn't have anything to do with a person's age, but rather "the age of their ideas."

"So we have all these people out there today struggling to get ahead — the answer cannot be 'we're going to raise the minimum wage by a couple bucks,'" he said. "Ten dollars and 10 cents doesn't solve the problem for someone.

"We need to figure out how can we help people that are making nine dollars an hour to make 30 dollars an hour?" he continued. "And the only way that's going to happen is if you have an economy that produces that $30-an-hour job and that person has the skills that that job requires. And the answer to both of those questions today is no."

In a videotaped message earlier in the week to an economic forum hosted by Florida Gov. Rick Scott, Mr. Rubio had criticized "outdated leaders" and said the time has come for a "new generation of leaders."

Other 40-somethings who are either running for president or are seriously considering runs on the Republican side include Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas, 44, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, 47, and Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, 43.

Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky, who is running, is 52, as is New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, who is laying the groundwork for a possible bid.

One of Mr. Rubio's top GOP rivals could be former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, 62, who spoke in person at the forum and said he didn't think the comments were directed at him.

"It's kind of hard to imagine that my good friend Marco would be critical of his good friend Jeb," Mr. Bush told reporters with a smile, according to the New York Times.

Mr. Rubio, for his part, also offered praise for the GOP field, which grew larger Thursday with the addition of former Texas Gov. Rick Perry.

"I always tell people as a Republican, I'm glad that we have so many good candidates. The Democrats are struggling to come up with one," Mr. Rubio said. "So I think it's great that we have so many good candidates — I believe this field is going to produce the next president, potentially the next vice president, maybe a future president, and cabinet officers. And we're going to have a vibrant, spirited primary where that ... competition is going to drive excellence and ultimately give us a stronger nominee."

"These are quality people that are going to be well-financed and have a good message — we agree on a lot of issues; we have some differences. We'll talk about those. But I think from a competitive process like this, you get a better nominee — someone who's been tested, someone who's had to spend time working with people to fine-tune both their ideas and their delivery and I think competition drives excellence, so it's a good thing," he said.

Marco Rubio just made another confusing comment about his Middle East policy // Business Insider // Hunter Walker – June 4, 2015

Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Florida) offered a somewhat confusing explanation of his Iraq policy in an appearance on Fox News' "Outnumbered" on Thursday.

Rubio seemed to express support for US troops being present in Iraq, but he maintained this did not represent the controversial "nation-building" philosophy that led to a protracted American military presence in that country following the US invasion in 2003.

However, while insisting he doesn't advocate "nation-building," Rubio seemed to define his policy as exactly that.

"It's not nation-building. We are assisting them in building their nation," Rubio said of his vision for Iraq.

Watch a video of Rubio's remark below.

Link: https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=bPrHm_zyWzw
The exchange began when a host asked Rubio whether he agrees with other Republican presidential candidates who have criticized the extended presence of US military troops in that country.

He began by explaining that America "can't build a democracy" in Iraq, but could help the country with practical matters like infrastructure that might help them "govern" long term. The host responded by saying he seemed to be expressing support for "nation-building."

This query provoked Rubio's claim that he's not calling for "nation-building" in Iraq and is instead talking about "assisting them in building their nation."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

His campaign did not immediately respond to an email from Business Insider asking them to clarify how that is any different from "nation-building."

After making his seemingly contradictory statement about "nation-building," the senator went on to explain why he believes the US has a "vested interest" in helping Iraqis govern their country.

"The alternative to not doing that is the chaos we have now," he said.

He argued that President Barack Obama's administration supported former Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who has been criticized for trying to consolidate power in the country among his fellow Shias while leaving out Sunni Muslims. Rubio said this behavior by al-Maliki facilitated the rise of the jihadist group Islamic State (also known as ISIS) in Iraq.

"What happened in Iraq under this administration is they rallied around Maliki. Maliki was a Shia leader who used his power to go after Sunnis," Rubio explained. "That created the environment that was conducive for ISIS to come back in and cause all these problems."

The US-led war in that country proved extremely unpopular and questions about the government's handling of Iraq have come up on the campaign trail for both the Republicans and Democrats who are aiming to win the White House in 2016. These questions have been fueled by the fact ISIS gained a foothold in Iraq following US troop withdrawal. Last year, the US military launched operations aimed at wiping the group out.

Rubio's comments on "nation-building" are the third instance where he has seemingly stumbled while discussing Iraq. As CNN has noted, Rubio, who has made foreign policy expertise a cornerstone of his campaign, has been "vague" about whether he'd support committing ground troops to fight ISIS. And last month, in an appearance at the Council on Foreign Relations, Rubio said he would not have supported the decision to invade Iraq, which was an apparent reversal from multiple prior comments he made in support of the war.

KASICH

The 2016 campaign's new straight shooter: John Kasich // WaPo // Amber Phillips – June 4, 2015

John Kasich is quickly becoming the most quotable candidate in the 2016 field.

The two-term Ohio governor told the Washington Post's Dan Balz and Robert Costa that he'll consider jumping into the race at the end of this month (and allies think he'll run). This would be his second time running for president; he entered the 2000 GOP primary, then quickly bowed out because his campaign didn't go anywhere.

“I didn’t get scared out, I got destroyed out,” he told Balz recently. “I had no money and no oxygen."

See what we mean? Balz, who has interviewed Kasich several times in recent years, describes his conversation style this way:

Kasich spews out current initiatives and ideas for new ones at a rapid pace, often shifting from one thought to another mid-sentence.

Here are more of Kasich's straight-shooter quotes. (For the record, The Fix urges all politicians to be this blunt.)

On whether he's going to gain traction this time around:

"Either I got it, or I don't." -- At a May 1, 2015 Christian Science Monitor breakfast

On the all-important first nominating state of Iowa:

“I haven’t been to Iowa." -- Washington Post interview, May 27, 2015

Actually, Kasich has a lot to say on Iowa -- all of it entertaining.

On whether he'd run for 2016, in a September 2014 editorial board meeting with Ohio's Youngstown Vindicator:

"Honestly, I just don’t see it. I tried it once. You come with me. You can go with me out to Iowa. You wouldn’t believe it. You’d never go to Iowa again."

Oops. More on Iowa, in an October 2014 interview with Dan Balz:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I blew this one," he said of the Vindicator comment. "I like the people of Iowa. ... I never liked the system they had where you had to pay to park your RV in a parking lot. I wasn't here to insult the people of Iowa.

(This is a reference to the Iowa straw poll, where prime real estate will cost your campaign.)

That wasn't the only time Kasich's blunt rhetoric has gotten him into trouble. In 2011, he had to apologize to a Columbus traffic cop who gave him a ticket. Kasich called him "an idiot."

And earlier this year Kentucky lawmakers demanded an apology from Kasich when he held a joint press conference with Democratic Kentucky Gov. Steve Beshear and bashed state lawmakers there for not wanting to toll a cross-border bridge between the two states.

Kasich, as quoted inthe Cincinnati Business Courier:

"At the end of the day, he (Beshear) can't force a group of legislators who want to put their heads in the sand to go forward and do something that needs to be done. He needs help from all of you," Kasich told business leaders in the room.

From the podium, Kasich randomly shouted out to "Tommy" a couple of times – North American Properties president Tom Williams.

Kasich is a bit of an odd duck in the Republican Party. As governor of Ohio, he expanded Medicaid under the Affordable Care Act and promoted federal social programs to help low-income residents. He also expressed resignation after voters rebuked his move to rein in the collective bargaining rights of unions.

In an interview with Robert Costa in February, Kasich acknowledged his uniqueness:

"It's pretty hard to peg me."

More on the issues. Kasich is officially for marriage "between a man and a woman," but said he'll uphold as president whatever the Supreme Court decides.

"I have a number of friends who are gay. I like them," he said at the May 1 Christian Science Monitor breakfast.

At the same breakfast, Kasich on the question of the moment for GOP candidates of -- whether he'd attend a friend's or relative's gay wedding:

"I don't usually go to weddings of people that I don't know, okay? I don't go to 'em. But if somebody that I like is getting married in the traditional sense or in the non-traditional sense, I'm not hung up about it. I'll be celebrating with them."

More on how his views don't quite align with Republican Party:

"I've always said the party is my vehicle and not my master," he told Balz and Costa this May.

In the same interview, Kasich said if he runs, it won't be away from his record:

" If people are bored by it, well, they'll have to put up with it while I give them the résumé. They need to know."

But in November 2011, when Ohio voters overwhelmingly voted to repeal a law he supported to limit collective bargaining rights, Kasich was humble about his loss:

"If you don't win and the people speak ... you have to pay attention to what they're saying."

Kasich also thinks young people don't focus enough on politics. (He's probably right.)

"Instead of young people talking about Justin Bieber or how bad the Grammys were, maybe we could get people talking about Washington, Madison and Monroe, and have a renewal of American history," he told Costa in February.

Kasich launches some pretty blunt attacks at his GOP competitors. He's focused his criticism so far on the frontrunner, Jeb Bush, who most analysts see him competing against for establishment-minded voters.

On Bush's nonprofit and super PAC, "Right to Rise":

"I don't know anything about [Bush's theme]. I really don't. I've never listened to him. What's "Right to Rise"? Getting up in the morning?" he said in May.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And as to why he's campaigning in New Hampshire this week:

Kasich is also plain-spoken when it comes to foreign policy. The former congressman probably is best described as a hawk who has called for sending troops to fight the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria.

Kasich, on the Hugh Hewitt radio show in April, on peace in the Middle East:

"People who think that there is a solution are naïve."

On Obama's much-maligned nuclear deal with Iran, at the Christian Science Monitor breakfast:

Obama is "so in love" with the idea. It's like, Kasich said, "You're so hungry to get that car you'll pay anything for it."

Kasich doesn't take himself too seriously, though. His philosophy on life on the Hugh Hewitt show:

"You know what? Everybody needs to take a deep breath and have a little fun once in a while, huh?"

We couldn't agree more, Mr. Kasich.

Kasich makes favorable impression on the influential in New Hampshire // The Columbus Dispatch // Darrell Rowland – June 4, 2015

Renee Plummer wanted to pin down exactly what time Ohio Gov. John Kasich and his entourage were coming to her condo Thursday evening for a private dinner.

She was ordering fried clams and filet mignon for the 18 or so guests, so she needed a firm commitment.

But it's Plummer's commitment Kasich and other Republican presidential hopefuls are seeking. While Kasich didn't quite win that Thursday, he did get glowing praise from a woman regarded as highly influential in New Hampshire politics.

Earlier in the day Kasich was the ninth possible presidential candidate that she hosted for a luncheon with nearly 50 business leaders in a conference room near her office next to the airport. And in this Plummer Primary he did what he must do time and time again in coming months if he is to become a serious presidential candidate: Win converts.

"I knew this was going to happen," Plummer said after the lunch. "People who were walking out (after Kasich's 52-minute talk) who thought they were with somebody else said 'I love this guy.'

"They stopped me. It was like, 'All right, you know what? He's like my No. 1.' They thought they were all set before they saw him."

And Plummer wasn't the least bit surprised.

"I said, 'Told you.' He's real. He's a real person. He's smart. ... I've been telling everybody, wait until you hear this guy speak."

The business roundtable was Kasich's only public event Thursday, but he also campaigned behind the scenes aside from the dinner with Renee and Danny Plummer's place. Just before Plummer's luncheon, for instance, he gave an interview to National Public Radio.

But perhaps the most important get-together of the day came with former New Hampshire Gov. John H. Sununu, patriarch of the state's leading GOP family. Kasich's campaign committee already is backed by his son, former U.S. Sen. John H. Sununu, which Danny Plummer said is very notable.

Kasich was accompanied by Franklin County Republican Chairman Doug Preisse as well as his campaign committee's top two leaders in New Hampshire: consultant Bruce Berke and state director Paul Collins, who worked for both Sununus.

Renee Plummer — who also praised the performance of former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and former executive Carly Fiorina at her roundtables — said she appreciates the fact that Kasich talks about working with Democrats rather than attacking them.

The Ohio governor raised eyebrows during a question-and-answer period following his roundtable speech by saying that any GOP presidential hopeful who thinks the party can topple Hillary Clinton by emphasizing the Republicans' familiar message about her questionable dealings is dead wrong.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We are not going to beat Hillary Clinton on the basis of Benghazi and emails and the Clinton Foundation," Kasich said.

"You know how you win? You better have a bigger vision as to how Americans feel that America's going to be better for them. And how they're going to play a role in it. And how the American Dream is not dead."

While bashing Clinton and President Barack Obama may win applause from GOP partisans, "That's hitting it in the cheap seats. That's not what's going to change this country."

It was merely the latest deviation from the party line for Kasich, seeking to make an impact in a presidential race where he is little known.

Thursday morning, Hotline dubbed him the "Most Interesting Man in the Field" and moved him up to No. 7 with an "up" arrow in its new GOP presidential power rankings.

Thursday afternoon, a much-watched Washington Post blog called him "the 2016 campaign's new straight shooter."

Kasich declined to criticize specific candidates in the GOP field, praising former Texas Gov. Rick Perry, who entered the race Thursday.

However, he did refer to the underwhelming performance of Bush to explain his serious consideration of running.

"I just thought that Jeb was going to suck all the air from the room. It hasn't happened. No hit on you Jeb!" Kasich told the business crowd.

And he took a jab at GOP ideologues in the race.

"If you think that somebody can get elected president, and go down to Washington and change that city without understanding how it works, it will not happen. It will not happen," Kasich said. "It cannot be done with some strict ideology and without understanding how you get other people in the other political party to support your efforts."

The governor said his effort is hitting internal organizational and fundraising goals, and "we'r e getting closer and closer to making the final conclusion" on whether he will officially launch his campaign. He could be the final major entrant into the contest.

But in a line he repeats often, Kasich said he would be as content spending time on his back porch with his family as he would running for president.

"I'm playing for a bigger game than that, which is really my eternal salvation, (which) is what matters to me. I think I've got it."

OTHER

GOP hopefuls fight for post-launch poll bounce // The Hill // Jonathan Easley – June 4, 2015

Republican presidential candidates entering one of the most crowded primary races in recent history are hoping to get a big bounce from their campaign launches.

Each of the nine candidates in the race so far has fought to win attention from social and traditional media when jumping into the race — but not everyone has been successful.

Sen. Marco Rubio (Fla.) jumped to the top of the pack after his announcement, while Sen. Rand Paul's (Ky.) approval ratings stayed relatively stable after his.
Some big names — former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, Ohio Gov. John Kasich and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie — have yet to enter the race.

And for others, it is too early to tell. Sen. Lindsey Graham (S.C.) joined the fight this week, while former Sen. Rick Santorum (Pa.) and former New York Gov. George Pataki got in the GOP race last week.

Here is a look at how each Republican presidential candidate has fared in the wake of their announcements.

Marco Rubio

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rubio has had the best bounce from his campaign launch.

As recently as March 31, Rubio was buried in the polls, sitting in seventh place with only 5 percent support, according to the RealClearPolitics (RCP) average.

After announcing his candidacy on April 13, he saw his numbers double, and the lift has yet to fade. He now tops the GOP field with 14 percent, according to the latest CNN/ORC poll released on Tuesday.

Rubio was already rising before his campaign launch in Miami, as influential conservative pundits lauded him as a next-generation candidate with unmatched rhetorical skills. He had already risen to 7.3 percent, according to the RCP average, the day of his announcement.

Since then, he's underlined his status as a top-tier contender.

Ben Carson

Carson had seen his support erode in the weeks leading up to his announcement; he arrived in his hometown of Detroit on May 4 taking only 5 percent. That placed him eighth.

But the media attention surrounding his campaign launch has helped his polling numbers. He stands at 9.5 percent — good for fourth place — according to the latest RCP average.

A Fox News poll released in mid-May showed Carson tied for first with Bush.

Carson's launch energized his base; his supporters are flooding his campaign with small-dollar donations and helping him to build a substantial election fund.

Although he trails Rubio, he might be the Republican candidate with the best chance of locking up the conservative vote in the primary.

Ted Cruz

Cruz also enjoyed a sizable boost in polls after his announcement on March 23.

Unfortunately for the Tea Party senator from Texas, his numbers haven't remained elevated like Rubio's and Carson's have.

According to the RCP average, Cruz sat at 4.6 percent on the day of his announcement, burying him in eighth place. Less than one month later, Cruz peaked at 11.3 percent — trailing only Walker and Bush.

Cruz got a jump on the GOP field, becoming the first presidential contender to enter the race with a direct appeal to evangelical conservatives at Liberty University, the nation's largest Christian college.

Cruz had a full two weeks to himself as the GOP's lone candidate, and his aggression was rewarded by a tremendous lift in the polls.

Cruz's early announcement helped him draw in conservative backers. His support among those who identify as "very conservative" shot up from 11 percent in March to 33 percent in April, according to a survey from Public Policy Polling.

But as other candidates have entered the race, particularly Carson and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, Cruz has seen his polling bump fade.

He's currently at 8.2 percent, according to the RCP average, and has fallen back into seventh place.

Mike Huckabee

Huckabee's presidential announcement helped him put an end to what had been a prolonged slide in the polls.

In early March, when the polls are largely driven by name ID, Huckabee was near the top of the field with 13.3 percent, according to RealClearPolitics. On May 5, when Huckabee launched his campaign from his hometown of Hope, Ark., he had slid into sixth place with 7.5 percent.

Huckabee has seen a modest uptick in since. He is currently in fifth place with 9.3 percent.

That's not as much of an uptick as some candidates received, perhaps because Huckabee entered an already crowded race.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rand Paul

Paul got almost no bump from his campaign launch.

The Kentucky Republican became the second presidential candidate to enter the GOP race on April 7, hitting the launch button in a well-received event in Louisville, Ky.

At the time, Paul was polling in the middle of the pack, taking 8.7 percent and sitting in fifth place, per RCP. After the launch, he ticked up to the 9.5 percent range, and fourth place in the polls.

The lack of a bounce might be because of his messy launch, which was overcome by a high-profile dust-up with NBC "Today" show host Savannah Guthrie the day after his announcement. Video of Paul chastising and talking over Guthrie went viral, and he spent the rest of the week having to explain himself.

The libertarian will look for a second wind after campaigning heavily on his Patriot Act talkathon.

Carly Fiorina

Fiorina was the first candidate not to launch with a major event, opting instead to announce on ABC's "Good Morning America" on May 4.

She hails from a deep blue state and lacks a clearly defined base of support, never having won political office. At the time, she barely registered in the national polls.

Still, Fiorina has earned rave reviews on the campaign trail for her fiery speeches and aggressive attacks against Republicans' likely opponent in the general election, Hillary Clinton.

But nothing has changed for Fiorina in the polls. She consistently pulls only 1 percent, despite benefitting from outsized media coverage in places like the Drudge Report.

Poll: Which Republican Presidential Candidate Should Democrats Fear Most? // National Journal // Sara Mimms – June 5, 2015

'Jeb can better battle Hillary for the center and exploit her pandering to the Warren faction.'

Q: Which Republican presidential candidate should Democrats fear most?

Jeb Bush: 37%
Marco Rubio: 29%
Scott Walker: 5%
John Kasich: 13%
Rand Paul: 4%
Mike Huckabee: 2%
Ben Carson: 0%
Chris Christie: 0%
Ted Cruz: 0%
Carly Fiorina: 0%

Jeb Bush

"He's the one who can unify his party at the end of the day and win swing voters in November 2016."

"If he can get through the primaries, he has the most crossover appeal to moderates and undecideds. He would also make great inroads with Hispanic voters."

"He'll have the deep-pocket Republican establishment behind him. Rubio a close second."

Marco Rubio

"He's young, handsome, has charisma. Thank God he is not nearly as good a candidate as Obama was."

"Rubio is likable, dynamic, and has a great story to tell, and he tells it well. He can connect. His earnest, youthful contrast to [Hillary Clinton] is worrisome."

"Broadest appeal and most different from Hillary. Represents [the] fresh/new."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Scott Walker

"Probably the best politician in the group. Also the least likely to be a good president if he wins."

"Danger is Scott Walker could bore the electorate to victory."

Q: Which Republican presidential candidate should Democrats fear most?

REPUBLICANS (56 VOTES)

Marco Rubio: 43%
Jeb Bush: 21%
John Kasich: 12%
Scott Walker: 9%
Chris Christie: 7%
Ben Carson: 2%
Ted Cruz: 2%
Carly Fiorina: 2%
Rand Paul: 2%
Mike Huckabee: 0%

Marco Rubio

"He represents a significant turning of the page for the GOP and has the potential to appeal to Hispanics and millennials in ways the others can't."

"A powerful combination of personal story and great ability to inspire. It's up to his campaign to see how far he can go."

"He is a natural campaigner that will fare well with the independents."

Jeb Bush

"Will keep GOP base, while getting more Latino votes than his brother."

"Jeb can better battle Hillary for the center and exploit her pandering to the Warren faction."

John Kasich

"Experienced, centered, Ohio, with little baggage. Perfect matchup with Clinton."

Scott Walker

"Midwest governor who turned blue state red, beat public-sector unions three times at polls, and made Wisconsin a right-to-work state. That's a tough hombre."

Chris Christie

"If he runs and survives the primary, his tell-it-like-it-is persona will be perfected, and he rivals Bill Clinton in terms of charisma. Hillary can't compete."

TOP NEWS

DOMESTIC

The number of Fortune 500 companies led by women is at an all-time high: 5 percent // WaPo // Ana Swanson – June 4, 2015

Female leaders in the Fortune 500 had another record year.

This year's Fortune 500 list "ties the record (set last year) for highest number of female CEOs with 24, including Mary Barra (General Motors), Meg Whitman (Hewlett-Packard), Ginny Rometty (IBM) and more." So reads the press release about the new list of America's 500 largest companies by revenue, which was published this morning.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But there's a less charitable way to look at this new. The number of female CEOs of America's most influential companies is stuck at a 5 percent, as it was the year before. While women make up 45 percent of the labor force of the S&P 500, few are climbing to the very top.

Catalyst, http://www.catalyst.org/knowledge/women-sp-500-companies
That said, there has been progress. In 1998, just one woman led a Fortune 500 company. By 2009, the figure had risen to 15, but then it fell to 12 in 2011 before doubling to 24 in 2014.

Among American companies overall, the percentage of female CEOs is slightly higher: about 15 percent, according to Catalyst, a nonprofit focused on women in the workplace. The percentage of women on U.S. corporate boards has been stuck at around 17 percent for almost a decade.

There are various arguments for bringing more women into the highest levels of corporate power. Some say it's a moral issue, while others stress that more diverse viewpoints bring better governance.

But the most persuasive argument may be the simplest one. When you draw from a smaller pool of people, you miss out on a lot of talent. Women are 50.8 percent of the population. Would you rather select your executive team from a pool of 100 people, or from 49?

Bringing more women into the workforce has already added a lot to the American economy. Consultancy McKinsey calculates that the additional productive power of women entering the workforce between 1970 to today accounts for about a quarter of the size of the U.S. economy.

Most Americans back legal status for undocum ented immigrants // Politico // Nick Gass – June 4, 2015

More than seven in 10 Americans say undocumented immigrants should be allowed to stay in the United States legally, as long as they meet certain requirements, according to a new Pew Research Center survey released Thursday.

A majority — 72 percent — say that immigrants should be allowed to legally remain in the country, including 80 percent of Democrats, 76 percent of independents and 56 percent of Republicans.

Of those 72 percent, 42 percent say they should be allowed to apply for citizenship, while 26 percent would allow for permanent residency. Just 27 percent responded that they should not be allowed to stay.

A majority of Republicans support allowing undocumented immigrants to stay in the U.S., but 58 percent see giving them a path to legal status as a reward for doing something that is against the law. Only 23 percent of Democrats and 33 percent of independents surveyed feel that way.

And Republicans and leaners aren't happy with the way their party is dealing with the issue. Just 34 percent say the GOP is doing a good job, with 59 percent in disagreement. By contrast, 51 percent of Democrats think their party is doing well on the issue, with 34 percent dissatisfied.

Additionally, 63 percent of Republicans surveyed said immigrants are a burden on the country, compared to 27 percent who called them a strength.

Overall, 51 percent said immigrants strengthen the country, compared to 41 percent who said they do not.

As far as legal immigration goes, a plurality of 39 percent said it should stay at current levels, while 31 percent say it should be decreased and 24 percent want more.

According to Pew, the share of Americans favoring less legal immigration has not declined in the last two years, though it has gone down in the past decade.
Just 37 percent approve of President Barack Obama's handling of immigration, while 65 percent disapprove.

The poll was conducted May 12-18 among 2,002 adults nationwide via landlines and cellphones, carrying an overall margin of error of 2.5 percentage points. Among 506 Republicans, the margin of error is plus or minus 5 percentage points; among 636 Democrats, it is plus or minus 4.5 percentage points; among 758 independents, it is plus or minus 4.1 percentage points.

Senate Dems ready to blockade all spending bills // Politico // Rachel Bade & John Bresnahan – June 4, 2015

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid is plotting to block GOP spending bills — an attempt to force Republicans to the negotiating table and hasten a deal to raise strict spending caps.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At a closed-door Democratic leadership meeting Tuesday night, Reid (D-Nev.) vowed that his caucus wouldn't allow a single appropriations bill to get a floor vote, sources familiar with the meeting say. Sen. Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.), one of Reid's top lieutenants, told their House counterparts that they're asking colleagues to filibuster and prevent Republicans from even calling up the spending measures.

"We will not vote to proceed to the Defense appropriations bill or any appropriations bills until Republicans have sat down at the table and figured out with us how we're going to properly fund the Defense Department ... and our families' domestic needs," Schumer said Thursday at a news conference disclosing the strategy.

Republicans in both chambers are working on spending bills that give the Pentagon more money, skirting 2011 spending caps by tucking the money into a war fund.

But President Barack Obama and the Democrats want dollar-for-dollar funding boosts for domestic priorities like education and transportation programs, too — and they're betting that gumming up the appropriations process will force the GOP to make a deal.
The plan, if executed correctly, would deliver a huge blow to the Senate's fledgling Republican majority, barring it from completing one of its top legislative priorities.

The GOP has prioritized a return to "regular order" — where all 12 appropriations bills are individually scrutinized and passed on the floor — as a way to demonstrate Republicans can govern effectively with control of both chambers. They want to avoid funding the government with a series of stop-gap continuing resolutions and last-minute legislating.

And while many Republicans are also interested in raising the spending caps eventually — though not until much, much later in the year — they'd hoped to clear GOP appropriations bills first, which would have given them bragging rights, at the very least.
Obama has promised to veto their appropriations measures, but the latest Democratic strategy means those bills wouldn't even make it to his desk.

"Every day that goes by without an agreement to replace sequestration in a responsible way is a day that makes it tougher," said Sen. Patty Murray (D-Wash.), calling GOP insistence on moving their own spending bills a "waste of time." She and Rep. Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) took a full two months to hammer out the first agreement to lift the caps in 2013, she said, a pact that many lawmakers hope can be recreated this year. "It's getting us, every day, closer to a meltdown."

Sen. Chris Coons (D-Del.) said some kind of Democratic stand is necessary to "reinforce the president's veto threat and ... compel a negotiation over the future of the budget."
Republicans will no doubt call Democrats obstructionists, accusing them of flirting with a government shutdown.

But Democrats are already playing defense, suggesting at a Thursday news conference that refusing to move to a deal immediately would hurt military families and veterans. They argue the ball is in the GOP's court.

"[T]he onus will be on Republicans to come to the table," a senior Democratic aide said.
Republican presidential candidate, Sen. Rand Paul, R-Ky. is pursued by the media as he departs a news conference on Capitol Hill in Washington, Tuesday, June 2, 2015, where officials and families of 9-11 victims called for the 28 classified pages of the 9-11 report to be declassified. Paul has been voicing his dissent in the Senate against a House bill backed by the president that would end the National Security Agency's collection of American calling records while preserving other surveillance authorities.

Whip Dick Durbin of Illinois told POLITICO that he and leadership had not whipped the count yet to ensure the entire party was on board, and when asked whether it would be easy to do so, Durbin responded with a terse, "No — nothing's easy."

But Democratic leaders already have a number of key Senate Democrats lined up, including former Appropriations Chairwoman Barbara Mikulski, who still leads the panel for the left.

"I want to put the chairman on notice: The president will veto bills at this allocation, and Democrats will vote against motions to proceed to these bills on the Senate floor," the Maryland Democrat warned at a recent spending mark-up. "We need a sequel to Murray-Ryan, and we need it sooner rather than later "

Senate Armed Services ranking member Jack Reed stood with leadership at the Thursday news conference, suggesting the defense-minded Rhode Island Democrat also backs the strategy. And Sen. Claire McCaskill of Missouri, another Democrat with a keen eye for military needs, says she's in.

"I certainly am inclined to vote against [the motion] to proceed to appropriations that's going to damage our military permanently by not dealing with the base budget needs," she said. "The appropriations bill is really where the fight will come."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Across the Rotunda, House Democrats under Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi are also playing offense. Though chamber rules don't allow them to muck up the process like the Senate can, the California Democrat also promised at Tuesday night's meeting that Democrats would continue to oppose House appropriations bills in large swaths to ensure Republicans cannot claim they have a veto-proof majority.

She also suggested that Democrats need to push for revenue increases to offset a portion of the cost associated with raising spending caps.

"What we have done is come together with a unified message of the folly of this budget's austerity," said House Democratic appropriator David Price (D-N.C.). "At some point there's going to be some sort of budget agreement … so what's it going to take to precipitate that action?"

House Appropriations Chairman Hal Rogers, when asked whether such a strategy would quicken work toward a deal, shrugged.

"I don't know," said the Kentucky Republican, who's been calling for a deal to raise the caps for a few months now. "We're going to continue with what we're doing. We're working at a record pace, and we'll just have to see."

Fracking Has Had No 'Widespread' Impact on Drinking Water, EPA Finds // WSJ // Russell Gold & Amy Harder – June 4, 2015

A decade into an energy boom led by hydraulic fracturing, the Environmental Protection Agency has concluded there is no evidence the practice has had a "widespread, systemic impact on drinking water."

The report is the federal government's most comprehensive examination of the issue of fracking and drinking water, and it bolsters the position staked out by the energy industry and its supporters: that fracking can be carried out safely and doesn't need to pose a threat to water.

While there have been some cases involving spills and leaking wells, the spread of fracking didn't cause extensive damage to groundwater resources, the EPA found. The four-year study noted that there were certain "potential vulnerabilities" to water supplies that needed to be addressed, including ensuring wells are well built and wastewater is disposed of properly.

"EPA's draft study will give state regulators, tribes and local communities and industry around the country a critical resource to identify how best to protect public health and their drinking water resources," said Thomas Burke, deputy assistant administrator of EPA's Office of Research and Development.

While the report doesn't recommend any specific action, it could reinvigorate a debate over the role of fracking in the nation's energy landscape at a time when environmentalists have increasingly called to ban the practice outright, a step that two states with gas resources—New York and Maryland—have recently taken.

Fracking remains controversial in some communities as critics of the practice have recently moved to highlight other concerns with the practice, including air emissions, community health impacts and the proliferation of earthquakes that some studies have tied to injecting fracking wastewater.

Fracking involves shooting millions of gallons of water, laced with chemicals, into dense rock formations to create fractures and allow oil and natural gas to flow out.

Several years ago, as fracking spread across the U.S., there were widespread fears that fracking would lead to contaminated drinking water. Many of these fears were stoked by the 2010 documentary Gasland. One of the most notable scenes showed a landowners lighting his faucet on fire.

In Congress recently, the political debate over fracking has subsided. Almost all Republicans endorse fracking, and many Democratic lawmakers have increasingly been supportive as well, in large part because it has brought economic growth to their districts.

The growing skepticism of fracking by the Democratic Party's environmental base has done little to move Democrats toward that position. The EPA's report, whose findings echo that of many Democrats on Capitol Hill and in the Obama administration, will reinforce much of the conventional wisdom on Capitol Hill about the drilling practice.

Barnard College will now accept transgender women // CNN // Emily Jane Fox – June 4, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Barnard College announced Thursday that it will admit transgender women, a move that follows a number of women's colleges who have expanded their policies on gender identity over the last several months.

Barnard, an all women's college in New York affiliated with Columbia University, said its board voted to consider admissions for applicants who "consistently live and identify as women, regardless of the gender assigned to them at birth." This will go into effect for those applying in the fall of 2016.

The policy does not apply to transgender men, who were born female and identified as male when they applied, though the college said it will continue to support and enroll those who transition to males after they have already been admitted.

Before now, Barnard did not have an official policy on transgender students or applicants.

The decision was made after a year-long discussion on campus, consisting of five town halls and a virtual forum that collected more than 900 responses.
From the conversations and feedback, a statement from the college said two things were made clear: "There was no question that Barnard must reaffirm its mission as a college for women. And there was little debate that trans women should be eligible for admission to Barnard."

Barnard's announcement comes as a spate of women's colleges across the country have reached similar decisions, amidst a national dialogue about transgender issues. Last fall, Mount Holyoke College announced it would admit "any qualified student who is female or identifies as a women." This means that it admits those who were born female and identify as female, those who were born male and identify as female, and, in a step further than Barnard, those who were born female and identify as male. The school also clarifies that it admits those who were born female and don't identify as either a man or woman.

In February, Bryn Mawr College adopted a policy that is much like Barnard's new policy, admitting those who were born male but identify as female at the time of application. Wellesley College came to a similar decision in March, as did Smith College in May.

As Supreme Court Obamacare case looms, Republicans split on response // Reuters // Susan Cornwell & Caroline Humer – June 4, 2015

U.S. Republicans face a potential political backlash from voters if the Supreme Court rules soon against President Barack Obama's healthcare law, and are split over what to do about it, with some calling on the Obama administration for help.

But the White House, perhaps sensing a chance to blame Republicans for trouble, is showing no outward signs of crafting a contingency plan in case of an adverse outcome in King v. Burwell, expected to be ruled on by the end of this month.

The outcome could mean millions of Americans, many of them Republicans, would lose their Obamacare health insurance coverage. One of them might be Rosel Ettress, of Chicago.

A daycare center manager and mother of three, Ettress could lose $250 a month in tax subsidies that help her afford the premiums for her insurance under 2010's Affordable Care Act.

She said in a telephone interview that this would be a blow and she urged Republicans and Democrats in Congress to act.

"I would like for Congress to come up with a way to fix this where everyone could still get the subsidies and still save a little money in the process," she said.

King v. Burwell is the result of a lawsuit brought by anti-Obamacare libertarian activists. Ordinarily, Republicans might be expected to cheer for a ruling damaging to Obamacare, which the party has opposed since its passage.

But there are many Republicans among the 6.4 million low- and middle-income Americans who get Obamacare premium subsidies in 34 states. If those Americans lost their coverage as a result of the case, who would they blame at the polls in 2016?

REPUBLICANS DIVIDED

Republicans in Congress have been working on post-King v. Burwell plans for months, but still can not decide what to do. Some favor extending the Obamacare subsidies long enough to protect people like Ettress for a time and prevent them from possibly seeking revenge on the party.

In another approach, the Republican Study Committee, a group of some 170 House of Representatives conservatives, on Thursday proposed a model for a longer-term replacement for Obamacare.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But the group's chairman, Representative Bill Flores, said it would not offer an interim plan for the immediate aftermath of King v. Burwell, in part because members can not agree on whether to temporarily extend the Obamacare subsidies.

"I will not vote to extend the subsidies unless the president is willing to sit down with us and do the things to reduce the overall cost of the premiums," said Representative Austin Scott, a member of the committee, at a news conference.

In the Senate, there was rising Republican anxiety about what might need to be done in the wake of King v. Burwell.

Twenty-one of 24 Republicans who are running for re-election to the Senate next year are from states on the federal exchange, Healthcare.gov, which King v. Burwell specifically targets and from which the court could make the subsidies disappear.

"Millions have grown accustomed to those subsidies and we're gonna have to replace them" if the court nixes them, Republican Senator John McCain of Arizona told Reuters earlier this week.

One of the senators running for re-election in 2016, Ron Johnson of Wisconsin, has 31 co-sponsors including McCain for his bill to extend the Obamacare subsidies through August 2017.

Senator John Barrasso of Wyoming, a Senate Republican leader, this week said Obama should step in. "The president made the mess. He doesn't seem to be a willing partner to work with in finding solutions to the mess he's made," Barrasso said.

White House officials said they have no Plan B if the Court rules against the administration.

"If the Supreme Court were to throw the health care system in this country into utter chaos, there would be no easy solutions for solving that problem," spokesman Josh Earnest told reporters at a briefing on Wednesday.

INTERNATIONAL

House could be forced to debate war against ISIL // Politico // Bryan Bender – June 4, 2015

Rep. Jim McGovern, calling Congress "the poster child for cowardice," is taking advantage of an obscure provision to force the House to debate the 10-month-old war against the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant.

The Massachusetts Democrat took to the House floor Thursday to introduce a bipartisan resolution under the provisions of the War Powers Resolution, which would require a full debate within 15 days on whether U.S. troops should withdraw from Iraq and Syria.

He cited the Congress' failure to authorize the U.S.-led air campaign against the militant group, along with some 3,000 military advisers to help train Iraqi troops.

"Frankly speaking, this is unacceptable," McGovern said, saying that if the Congress "doesn't have the stomach" to authorize the war it should vote to bring U.S. forces home.

His resolution is co-sponsored by Reps. Walter Jones (R-N.C.) and Barbara Lee (D-Calif.).

"This House appears to have no problem sending our uniformed men and women into harm's way. It appears to have no problem spending billions of dollars for the arms, equipment and airpower to carry out these wars. But it just can't bring itself to step up to the plate and take responsibility for these wars," McGovern said in prepared remarks. "Congress is the poster child for cowardice."

"Just yesterday Gen. John Allen, the U.S. envoy for the U.S.-led coalition fighting ISIL, said that this fight may take 'a generation or more,'" McGovern went on. "If we are going to invest a generation or more of our blood and our treasure in this war, then shouldn't Congress at least debate whether or not to authorize it?"

"Every single hour the taxpayers of the United States are paying $3.42 million for military actions against the Islamic State. $3.42 million every hour," he declared.

The War Powers Resolution requires the president to notify Congress within 48 hours of committing armed forces to military action. It also requires the troops be brought home after 90 days without without an authorization of the use of military force or a declaration of war — a requirement that has largely been ignored over the decades since it was adopted after the Vietnam War.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

An aide described the procedure McGovern is relying on to force such a debate this way:

“The way it works, the clock would start tomorrow and there would then be 15 calendar days for the House Foreign Affairs Committee to act. If they fail to act, the resolution can then be brought up for a vote once it has ‘ripened’ the week of June 22, specifically on the first day of session that week, June 23.”

At the urging of members of both parties, President Barack Obama sent Congress a proposed authorization for the use of military force in February, but due to deep disagreements in both parties neither the House nor Senate has taken action.

Jones, who represents Fort Bragg, cited in his floor remarks Thursday Congress’ war making authority in the Constitution.

“The House has a responsibility to the men and women in uniform and the American people,” he said.

China suspected in massive breach of federal personnel data // AP // Ken Dilanian and Ricardo Alonso-Zaldivar – June 4, 2015

China-based hackers are suspected of breaking into the computer networks of the U.S. government personnel office and stealing identifying information of at least 4 million federal workers, American officials said Thursday.

The Department of Homeland Security said in a statement that data from the Office of Personnel Management and the Interior Department had been compromised.

"The FBI is conducting an investigation to identify how and why this occurred," the statement said.

The hackers were believed to be based in China, said Sen. Susan Collins, a Maine Republican.

Collins, a member of the Senate intelligence committee, said the breach was "yet another indication of a foreign power probing successfully and focusing on what appears to be data that would identify people with security clearances."

A U.S. official, who declined to be named because he was not authorized to publicly discuss the data breach, said it could potentially affect every federal agency. One key question is whether intelligence agency employee information was stolen. Former government employees are affected as well.

"This is an attack against the nation," said Ken Ammon, chief strategy officer of Xceedium, who said the attack fit the pattern of those carried out by nation states for the purpose of espionage. The information stolen could be used to impersonate or blackmail federal employees with access to sensitive information, he said.

The Office of Personnel Management is the human resources department for the federal government, and it conducts background checks for security clearances. The OPM conducts more than 90 percent of federal background investigations, according to its website.

The agency said it is offering credit monitoring and identity theft insurance for 18 months to individuals potentially affected. The National Treasury Employees Union, which represents workers in 31 federal agencies, said it is encouraging members to sign up for the monitoring as soon as possible.

In November, a former DHS contractor disclosed another cyberbreach that compromised the private files of more than 25,000 DHS workers and thousands of other federal employees.

Cyber-security experts also noted that the OPM was targeted a year ago in a cyber-attack that was suspected of originating in China. In that case, authorities reported no personal information was stolen.

One expert said it's possible that hackers could use information from government personnel files for financial gain. In a recent case disclosed by the IRS, hackers appear to have obtained tax return information by posing as taxpayers, using personal information gleaned from previous commercial breaches, said Rick Holland, an information security analyst at Forrester Research.

"Given what OPM does around security clearances, and the level of detail they acquire when doing these investigations, both on the subjects of the investigations and their contacts and references, it would be a vast amount of information," Holland added.

DHS said its intrusion detection system, known as EINSTEIN, which screens federal Internet traffic to identify potential cyber threats, identified the hack of OPM's systems and the Interior Department's data center, which is shared by other federal agencies.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It was unclear why the EINSTEIN system didn't detect the breach until after so many records had been copied and removed.

"DHS is continuing to monitor federal networks for any suspicious activity and is working aggressively with the affected agencies to conduct investigative analysis to assess the extent of this alleged intrusion," the statement said.

Rep. Adam Schiff, ranking Democrat on the House intelligence committee, called the hack "shocking, because Americans may expect that federal computer networks are maintained with state of the art defenses."

Ammon said federal agencies are rushing to install two-factor authentication with smart cards, a system designed to make it harder for intruders to access networks. But implementing that technology takes time.

Senate Intelligence Committee Chairman Richard Burr, R-N.C., said the government must overhaul its cybersecurity defenses. "Our response to these attacks can no longer simply be notifying people after their personal information has been stolen," he said. "We must start to prevent these breaches in the first place."

Obama to meet Iraqi prime minister at G7 // The Hill // Jordan Fabian – June 4, 2015

President Obama will meet with Iraqi Prime Minister Haider al-Abadi at this weekend's Group of Seven (G7) summit in Germany amid tensions over the administration's strategy in fighting the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria (ISIS).

It will be Obama and Abadi's first face-to-face meeting since the city of Ramadi fell to ISIS militants last month, a major blow for the international coalition's campaign against the group.
The two leaders will discuss "the situation on the ground and our efforts to support the Iraqi security forces," deputy national security adviser Ben Rhodes told reporters Thursday.

The White House has publicly expressed confidence in Abadi's leadership, but there have been signs of a strained relationship since ISIS took control of the Sunni stronghold of Ramadi.

Abadi called for greater international support for Iraqi ground forces during a meeting of coalition partners in Paris this week.

"This is a failure on the part of the world," Abadi told reporters. "There is a lot of talk of support for Iraq. There is very little on the ground."

ISIS has also made recent gains in Syria, taking the ancient city of Palmyra and advancing on Aleppo.

Rhodes said there are no plans to announce any shift in strategy. He expressed confidence in the existing plan to fight the group, which includes a new offensive in Anbar Province, where Ramadi is located.

There are approximately 3,000 U.S. troops training and equipping Iraqi forces, but they do not serve in combat roles.

In addition, the government has sent 2,000 anti-tank missiles to Iraq to help combat ISIS's use of car bombs placed inside armored vehicles. The administration has also pledged to speed up other weapons shipments.

Last month, Iraqi officials were angered when Defense Secretary Ashton Carter said Iraqi troops who were routed in Ramadi showed "no will to fight." That prompted Vice President Biden to smooth over tensions and pledge support for the Iraqi forces in a phone call with Abadi.

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS

Let Transgender Troops Serve Openly // NYT // The Editorial Board - June 4, 2015

Staff Sgt. Loeri Harrison could receive the paperwork any day now, forms certifying that after an exemplary eight-year Army career, she is no longer fit for duty and must leave Fort Bragg because she is transgender.

Early this year, Senior Airman Logan Ireland feared he might face a similar fate when he disclosed to his commanders during a recent deployment in Afghanistan that he transitioned from female to male. Yet, his supervisors have been supportive, allowing him to wear male uniforms and adhere to male grooming standards even though Air Force records continue to label him as female.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It can go either way in the military these days. While transgender civilians in the federal work force enjoy robust legal protections from discrimination, those in the armed forces may be discharged at any moment. The Pentagon, shamefully, has yet to rescind anachronistic personnel guidelines that prohibit openly transgender people from joining in the military, labeling their condition a “paraphilia,” or perversion.

The policy has forced thousands to serve in silence, repressing an essential part of their identity. The Williams Institute at the U.C.L.A. School of Law, which researches gender issues, estimates there are about 15,500 transgender troops serving in uniform.

Those who take steps to transition while in uniform must carefully compartmentalize their lives as they test the shifting boundaries of tolerance within an institution that still allows discrimination on the basis of gender identity. While some service members have come out in recent years to commanders willing to bend or disregard rules, scores have been expelled.

The absence of common-sense leadership on this issue by Pentagon leaders has forced commanders on the ground to develop a patchwork of unofficial rules. Those have created a tremendously uneven landscape in which some service members are treated with respect and assured career advancement, while others are subject to scorn, if not dismissal.

A recent graduate at the Naval Academy in Annapolis, Md., who is in the early stages of transitioning from male to female, is agonizing about the months ahead. When she reports for flight school in Pensacola, Fla., in the fall, and undergoes a medical exam, the officer may be forced to explain why she has been on hormone replacement therapy for more than a year.

“If they let me serve as myself, I will give 30-plus years,” said the 22-year-old Navy officer, who asked to be identified only as Alex, wihch is part of her name. “I will sign up for the rest of my life. I love the military. I love my peers. I love the whole structure of the military.”

The rules that prohibit transgender people from entering miltary service were introduced in the early 1980s, an era during which few people lived openly and those who did were widely stigmatized. The Pentagon’s transgender ban went largely unchallenged, even as the medical community’s understanding of gender identity evolved considerably over the years.

In the 1990s, when Congress passed the “don’t ask, don’t tell” law allowing gay and lesbians to serve in the military as long as they remained closeted, there was no mention of transgender troops. The unspoken consensuswas that they did not belong in the force.

During the months leading to the repeal of the “don’t ask, don’t tell” law in 2011, gay activists refrained from publicly talking about the transgender ban, which was never codified in law. Some feared that advocating for transgender rights would cause Congress to enact a ban on transgender service. After “don’t ask, don’t tell” was rescinded, transgender service members felt slighted. Like gay troops had done a few years earlier, some began to mobilize covertly, initially largely online, to make the case that they, too, deserved to serve openly and proudly.

Sergeant Harrison, a satellite communications expert who joined the Army in 2007, contacted Sparta, an advocacy group for gay and transgender troops, after returning in 2012 from her second deployment to Afghanistan. At the time, her marriage was crumbling, and she was finding it increasingly hard to suppress the desire to live as a woman.

She was among the active duty service members who traveled to Houston in January 2014 for a Sparta strategy meeting attended by representatives of prominent advocacy groups, including the American Civil Liberties Union, the National Center for Transgender Equality and the Palm Center. It was a galvanizing moment for those who had been too afraid of taking steps to transition.

Senior Airman Ireland met an Army nurse, Cpl. Laila Villanueva, to whom he is now engaged. The two legally changed their names last year and began coming out gradually. The underground support community started expanding.

“Meeting all those people, seeing what they were doing, how they were balancing the military life with themselves, gave me an impetus to do more than just talk to a therapist,” said Sergeant Harrison, who legally changed her name this year.

Soon after the Houston meeting, Sergeant Harrison told her battalion physician during a regular checkup that she intended to start hormone replacement therapy soon. The doctor urged her to notify her commander. “That was a scary moment, basically going up to someone and saying, ‘Here is my career. You can flush it if you want, but this is what I need to do to be sane,’ ” she said.

Much to her surprise, her commander was supportive. As long as she adhered nominally to male grooming standards during the day, he said, the unit would overlook everything else that was happening in her life. She used strong gel to slick her hair back during the work day, asked close colleagues, as a personal favor, to use female pronouns, and began using a female restroom near her office that was infrequently used.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Late last year, after a stressful period at work, Sergeant Harrison went to the behavioral health center at Fort Bragg to talk to a therapist, where she broke down in tears. A physician who reviewed her file during that visit filled out a form setting in motion her expulsion from the Army.

Two former secretaries of defense, Leon Panetta and Chuck Hagel, were urged to review the military's ban on transgender troops and the type of policies needed to allow them to serve openly. Neither made it a priority.

Defense Secretary Ashton Carter should take on what they refused to do. The current policies leave transgender troops vulnerable to discrimination that the Justice Department and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission describe as a violation of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Medical and military experts who have studied the policies have concluded that there is no rationale for disqualifying transgender troops from serving on medical grounds.

On the ground, commanders and military doctors who have reached the same conclusions have resorted to makeshift, imperfect solutions. Some doctors prescribe hormones for transgender patients without clearly documenting the reason on their medical files. In rare cases, policies on personal grooming and uniform standards are waived.

Lt. Cmdr. Jesse Ehrenfeld, a Navy Reserve doctor who returned recently from a deployment to Afghanistan, has treated several transgender service members. He said the type of medical care most of them need is fairly basic and should not preclude them from being deployed.

"They do just fine and are able to serve appropriately," he said. "I've seen folks deploy with all sorts of complex medical conditions that are frankly more limiting." Yet, some commanders have prohibited troops from taking hormones to transition.

Military officials from several of America's closest allies have been pragmatic and enlightened about this issue for years. Britain, Canada, Australia, Germany and Israel are among the nations that allow transgender people to serve openly. The Israeli military has begun educating commanders and rank-and-file troops about gender identity to ensure that the handful of service members who transition each year are treated with respect.

"It's not that hard," Brig. Gen. Rachel Tevet-Weisel, a senior Israeli military leader who played a significant role in fostering an open environment for transgender troops. "The issue is you have to have very good education for the young soldiers coming each year."

Commander Ehrenfeld and Senior Airman Ireland were among the troops who met with Mr. Carter during his visit to Kandahar, Afghanistan, in February, a few days after being sworn in. The doctor asked Mr. Carter what he thought about transgender troops serving in austere environments, a reference to the argument some officials at the Pentagon have made to justify the ban.

Mr. Carter replied that he hadn't studied the issue closely, but he added that the military should be working to attract the most qualified people. "That's the important criteria," he said. "Are they going to be excellent service members?"

They already are. While some, like Senior Airman Ireland, are thriving, others, including Sergeant Harrison, fear that their careers could unravel at any moment. That is an inexcusable way to treat Americans who want to serve their country.

Alex, the recent Naval Academy graduate, decided during her junior year that she would transition publicly in the near future. The only alternative, she felt, was suicide. "I'm going to stop fighting it, and I'm going to do something about it to save my life," she said she decided then.

She is scheduled to report for flight school in October. That gives Mr. Carter ample time to ensure that her career gets off the ground smoothly, and that transgender troops will no longer have to suffer in silence.

Listen to Rand Paul // WaPo // Fareed Zakaria – June 4, 2015

It turns out that Republicans in Washington are united on one issue: their hatred of Rand Paul. John McCain says that he is "the worst possible candidate . . . on the most important issue." Marco Rubio opines that "he has no idea what he's talking about." Lindsey Graham concludes that it would be "devastating" for the party to nominate him. Conservative commentators are even more vicious and ad hominem. The obsession with Paul is striking. In a Post op-ed last summer, then-Texas Gov. Rick Perry mentioned Paul 10 times. I cannot recall an instance in recent decades when so much vitriol has been directed against a leading political figure by his own party.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The attacks are almost entirely focused on Paul's foreign policy, which is routinely characterized as dangerous and isolationist. In fact, the real problem appears to be that Paul is trying to force Republicans and many Democrats to defend what has become a lazy, smug consensus in favor of an ever-expanding national security state.

I have read Paul's proposals and speeches on foreign policy. There are some bloopers, odd comments and rhetorical broadsides, but for the most part his views are intellectually serious and well within a tradition of what he (correctly) calls conservative realism. They are also politically courageous. Paul has taken positions and cited authorities that are deeply unpopular with his own party. Yes, of course, he craves publicity and engages in stunts. What politician doesn't? But what makes his opponents most uncomfortable is the substance, not the style.

Take the most recent example: his opposition to the blanket extension of the Patriot Act, which has resulted in some modest restraint on the vast expansion of government powers since 9/11. (The new checks and balances are close to ones recommended by a panel put together by the Obama administration.) In defending his position, Paul notes— correctly — that we would not even know of the existence of this system of metadata collection if not for Edward Snowden's revelations, that the FBI has been unable to cite a single terrorist plot disrupted by it and that the special courts in place have few checks and little transparency. He cites, glowingly, the 1979 dissenting opinion regarding the dangers of government collection of phone records by Thurgood Marshall and William Brennan, the Supreme Court's two most prominent liberals of the past half-century.

Or consider Paul's views on lifting the embargo on Cuba, on which he writes: "The supporters of the embargo . . . fall strangely silent when asked how trade with Cuba is so different than trade with Russia or China or Vietnam." This is not a path to primary voters' hearts in Florida.

He has raised uncomfortable questions that no other politician dares raise about Anwar al-Awlaki, an al-Qaeda leader who was killed in a car on a road in Yemen by a U.S. drone strike. Paul has pointed out that since Awlaki was a U.S. citizen, this action creates an extraordinary legal precedent — that the president of the United States can execute a U.S. citizen without trial. He cites approvingly the American Civil Liberties Union, which, he writes, has pointed out that "in modern history, a presidential order to kill an American citizen away from a battlefield is unprecedented."

In the Middle East, Paul has called for caution before the next military intervention, suggesting that it is worth learning some lessons from the past decade. U.S. military interventions, he has argued, have destabilized countries and led to perverse consequences. "As secular dictators fell in Libya, Egypt, Iraq, and now Syria, radical jihadists exploited the vacuum," he has noted.

In Afghanistan, he said, President Obama added 50,000 troops to the U.S. force and spent an additional $120 billion on the effort with little effect. Afghanistan today is by some measures as dangerous as ever — after 14 years of continuous U.S. military intervention and $1 trillion spent, by one estimate. Surely this is worth pondering?

I don't agree with Rand Paul on many things, including foreign policy. I think some of his positions on civil rights are historically blind, cruel and dangerous. But in the arena of national security, he has time and again raised important, inconvenient questions, only to have them ruled out of order and to be told that he is a crank, far outside the mainstream. In fact, it would be useful and important for Republicans — and Democrats — to stop the name-calling and actually discuss and debate his ideas.

Jeb Bush vs. Rick Perry // WaPo // Jennifer Rubin – June 4, 2015

Former Texas governor Rick Perry will officially announce his run for the presidency in less than two hours. Jeb Bush will announce his run on June 15. In comparing the two, Bush's challenges become clear.

Jeb Bush was not a combatant during most of the Obama presidency. Perry was famous for suing the federal government, challenging the president to enforce the border and railing against federal overreach. Some Republicans who have engaged in political combat have the sense that Bush was not there in the trenches.

Bush is knowledgeable and impressive; Perry is emotional, enthusiastic and engaged. The latter attributes may be more helpful in a campaign.

Perry and Bush have similar views on immigration (secure the border, fix legal immigration and then deal with the 12 million here illegally). Perry, however, gains credibility with the right wing because he took on the White House and deployed National Guard troops to secure the border. Bush will need to show that he is emphatic about border security. Bush, however, is not the most generous when it comes to illegal immigration. While Bush flirted with the idea, both Sens. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) and Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) are foursquare in favor of an earned path to citizenship.

Both candidates were accomplished conservative governors, but given the passage of time, Bush's record of accomplishment is not well known to most voters. He will need to show what he accomplished and why he more than every other candidate can deliver conservative results. By contrast, most Republican primary voters are well aware that Perry's job creation record during the recession was by far the best of any governor.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Expectations for Bush are high, so when he leads the pack but with less than 15 percent support he is in "trouble"; Perry enjoys low expectations and the ability to surprise voters. In the debates, Bush is likely to be attacked; Perry is not expected to be a target for many candidates.

Bush does not seem to relish skewering Hillary Clinton, and there are real concerns that he won't be aggressive enough to deliver fatal blows. Perry (like Carly Fiorina) seems downright giddy when it comes to attacking the Chappaqua millionairess. If Bush wants to convince Republican primary voters that he can beat Clinton, he needs to show some fire, beginning now.

Bush is not only a "Bush," but he is perceived as someone whose background and life experience set him apart from regular Americans. Perry can play up his origins as a poor boy from Paint Creek, Tex. Bush has to become "Jeb" and not just another Bush. That requires that he show enough about his own life so he does not become a caricature like Mitt Romney.

Both Bush (62) and Rick Perry (65) are younger than Clinton (67), but they are not of the "next generation" of new leaders that some Republicans want. Both Republicans will need to show energy, vigor, technological sophistication and recast the GOP's image if they are to paint Clinton as past her sell date.

Both Bush and Perry have a newer rival whom they need to get past to solidify their support. Bush faces a younger, more dynamic reformer in Rubio. Perry will need to displace the younger conservative governor Scott Walker of Wisconsin. In both cases, one suspects that Bush and Perry will argue that the newcomers just are not ready or that their rhetoric does not always match their results.

Bush will have tons of money, but it makes a real difference if the race becomes a long slough. However, what we have seen is that there is more than enough money to go around and at least in the early states it is time on the ground and emotional connectivity more than ad dollars that are decisive.

In sum, Bush — like Perry — would come into the presidency with a record of accomplishment and with leadership skills that Clinton entirely lacks. But the trick for each is convincing the primary voters he is the best candidate to retake the White House.

What Hillary Clinton's Campaign Is Getting Right // Esquire // Charles Pierce – June 4, 2015

Perhaps it's been overlooked by the inside baseball press corps but, so far, Hillary Rodham Clinton's campaign has hit all the right buttons about what's really going on in the country. Specifically, the rigging of our politics to suit the needs of the money power, the slide toward oligarchy that has not been arrested for any length of time since Ronald Reagan started the snowball down the mountain with his first budget in 1981. She has come out in favor of a constitutional amendment to reverse the Citizens United decision and its progeny–a longshot proposition at best, but the only real solution at law to the legalized influence-peddling that the decision produced. (Read the decision again. It's damned near bulletproof.) And, Thursday, in a speech she's planning to take on the second arm of the pincer attack on popular democracy–John Roberts's declaration of the Day Of Jubilee.

The voting rights speech at the historically-black college Texas Southern University will be one of the first policy speeches of Clinton's newly launched campaign and will mark one of the first times a 2016 presidential candidate has spoken out about voting restrictions which have swept the country since the high courtstruck down Section 4 of the VRA in its Shelby County ruling in 2013. According to her campaign staff, the speech will include a call for a new standard of no fewer than 20 days of early in-person voting in every state, including weekend and evening voting. In 2014, 20 million American voters cast their ballot early but currently,one thirdof states offer no early voting.
HRC also is planning to call for Congress–I know, I know, but elect some damn Democratic candidates and see–to restore those parts of the Voting Rights Act that the Supreme Court fed to the woodchipper. In addition, she is not just talking the talk on this one. Her campaign has gone to court in several important swing states to challenge the new voter-suppression laws that have become all the rage since the Day Of Jubilee was declared.

While Clinton speaks out against restrictive voting measures which studies have shown disproportionately keep African Americans and younger voters from the polls, her campaign lawyer, Marc Elias, has started bringing legal actions against restrictive laws in a number of key swing states. Last month, he and others filed a suit against Ohio alleging the state's restrictive voting laws were designed to suppress the votes of groups that typically vote for Democrats, including students, African Americans and Latinos. And last week, he hit Wisconsin with another suit claiming laws that have curtailed early voting and other restrictive changes put in place by Republican lawmakers hurt minority voters and other groups.

Make no mistake. This is a fight worth making and a debate worth having. The Republican party considers its efforts to restrict the franchise an unalloyed triumph. It helped get Greg Abbott elected governor of Texas. Scott Walker never shuts up about the grotesque law that he and his pet legislature enacted in Wisconsin, the state that gave us so many of the mechanisms by which the money power first was struck from our elections. And, in where-the-fck else, Kansas, Governor Sam Brownback may allow his secretary of state, Kris Kobach, the man behind the Papers, Please theory of immigration law, to prosecute "voter fraud" cases that state prosecutors had declared non-starters. Voter suppression is a litmus test on the political Right now, and it is a central pillar of Republican politics general, and it has been ever since Karl Rove used it as the casus belli in his purge of U.S. Attorneys nine years ago. It is a long game they've been playing.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As hard as it may be for the likes of Chris Cillizza to understand, there is considerable merit in taking on important issues that do not necessarily poll as well as "Eeek! Moosssslims!" does. The corruption of our politics by the money power, and the new mechanisms enacted to safeguard it, is the fundamental issue of our time because, unless it is reversed, and soon, all of the other issues won't matter because no real solutions will emerge from the one place where they are supposed to emerge. Ms. Rodham Clinton seems to get this. Good on her for bringing it up.

Hillary Clinton gets it on voting rights, Republican contenders don't // CNN // Donna Brazile – June 4, 2015

Hillary Clinton is speaking Thursday in Texas about the importance of protecting and expanding the constitutional right to vote for all citizens of the United States. Clinton will also call for a new national standard of "no fewer than 20 days of early in-person voting, including weekend and evening voting."

It has been 50 years since the historic march led by John Lewis, the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. and civil rights activists from Selma, Alabama, to Montgomery, Alabama, protesting voting restrictions used against African-Americans who wanted to exercise their right to vote.

It was only a few months later, on August 6, 1965, when President Lyndon Johnson signed into law the Voting Rights Act to end all barriers to political participation for racial and ethnic minorities, once and for all.

While a great deal of progress has been made over the years, today, we face new challenges to those who are eligible to vote, and some of the leading culprits of erecting barriers are running for president.

It shouldn't come as a surprise to anyone that Republicans are imposing new restrictions on the right to vote -- restrictions that disproportionally affect African-Americans, Latinos, working Americans, seniors and America's youth -- the very groups the Voting Rights Act was formed to protect.

It is because of these restrictions that we must continue to march for the right of all eligible citizens to exercise their right to vote. We march because the right to have one's voice heard in this country is embodied in our Constitution, and in the spirit of our democracy.

That's the fundamental difference between Democrats and the current GOP presidential field. As Democrats, we believe in the right of every eligible citizen to vote and have that vote counted; we are fighting to expand and protect the right to vote, while Republicans are doing just the opposite.

Many of the Republican presidential hopefuls would make it more difficult for people to cast their ballots because they believe that is their party's best path to victory, to have a smaller electorate with fewer minority voters.

While a small number of Republicans have worked to restore protections to voting rights struck down by the Supreme Court, too many of them support laws that prevent people who disagree with them from participating in the electoral process.

Jeb Bush has a long history of opposing basic voting rights, calling for more stringent voter ID laws and signing into law legislation that restricted the hours and locations for early voting. And let's not forget when the Jeb Bush administration purged 12,000 eligible voters from the Florida voter rolls ahead of the 2000 presidential election, and attempted a similar voter purge ahead of the 2004 election.

Republican hopeful, Sen. Marco Rubio also supported voter ID laws. While on the campaign trail for Mitt Romney, Rubio stated his support for these laws, saying "What's the big deal? What is the big deal?" Well according to the Brennan Center for Justice, the "big deal" is that more than 11% of eligible voters lack government-issued identification.

Former Texas Gov. Rick Perry also signed legislation to make Texas voter ID laws stricter. Even though Texans were already required to bring an ID with them to the polls, the new law would have required them to bring a photo ID. The Department of Justice blocked the law, stating that it violated the Voting Rights Act and disproportionately affected Hispanic voters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sen. Ted Cruz, son of a Cuban immigrant, introduced federal legislation that would have required voters to present "proof of citizenship" before casting their ballots in elections for federal office. This measure would have amended the National Voter Registration Act.

Sen. Rand Paul claims he is the single GOP candidate qualified to broaden his party's appeal to constituencies they normally ignore. But when asked about the need to strengthen the Voting Rights Act, Paul suggested it wasn't necessary because "we have an African-American president."

Ohio Gov. John Kasich signed into law a piece of legislation that slashed early voting and ended same-day registration in the state. The Cleveland Plain Dealer's editorial board even said the legislation was "a breathtaking bid to suppress voting despite constitutional guarantees of voting rights."

And then there's Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, who has arguably the worst record among the GOP's potential candidates in terms of voting rights. In 2010, Walker enacted one of the most restrictive voter ID laws in the country that also cut the early voting period from 30 to 12 days, eliminated weekend and evening voting, and required proof of residence when registering to vote, along with many other strict provisions.

To no one's surprise, lawsuits were filed in recent weeks maintaining that Ohio and Wisconsin laws violated the Voting Rights Act. In Ohio, the lawsuit claimed that "hundreds of thousands of Ohioans will find it substantially more difficult to exercise" their right to vote.

In Wisconsin, the lawsuit was specifically filed against the voting laws passed under the Walker administration, claiming that the measures targeted "African-American, Latino, young, and/or Democratic voters in Wisconsin in particular."

Clearly, these guys just don't get it.

It's time the GOP presidential candidates get behind one of their party's own elected officials, Rep. Jim Sensenbrenner, and others who want to fulfill the promise of the Constitution and protect everyone's right to vote.

Listen, at the end of the day, the right to vote is sacred in this country, especially for the people who have fought so hard over the years to have their voices heard. When Republican lawmakers play politics and take that away, they silence the voices of so many across the country. I'm glad Clinton is speaking out on this issue and, who knows, we might get a chance to hear from others before the end of the summer.

Hillary Clinton's Bold Plan for Voting Rights // The Nation // Ari Berman – June 4, 2015

Hillary Clinton was a senior in high school when she watched on a black-and-white television as President Lyndon Johnson signed the Voting Rights Act.

Fifty years later, the VRA—the country's most important civil rights law—has been gutted by the Supreme Court and voting rights are under attack across the country. From 2011 to 2015, 395 new voting restrictions have been introduced in forty-nine states, according to the Brennan Center for Justice, and twenty-one states have adopted new laws making it harder to vote, 14 of which will be in effect for the first presidential cycle in 2016.

Clinton sounded the alarm about the widespread push to roll back voting rights during a high-profile speech in Texas today and offered innovative solutions to fix our broken political system.

"What is happening is a sweeping effort to disempower and disenfranchise people of color, poor people and young people from one end of our country to the other," Clinton said. She criticized the GOP contenders for president for "systematically and deliberately trying to stop millions of Americans from voting" by peddling a "phantom epidemic of voter fraud."

She offered three major policy ideas for expanding voting rights:

1. Automatically register voters

Up to a third of Americans are not registered to vote. Clinton proposed fixing that problem by automatically registering every American when they turn eighteen unless they opt out. Universal, automatic voter registration—recently adopted by states like Oregon—would add 50 million Americans to the voting rolls. "I think this would have a profound impact on our elections and our democracy," Clinton said.

2. Expand early voting

14 states have no form of early voting before Election Day and many others have limited days and hours. Clinton proposed a minimum of 20 days of early voting nationwide, with expanded hours on nights and weekends. "Early, in-person voting will reduce those long lines and give more citizens the chance to participate, especially those who have work or family obligations that make it difficult to get to the polls on Election Day," she said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Unfortunately, many states continue to move in the opposite direction. Republicans have killed bills to expand early voting in fifteen states so far this year, according to Carolyn Fiddler of the Democratic Legislative Campaign Committee.

3. Restore the Voting Rights Act

Nine of fifteen states that previously had to submit their voting changes with the federal government before the Supreme Court gutted the VRA have passed new voting restrictions since 2010. The Supreme Court's decision has had a devastating impact in states like Texas, whose strict voter ID law was previously blocked under the VRA but is now in effect, leading to many longtime voters being turned away from the polls.

"We need a Supreme Court who cares more about the right to vote of a person than the right to buy an election of a corporation," Clinton said. Efforts to restore the VRA have gone nowhere in Congress, even after 100 lawmakers traveled to Selma to observe the 50th anniversary of Bloody Sunday.

These policy proposals would make it easier for millions of Americans to cast a ballot and participate in the political process. Clinton's speech signaled that voting rights will be a major issue in the 2016 race. Lawyers affiliated with her campaign have already filed suit against restrictive voting laws in Ohio and Wisconsin and have hinted that more lawsuits are to come.

It's unfortunate that voting rights has become such a partisan issue. For many years both Republicans and Democrats overwhelmingly supported the VRA. Only recently, particularly after the election of Barack Obama, has the issue become so politicized, with GOP lawmakers passing new laws curtailing access to the ballot.

Many in the media will no doubt report that Hillary's policy proposals are intended to boost her campaign and core Democratic constituencies. Regardless of the motive, expanding voting rights is good for everybody. There's no equivalence between policies that make it easier to vote and policies that make it harder to vote.

Alexandria Phillips
Press Assistant | Communications
Hillary for America | www.hillaryclinton.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Nick Merrill" <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com>
To: "Jennifer Palmieri" <jennifer.m.palmieri@gmail.com>
"Philippe Reines" <pir@hrcoffice.com>
"Cheryl Mills" <cheryl.mills@gmail.com>
"John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
"Jacob Sullivan" <Jake.sullivan@gmail.com>
"Heather?? Samuelson" <hsamuelson@cdmillsGroup.com>
Date: 3/23/2015 12:06:18 PM
Subject: NYT Follow-Up

See below.

We have gotten only 2 inquiries today (the below doesn't really count but flagging since it went to David).

PIR, Jen, and I spoke and the consensus is to get the facts out there without going nuclear at this point (doesn't mean we can't do more later). We're gave a friendly (Hunter Walker at Business Insider) our statement in full so that it's out there and we'll see what else he asks for. Some talking points are going out to surrogates now.

Will keep everyone posted, but so far all quiet on the western front.

From: <Kendall>, David Kendall <DKendall@wc.com >
Date: Monday, March 23, 2015 at 1:07 PM
To: NSM <nmerrill.hrco@gmail.com >
Subject: FW: quick question on sec. Clinton's emails, and subpoena..

Over to you, Nick—I'm not responding.

From: Billy House (BLOOMBERG/ NEWSROOM:) [mailto:bhouse5@bloomberg.net]
Sent: Monday, March 23, 2015 12:46 PM
To: Kendall, David
Subject: quick question on sec. Clinton's emails, and subpoena..

Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy said yesterday, Sunday:

"We're not interested in her private emails. We're not even interested in her emails regarding Russia and the reset or Syria and Assad and the chemical weapons, only those pertaining to Benghazi."

Q: With the Benghazi committee's subpoena coming due on Friday for a response on the request for the secretary's private emails on Libya and the 2012 terrorist attacks -- has there been a decision on whether to comply? Either partly, completely, or not at all?

NOTICE:

This message is intended for the use of the individual or entity to which it is addressed and may contain information that is privileged, confidential and exempt from disclosure under applicable law. If the reader of this message is not the intended recipient or the employee or agent responsible for delivering this message to the intended recipient, you are hereby notified that any dissemination, distribution or copying of this communication is strictly prohibited. If you have received this communication in error, please notify us immediately by reply or by telephone (call us collect at (202) 434-5000) and immediately delete this message and all its attachments.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"The Washington Post" <email@e.washingtonpost.com>
To:	john.podesta@gmail.com
Date:	7/9/2015 12:12:46 AM
Subject:	The Daily 202: Does Brad Pitt have a better chance of appearing in the first GOP debate than Lindsey Graham?

View The Daily 202 on the Web

PowerPost

The Daily 202

Morning intelligence for leaders

Share on Twitter Share on Facebook

State Rep. Cezar McKnight (D), right, hugs an unidentified man after the South Carolina House approved a bill removing the Confederate flag from the Capitol grounds in Columbia around 1 a.m. this morning. (AP Photo/ John Bazemore)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BY JAMES HOHMANN

THE BIG IDEA:

— Fox News is diminishing the power of the early states in the presidential nominating process. The cable channel will use an unspecified mix of national polls to decide which ten Republicans appear in the first debate next month. The drama over who is going to make the cut disturbs a bipartisan mix of leaders from Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina because it validates deeper fears that they will not play the same gatekeeping role as they have in the past. They argue that, in 2016, it will be harder than ever for underfunded longshots, like Jimmy Carter in 1976 or Rick Santorum in 2012, to emerge by outhustling everyone else and impressing grassroots activists.

"Nationalizing the primary by limiting the field based on national poll results turns the debates into a popularity contest based mostly on name ID, and is especially questionable when tenths of a point separate candidates near the cutoff," James Sununu, a New Hampshire activist who hails from one of the state's most prominent families, told The Daily 202 last night. He helped organize a group of 50 GOP heavyweights in the state to sign a letter pushing Fox (unsuccessfully) to change its criteria. "Voters in [the early] states have a well-earned reputation for vetting and testing presidential contenders, and voters nationally should have the same opportunity to be exposed to all these candidates."

In South Carolina, more than 130 Republicans – led by Lt. Gov. Henry McMaster – signed onto a separate letter warning direly that Fox is threatening the relevance of their First in the South primary. "Excluding candidates based on national polling at this point in the race rewards name recognition for those candidates who are celebrities, candidates who have run previously or candidates who have lots of money to purchase early national advertising," they said.

Candidates who look unlikely to make the first debate, on Aug. 6 in Cleveland, are embracing these concerns with gusto, partly to expand their appeal in these states. Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) is pushing an online petition this week calling for debate "equality." "If the cable news channels or political elite have their way, the media will have a louder voice in our nominating contest than actual Republican voters," Graham warned in a note to supporters. "Under the current debate rules supported by the RNC, Brad Pitt would have a better shot of being on the debate stage than real candidates for president … If you care about the Iowa Caucuses, New Hampshire primary, or contests in other early states, this is the beginning of the end."

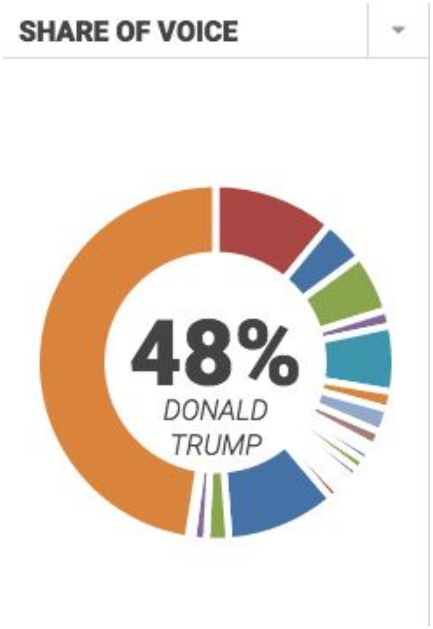
This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Brad Pitt in January (Photo by Jordan Strauss/Invision/AP)

— These concerns about "celebrities" have been accentuated because it looks very likely that Donald Trump will make the first debate, even while sitting Republican governors like Chris Christie, John Kasich and Bobby Jindal risk being excluded.

- Speaking of Trump, he continues to dominate the online conversation. According to Zignal Labs, 48 percent of all the conversation about 2016 – across social media and the media – was about The Donald last week. He had more than 1.9 million total mentions on social, traditional and broadcast media from June 30 to July 6. By comparison, the candidate who received the next highest number of mentions, Hillary Clinton, had 448,000. On Twitter, Trump was mentioned about five times as often as Clinton. On TV and online media, the gap was more like two-to-one. Of course, not all press is good press. Trump mentions were more than twice as likely to be negative than positive, according to a Zignal algorithm that tracks sentiment. This is even more pronounced in Spanish-language media. Univision and Telemundo are intensively covering all things Trump.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.



- Republican leaders, initially slow to condemn Trump, are increasingly alarmed that he will damage the whole party's brand: RNC Chairman Reince Priebus spent 45 minutes on the phone with Trump yesterday asking him to "TONE IT DOWN." My colleagues Karen Tumulty, Philip Rucker and Robert Costa report that Priebus was "cordial." Some establishment leaders wish he was a little less so. But there's reason that Reince and others are treading carefully. A North Carolina poll released yesterday afternoon by the Democratic firm Public Policy Polling put Trump in first place in the state, leading Jeb Bush 16 percent to 12 percent. He was viewed favorably by 55 percent of GOP voters in the survey and unfavorably by 32 percent. In what could be an opposition research dump provided by a rival, BuzzFeed published a story noting that Trump told CNN's Larry King in 1999 that he supported universal health care and is "quite liberal" on the issue.
- Meanwhile, Trump doubled down on his comments during several interviews. "If I get the nomination, I'll win the Latino vote," Trump told NBC. "The Latinos will have jobs that they don't have right now." He's heading to campaign in Arizona and Nevada on Saturday. In the heavily Hispanic states, he plans to discuss immigration. But the brouhaha continues to take a toll on his business: Spanish-born chef José Andrés backed out of a deal to open the flagship restaurant in Trump's forthcoming Washington hotel.
- National Democrats want to make Trump the face of the national GOP. The DNC posted a web video this morning, called "The Retrumplican Party," that highlights comments other GOP candidates have made echoing Trump. It's in the same vein as Hillary Clinton's comments in Iowa on Tuesday. Although, the Clinton Foundation yesterday said it will hold onto the six-figure donation Trump gave before he became a candidate. A California state senator, meanwhile, introduced a resolution condemning Trump and calling on the state to divest from Trump-affiliated businesses.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Workers leave the site of the future Trump International Hotel, which is at the Old Post Office Pavilion (Photo by Matt McClain/ The Washington Post)

— Sneak peek: Bobby Jindal will attack the GOP establishment for not wanting to talk more about abortion. In a keynote tonight at the National Right to Life Convention in New Orleans, the Louisiana governor will blast the "spineless" Republican "smart guys" in Washington who see cultural issues as a "distraction." From excerpts shared by the campaign: "There are some Republicans running for president who would like to sneak into this convention, whisper about being pro-life, and then sneak away hoping the press won't report on it … We will not be silenced or quiet. If they don't want to hear me talk about these issues, they better buy some ear muffs, because I will not be silenced."

Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost 's morning newsletter. Sign up to receive the newsletter.

With contributions by Elise Viebeck .

WHILE YOU WERE SLEEPING:

— The South Carolina House approved the removal of the Confederate flag from Capitol grounds. It will likely come down Friday. The vote was 94-20, but it followed more than 12 hours of debate over amendments. "A two-thirds majority vote in the House was needed for final passage, a requirement of the 2000 law that took the flag off the State House dome and put it next to the Confederate Soldier Monument on the north side of the Capitol," The State newspaper reports. "The House did not change the Senate bill (which passed Tuesday) after spending much of the day considering amendments from Republicans who insisted on finding another way to honor the Confederate dead if the controversial banner was removed from the State House grounds. More than 25 amendments were voted down or rejected before they came for a vote."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

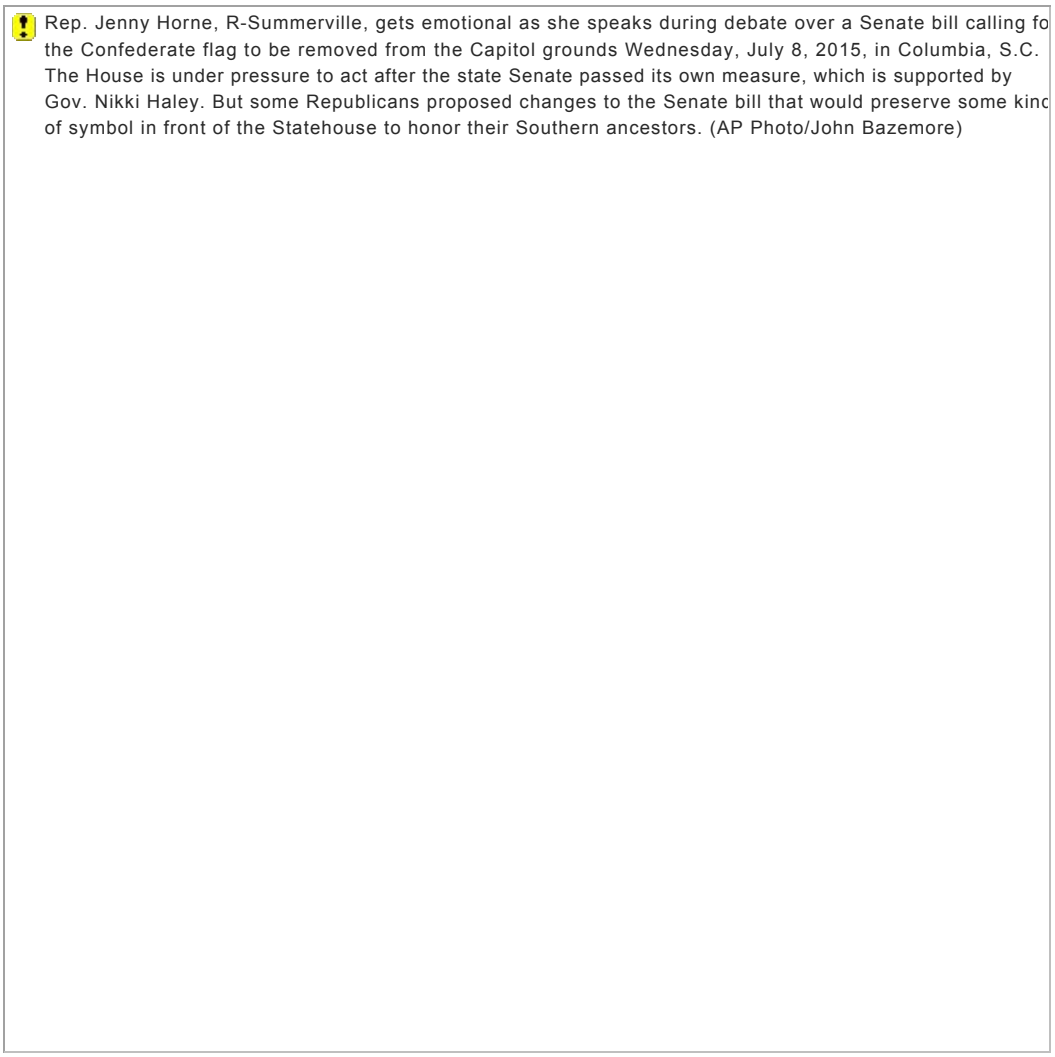
Republican State Rep. Jenny Horne (pictured below) choked up and started shouting during a floor speech over amendments that would have delayed removing the flag: "I cannot believe that we do not have the heart in this body to do something meaningful such as take a symbol of hate off these grounds on Friday. We are telling the people of Charleston, 'We don't care about you.'" This helped bring an end to the debate.



Rep. Jenny Horne, R-Summerville, gets emotional as she speaks during debate over a Senate bill calling fo the Confederate flag to be removed from the Capitol grounds Wednesday, July 8, 2015, in Columbia, S.C. The House is under pressure to act after the state Senate passed its own measure, which is supported by Gov. Nikki Haley. But some Republicans proposed changes to the Senate bill that would preserve some kinc of symbol in front of the Statehouse to honor their Southern ancestors. (AP Photo/John Bazemore) — Talks between the U.S. and Iran are continuing despite several tense moments, including a spat in which the Iranian foreign minister told a U.S. official: "Never threaten an Iranian," my colleagues Carol Morello and Karen DeYoung report from Vienna. The deadline for a deal is now Friday. The biggest sticking point remains Iran's desire for an agreement to lift a U.N. embargo on conventional arms sales to Tehran.

(AP Photo/John Bazemore)

GET SMART FAST:

1. The mayor of Baltimore fired the police chief over the department's response to the riots.
2. "The Obama administration is drafting rules to require that railroads install video cameras inside locomotive cabs to record the actions of engineers," the AP reports. "The

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Federal Railroad Administration also says that other steps aimed at reducing human error are in the works. The cameras have been opposed by labor unions." This grew out of the Amtrak derailment in Philadelphia in May: the engineer says he doesn't remember what happened, and there was not a camera.

3. Seventh-day Adventists voted that women should not be ordained as ministers.
4. A far-reaching school voucher plan that would have allowed low-income students to use federal tax dollars to pay private school tuition narrowly failed in the Senate yesterday, as a handful of GOP members broke ranks with Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.)
5. A super PAC supporting Marco Rubio's presidential candidacy said it has raised more than $16 million since early April, meaning that pro-Rubio outside groups have raised nearly $32 million. In Iowa yesterday, Rubio strenuously rejected comparisons of himself to Barack Obama.
6. A 527 supporting John Kasich launched a half-million-dollar ad buy in New Hampshire yesterday to promote the Ohio governor ahead of his announcement. Fred Davis produced the minute-long ad .
7. The Republican Governors Association has gone up with its first TV ad in the off-year Kentucky governor's race, linking Democratic nominee Jack Conway to President Obama. The spot is reminiscent of almost every ad the GOP ran in red state Senate races last year.
8. The Republican Party of Virginia is selling "Hillary Clinton Press Lassos" to capitalize on the media wrangling episode in New Hampshire over the weekend.

POWER PLAYERS IN THE NEWS:

1. Rep. Alan Grayson (D-Fla.) plans to announce today that he's running for the Senate seat being given up by Marco Rubio, a significant setback for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee because it sets up an expensive and potentially divisive primary battle with their preferred candidate, Patrick Murphy.
2. The DSCC has been talking to Pennsylvania Gov. Tom Wolf's chief of staff, Katie McGinty, about getting into the Senate race because they retain doubts about whether ex-Rep. Joe Sestak is the best candidate to challenge Republican Sen. Pat Toomey. (AP, via Philadelphia Inquirer)
3. Martin O'Malley is rolling out a plan to limit taxpayer exposure from Too Big to Fail banks today. (We got an early look at the white paper the ex-Maryland governor will roll out on Wall Street reform.)
4. Rep. Chris Van Hollen, the Democrat running for Barbara Mikulski's Senate seat, raised $1.5 million in the second quarter. The other leading Democrat, Rep. Donna Edwards, only brought in $590,000.
5. Speaker John Boehner has raised $28 million for House Republicans so far this year (Politico)
6. Caroline Kennedy, the U.S. ambassador to Japan, played a key role in getting former Toyota executive Julie Hamp out of jail yesterday, USA Today reports. The American, who resigned last week as the automaker's global communications chief, was arrested over prescription drug possession.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

7. "Bill Cosby was quietly dumped by CAA, which represented him since 2012, and he is now without talent representation in Hollywood," Deadline reports. A sexual assault awareness group, meanwhile, called on President Obama to rescind the Presidential Medal of Freedom that Cosby received from George W. Bush.
8. ESPN announced it will discontinue Keith Olbermann's show, which airs on ESPN2, when his contract ends on July 31. The network reportedly wanted him to limit his commentary, including criticism of the NFL over its handling of the Ray Rice domestic violence scandal.
9. Former Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi was found guilty of bribing a senator in 2006 as part of a ploy to bring down the opposition government, the BBC reports. "A Naples court sentenced Berlusconi to three years in jail and banned him from holding public office for five years. The four-time prime minister denied the charges. He will not have to serve his sentence because a statute of limitations comes into effect later this year, before any appeal can be held."
10. Actor Tom Selleck stands accused by California authorities of sending a truck to steal water from a hydrant and deliver it to his 60-acre ranch. A local water district filed an injunction and wants to fine him more than $20,000 – part of efforts to deal with the drought.

WAPO HIGHLIGHTS:

— "Even as Congress moves to strip his power, Arne Duncan holds his ground," by Lyndsey Layton: "Duncan faces a political backlash that threatens to undercut his power and erase some of his most influential work. The bipartisan warmth he enjoyed on Capitol Hill has yielded to critics from the left and the right, including an odd alliance between tea party conservatives and the teachers unions. This week, both houses of Congress began debating legislation that would seriously dial back the education secretary's legal authority."

— "A rejuvenated China? Stock market crash punches a hole in Xi's dream," by Simon Denyer and Steven Mufson: "Invisible and fast-paced, mutinous market forces have defied the party-led government's efforts to arrest the month-long slide in Chinese stock markets. If this continues, the slump in stock prices could slow the economy and undermine faith in the party's leadership and power, experts on China and economics say… How the stock market collapse has been handled so far and how it is handled in the coming days goes to the heart of reform in an economy that is a strange mixture of robust private enterprise and a legacy of central planning."

SOCIAL MEDIA SPEED READ:

–WHAT EVERYONE IS TALKING ABOUT:

Pictures of the day:

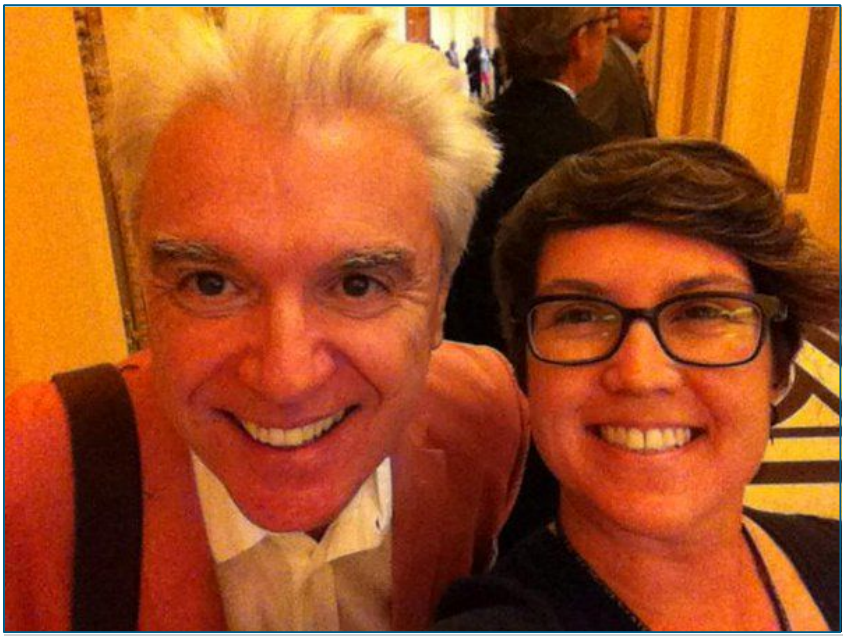
This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Kerry Washington tweeted a photo from the set of the upcoming HBO film “Confirmation,” in which she’ll play Anita Hill:

My view on my final day (as an actor) on #Confirmation. (kerrywashington)

Tweets of the day:

David Byrne of Talking Heads was spotted on Capitol Hill:

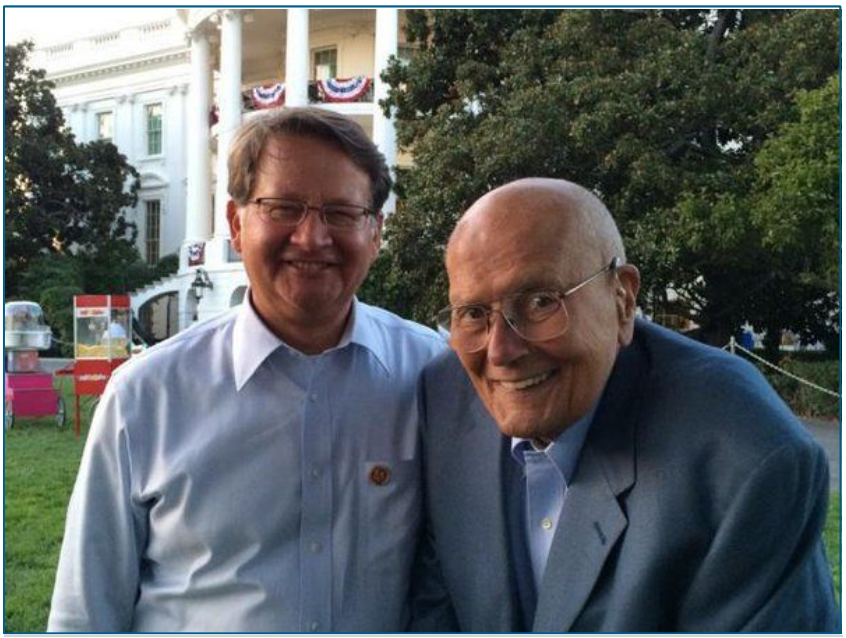


Selfie with David Byrne of Talking Heads, who’s at the Capitol for some reason. What! (@jbendery)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He wasn't burning it down, but #DavidByrne was in the House today to discuss creative works (@RepJudyChu)

Former Rep. John Dingell (D-Mich.) celebrated his 89th birthday (and a Tigers win):



Happy birthday to one of Michigan's finest – former Congressman / current Twitter master @JohnDingell. (@SenGaryPeters)

> Have my birthday party soon, but the @tigers are up a run, late in a close one. Even at 89, life throws you some seriously tough decisions.
>
> — John Dingell (@JohnDingell) July 8, 2015

> Tigers win. Birthday can now continue as planned.
>
> — John Dingell (@JohnDingell) July 8, 2015

And D.C. faced yet another dramatic summer storm:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Another line headed towards downtown
(@Joe_Fillingham; retweeted by @capitalweather)

Nice new "fountain" at Reston Metro! (@burtonwc ; retweeted by @capitalweather)

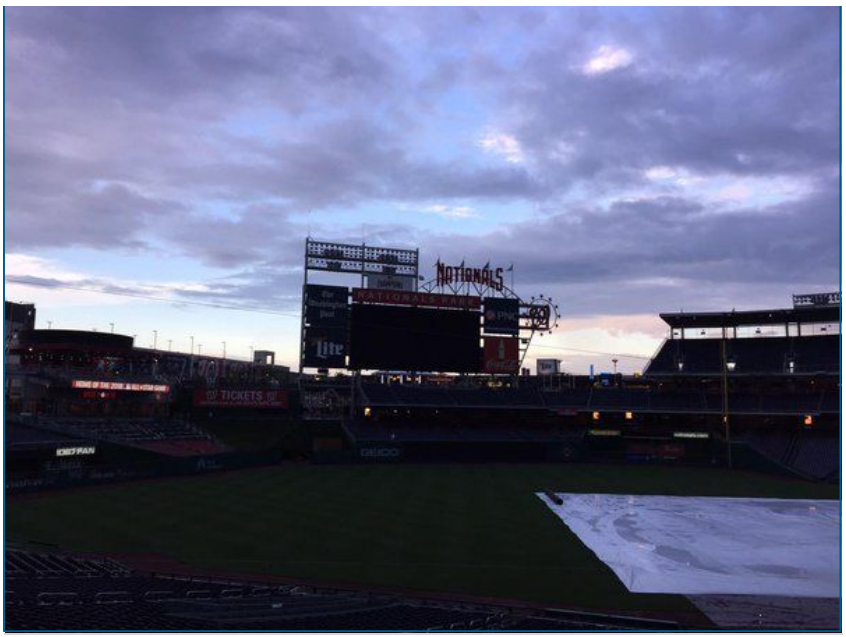
Though the bad weather did not last long:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.



So one hour after the @Nationals cancelled tonight's game this is the weather at Nats Park. Seriously Nats? (@brianjameswalsh)

Instagrams of the day:

Marco Rubio made a Bill and Ted joke to criticize Hillary Clinton:

The race for the future will never be won by going backward. (marcorubiofla)

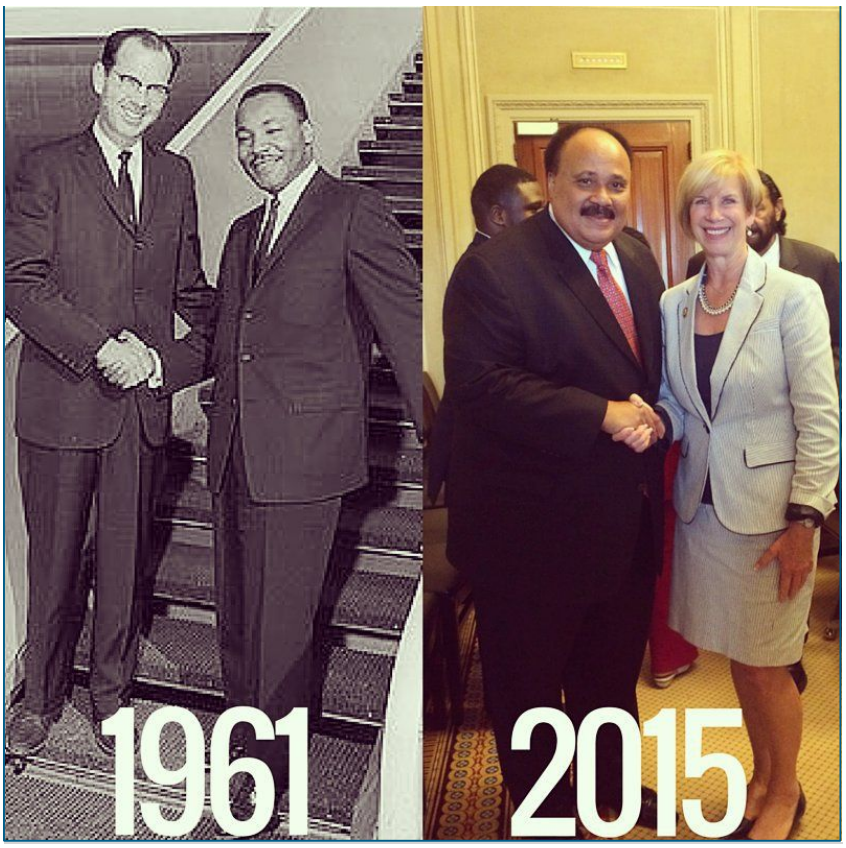
This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rep. Joe Kennedy (D-Mass.) announced that he and his wife Lauren are expecting a daughter:

We're expecting our first child in late December – a baby girl!
(repkennedy)

And Rep. Janice Hahn (D-Calif.) met with Martin Luther King III, 54 years after their fathers met:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.



From generation to generation (repjanicehahn)

GOOD READS FROM ELSEWHERE:

— New York Times, "Medicare plans to pay doctors for counseling on end of life," by Pam Belluck: "The proposal would settle a debate that raged before the passage of the Affordable Care Act, when Sarah Palin labeled a similar plan as tantamount to setting up "death panels" that could cut off care for the sick. The new plan is expected to be approved and to take effect in January, although it will be open to public comment for 60 days."

— Los Angeles Times, "It's Official: Latinos now outnumber whites in California," by Javier Panza: "The new tally, released in late June, shows that as of July 1, 2014, about 14.99 million Latinos live in California, edging out the 14.92 million whites in the state…California is now the first large state and the third overall — after Hawaii and New Mexico — without a white plurality, according to state officials."

— Wall Street Journal, "NYSE Trading Glitch Reflects Persistent Problems with Financial IT," by Steven Norton: "The precise nature of the problem was unclear. The root cause was determined to be a configuration issue, the NYSE said in prepared statement, without further elaboration…NYSE said the problem started in a software update it installed [Tuesday] night, Peter Costa, a floor trader and president of Empire Executions, told the Journal. 'They told us they did some software updates overnight and tested it without problems, but this morning something happened.'"

— New York Times, "A political lifer, Scott Walker has long been his own strategist," by Jonathan Martin: "As Mr. Walker, 47, prepares for his formal entry into the presidential contest, he has brought on a campaign manager, a pollster and a group of press aides. But he has not hired a strategist — because it might be needlessly duplicative: Those who know him well say that Mr. Walker has always been his own."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

— Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, "$72.7B heads to Scott Walker," by Jason Stein and Patrick Marley: "The state Assembly sent the two-year $72.7 billion state budget to Gov. Scott Walker early Thursday, giving him just enough time to sign it before his presidential campaign announcement on Monday. The budget passed 52-46, with 11 Republicans joining all Democrats in opposing the budget.

BUZZING AT THE CAPITOL:

— PowerPost, "Republicans again propose blocking Obama's immigration orders," by Kelsey Snell: "The House Appropriations Committee on Wednesday released a draft Homeland Security funding bill that includes language that would prevent the Obama administration from enforcing executive actions on immigration he issued in November 2014 until a court decides if the orders are legal."

— PowerPost, "Senate could take up the highway bill next week," by Kelsey Snell: Mitch McConnell "did not offer any details on what the highway bill might look like, he did tamp down expectations that a six-year bill will be considered soon and dismissed the idea of using a gas tax increase or revenues from tax reform to help offset the cost of the $50 billion a year program."

— National Journal, "On Iran deal, Schumer is the man in the middle," by Alex Rogers: "On Iran, Chuck Schumer feels the pressure more than most. Balancing a large Jewish constituency pulling him in every direction, his own hawkish beliefs, the burdens of being the next Senate Democratic leader, and a White House intent on striking a historic accord, the senator from New York has kept unusually quiet. But it's clear that should a deal on Iran's nuclear program be reached, Schumer's support or opposition will be a key factor in whether the Democratic Party can speak with a united voice on a major foreign policy issue."

— Politico, "Hillary Clinton v. Trey Gowdy," by Rachael Bade: "The war of words between Hillary Clinton and Trey Gowdy over her email practices is seriously heating up. Clinton allies and House Benghazi investigators are clashing over the 2016 presidential candidate's prime-time defense of her email practices, including claims to CNN she did nothing wrong — and had 'no obligation' to hand over any correspondence … Hours after the interview aired, Gowdy blasted Clinton's claims that she was not required to turn over her communications."

— The Hill, "Oversight Republicans subpoena Kerry for Keystone documents," by Devin Henry: "House Republicans have subpoenaed Secretary of State John Kerry for documents related to the Obama administration's review of the Keystone XL pipeline. 'Congress has a right to review these documents,' Rep. Jason Chaffetz (R-Utah), the chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, said Wednesday … Committee Republicans have twice asked the State Department to provide it with all 'reports, recommendations, letters and comments" related to their review of the pipeline.'"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

HOT ON THE LEFT

Redskins dealt major defeat in battle over mascot. From Talking Points Memo: "A Virginia judge ordered Wednesday that the Washington Redskins' trademark registrations be cancelled – the biggest legal defeat the team has suffered in its two-decade battle over its name. The ruling ends a legal saga that began when the team filed a lawsuit to contest the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office's decision to end the team's trademark registration, including the red-faced mascot viewed as racially offensive to Native Americans."

HOT ON THE RIGHT

Bakers who refused to make lesbian wedding cake told to pay $135K by Monday or else. From Fox News : "Two Christian bakers who refused to bake a cake for a lesbian wedding have been ordered to pay $135,000 in damages by July 13 or else the state of Oregon could place a lien on their home. Aaron and Melissa Klein, the owners of Sweet Cakes by Melissa, were punished by the state's Bureau of Labor and Industry (BOLI) … The Kleins, who are devout evangelical Christians, argued that baking the cake would be a violation of their religious beliefs."

DAYBOOK:

–What's happening today on the campaign trail: John Kasich will attend a luncheon at the Williamson Chamber of Commerce in Franklin, Tenn. Martin O'Malley will meet local Democrats at a breakfast in Wolfeboro, New Hampshire. Marco Rubio will attend a coffee and deliver remarks at the Scott County Republican Office in Davenport, Iowa. Jeb Bush has a fundraiser in Kennebunkport, Maine. Bobby Jindal will speak at the National Right to Life Convention in New Orleans, La.

–On the Hill: The House will convene at 10 a.m. while the Senate resumes work on an education bill at 9:30 a.m. Senate Armed Services Committee will consider the nomination of General Joseph F. Dunford to be Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The House Foreign Affairs Committee will hold a hearing on the implications of a nuclear agreement with Iran.

–At the White House: President Obama will meet with Attorney General Loretta Lynch at 3:15 p.m. Vice President Biden will travel to New York City to deliver remarks at an event held by Freedom to Marry at 7 p.m. Press Secretary Josh Earnest will brief the media at 12:30 p.m.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

QUOTE OF THE DAY: "They are pushing this through Twitter. So it's no longer the case that someone who is troubled needs to go find this propaganda and this motivation. It buzzes in their pocket. There is a device — almost a devil on their shoulder — all day long, saying: 'Kill. Kill. Kill. Kill.'" – FBI director James Comey, begging for law enforcement to get more access to encrypted technology as a way to stop radicalization, during a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing.

NEWS YOU CAN USE IF YOU LIVE IN D.C.:

— It will feel hotter than 100 degrees today, with a good chance of thunderstorms in the evening: "Clouds diminish steadily as the sun rises allowing the heat to build," the Capital Weather Gang forecasts. "A southwest breeze is likely to enhance the heating and with loads of humidity. Highs push into the low-mid 90s which is likely to push the heat index past 100 in much of the region. Clouds bubble up quickly in the afternoon but thunderstorms could hold off until evening, allowing many commuters a safe get away with rain chances set at 40%. The storms could be strong enough to produce very heavy rain and localized damaging wind gusts, so be on the lookout."

— The Nationals game against the Reds was postponed because of last night's thunderstorms.

VIDEO OF THE DAY:

In case you missed it, pop star Ariana Grande is in hot water after declaring that she "hates Americans" and "hates America," a controversy that apparently led her to cancel a performance scheduled for an MLB All-Star Game concert. (She claims she canceled because of emergency wisdom teeth surgery.) Grande made the comments, apparently related to U.S. obesity rates, in a doughnut shop. Here's the security camera footage:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(TMZ)

If you prefer, here's the Vine version.

Grande apologized yesterday for her choice of words:

(@BuzzFeedNews)

You received this e-mail because you are registered on washingtonpost.com . We respect your privacy . If you believe that this e-mail has been sent to you in error, or you no longer wish to receive this newsletter, click here . Contact us for help.

©2015 The Washington Post | 1150 15th St NW, Washington, DC 20071

The Washington Post

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Embassy of India, Washington DC" <info2@indiagov.org>
To:	podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date:	8/14/2014 12:04:57 AM
Subject:	U.S. is India's Biggest Arms Supplier Past 3 Years | Embassy bulletin on Key Policy Decisions and High-Impact News

To read online, Click here!

Welcome to the latest bulletin of key policy decisions and high-impact news from India, presented by the Embassy of India, in Washington D.C.

High Impact News

Modi to U.S. Defense Secy.: Let Us Jointly Develop Arms

Prime Minister Modi told visiting U.S. Defense Secretary Chuck Hagel that India would like to work with U.S. defense firms on a joint development and co-production model as part of Delhi's efforts to achieve self-reliance and reduce arms imports.

READ MORE

U.S. is India's Biggest Arms Supplier Past 3 Years

Over the past three years, the U.S. has overtaken Russia as the largest supplier of weapon systems to India. During that period, India has spent $13.6 billion on foreign-produced weapons, with $5.3 billion going to U.S. firms and $4.1 billion going to Russia, Defense Minister Arun Jaitley said.

India's June Factory Output Seen Rising for 3rd Straight Month

Industrial production in India likely expanded for a third consecutive month in June driven mainly by solid growth in infrastructure output, according to a poll of economists. Factory output in June likely rose 5.4 percent from a year earlier, faster than the 4.7 percent growth in May. "India's core sector growth touched 7.3 percent year-on-year in June supported by a significant pick-up in electricity, cement and coal production," said Rupa Rege Nitsure, chief economist at Bank of Baroda.

READ MORE

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Modi To Lay Foundation for $652 Million Special Economic Zone at Port

Prime Minister Modi will lay the foundation stone for a $652 million multi-product special economic zone at Jawaharlal Nehru Port Trust in Mumbai, on August 16. The proposed industrial infrastructure is 684 acres with a total public and private investment of $652 million, and has the potential of generating 150,000 direct and indirect jobs, an official statement said.

Commerce Minister: Govt. Readying Blueprint for Manufacturing Revival

The Modi Government is preparing a blueprint to revive the manufacturing sector, including a new framework for making special economic zones more attractive to investors by easing various restrictions, said Minister of State for Commerce, Corporate Affairs and Finance Nirmala Sitharaman.

READ MORE

Key Policy Decisions

Govt. OKs 14 Foreign Direct Investment Proposals Totaling $249 Million

The Government has approved 14 proposals for foreign direct investment in projects totaling $249 million. The projects include share allotment, expansion of equity participation and capital transfer.

OFFICIAL NOTICE

Govt. Considers Amendments to Minimum Wages Act

The Government is considering a proposal to amend the Minimum Wages Act of 1948 in order to include workers in certain occupations not covered under the Act.

READ MORE

Automatic Clearance for Coal Linkage for New Power Plants

Minister of State for Power, Coal and Renewable Energy, Piyush Goyal said that new power plants will be given automatic clearance for coal linkage and will be allowed to enhance capacity by up to 50%. "Replacing old plants will also help in protecting the environment besides increasing efficiency," he said, adding that the additional capacity will improve India's power generation.

READ MORE

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Finance Ministry Proposes Instrument for Rural Development

The finance ministry has proposed a Special Purpose Vehicle(SPV) in each State to ensure effective rollout of the ambitious Shyama Prasad Mukherji Rurban Mission rural development project, aimed at building integrated infrastructure projects in India's rural areas through public-private partnerships.

READ MORE

Reserve Bank of India Keeps Key Rates Unchanged, Cuts Liquidity Ratio by 50 Basis Points

Reserve Bank of India Governor Raghuram Rajan kept interest rates unchanged for the third time in a row as expected, making it abundantly clear that his intent is to stay the course and slay the inflation demon once and for all, declaring that he has Prime Minister Modi's backing in his efforts to tame prices.

READ MORE

Have a business problem with India you need fixed?

Email us at ccom@indiagov.org or tseco@indiagov.org

Forward this issue

Join Our Mailing List!

Like us on Facebook | Follow us on twitter

Comments? Feedback? | info2@indiagov.org | www.indianembassy.org

Disclaimer: The Embassy provides links to online contents of interest, which should not be construed as endorsement.

SafeUnsubscribe

This email was sent to podesta@law.georgetown.edu by info2@indiagov.org | Update Profile/Email Address | Rapid removal with SafeUnsubscribe ™ | Privacy Policy .

Trusted Email from Constant Contact FREE
Try it FREE today.

Embassy of India, Washington DC | 2107 Massachusetts Ave NW | Washington | DC | 20008

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "GMF Europe Program" <EuropeProgram@gmfus.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 7/31/2015 1:41:17 AM
Subject: New GMF Policy Paper on Reviewing the EU's Approach to its Eastern Neighborhood

If you have problems viewing this email, you can view it as a web page. To view the mobile-friendly web page click here.

Reviewing the EU's Approach to its Eastern Neighborhood

Barely a decade after its launch, the European Neighbourhood Policy is in tatters. Rather than its stated ambition to surround itself with a "ring of friends," realities in the EU's neighborhood resemble a veritable ring of fire, with regional challenges and pressures on Europe greater than ever before. In clear acknowledgement of the serious challenges presented by the European neighborhood, and the inadequacy of its own policy, the EU recently initiated a review process, conducted jointly by the European Commission and the EU High Representative for Foreign Affairs and Security Policy.

"Reviewing the European Neighbourhood Policy: Eastern Perspectives" provides recommendations for a revised policy for Europe's East. As co-editors Alina Inayeh and Joerg Forbrig argue, such an approach must have European values at its core, with an unambiguous and adamant projection of the EU's normative model. The security needs of individual countries and the region as such need stronger emphasis. Serious and direct EU engagement is needed to solve existing frozen conflicts, and to address political, economic, and societal vulnerabilities of individual countries. Further differentiation is needed, with added instruments that are tailored to individual neighbors instead of hitherto generalized formats.

Alina Inayeh and Joerg Forbrig, eds. "Reviewing the European Neighbourhood Policy: Eastern Perspectives." GMF Europe Policy Paper 4/2015. July 29, 2015.

Recent Publications in the GMF Europe Policy Paper Series

Joerg Forbrig. "What's Ahead for Russia and the West? Four Scenarios." GMF Europe Policy Paper 3/2015. June 22, 2015.

Guillaume Xavier-Bender. "France's Unexpected Role on the Way to a Reasonable and Balanced TTIP." GMF Europe Policy Paper 2/2015. June 16, 2015.

The German Marshall Fund of the United States (GMF) strengthens transatlantic cooperation on regional, national, and global challenges and opportunities in the spirit of the Marshall Plan.

GMF contributes research and analysis and convenes leaders on transatlantic issues relevant to policymakers. GMF offers rising leaders opportunities to develop their skills and networks through transatlantic exchange, and supports civil society in the Balkans and Black Sea regions by fostering democratic initiatives, rule of law, and regional cooperation.

Founded in 1972 as a non-partisan, non-profit organization through a gift from Germany as a permanent memorial to Marshall Plan assistance, GMF maintains a strong presence on both sides of the Atlantic. In addition to its headquarters in Washington, DC, GMF has offices in Berlin, Paris, Brussels, Belgrade, Ankara, Bucharest, and Warsaw. GMF also has smaller representations in Bratislava, Turin, and Stockholm.

The views expressed in GMF publications and commentary are the views of the author alone.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Strengthening Transatlantic Cooperation

Our Organization
About GMF
Career Opportunities
Press Room

Our Work
Leadership
Policy
Civil Society
Research & Analysis
Transatlantic Academy

Our Events
Major Conferences & Forums
Recent & Upcoming Events

Our Experts
Find an Expert

Manage preferences | Forward email | Unsubscribe | Subscribe

From: "German Marshall Fund" <press@gmfus.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 3/1/2016 6:00:00 PM
Subject: GMF's World Wire: New GMF Congressional Affairs Leadership | European Crises | Upcoming Brexit Vote

If you have problems viewing this email, you can view it as a web page. To view the mobile-friendly web page click here

G | M | F The German Marshall Fund of the United States
STRENGTHENING TRANSATLANTIC COOPERATION

Our Organization | Our Work | Our Events | Our Experts | GMFUS.org

GMF's World Wire

March 2, 2016

Reta Jo Lewis Named to Lead GMF Congressional Affairs

GMF is pleased to announce that Reta Jo Lewis was named the new director of congressional affairs on February 29. Lewis has over 25 years' experience in governmental relations and had been a senior resident fellow with GMF's Transatlantic Leadership Initiatives since January 2015.

LEARN MORE

The Multiple Crises of Europe

Ahead of an event today Transatlantic Academy Executive Director Stephen Szabo and Former German Ambassador and Academy Fellow Klaus Scharioth discuss the challenges facing Europe.

LISTEN HERE

Russia's Military: On the Rise?

Margarete Klein
Russia's operations in Ukraine and Syria clearly demonstrate that its armed forces are able to fulfill an increased set of functions even with limited means.

READ MORE

Tweet of the Week

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

@d_jaishankar :
Star Wars reference at #GMFSEAsia , regarding the rise of China. "It's not the Phantom Menace; it's The Empire Strikes Back."

RETWEET

Brexit Vote Approaches

GMF Senior Fellow Sir Michael Leigh joins Julie Rose on Top of Mind from BYURadio to discuss the upcoming Brexit vote and what it means for the long-term viability of the EU.

LISTEN HERE

Counting Down to the NATO Warsaw Summit

On February 24, GMF hosted Ambassadors Douglas Lute, Jacek Najder, and Adam Thomson to review key topics and identify priorities for the upcoming NATO Summit.

LEARN MORE

Policy Leadership Civil Society

Follow

Strengthening Transatlantic Cooperation

Our Organization
About GMF
Career Opportunities
Press Room

Our Work
Leadership
Policy
Civil Society
Research & Analysis
Transatlantic Academy

Our Events
Major Conferences & Forums
Recent & Upcoming Events

Our Experts
Find an Expert

Manage preferences | Forward email | Unsubscribe | Subscribe

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	Creamer2@aol.com
To:	bigcampaign@googlegroups.com CAN@list.americansunitedforchange.org
Date:	9/30/2010 1:52:05 AM
Subject:	[big campaign] New Huff Post from Creamer-10-2-10 Rally Gives Progressives a Chance to Stand Up

10-2-10 Rally Gives Progressives a Chance to Stand Up Straight

This Saturday, a broad coalition of progressive organizations will hold a massive One Nation Working Together rally – actually kind of a revival – aimed at allowing Progressives to emerge from a defensive crouch, stand up straight and mobilize our forces to do battle in the decisive mid-term elections.

Due to a navigational error, the U.S. 4th Infantry Division landed on the wrong inlet on Utah Beach in Normandy on D-Day in 1944. For hours they were disoriented and pinned down by German defenders. Then the only general to accompany the amphibious assault, General Ted Roosevelt (son of President Teddy Roosevelt), personally rallied his troops from the beach, over the seawall and established a beachhead that was critical to the successful invasion of France that ultimately ended World War II.

Saturday's rally is aimed at energizing thousands of latter-day General Ted Roosevelt's who can fan out across America and do the same for the progressive forces that can be successful on November 2nd if – together – we stand up straight, take the offensive and refuse to be pinned down by constant attacks from the right.

The President's speech to 27,000 in Madison, WI last Monday night fired up all present. It was a great start. But this weekend's rally-organizers plan to communicate one central message to the thousands of activists that will gather in Washington Saturday: the President and other Democratic political leaders are not the only ones responsible for rallying our forces. We are all the Generals who will rally our troops off this beach. It's up to us to take the leadership to prevent the Big Business, Wall Street-dominated, Tea-Party-Republicans from reclaiming right wing domination of American politics.

For forty years the right was on the offensive in America. At least when Bill Clinton was President, Democrats had a team on the field, but in so many respects the right wing offensive continued until their crushing defeat in November 2008.

For the last 18 months, the progressive forces have once again been on the offense. But the entrenched corporate interests didn't roll over and play dead. They fought tooth and nail – they lied, they bit, they poked eyes – they did everything in their power to stop change.

Progressives won a lot in the last 18 months. We stopped the Great Recession caused by the Republican's policies from turning into the Great Depression. Over the intense opposition of the insurance companies, after 60 years of trying, we passed health care reform that will finally make health care a right in America – and begins to hold those big private insurance companies accountable. We passed landmark legislation to rein in the recklessness of the big Wall Street banks that collapsed the economy and cost eight million Americans their jobs. We created a consumer agency headed by Elizabeth Warren – a true progressive champion for the middle class.

Along the way Congress passed the Lilly Ledbetter Act to ensure women get equal pay for equal work. It expanded the State Children's Health Insurance Program. It completely reorganized the Student Loan Program to end wasteful bank subsidies and guarantee that every kid can get financing for his or her higher education. It passed a budget that massively changed the spending priorities of the Federal government.

We did all of this in the face of constant, unrelenting fire from corporate interests.

But as any Progressive can tell you, there is so much left to do. We can't stop now. We can't let the furious, intense opposition from Wall Street, the insurance companies, big oil and the far right fringe discourage or dispirit us. We can't allow them to successfully take over one or both Houses of Congress. That would bring any opportunity for serious progressive change to a screeching halt.

We have to get off the beach and get back on the offense.

Sometimes the day to day back and forth of politics can cause us to forget what's really at stake – and the massive gulf between Progressive and Right Wing values – the difference between our vision of society and the vision of the other side.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We have to remember the fundamental difference between the right's belief in unbridled pursuit of individual interest and our commitment to the common good; selfishness versus commitment to others; division versus unity; fear versus hope; that we're all in this together, not "all in this alone."

For the first few years after my wife, Jan, and I were married in 1980, her Great Aunt lived with us during the week. Jan and I both worked, so Aunt Sylv looked after the house and was very involved in raising Jan's two kids and my daughter.

Sylvia Lazar was a warm, wonderful woman who by that time was in her 70s. She'd come to the United States as a teenager from the Ukraine, and still spoke with a thick accent.

Silvia had grown up in a Ukrainian schtetle — a small peasant town where the family purchased water each day from a salesman who carried two buckets from the river on a yoke over his neck. Oxen and horses were the principal means used to transport goods and people. Life in her schtetle was very much as it had been for hundreds of years.

Her family moved to the United States by way of Canada in the early part of the last century to escape anti-Semitism and find a better life.

By the time she died in the mid-1980s, the world around her had been completely transformed. In the place of oxen, she had flown on jet planes, lived in air-conditioned homes with running water and indoor plumbing. She lived to see the development of antibiotics that changed forever the treatment of infectious disease. She watched a television as men landed on the moon.

Worldwide, life expectancy had skyrocketed. The standard of living in the developed world had exploded.

But Sylv had also lived through two great world wars that had killed tens of millions. She had seen six million of her fellow European Jews systematically slaughtered in the Holocaust. She'd seen pictures of the explosion of the atomic bomb and lived through an accelerating arms race and cold war between America and the USSR that included her old homeland.

She watched with all Americans as the world approached the edge of the nuclear precipice during the Cuban missile crisis. And she had cheered on her niece Jan, who become active in fighting the growing environmental crisis brought on by exploding human economic activity.

Over the tiny span of one lifetime, Sylvia Lazar had been witness to the qualitative transformation of society its culture and technology. She had seen both the breathtaking possibilities and the horrific dangers unleashed by the accelerating march of technology and human history.

Whenever I think how hard it is to make social change, I think about Aunt Sylv.

In the thick of political battle, it's often difficult to see the qualitative change. But all you need to do is back up a little distance from the everyday struggle to see how quickly our world has been, and is being, transformed before our eyes.

Only 155 years ago, America was ending its great Civil War. Human slavery was abolished in America a mere eight generations ago.

That century-and-a-half represents .002% of the seven million years of human evolutionary development. It represents only 1% of the 13,000 years since humans made the critical evolutionary advance — agriculture.

Politics is fundamentally the means through which human societies make choices about their futures.

Radical conservatives like to argue that the world is a dangerous place – that the tough, hard-nosed, survival-of-the-fittest, individualist values are necessary to protect our survival. They claim that only by standing up fiercely for our own individual self-interests will we be successful at defending America and the values of "Western civilization." They claim that radical conservative values are tough, and that progressive values are soft.

But progressive values are the farthest thing from "pie-in-the-sky," "soft," "unrealistic," "head-in-the-clouds" precepts for action. In fact, right wing values are mainly rationales for allowing the rich to become richer and the powerful more powerful. In fact, progressive values allow us the best opportunity to survive and succeed in the future world that is simultaneously bristling with unprecedented danger, and beckoning with undreamt-of opportunity for our children and future generations – if we go there together.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Time for us all to remember that there is a lot more at stake this fall than who gets to wield the big gavel in the House of Representatives.

For everyone who was inspired and energized by the 2008 campaign, who believed that they were making history: you were right. We took a lot of ground, but the war is far from over. Now it is time to saddle up and report for duty once again.

Robert Creamer is a long-time political organizer and strategist, and author of the recent book: Stand Up Straight: How Progressives Can Win, available on Amazon.com.

--

You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail dubois.sara@gmail.com with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Ryan Duncan" <ryan@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: "Big Campaign" <bigcampaign@googlegroups.com>
Date: 8/11/2008 4:08:26 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Morning 08/11/08

Main Topics: New Obama Embrace Ad, Olympic coverage, Edwards Scandal, Russia/Georgia Conflict, Evangelical Voters

Summary: In regards to McCain's recent celebrity ads, Obama released a new response ad called "Embrace". Huckabee discussed McCain's relationship with evangelical voters, and Tucker Bounds spoke about Obama's new ad. McCain and Obama released statements on the Russia/Georgia conflict.
The Olympic games dominated morning network coverage. A brief interview with the President in Beijing last night repeatedly aired, where he voiced his discontent with the Georgian conflict. The John Edwards scandal continued to be a highlight, as he will now not be present at the Democratic Convention. The Georgian military in South Ossetia has completely withdrawn from the area amidst attacks by Russian forces. A U.S. air strike in Afghanistan has left eight hostages and 25 Taliban militia dead. Al Qaeda's deputy chief released a new tape accusing Musharraf of working for America's interests. Iraq demanded a set timetable of withdrawal of troops.

Highlights:
1. Obama Releases New Embrace Ad
a. FNC: Fox and Friends Discusses New Obama "Embrace Ad" and the "Same Old Politics" Message
b. FNC: McCain's Celebrity Ad Versus Obama's Embrace Ad
c. FNC: Tucker Bounds Talks McCain's Reform Ability and Maverick Status in Face of New Ads
2. FNC: Huckabee On McCain's Relationship With Evangelical Voters
3. Rick Davis' Interview From Last Night on Fox Sunday Reports
a. FNC: Rick Davis Interview, Part I: Tries To Answer, If McCain Thinks This Country Is Worse Off That It Was Four Year Ago, Then Who Exactly Is Responsible?
b. FNC: Rick Davis Interview, Part II: Answers Questions on DHL and Lobbyist Connections
c. FNC: Rick Davis Interview, Part III: Comments on McCain's Plan For Lost DHL Jobs

Highlights No Clips:
1) CBS – JOHN MCCAIN: [Official Response to Russia/Georgia South Ossetia Conflict]: "Continued Russian behavior… indicates that Russia is moving further and further from the principles and values and ideals of the G-8."

Clips:
Highlight #1
Fox and Friends Discusses New Obama "Embrace Ad" and the "Same Old Politics" Message (FNC 08/11/08 7:11am)
STEVE DOOCY: Remember, a couple of weeks ago John McCain came out with that brand new ad, it was called "Celebrity", where it showed Barack Obama along with Britney Spears and Paris Hilton and talking about how he, Barack Obama, the biggest celebrity in the world. Well, the Obama campaign now firing back. They parodied, Mr. McCain in the new ad called "Embrace", which has been embargoed until right now. Here it is in its entirety.

["Embrace" ad shown]

[…]

GRETCH CARLSON: My first impression is, actually, that's a really upbeat ad for John McCain! I mean, he looks like he has a whole lot of energy and he's meeting with all these different people. That's just my guy, initial reaction. Also, I think the timing is a little off, because this should have come out immediately after the celebrity ad. This is a little delayed.

BRIAN KILMEADE: It's two things. They want to show him with President Bush, that's what they feel is going to be successful, all the experts come on and say if I was running against John McCain I would put him with President Bush. But the other thing is, that's inaccurate, is that it was Barack Obama who voted for the President's energy plan which included tax breaks for the oil companies. It was John McCain that said that this was a party for the oil companies, therefore I'm not going to vote for it, which got Republicans very mad at John McCain.

DOOCY: I also think it's funny that, where it says "John McCain taking the low road", this is an attack ad from Barack Obama. Hello? And Gretchen I'm exactly with you in that it shows John McCain, you know they've been very effective the Barack Obama people, have you noticed that every time they have done an ad in the past they talk about "same old tired politics" they're trying to brand in our heads that he is old, and tired, and stuff like that. […]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

KILMEADE: But Barack Obama is right, John McCain is the darling of the late night shows. He's a darling of the talk shows, he's probably the number one person that every Republican wants by their side to raise money up until this presidential race. So there, Barack Obama is right, I don't know if he got that message across here.

McCain's Celebrity Ad Versus Obama's Embrace Ad (FNC 08/11/08 7:26am)
[…]

JAMAL SIMMONS: John McCain may have a lot of energy, but it looks like where he's headed with the country though, is in a pretty bad place. And Americans seem to have recognized that. You look to the polls, as you just showed, it looks like John McCain can't really get above 42, 43 percent in any of these polls, and he's one of the people that Americans have known now for ten years. I mean from his 2000 campaign, he's a pretty popular guy. The problem is the John McCain of 2000 wouldn't go anywhere near voting for the John McCain of 2008, cause he's sort of sold out all of his positions that he took back in 2000.

[…]

STEVE DOOCY: I'm talking about your candidate, how McCain was effective in tying Paris Hilton to Barack Obama, and Britney Spears.

SIMMONS: Yeah, I don't think it was very effective. I think that in fact, if it was effective at all, it was effective at erasing the maverick label from John McCain because one thing, I think, republican voters chose John McCain because they thought they were getting an adult who was going to talk about the real issues that we have, the real problems with gas prices, war in Iraq, and the economy. People have lost 51,000 jobs in the last month, and instead they've got John McCain talking about Paris Hilton. And frankly, it just wasn't very serious.

DOOCY: In that same ad, you mentioned gas prices, John McCain is for offshore drilling, Barack Obama is not. And that is part of the real message of that ad, Paris Hilton/Britney Spears ad.

SIMMONS: Well you know, we've come to find out that John McCain is sort of in the pocket of the oil company. He's gotten about two million dollars in oil contributions. The democrats have an Exxon/ McCain website that we've just put up. And I think people realize that, you know, we do want to get gas prices down and Barack Obama has a pretty good plan to do it. He wants to make sure the oil companies go after oil and the leases they already have. They have millions of acres they could be going after oil in right now, and if the part of the deal to get a comprehensive strategy long term to get rid of oil is to have offshore drilling, then Obama's open to talking about the offshore drilling. He just doesn't think it's going to be that effective. But let's go ahead and do it, he's not going to stand in the way of getting a real comprehensive deal just because he doesn't agree with one of the republican ideas.

[…]

SIMMONS: […] John McCain's plan is to tax American healthcare benefits from their employers for the first time in history, so if you take a look at where Barack Obama is and where John McCain is and I think people have really realized that Barack Obama is the one they like.

Tucker Bounds Talks McCain's Reform Ability and Maverick Status in Face of New Ads (FNC 08/11/08 7:34am)
GRETCHEN CARLSON: How do you feel about the ad that was just sent at your man, Senator John McCain? You've must have seen it, moments ago. […]

TUCKER BOUNDS: It's quirky. It doesn't fit. It's a response to our ad about Barack Obama's celebrity and I think that the reason why our ad was able to be effective is because Barack Obama was over in Germany, talking to throngs of fonding Germans and they're fans, they're not voters. He's shown an inability to close down some of those primary states despite having these enormous rallies during his primary. And the difference is John McCain has a record of being able to reform government, it's been since 2004 that he actually took on the Abranoff scandal, inside Washington he's been beating down doors and changing the way business is done here. And so, it's an ad, it's quirky, it's a response. But I don't think it really fits John McCain, his record, or who he is.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

STEVE DOOCY: […] He said that celebrity ad was not effective, but we've seen some of the pollsters say that in talking to voters, potential voters over the last week or two, it was effective, your ad in tying Barack Obama to Britney Spears and Paris Hilton and stuff like that. But when you're watching this new ad, if you were watching with the sound down it would look like John McCain goes to a lot of fun places.

BOUNDS: Yeah, well, he goes to talk directly to voters, he's an energetic guy, I think that came through even in a negative attack ad […]. It really is hard to dampen down John McCain's energy, I think that came through in their ad, but ultimately it just doesn't fit the candidate. I mean, this is the same John McCain that was riding around the back of the bus talking to anyone he could talk to to try to win the New Hampshire primary, he had no money, he was traveling around with just a couple people, and it doesn't really have any sort of basis in the historical relevance of this race or of the candidate.

[…]

BOUNDS: We don't have to, I don't think, delve into the Mark Penn playbook, that was a different campaign for a different candidate. We have the luxury of having a proven public servant, who has a history of working for change in this country, and reforming Washington. We're going to run on that.

Highlight #2
Huckabee On McCain's Relationship With Evangelical Voters (FNC 08/11/08 7:49am)
BRIAN KILMEADE: Is Senator John McCain making some progress in the evangelical vote?

MIKE HUCKABEE: I think he's making some, I think there's ground yet to be made. I would also, maybe include the term "values voters" rather than evangelicals, because the larger interest here is not just evangelicals, it includes Catholics, it includes people who may not be necessarily religious but are very pro-life. And I think that one of the mistakes that some people make is to assume that being pro-life means that you're anti-abortion. The real focus is not what we're against, it's more about what we're for. And it's the idea that people have intrinsic worth and value and that there's a sense of respect for the dignity of every person. And that's what's driving a lot of passions right now. Obama is reaching out to this group, and he's doing it with the view, I don't think he believes he's going to get the endorsement, but I think he wants to maybe tamp down the enthusiasm of opposition. And he's done a lot to reach out to that group.

[…]

GRETCHEN CARLSON: At the same time […] some are fearing the left principles of Barack Obama and so some of the center and some of the right coalescing now behind John McCain. You remember, of course, you remember more than anyone, that a lot of those people did not like John McCain. What's happening there.

HUCKABEE: […] He also does not have the same adherence to the idea of traditional marriage one man, one woman as John McCain does. And the scariest thing for many of the value voters comes down to the appointment of judges which could have a huge impact, not just for the next four to eight years but for the next 50 years. That's what is driving many conservatives to say look, McCain may not have been our first choice but he is the best choice we have got.
[…]

Highlight #3
Rick Davis Interview, Part I: Tries To Answer, If McCain Thinks This Country Is Worse Off That It Was Four Year Ago, Then Who Exactly Is Responsible? (FNC, 08/10/08 6:06pm)
[…]

WALLACE: But again, when you have a nonpartisan group saying that, in fact, for the exact group that you're talking about, people making $37,000, $40,000 a year, that Obama would cut their taxes more than McCain...

DAVIS: Then Obama should put that in an ad. We're going to talk about the things Obama has said and done in the United States Senate and on the campaign trail, and that includes his vote to increase taxes on people making $42,000 a year.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

WALLACE: You think that people should be held accountable...

DAVIS: Absolutely.

WALLACE: ... for what their votes are in the Senate.

DAVIS: Look, politics isn't bean bag, Chris. And if he has a record, it's a very short one, because he has very little experience as a legislator. But we ought to look at the experience he has, and he is a tax increaser.

WALLACE: All right. We're going to — I'm asking you that because we're going to come back on McCain votes as well. Let's take a look at another McCain ad. Here it is.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: Does Senator McCain really believe that, that this country is worse off than we were four years ago?

DAVIS: Sure. All along the trail, John McCain campaigns around real people. He goes to town halls and he hears what they have to say to him. You don't have to be in very many town halls, Chris, to understand that people are pinched by the increase in gas prices. They're losing jobs because of some downturn in manufacturing. And the economy as a whole has been very hard on the American family. That's what John McCain's referring to. He doesn't have to go very far every day to find those kinds of examples.

WALLACE: Given that, I want you to respond to this clip from an Obama ad. Take a look.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: In fact, Mr. Davis, Senator McCain is understating it. Last year, he voted to support Bush legislation 95 percent of the time. Given that, if the country's worse off, isn't both the president and John McCain — aren't they both responsible?

DAVIS: Well, look. If you want to talk about history, then you can make all the cases you want to make...

WALLACE: But you're talking about history. You talk about the last four years.

DAVIS: Exactly. And what I'm talking about, though, right now is what the future holds and who's got a plan to cut taxes and get the economy moving again, because growth is the only way we're going to improve people's situation, whether it's in a family or small businesses. And so John McCain's got a plan for growth. Let me remind you, too, there's been never a bigger maverick in this town than John McCain. I mean, we talk about how many times you voted for Bush or against Bush. But you've been in this town a long time. Who was the biggest irritant to this administration for the last 10 years or last eight years? John McCain. He sided with Democrats when he thought they were doing the right thing for the country, and sided with the Republicans when he thought they were doing the right thing for the country. So you can say all you want about the record, but who is the one proven commodity in this town who's willing to put his country first and take strong positions, sometimes against the current administration or his own party, in order to do what's right?

WALLACE: But I've got to come back at...

DAVIS: And that's been McCain.

WALLACE: But I've got to come back at you. If you say the country is worse off than it was four years ago, clearly the president has got to bear some of the responsibility. And by his own record, by his own admission, John McCain voted with the president last year 95 percent of the time.

DAVIS: Sure. But I mean, how many of these things actually had anything to do with the current economic conditions or where we are in other places? Look, trade's a good example. John McCain's voted with George Bush for trade many times in the past and will support trade in the future. Democrats have opposed that. What's better for the economy, trade or no trade? It's very simple. It doesn't mean everything George Bush has done in the economy has been bad. But look, everybody — it's a pox on everyone's houses. Why do you think the public has a low approval rating of the current administration and Congress? Because they figured out that no one person is responsible for what we're doing. They're all at fault. And you have the one guy who's been screaming about spending by Congress and trying to get George Bush to veto some of these measures. Who's the one guy who stood up in the middle of that crowd and said we've got to fix this problem? John McCain.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rick Davis Interview, Part II: Answers Questions on DHL and Lobbyist Connections (FNC 08/10/08 6:15pm)
WALLACE: […] why is John McCain inviting the vice president to the convention?

DAVIS: Because I think John McCain believes that the only way we're going to change the culture of this town, the only way we're actually going to ever start getting anything done, is if we stop putting our own self-interests ahead. You know, if he wanted to make a point and, you know, strike out at this administration, it would have been very easy to do that. But he is not that kind of candidate. He's the kind of man who says, "Look, we've got to get everybody on board in order to get progress made in this country. I'm not going to, you know, take retaliation or retribution against anybody, whether they're Democrats or Republicans." If we are going to move forward, this culture has to change. The only guy who's been able to do that in this town for the last eight years is John McCain. Barack Obama has never sided against his party's interest on any important issue. He's never joined with Republicans across the aisle like John McCain has with Democrats. We have an ad out that shows a lot of Democrats, leaders in Congress, saying great things about John McCain. Of course, that was before there was a political campaign. You'll never find John McCain changing his stripes just because of an election.

[…]

WALLACE: Is there any chance that Senator McCain will pledge to serve only one term as president and that there will be no politics in the White House?

DAVIS: Well, first of all, if you know John McCain, you know there's not going to be much politics in the White House anyway. I mean, he doesn't grade any of his decisions either as a senator or in the future as president on what the political dynamic is. You look at his history, whether it's campaign finance reform, or opposing this administration on detainee abuse and things like that, he does what he thinks is right for the country, and he's going to do that throughout his career no matter what office he holds.

[…]

WALLACE: You're not ruling it out.

DAVIS: I'm not talking about it at all.

WALLACE: Finally, the Obama camp, I don't have to tell you, is pounding you for your work as a lobbyist. In 2003, you lobbied Congress, and Senator McCain in his job as chairman of the Commerce Committee helped you to allow the German-owned DHL buy Airborne Express. You made from this German-owned company about $600,000 in lobbying fees. The Democrats are making a big deal of the fact that DHL is now talking about taking 8,000 jobs out of the state of Ohio. Are you and Senator McCain going to do anything to try to prevent that?

DAVIS: Well, first of all, let me correct you. Senator McCain did not help me do anything. I represented Airborne, which was the incumbent in that location in Ohio, and they wanted to be bought by DHL. And there were people in Congress who didn't want to have that happen. John McCain has always believed that foreign investment in this sector is fine, and unless there was something that was inappropriate about the deal it should go forward.

WALLACE: Well, that's how he helped you, is to agree that...

DAVIS: Well, but he didn't help me. He helped the people in Ohio, because those jobs were probably going to be lost if they didn't get taken over because of the competitive nature of this business.

WALLACE: But now DHL is talking about taking...

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

DAVIS: I haven't represented DHL or any of their entities since 2005 when I completely got out of the lobbying business. So what you have here — and frankly, a typical situation by the Obama campaign, to try and change the topic. John McCain has only the most, you know, kind things to say about the people there. He just came from a town hall with the people affected there. Barack Obama won't go there and hold a town hall, especially not now, because one of the women who voiced her concerns about this transaction is now a star in the Obama radio ad that's up in that area, and she's asked them to take it down because he is portraying her as against John McCain,. and she's not. In fact, she's had some very nice things about — to say lately about the fact that John McCain came to town, listened to those people, talked to them about the need to be able to find, you know, a way to keep as many jobs there as you can. But most importantly, she's asked them to take that radio ad down, and they refused to do it.

Rick Davis Interview, Part III: Comments on McCain's Plan For Lost DHL Jobs (FNC 08/10/08 6:20pm)
WALLACE: Directly, can you, will you, or Senator McCain, try to do anything to get DHL not to take those 8,000 jobs away?

DAVIS: Oh, sure. Senator McCain in the town hall with the people affected most by this told them that he would do what he could do, look into the transaction. By the way, this is a different transaction than had occurred almost four years ago. So it has nothing to do with any of the things he'd ever done before. And he didn't really have the level of detail he need and he's going to look into it.
[…]

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: ricesusane@aol.com
To: mlippert@barackobama.com dmcdonough@barackobama.com djsberg@gmail.com tblinken@barackobama.com
john.podesta@gmail.com
john.podesta@ptt.gov
Date: 11/7/2008 8:29:13 AM
Subject: Re: Proposed Briefings to be Requested

yes, we envisioned that as part of ongoing operations. Would you separate it out?

Come to think of it, we should also ask for AFRICOM brief.

-----Original Message-----
From: Mark Lippert <mlippert@barackobama.com>
To: Ricesusane@aol.com; Denis McDonough <dmcdonough@barackobama.com>; djsberg@gmail.com; Antony (Tony) Blinken <tblinken@barackobama.com>; john.podesta@gmail.com; john.podesta@ptt.gov
Sent: Fri, 7 Nov 2008 3:19 pm
Subject: Re: Proposed Briefings to be Requested

Just skimming - I'd throw CTJF-HOA brief into the mix for DOD.

From: ricesusane@aol.com
To: Denis McDonough; Mark Lippert; djsberg@gmail.com ; Antony (Tony) Blinken; john.podesta@gmail.com ; john.podesta@ptt.gov
Sent: Fri Nov 07 14:17:07 2008
Subject: Proposed Briefings to be Requested

Below is the list of briefings Jim and I propose we request of the IC and others for senior transition national security staff over the coming weeks.

A subset of these TBD could subsequently be requested for POTUS-E and VPOTUS-E. We leave it to others to decide if it is desirable and appropriate for POTUS-E to request any or all of these in his meeting with Bush on Monday).

We welcome your thoughts.

IC

Iraq
Iran
Afghanistan
Pakistan
Russia
China
MEPP and region
Mexico
Counter-narcotics and Crime
North Korea
Al Qaeda and global CT threat
Global WMD Threat (bio, chem and nuclear)
Cybersecurity and CI
IRDPA briefs

NSC

Policy briefings on:

Iraq
Iran

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Afghanistan
Pakistan
Russia
China
MEPP and region
North Korea
Al Qaeda and global CT threat
Global WMD Threat (bio, chem and nuclear) Cybersecurity
Mexico
Counter-narcotics and Crime
Syria
Lebanon
Egypt Saudi Arabia
Darfur
Zimbabwe DRC
Weak States strategy

OMB

Budget briefing

DOD

Ongoing Operations
Iraq
Afghanistan
Pakistan
Nuclear safety and security
Readiness

Homeland Security

Infrastructure security
Border security
Disease/pandemic preparedness
First respone/disaster preparedness
Crisis Response plans/processes and continuity in government

Instant access to the latest & most popular FREE games while you browse with the Games Toolbar - Download Now!

Instant access to the latest & most popular FREE games while you browse with the Games Toolbar - Download Now!

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Halifax International Security Forum" <info@halifaxtheforum.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 9/30/2015 12:19:03 PM
Subject: Halifax International Security Forum Releases 2015 Topical Agenda

HALIFAX INTERNATIONAL SECURITY FORUM RELEASES 2015 TOPICAL AGENDA

Annual Global Meeting to Focus on Threats to Democracy

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

September 30, 2015

Washington, DC—Halifax International Security Forum today released the draft Topical Agenda for this year's Forum to be held November 20-22 in Halifax, Nova Scotia.

The mix of on-the-record plenary sessions and smaller, off-the-record sessions covers a wide range of security issues affecting individuals and families on every continent.

Since 2009, beginning with the first Halifax International Security Forum, the subjects covered at the November gathering have more often than not proven to be prescient in terms of issues the international security community would be focused on the following year. In November 2013, for example, the plenary "Free Radicals With Return Tickets" addressed publicly the critical issue of Western youth joining radical terrorist organizations in increasing numbers prior to this becoming a major story followed by international media. Similarly, in November 2014, the Forum's panel "(Re-)Visit Cuba" forecast to keen observers the thawing of relations between Cuba and the United States.

This year will be no different. "All year long, we consult closely with democratic governments around the world to identify the real and complicated threats to a modern world," said Peter Van Praagh, President of Halifax International Security Forum. "Once identified, we create the agenda for necessary conversations that lead to concrete cooperation and results."

While the titles of the panels are meant to provoke reaction, the issues they address are both timely and serious.

The Halifax International Security Forum Agenda Working Group meets through the summer months to complete the agenda. To ensure that the agenda is exactly relevant to all of its participants from around the world, the final version of the Halifax Agenda will be released just prior to the Forum.

Halifax International Security Forum brings together individuals who are on the ground facing consequential local threats, writers who challenge and influence the world's thinking on security, and military and political decision-makers who make the tough choices.

Halifax International Security Forum is a non-profit, non-partisan organization based in Washington, DC.

2015 DRAFT TOPICAL AGENDA

Plenary Sessions (On-the-Record)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Cooperate, Contain, or Conquer? Prioritizing Strategy 70 Years On
- Breaking Rules: Discipline or Disorder in the Global Playground
- Breaking Tradition: Modern Muslims Advance
- Broken China: Handle with Care
- The American Fix: Best Dosage for Optimal Results
- Responsibility to Welcome: Yours. Mine. Ours.
- Hi-Tech, Bio-Tech: Unleashing Known Unknowns
- Financing Terror: Selling Drugs, Abusing Women, Making Money

Small Group Sessions (Off-the-Record)

- Arctic Rivalries
- From Athens to Brussels: Europe on the Line
- Being Israel
- Betting on the African Union
- Cheap Energy, Pricey Consequences
- China's Bottom Line: A Dim Sum
- Climate: Warming Up for Paris
- Come Together? The Case for a United Korea
- The Cuban Thaw and the Future of Latin American Democracy
- (Cyber) Rulers of the World
- Eurasian Futures: The Sino-Russian Axis
- Inclusive Security: Winning With Women
- From India to Japan: The Importance of Democratic Asia
- Making Peace: Lessons from Colombia
- Mullahs with Moolah: The World After the Iran Deal
- The Next Wave of Attack: Terror on the Trains
- Nigeria's Next Steps
- Post-American Stress Disorder: From Afghanistan to ISIS
- Putin Rules by Putin's Rules
- Qui est Charlie? Europe's Integration Problem
- Ruling the Waves: China Whets Its Dream
- Terror Plots, Meet Covert Ops
- Turkey's Tough Neighborhood
- Ukraine's Tug of War
- Unhelpful Help: The Saudi Model
- What's New with Nukes

- 30 -

For media inquiries, please contact communications@halifaxtheforum.org . Please direct other inquiries to info@halifaxtheforum.org .

Canada FOREIGN AFFAIRS MEDIA PARTNER HALIFAX CANADA CLUB

This email was sent to podesta@law.georgetown.edu why did I get this? unsubscribe from this list update subscription preferences
Halifax International Security Forum · 1740 N Street Northwest, Washington, DC · Washington, DC 20036 · USA

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Jacob Roberts" <jacob@progressiveaccountability.org>
To:	"big campaign" <bigcampaign@googlegroups.com>
Date:	9/29/2008 5:04:25 AM
Subject:	[big campaign] MMR: Palin's qualifications, McCain's debate performance, McCain's role in economic rescue plan

Highlights:

1. MSNBC: Mitt Romney: Palin is no foreign policy expert
   MITT ROMNEY: "Look, she wasn't selected by John McCain because she's an expert in foreign policy."
2. MSNBC: McCain looked like an angry grandpa, Scarborough says
   JOE SCARBOROUGH: "He looks like the angry grandfather that you don't want to talk to at Thanksgiving."
3. NBC: Bush pushes rescue plan as bipartisan and 'extraordinary'
4. CBS: Conservatives doubt Palin's qualifications
   JEFF GLOR: "[…] even some conservatives are concerned, including syndicated columnist, Kathleen Parker who said Palin is "clearly out of her league," and called for the Alaska governor to leave the race."
5. NBC: Romney defends Palin's qualifications
   MITT ROMNEY: "[T]here's nothing like being able to create low expectations and that's certainly being done for her."
6. ABC: McCain camp works to keep expectations for Palin low
   DAVID WRIGHT: "Her advisors are trying to lower expectations, but even among some conservatives, expectations couldn't be any lower."
7. FNC: Nancy Pfotenhauer decries nature of questions Palin receives.
   NANCY PFOTENHAUER: "I think it was a series of trapdoor questions."
8. MSNBC: McCain gives billions in tax breaks to oil companies, Bill Adair verifies
   BILL ADAIR: "McCain's tax plan would cut corporate taxes from 35 to 25% and, if you calculate how much oil companies would get—works out to be about $4 billion."
9. FNC: Graham admits his pork is part of the problem and changes the subject when asked about Palin's Russian expertise.
   LINDSEY GRAHAM: "I have been part of the problem. My earmarks have been authorized, number one. They're out there for you to look at. And I'm part of the problem."

Local Highlights:

10. WTTE – FOX – OH – BETH DOLINGER: "I think it'll be interesting. Sometimes you can get a different perspective when you're looking at someone face-to-face than from television because there's interesting, non-verbal, instead a person will…you'll see that you may not see," on why she's so excited to see Sarah Palin

Clips:

Highlight #1

Mitt Romney on Sarah Palin: Not an Expert (MSNBC 09/29/08 7:28am)

MITT ROMNEY: […] holding Sarah Palin to just three interviews and microscopically, you know, focusing on each interview, I think has been a mistake. I think they'd be a lot wiser to let Sarah Palin be Sarh Palin. Let her talk to the media. Let her talk to people.

Look, she wasn't selected by John McCain because she's an expert in foreign policy. John McCain's the expert in foreign policy. She was selected because she's a maverick. She's a person who identifies with people in homes across America […].

Highlight #2

Scarborough Characterizes McCain's Debate Performance as an Angry Grandpa (MSNBC 09/29/08 6:07am)

JOE SCARBOROUGH: The reflects in a very visual way, for those of us who are visual, what a bad week it has been for John McCain. [...] He looked angry. He looked straight ahead. He looked old. He looked like a grumpy grandfather. [...] He looks like the angry grandfather that you don't want to talk to at Thanksgiving.

Highlight #3

Bush Promotes Rescue Plan (NBC 09/29/08 7:33am)

GEORGE W BUSH: Yesterday, leaders here in Washington reached an extraordinary agreement to deal with an extraordinary problem in our economy. Working closely with my administration, congressional leaders from both parties produced the Emergency Economic Stabilization Act -- a bold bill that will help keep the crisis in our financial system from spreading throughout our economy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Highlight #4
Palin's Credibility Doubtful to Some Conservatives (CBS 09/29/08 7:08am)
MAGGIE RODRIGUEZ: [T]he question a lot of Americans are asking this morning, including some prominent republicans is whether Sarah Palin is ready. […]

JEFF GLOR: […] Sarah Palin has mostly been kept away from reporters, but the interviews she has done are raising eyebrows.

SARAH PALIN: It is from Alaska that we send those out to make sure that an eye is being kept on this very powerful nation, Russia because they are right there.

GLOR: The most recent, with Katie Couric, provoked widespread criticism from liberals on the web and a lampooning on Saturday Night Live.

[SNL "lifeline" segment]

GLOR: But even some conservatives are concerned, including syndicated columnist, Kathleen Parker who said Palin is "clearly out of her league," and called for the Alaska governor to leave the race.

ALEX BURNS: […] I think there's a larger number of people who privately express kind of muted criticism and concern.

GLOR: McCain himself was asked about the chatter on Sunday.

JOHN MCCAIN: I'm so excited about the reaction that Sarah Palin has gotten across this country; huge turnouts, enthusiasm, excitement. She knows how to communicate directly with people. They respond in a way that I've seldom seen.

[…]

LARRY SABATO: […] If you're running for president or vice president you shouldn't have a choice. Your obligation is to run the gauntlet of the press corps. Can they be mean and nasty? You bet they can. It's part of the price of running for national office […] I think the McCain campaign has made a mistake with Palin in keeping her so bottled up […]. She's become […] an object of ridicule, in part because of that Katie Couric interview, which was a real turning point in her campaign.

Highlight #5
Romney Defends Palin, Says She's a Maverick (NBC 09/29/08 7:10am)
ANDREA MITCHELL: In their first debate Friday night, McCain was the aggressor.

JOHN MCCAIN: I honestly don't believe that Senator Obama has the knowledge or experience and has made the wrong judgments in a number of areas.

[...]

MITCHELL: Palin is still drawing big crowds, but the reviews have been withering for her interview with Katie Couric, only her third since nominated.

[...]

MITCHELL: Palin's critics now include some conservative commentators. On the National Review Online website, columnist, Kathleen Parker called on Palin to drop out, writing, "Quick study or not, she doesn't know enough about economics and foreign policy to make Americans comfortable with a President Palin should conditions warrant her promotion," and New York Times columnist, David Brooks with Chris Matthews:

DAVID BROOKS: [I]s she ready to be vice president? Based on what we've seen with the Katie Couric interview? It's embarrassing. It's painful to watch those things. You want to turn them off.

[...]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MITT ROMNEY: [...] I think John McCain chose a person who, like him, is a maverick, a reformer, she's a governor with the experience of executive nature and you know, she's not a lifelong politician, she's not the master of words that Joe Biden is and, as a result, she's going to come across like an ordinary citizen but a person of great capacity and that's what John McCain wanted.

MATT LAUER: Ed Rollins [...] said that basically they put [Palin] in storage [...] and it broke her confidence. [...]

ROMNEY: [T]here's nothing like being able to create low expectations and that's certainly being done for her.

LAUER: [...] Sarah Palin has done three [interviews]. Is this a case where maybe practice will make her more perfect?

ROMNEY: [...] let her get out there and be herself and people will say, 'You know what? I like what I see [...].'

LAUER: [...] Did John McCain play a significant role in shaping the [rescue] bill as it stands?

ROMNEY: Oh, absolutely [...].

Highlight #6
Even Fox Commentators Question Palin's Ability (ABC 09/29/08 7:09am)
ROBIN ROBERTS: […] On Thursday, the one and only vice presidential debate between Senator Joe Biden and Governor Sarah Palin who went jogging yesterday in the Philadelphia area. That will take place in St. Louis. […]

DAVID WRGHT: […] Sarah Palin has a relatively light schedule over the next couple of days as she prepares for that big debate, that video that you just rolled there of her jogging through the streets of Philadelphia, looking a bit like Rocky Balboa. Her advisors are trying to lower expectations, but even among some conservatives, expectations couldn't be any lower. [….] Sarah Palin has been trying hard to prove herself. Hob-knobbing with world leaders at the UN; sitting down with influential anchormen and women.

KATIE COURIC: You've sighted Alaska's proximity to Russia as part of your foreign policy experience. What did you mean by that?

SARAH PALIN: That Alaska has a very narrow maritime border between a foreign country, Russia, and on our other side the land boundary that we have with Canada.

COURIC: Explain to me why that enhance your foreign policy credentials.

PALIN: Well, it certainly does, because our next-door neighbors are in foreign countries. They're in the state that I am the executive of.

WRIGHT: Judging from Saturday Night Live, the comedians have their doubts. […] Some foreigners we've met have their doubts too. […] This weekend even Fox News raised questions:

BRIT HUME: Coming up on the grapevine, are some Republicans turning on Sarah Palin?

WRIGHT: Highlighting conservative critics of Palin

ROD DREHER: It's going to be very, very hard to erase the impression that she's given in her network TV interviews; that she is in way, way over her head, and she is not ready for Prime Time.

WRIGHT: At an Irish pub in Philly Friday night, the crowd watching debate with her was friendly, but outside, not so much. John McCain told George Stephanopolous, he's not concerned.

JOHN MCCAIN: […] They can complain all they want to; I'll rely on the American people. The American people respond to her in a way that's been wonderful. But how will Palin fair with her ninety-minute debate with Joe Biden?

KEVIN MADDEN: Sarah Palin has to get through this debate by avoiding a really big mistake, by looking unready to assume the office.

WRIGHT: Palin's advisors tell us they're not worried one bit. They are reportedly bringing in the heavy hitters to give her a few last-minute coaching tips. They know that she needs to address the question of experience, and they tell us she's looking forward to doing it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

ROBERTS: […] Give us the bottom line on what's happening right now with Sarah Palin.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULUS: She's become a problem for Senator McCain, there's no question about it. If you look at the polling numbers over the last few weeks- and listen, when she was first picked, it was a huge boost for John McCain, no question about it. But look at her favorability numbers, they've gone down, from 58% on September 7th to 52% on September 22nd. Even more important, the question of qualifications, the number of people who say she's not qualified to be vice president is going up. 49% say she's not qualified for Sarah Palin, compared to only 21% for Joe Biden. Those are the polling numbers.

But you've got to add into that the reaction among conservatives, as David Wright just reported, there's a lot of second thoughts now out in the conservative community, about Sarah Palin, and the buzz- the buzz on Sarah Palin has gone all bad. When you become a punch line in politics, it is one of the worst things that can happen. And that is what is happening to Sarah Palin now; she has got to address it in the debate on Thursday night. […]Picking up on what Kevin Madden said in David Wright's piece; number one, for Sarah Palin, she cannot make a mistake. A major mistake, particularly on foreign policy, would be absolutely fatal to her candidacy.

But even beyond that, she has to avoid some of what you've seen in some of those interviews; those deer in the headlights moments, where it seems like she doesn't know what to say. I think one thing she can do to get around that, and I would expect this on Thursday; watch for her to be aggressive against Barack Obama; to call him out as liberal so that Joe Biden in that debate will have to answer for Obama. […]

Highlight #7
Nancy Pfotenhauer Criticizes Nature of Questions Aimed at Palin (FNC 09/29/08 8:39am)
NANCY PFOTENHAUER: [...] [in regards to McCain on the Hill] The wheels were off the car, and he came in very quietly behind the scenes and worked almost nonstop to pull those parties together and did not force his own proposal down peoples' throats [...]

[in regards to Palin's upcoming debate] I think we're working the governor to focus her on what she's likely to run into at the this debate. Obviously you can have the series of gotcha questions [...]My guess is they're going to go very heavily on foreign policy, where I would prefer - normally in vice presidential debates you see a more even-handed approach, particularly with the challenges that we're facing with the nation's economies. So I would hope the questions would be more even-handed [...] I think the moderator will have questions to answer themselves if they do go so heavily on foreign policy. [...] If it's a battle of wits we like our questions, and we think she'll do a fine job. [...]

[in regards to the Palin/Couric interview] I think it was a series of trapdoor questions. [...]

Highlight #8
Debate Fact Check: McCain Gives Billions in Tax Cuts to Mega Corporations (MSNBC 09/29/08 9:33am)
TAMRON HALL: Here's what Barack Obama said about McCain's tax plan.

BARACK OBAMA: Under your tax plan […] oil companies would get an additional $4 billion in tax breaks. […]

HALL: […] is that true or false?

BILL ADAIR: That one got a 'true' on the truth-o-meter. Indeed, McCain's tax plan would cut corporate taxes from 35 to 25% and, if you calculate how much oil companies would get—works out to be about $4 billion. So true on our truth-o-meter.

Highlight #9
Graham Admits He's Part of the Pork Problem, Changes the Subject on Russia (FNC 09/28/08 6:00pm)
LINDSEY GRAHAM: I think it was decisive in regards to the House being involved. John was challenged about four days ago by Harry Reid to say, "If you don't support this proposal," the original Paulson proposal that was being tweaked, "there'll be no Democratic votes for it." If John McCain doesn't vote for it, the Democrats won't.

[...]

MIKE WALLACE: But let me ask you a question about that, Senator Graham. If earmarks are so bad, why did you ask for 71 projects totaling $305 million in the last fiscal year?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GRAHAM: I have been part of the problem. My earmarks have been authorized, number one. They're out there for you to look at. And I'm part of the problem.

I'd like to be part of the solution, because the good part of earmarks has been overwhelmed by the bad part. Let's just start over. Let's start over, because the $3 million to DNA -- to bear studies in Montana, the $250 million bridge in Alaska for 50 people, is drowning out some of the good things I've done and John's done.

[...]

WALLACE: Senator Graham, what the heck was she talking about?

GRAHAM: Trying to show that she lives near one of the biggest threats we have in the world, Russia, run by Putin, who John said, "When I looked in his eyes, I saw KGB."

But the truth is Joe has said some things about FDR being on T.V. He's right. These are human beings. She'll get better. She's very talented at what she's been asked to do in the past. She's been a really good governor.

--
Jacob Roberts
PAO
208.420.3470 (c)

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To: ctrfriendsfamily@americanbridge.org
Date: 11/2/2014 7:44:02 AM
Subject: Correct The Record Sunday November 2, 2014 Roundup

Correct The Record Sunday November 2, 2014 Roundup:

Headlines:

Politico: "When Hillary Clinton attacks"

"In more than a dozen appearances for Democrats in races around the country, Clinton has not just been talking up her candidate with anodyne stump speeches. She's been going after the Republican, in pointed ways."

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: "Hillary Clinton lifts Grimes in final push"

"Both Hillary and Bill Clinton have been fixtures on the campaign trail this year, as Hillary mulls a widely expected 2016 bid for the White House."

The Hill: "Dems turn to Clintons, not Obama"

"Democrats are turning to Bill and Hillary Clinton — and not President Obama — to save their majority in the Senate."

Washington Post blog: Post Politics: "Hillary Clinton and Mitch McConnell: It's complicated"

"The fierce fight to win Kentucky's Senate seat carries with it some lingering intrigue: the complicated relationship between a potential future president and a potential future majority leader."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Richmond Register: "Hillary focuses on economic issues in Lexington speech for Grimes"

"Hillary Clinton urged Kentucky voters to wade through the flood of negative ads and to choose 'a fresh start' by sending Democratic U.S. Senate candidate Alison Lundergan Grimes to Washington and ending Mitch McConnell's 30-year run there."

BuzzFeed: "Hillary Clinton's Choice For Kentucky: 'Old' Or 'New'?"

"In three weeks on the campaign trail, Hillary Clinton has hit 16 states to campaign and fundraise for Democrats facing elections on Tuesday. But here in Kentucky, Clinton has held more campaign rallies for one candidate, Alison Lundergan Grimes, than any other single Democrat on the ballot this month."

National Journal: "Hillary Clinton on the Stump for New Hampshire Women"

"The former secretary of State won New Hampshire in 2008, and when she arrives here on Sunday to campaign for Sen. Jeanne Shaheen and Gov. Maggie Hassan, she'll be in a good position to remind voters that she would need them again if she runs in 2016."

CNN: "Hillary Clinton reaches back to Katrina to tout Mary Landrieu"

"To Hillary Clinton, U.S. Sen. Mary Landrieu is the fighter for Louisiana who 'refused to let Washington turn its back' on the state in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina almost 10 years ago."

Reuters: "Courting liberals, Clinton takes tougher line on big business"

"Long viewed as an ally by Wall Street, likely 2016 presidential contender Hillary Clinton has increasingly been taking banks and big business to task while on the campaign trail for Democrats across the country."

Associated Press: "Women are the target on campaign's final weekend"

"Women were the focus in Kentucky on Saturday as Hillary Rodham Clinton, appearing with Grimes, endorsed a higher minimum wage and equal pay for women in remarks to more than 1,000 people at Northern Kentucky University."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Washington Post: "Republicans appear set to take control of Senate, but hope remains for Democrats"

"Republicans are on the cusp of taking control of the Senate in Tuesday's elections, with Democrats now dependent on their ability to navigate an increasingly narrow path to maintain their majority by the slimmest of margins, according to strategists, politicians and a Washington Post analysis of the contested campaigns."

Washington Post: "Top Democratic strategists acknowledge 'challenging' environment as Tuesday looms"

"Prominent Democratic strategists are growing increasingly nervous that the national political environment is not only bad for their side but moving in the wrong direction in the final days before the election, a trend that could cost their party not only control of the Senate but also double-digit House losses."

NBC News: Meet the Press: "Which 2016 Presidential Potential Had the Best 2014?"

"As for the Democratic side, the panel agreed that former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton has some more work to do."

CNN: "Polls give GOP momentum going into midterms"

"Democratic National Committee Chairwoman Debbie Wasserman Schultz said on ABC's 'This Week' that her party's candidates will benefit from get-out-the-vote efforts targeting people who supported Obama in 2008 and 2012, but didn't vote in the 2010 midterm elections. 'We have a ground game that I know [RNC chairman] Reince [Priebus] would take ours over theirs any day of the week,' she said. She also pointed to Democratic surrogates -- including former President Bill Clinton and Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, Obama and Vice President Joe Biden -- and said they trounce GOP surrogates like New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, Paul and Texas Sen. Ted Cruz."

Bloomberg: "Clinton Allies Resist Calls to Jump Early Into 2016 Race"

"Veteran Hillary Clinton advisers say she shouldn't accelerate her early 2015 timetable for announcing whether she'll run for president, despite calls from prominent backers of President Barack Obama for her to enter the race soon after Tuesday's congressional elections."

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: "Paul: 'People are ready for new leadership'"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) said Sunday that American voters might be tiring of the sort of leadership provided by President Obama and Hillary Clinton."

Boston Herald: "Hillary to be among those paying respects"

"Fellow lawmakers, family, friends and constituents of beloved former Mayor Thomas M. Menino will gather in Boston to pay their respects today and for a procession tomorrow that honors the mark he left on the city during his five-term tenure. Among the dignitaries will be former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, who plans to pay her respects to the Menino family today at Faneuil Hall, Menino's press secretary Dot Joyce confirmed yesterday."

Articles:

Politico: "When Hillary Clinton attacks"

By Maggie Haberman

November 2, 2014, 6:59 a.m. EST

Hillary Clinton's immersion into campaign politics this fall has come with a surprising twist: She's talking carefully but wielding a big stick.

In more than a dozen appearances for Democrats in races around the country, Clinton has not just been talking up her candidate with anodyne stump speeches. She's been going after the Republican, in pointed ways.

She never mentions the opponent by name, avoiding looking like she's taking gratuitous shots. But Clinton has tailored her stump speeches to incorporate each Democrat's specific message against his or her rival, a use of her megaphone that risks making her look more partisan but that's earning her goodwill and chits.

The most overt example came last week when Clinton campaigned for Bruce Braley in Iowa. She didn't just pump up the Senate hopeful's resume in her stump speech – she took a harsh jab at his rival, Republican Joni Ernst, for not sitting down with the Des Moines Register's editorial board.

"They have to be willing to answer the tough questions, which Bruce has been willing to do and his opponent has not," she said in Iowa. "It really seems like it should be disqualifying in Iowa of all states to avoid answering questions."

It was a message that Braley's campaign had been trying for days to get traction on, stoking questions about whether Ernst can be trusted and whether she will talk to people who aren't her supporters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton "forcefully highlighted Ernst's big problem," said Braley strategist Jeff Link, doing something that was "very important for Braley in the final days of this campaign."

A few days earlier, Clinton campaigned for Mike Michaud, the Democratic candidate for governor in Maine. At a gymnasium rally in Scarborough, she asked people not to waste their votes in a campaign in which an independent candidate, Eliot Cutler, is siphoning support.

"You've got three people running, right?" Clinton said to the crowd. "Whoever gets the most votes wins — you've just gotta make sure Mike [gets] the most votes."

She repeatedly implored attendees to get everyone they knew to the polls, adding, "This is no time to be throwing away a vote."

It's the message that message came as Democrats had been trying to minimize Cutler's impact on the race. Maine is one of the few states President Barack Obama has traveled to in an election year in which candidates in tight races have avoided him.

In Louisiana on Saturday, she hit Democratic Sen. Mary Landrieu's main opponent, Republican Rep. Bill Cassidy, over the aftermath of Hurricane Isaac — a topic that still resonates loudly in the state.

"From what I've heard, Mary's opponent didn't really lift a finger after Isaac," Clinton said without naming Cassidy but bolstering a Landrieu message.

And when she traveled a bit north of her Chappaqua home to appear with former Clinton White House staffer Rep. Sean Patrick Maloney, she rapped his opponent, Nan Hayworth, as someone who will "turn the clock back" on women's health.

Maloney's "opponent," she said, is someone who "has publicly stated she would defund Planned Parenthood," Clinton said. She "supports the Hobby Lobby decision."

Clinton made clear out of the gate when she started campaigning for candidates this fall that she was going to make the contrasts. At a "Women for Wolf" rally for Democrat Tom Wolf in Philadelphia, she invoked incumbent Republican Gov. Tom Corbett's support for a vaginal ultrasound bill in cases of abortion and his comparison of gay marriage to incest.

Democrats say it's allowed their candidates to break through some of the noise surrounding races in which the airwaves are cluttered with outside groups' attack ads.

"Her events have not only generated enthusiasm for our candidates and motivated our people to get out the vote, but she has made the case to undecided voters about what's at stake and why these Republican candidates are so wrong on issues they care about," said Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee spokesman Matt Canter.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton has done her most extensive fall campaign work trying to bolster Senate Democrats, many of whom were her colleagues when she served as a senator from New York. She's gotten engaged in most of the highly competitive races, making two trips for three events to Kentucky, where she has stumped for Democrat Alison Lundergan Grimes.

Clinton delivered her shots at incumbent Rep. Mitch McConnell surgically. But she made her toughest comparison against him on the issue of Obamacare, which he has said he wants to repeal outright.

"Either you think [Kentucky's existing health care exchange is good] for hard-working families, for children or you want to pull out health care reform root and branch," Clinton said.

"If you're going to break through, you have to do more than just platitudes," said Democratic strategist Steve Elmendorf of why Clinton can deliver a message with strong impact. "It's not like she's making cheap shots – there are very legitimate distinctions to be made here."

Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee spokesman Josh Schwerin agreed.

"There are few people in either party who can deliver a persuasive and motivating message to both base and swing voters," he said. "Hillary Clinton is one of those people."

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: "Hillary Clinton lifts Grimes in final push"

By Bernie Becker

November 1, 2014, 4:12 p.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton returned to the stump in Kentucky on Saturday, making a final push for Alison Lundergan Grimes's campaign to unseat Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell.

The former secretary of State is holding a pair of events on Saturday with Grimes, appearing in the state's suburbs of Cincinnati, Ohio and in Lexington.

In Highland Heights, Ky., Clinton again employed a populist message that has become increasingly popular for Democrats this campaign season, saying Grimes would fight for an increase in the minimum wage and pay equity for women.

"This is not just a contest between a permanent Washington fixture and a fresh face," Clinton said. "It's a contest between old thinking and new thinking."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Both Hillary and Bill Clinton have been fixtures on the campaign trail this year, as Hillary mulls a widely expected 2016 bid for the White House. But the Clintons might be exerting the most energy to elect Grimes, Kentucky's secretary of State.

Grimes's father and the Clintons are long-time friends, and Bill Clinton joked this week about filling out tax forms in Kentucky.

But even with the Clintons's efforts, McConnell is still favored to beat Grimes on Tuesday. If McConnell wins and the GOP captures six seats, the Kentucky Republican would be in line to become the new Senate majority leader.

The Hill: "Dems turn to Clintons, not Obama"

By Amie Parnes

November 1, 2014, 12:28 p.m. EDT

Democrats are turning to Bill and Hillary Clinton — and not President Obama — to save their majority in the Senate.

The Clintons have crisscrossed the country in recent weeks for Democratic candidates, and will each appear in key states this weekend where races could decide which party controls the upper chamber.

While Obama has been mostly sidelined — he'll appear at a Michigan rally on Saturday where Democrats believe a Senate seat is safely in hand — the Clintons are traveling to red states where the president is not welcome.

On Saturday, Hillary Clinton will appear alongside Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.). She'll then travel to Kentucky to appear alongside Senate candidate Allison Lundergan Grimes, who is running against Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-KY.)

Former Secretary of State Clinton will travel the next day to New Hampshire to appear at a get out the vote rally for Gov. Maggie Hassan and Sen. Jeanne Shaheen.

Meanwhile, Bill Clinton, his approval ratings still sky high, will stump in North Carolina for Sen. Kay Hagan (D) before heading back to his home state of Arkansas for one final rally for Sen. Mark Pryor (D).

Obama has been stuck mostly campaigning for Democratic governors around the country.

With his approval ratings in the low 40s, most Democratic House and Senate candidates have wanted him to stay away. In Kentucky, Grimes even refused to say whether she voted for Obama.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The flurry of visits by the Clintons comes with some responsibility.

If Democrats do poorly on Election Day, Republicans will seek to put the blame on them.

But Democrats and many pundits believe that will be a hard argument to make — in large part because of Obama.

“The loss will be attributed primarily to Obama not the Clintons,” said Cal Jillson, a professor at Southern Methodist University.

“It’s a tall order to expect from a former president and secretary of state. I think there are candidates that are happy to have her and happy to have Bill at their sides. But it’s more that the party sees them as having a profile more acceptable to the electorate as Obama’s current profile,” he said.

Steve Elmendorf, a top Washington lobbyist who served as deputy campaign manager on Sen. John Kerry’s presidential campaign, said while both Clintons were extremely popular on the campaign trail, this election isn’t about either of them.

“Surrogates are valuable to raise money, get you some press, turn out the base, but are they ultimately what each of these races is about? No,” he said. “These races are so baked one way or the other. I don’t think any surrogate should be given credit or blame.”

Republicans, of course, don’t see it that way. They’re looking particularly at Hillary Clinton’s surrogacy this cycle to determine what the early stages of her potential candidacy could look like.

Kirsten Kukowski, a spokesperson for the Republican National Committee, pointed as proof to a campaign event earlier this week when Clinton stumped for Anthony Brown, who is running for governor in Maryland.

Kukowski called the event “lackluster” and “sparsely attended,” and said it spoke of Clinton’s effectiveness more than anything.

“She’s already been ineffective in places she tried to help for 2014 and prior to this, she and Bill have already had a dismal track record,” she said. “Apparently, Maryland isn’t so ready for the Democrat ticket in 2014 or Hillary.”

Clinton allies say they expect that talking point from their Republican counterparts. But they say they are confident that the Clintons did more to help Democratic candidates than any other surrogate around.

And they’re happy to point out that the Clintons are more helpful than the Obamas to most Democrats this year.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“There’s no one else who can do what they do, not even the sitting president and first lady” said one longtime Clinton ally. “It’s a function of their history, public service and their networks and no one else comes close. “

Richmond Register: “Hillary focuses on economic issues in Lexington speech for Grimes”

By Ronnie Ellis

November 1, 2014, 9:39 p.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton urged Kentucky voters to wade through the flood of negative ads and to choose “a fresh start” by sending Democratic U.S. Senate candidate Alison Lundergan Grimes to Washington and ending Mitch McConnell’s 30-year run there.

The former secretary of state, first lady and current favorite for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination made two campaign stops for Grimes on Saturday, one at Northern Kentucky University and a second before an overflow crowd of 1,200 at Transylvania University in Lexington.

Grimes has been locked in what was previously regarded as a tight race with McConnell. But it may be slipping out of reach in the final days as multiple polls have shown McConnell with leads ranging from three to seven points. Both campaigns are urging voters to go to the polls Tuesday, saying turnout by their supporters could determine the winner.

Clinton was making her second trip to Kentucky on behalf of Grimes. Her husband, former President Bill Clinton, has campaigned for Grimes on three trips to the state, the last on Thursday when he stopped in Louisville and Ashland.

As polls have continued to swing in McConnell’s direction, recent Grimes rallies seemed to lose some of the enthusiasm of earlier ones. But that wasn’t the case here Saturday.

“My goodness,” exclaimed Clinton as she walked on stage to wild cheering. “There is enough energy in this auditorium to light Lexington for a month.”

But that, of course, is part of the effort to get supporters to the polls. Every speaker who preceded Clinton – Auditor Adam Edelen, former governor Martha Layne Collins, Gov. Steve Beshea, and Grimes – waved a card supporters were asked to sign to work on Tuesday. By the time Clinton raised hers, the crowd was laughing about it.

Clinton focused most of her 23-minute speech on the economic themes Grimes pushes in her campaign: raising the minimum wage; voting for equal pay for equal work by women; and a jobs plan Grimes has campaigned on, attempting to contrast what she said is Grimes' concern for the average Kentuckian with McConnell’s focus on wealthy donors and Washington power.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She said increasing the minimum wage will not cost jobs, reminding the crowd her husband raised the minimum wage during a period of significant job creation and low unemployment.

BuzzFeed: "Hillary Clinton's Choice For Kentucky: 'Old' Or 'New'?"

By Ruby Cramer

November 2, 2014, 12:03 a.m. EST

[Subtitle:] Stumping for Grimes, Clinton's pitch to voters is a "referendum on the future." Clinton, who has been in national politics almost as long as McConnell's been in office, looks ahead to a "fresh start" in Washington.

LEXINGTON, Ky. — In three weeks on the campaign trail, Hillary Clinton has hit 16 states to campaign and fundraise for Democrats facing elections on Tuesday.

But here in Kentucky, Clinton has held more campaign rallies for one candidate, Alison Lundergan Grimes, than any other single Democrat on the ballot this month.

Clinton returned to the state on Saturday to cast Grimes — the 35-year-old secretary of state running against a U.S. senator whose tenure on Capitol Hill is almost as long — as an emblem of "new thinking" and a coming "fresh start" in Washington.

Polls don't show Grimes winning on election day against Mitch McConnell, the Senate Minority Leader running for a sixth term. But she has made his long tenure in Washington the crux of her campaign, while framing herself as the face of a new generation in politics, fed up with the last. (Her speeches focus relentlessly on McConnell, and her merchandise features slogans like "Ditch Mitch" and "I Challenge Mitch.")

Clinton singled out that quality on Saturday in two speeches, both held on college campuses. The "entire country is watching" the Grimes-McConnell race, Clinton said, because of the way her new voice would shift the politics in D.C.

"Maybe more than any other place in these midterm elections, the voters of Kentucky have the chance not just to send a message, but to alter the course of politics and government," Clinton said at her first event of the day, a rally inside a large and dimly lit arena in Highland Heights, a town near the Ohio border.

Clinton's pair of speeches had a pronounced forward-looking quality that hung in part on the generation dynamics at play between Grimes and McConnell, who is 72.

She did not name McConnell directly in her remarks at the first rally or the second, which was held at Transylvania University in Lexington. But Clinton repeatedly depicted her former Senate colleague as a "permanent Washington fixture."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Are you ready for a fresh start with a fresh voice and a fresh leader?” Clinton asked.

Speaking after Grimes at both rallies, she argued there is a “need to change course” and called upon attendees to “vote for the future.” The Grimes-McConnell race, Clinton said, is “not just a contest between a permanent Washington fixture and a fresh face — it’s a contest between old thinking and new thinking.”

“It is a referendum on the future,” Clinton said at both rallies.

Clinton herself has been involved in national politics — on her husband’s campaigns; in the White House and the U.S. Senate; as a candidate for president; and as the last secretary of state — for nearly as long as McConnell has been in office.

But on the campaign trail this month, Clinton has developed a speech that is aspirational and focused on the future, describing Democrats she stumps for as change-making. In Pennsylvania, at a rally for Tom Wolf, the businessman running for governor, she called on his campaign slogan, “A Fresh Start,” in her speech.

And last week, at an event with Rep. Sean Patrick Maloney in New York’s Hudson Valley, Clinton said the young congressman was “part of a new political mission to make our government work again for the people of the country we love.”

If she runs for president, Clinton will face the challenge of leading that “new political mission,” offering a distinct path forward from the Obama administration, and convincing voters she is closer to a Grimes “fresh face” than a McConnell “fixture.”

Clinton spent much of her speeches on Saturday decrying parts of the political system. She described Washington as a place where people use money to “muddy the waters” and “drown” out voters, and where troubling “patterns” develop among public officials. Some, Clinton said, “don’t seem to care as much or work as hard to give everyone the same chance that Alison had and made the most of.”

“We cannot in our country continue to reward the dividers,” said Clinton. “We need to reward the uniters — the people who care about everybody.”

Washington Post blog: Post Politics: “Hillary Clinton and Mitch McConnell: It’s complicated”

By Paul Kane

November 2, 2014, 8:00 a.m. EST

The fierce fight to win Kentucky's Senate seat carries with it some lingering intrigue: the complicated relationship between a potential future president and a potential future majority leader.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In one corner, Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) is running his campaign squarely against President Obama -- whose favorability remains below 30 percent here -- instead of his youthful, energetic challenger, Kentucky secretary of state Alison Lundergan Grimes (D). In the other corner is the Grimes campaign, which has practically ignored Obama's existence -- as a stand-in for the actual nominee used the Clinton family as the de facto challenger to McConnell.

That dynamic reached a crescendoSaturday afternoon inside a packed theater on Transylvania University's campus here, when former U.S. secretary of state Hillary Clinton delivered a 22-minute rallying cry for the 35-year-old challenger -- the seventh time she or former president Bill Clinton have appeared in Kentucky for Grimes.

Clinton accused Republicans of running a campaign of "fear," suggesting McConnell's campaign had been endlessly negative in an attempt to smear the challenger. McConnell aides "just hope that enough of it sticks," she said.

But not once did she ever mention the Senate minority leader by name.

"If Alison's opponent wanted to run against the president, he had the chance in 2012," Clinton said, to cheers from more than 1,200 Democrats packed inside the event.

It was a delicate bit of diplomacy for Clinton, honed both in her four years at Foggy Bottom and her eight years serving alongside McConnell in the Senate. Local observers say that former president Bill Clinton has no hesitation in invoking McConnell by name -- but Hillary Clinton seems to avoid it.

It's likely, at least in part, senatorial courtesy -- but also it could help smooth relations between the two should Hillary Clinton run for, and win, the presidency in 2016. Polls show McConnell with a small-but-steady lead, and Republicans are very close to securing the six seats necessary to win the Senate majority in Tuesday's elections.

That would make McConnell the majority leader, a post he might still hold if and when Clinton is sworn in as president in January 2017. The Republicans will face a difficult electoral map for the Senate in 2016, so GOP strategists are hoping for a big sweep that will provide a cushion for seats they could lose two years from now and maintain the majority.

For his part, McConnell denies that he holds any grudge against the Clintons for their overt stumping for Grimes.

"I don’t think it’s personal, it’s just business. This is the Clintons' business., to go around the country. The president’s so unpopular that the only person they can send out that everybody’s heard of is President Clinton," he said Friday after a stop in Lexington, adding again: “It’s not personal.”

Still, he declined to say whether any grudges would linger if he had to negotiate with a President Hillary Clinton. “I’m hoping that doesn’t happen and we don’t have to figure out," he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In 2010, McConnell hosted Hillary Clinton at the institute he built at his alma mater, University of Louisville, for a lecture that followed his tradition of bringing in a bipartisan collection of speakers, including Vice President Biden and the late Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.). At that event, still serving as secretary of state, Clinton praised McConnell's work on foreign policy, which The Hill newspaper noted last month in this lengthy quote from her 2010 speech:

"I was fortunate to find common cause and work with him on a number of foreign policy issues: human rights in Burma; legislation to support small businesses and micro-credit lending in Kosovo; promoting women and civil society leaders in Afghanistan; strengthening the rule of law in parts of the Islamic world. ... And I've appreciated working with him in my new capacity upon becoming secretary of State."

The Clintons are longtime friends with Jerry Lundergan, the father of the candidate and a former state party chairman who helped deliver the Bluegrass State twice for Bill Clinton. Grimes frequently labels herself a "Clinton Democrat," and over a memorable stretch a few weeks back she refused to acknowledge whether she had even voted for Obama.

That connection is the main factor driving their support for Grimes, it seems. But there's a chance that the Clinton-McConnell relationship could prove to be a longtime determinant of national policy.

"Tuesday is your chance to reject the guardians of gridlock," Hillary Clinton said Saturday, drawing the activists to their feet.

If voters don't take her advice, and McConnell wins, the "guardian of gridlock" could play a key role in shaping the success or failure of the next Clinton administration.

National Journal: "Hillary Clinton on the Stump for New Hampshire Women"

By Emily Schultheis

November 2, 2014

[Subtitle:] The expected presidential contender visits a state that likes to elect female candidates.

New Hampshire likes women. And Hillary Clinton likes New Hampshire.

The former secretary of State won New Hampshire in 2008, and when she arrives here on Sunday to campaign for Sen. Jeanne Shaheen and Gov. Maggie Hassan, she'll be in a good position to remind voters that she would need them again if she runs in 2016.

New Hampshire is the only state with an all-female delegation. There's Hassan, the Democratic governor; two U.S. Senators, Shaheen and Republican Kelly Ayotte; and two U.S. House members, Democrats Carol Shea-

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Porter and Ann McLane Kuster. (The state's current House speaker and Supreme Court chief justice are women as well.)

Four of those women are on the ballot this fall, some of them locked in tight races, a fact that's brought Clinton out. But the sheer number of female incumbents on the ballot here, and the number who have won in years past, are a reminder of the state's track record of electing women from both parties—something the state's female pols say is a result of both the grassroots nature of New Hampshire politics and an uncommonly high number of opportunities to run for office.

"When that moment happened where there was the first all-female delegation, it wasn't surprising to us that it was New Hampshire," said Debbie Walsh, director of the Rutgers Center for American Women and Politics. "There's such a tradition of women's leadership … there's a kind of comfort level with electing women and seeing them on the ballot."

The state's record of electing women to state legislative positions goes back decades—though it's worth noting that even New Hampshire didn't send a woman to Congress until Shea-Porter was sworn in in 2007. The state made history when it became the first one with a majority-female chamber of its state legislature: back in 2009 and 2010, 13 of the 24-member state Senate were women.

According to data from Rutgers, the state legislature has been at least a quarter female since the university began collecting data in 1975, a figure far higher than most other states at the time. And Shaheen, who's now facing reelection for a second term in the Senate, is the first woman in U.S. history to serve as both governor and senator for a state.

These data points are all the more striking when they're put up against the rest of the country. Just 23 of 50 states have elected women as governors, and there are still four states—Iowa, Vermont, Mississippi, and Delaware—that have never sent a woman to Congress. Even in the more politically progressive Northeast, neighboring states have had a tough time getting women into top jobs: Rhode Island and Massachusetts could elect their first female governors on Tuesday, with State Treasurer Gina Raimondo and Attorney General Martha Coakley, respectively.

New Hampshire's record is due in large part to an unusually large legislature: the House of Representatives alone has 400 members, which means about one state rep per 3,300 people.

"We're what I call an all-hands-on-deck state: we include people and welcome them if they want to participate and contribute," Hassan told National Journal after a campaign press conference in Concord. "That spirit really means that women who get involved in their communities have an opportunity to participate and are respected in their own right."

The state House is what people in New Hampshire call a true citizen legislature: elected members make just $200 per term (or $100 per year), and their work there isn't considered a full-time job. That part-time nature of the role is something that helps make the process more inclusive for women.

Still, that doesn't mean there aren't still significant barriers and challenges. Speaking at a training session at the state Republican convention in Hooksett, Ayotte told the crowd about the two questions she got on the 2010 campaign trail that men never did: what would happen to her children and whether she'd be "tough enough" for Washington.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I thought to myself … 'What do you mean am I going to be tough enough? Listen, I was a murder prosecutor!'" she said. "I put some of the toughest criminals in the history of our state behind bars personally. How much tougher do you want me to be?"

And Shaheen, who ran unsuccessfully for her current job in 2002 (she won six years later), said the focus on national security issues that year hindered female candidates across the country.

"In 2002, when national security was a big issue, I think that affected women running ... I ran for the Senate in 2002 and lost that race," she said. While 2014 is certainly different than 2002, the late-stage focus on national security in this year's midterm elections is playing a big role in Shaheen's reelection bid.

Hassan, however, said the growing pains women face when running for office are improved every time another woman gets elected and serves.

"Every time women have worked to broaden their role in society they come up with some challenges," she told National Journal. "The more women who run and the more women who hold office, the more those barriers will fade."

If that's true, and New Hampshire's record of supporting female candidates holds, no one stands to benefit more than Clinton in 2016.

"New Hampshire has always been seen as a bellwether state for the country so hopefully this just means a mandate for women's leadership is sweeping the nation," said Jess McIntosh of the pro-Democratic women's group EMILY's List. "New Hampshire is very much ready to vote for a woman president, whether that's Hillary Clinton or somebody else who takes the plunge."

CNN: "Hillary Clinton reaches back to Katrina to tout Mary Landrieu"

By Dan Merica

November 1, 2014, 11:34 p.m. EDT

To Hillary Clinton, U.S. Sen. Mary Landrieu is the fighter for Louisiana who "refused to let Washington turn its back" on the state in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina almost 10 years ago.

Clinton reached back to the months and years after the 2005 hurricane killed more than 1,500 people in Louisiana to praise Landrieu on Saturday at a New Orleans rally for the endangered three-term senator.

"She was relentless," Clinton said, noting that she and Landrieu were in the Senate at the time. "You learn a lot about a person and a leader in a moment like that. And I saw Mary in action, no cameras, no attention, just focused like a laser to take care of her people."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton continued: "She never gave up. If you know anything about Mary Landrieu, you know that is an ingrained characteristic, she doesn't shy away from a fight."

Landrieu is in a different kind of fight this year -- a fight to keep her Senate seat against a stout challenge from Republican Rep. Bill Cassidy. Every national poll since the start of September has shown Cassidy besting the incumbent.

Clinton did her part on Saturday to knock Cassidy but never actually referred to him by name.

"From what I have heard, Mary's opponent didn't really lift a finger after Isaac," Clinton said, using a familiar Landrieu campaign attack that cites a 2012 no-vote against legislation that included disaster relief money for the state after Hurricane Isaac rocked the state.

Clinton also subtly hit George W. Bush's presidency for fumbling the response to Katrina, blaming the former president for a "paralyzed" response to the tragedy.

For her part, Landrieu portrayed herself as the right choice for Louisiana because her support for oil and gas, women and seniors.

She also didn't run away from her 18-years in the Senate, despite polls that show a deep-seeded resentment of Congress and an anti-incumbent mood throughout the country.

"I have now worked with three presidents, four majority leaders and six governors," Landrieu said within the first few minutes of her speech. "And I know how to get work done for you, no matter what the line up in Washington is and no matter how gridlocked it might be."

Landrieu, however, finds herself behind in her fourth race.

Cassidy has sought to tie Landrieu to President Barack Obama, who in much of Louisiana is markedly unpopular. In nearly every ad, Cassidy mention that "Landrieu supports Barack Obama 97 percent of the time."

The attacks have worked and some polls show the Democratic senator might be past the point of Clinton's saving.

Landrieu advisers and spokesmen on Saturday told reporters to disregard most of the polling and instead pointed to early voting totals as proof that momentum is swinging their way.

In particular, Matthew Lehner, a senior adviser to Landrieu, pointed to the fact that 33% of early ballots totals have come from black voters, a strong demographic for the Democrat.

"Sen. Landrieu has had tight races in all of her races," said Fabien Levy, the campaign's spokesman. "If need be, we will be ready [for a runoff]. But we are ready to win this on election night."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Reuters: "Courting liberals, Clinton takes tougher line on big business"

By Gabriel Debenedetti

November 2, 2014, 8:14 a.m. EST

Long viewed as an ally by Wall Street, likely 2016 presidential contender Hillary Clinton has increasingly been taking banks and big business to task while on the campaign trail for Democrats across the country.

Many Democratic strategists see the sharper rhetoric as an effort to win over liberal critics, such as supporters of Massachusetts Senator Elizabeth Warren. It comes days before Tuesday's midterm elections and as Clinton ramps up her political activity ahead of a probable White House bid.

"Al has pushed for more and better oversight of the big banks and risky financial activity," Clinton said in support of Senator Al Franken in Minnesota in late October.

"There's a lot of unfinished business to make sure we don't end up once again with big banks taking big risks and leaving taxpayers holding the bag," she said, in the starkest example yet of her populist turn.

This is a change of tone for the former New York senator, who faced criticism for her Wall Street ties as recently as September, after appearing with Goldman Sachs chief executive Lloyd Blankfein.

Allies and analysts see it as an effort to find the balance between populism and her familiar centrism that Clinton may need in order to broaden her appeal in a potential 2016 Democratic primary contest.

"What she's trying to do, really, is find her message. This is something that she struggled with in 2008 (while losing the Democratic nomination battle to Barack Obama), and she really didn't have to do it as secretary of state," said Brookings Institution campaign expert John Hudak.

"She's trying to thread the needle, to say to progressives, 'I'm your candidate,' but also say to Iowa Democrats, 'I'm your candidate, too.'"

Clinton, who was secretary of state from 2009-2013, has not declared her candidacy, although supporters have built a national campaign structure to await a presumed run. She says she will decide whether or not to run early next year and for now she is campaigning for others, largely in states where Obama is unpopular. Sunday's New Hampshire swing comes after Saturday stops in Louisiana and Kentucky.

But supporters of Warren, who says she does not plan to run for the White House, are still wary of Clinton, who ran as a centrist in 2008. Clinton leads Warren 60 to 17 percent in an October Reuters/Ipsos poll of Democrats in Iowa, which holds the first contest of the presidential nominating race.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Warren, a former Harvard Law School professor who spearheaded the creation of the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau after the 2008 financial crisis, has gained solid backing from liberals in the party for her steady criticism of Wall Street and big banks.

Clinton campaigned with Warren in October for Massachusetts governor candidate Martha Coakley, praising the bank regulation advocate for "giv(ing) it to those who deserve to get it." That despite the fact that she is personally close with some high-profile bankers who know her from her time representing them in the Senate, and from her experience as first lady during Bill Clinton's years as president.

In Minnesota, Clinton expanded on her economic priorities, saying that before the financial crisis "a lot of us were calling for regulating derivatives and other complex financial products, closing the carried-interest loophole, getting control of skyrocketing CEO pay."

It was a line that raised eyebrows given the deregulatory policies of Bill Clinton's administration. But progressive activists, who have criticized Hillary Clinton's practice of giving highly-paid speeches to groups including financial firms, welcome such statements.

"It's baby steps in the right direction after $200,000 speeches at Goldman Sachs," said Adam Green of the Progressive Change Campaign Committee.

There are pitfalls to the appeals to liberals. Critics pounced after Clinton told voters in Boston last month not to "let anybody tell you that it's corporations and businesses that create jobs."

Clinton later explained that she meant to criticize the idea that the economy grows because of corporate tax breaks, but Republicans across the country, including a pair of potential Republican 2016 opponents - Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky and former Florida Governor Jeb Bush - have since used the line against her.

Associated Press: “Women are the target on campaign's final weekend”

By Steve Peoples

November 1, 2014, 8:17 p.m. EDT

Their grip on the Senate majority slipping, anxious Democrats aggressively courted female voters Saturday on the final weekend of a midterm campaign that will decide the balance of power in Congress and statehouses during President Barack Obama's final years in office.

At the same time, some Republicans offered a softer tone as party leaders began to outline plans for a GOP-controlled Congress even with polls suggesting more than a half dozen Senate contests are deadlocked.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We want to engage members from both parties in the legislative process, to get our democracy working again the way it was designed," said Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell, who would ascend to majority leader if he holds his seat and his party gains six more.

Without getting specific, McConnell predicted that Republicans would "be able to work with the president to ensure solid, pro-middle-class ideas are signed into law."

Plagued by poor poll numbers, Obama has avoided the most competitive elections, but he used his last radio and Internet address before Tuesday's election to seek support from women, who are expected to play a pivotal role in races from New Hampshire to Iowa.

"When women succeed, America succeeds," the president said. "And we should be choosing policies that benefit women — because that benefits all of us."

Obama made a similar pitch Saturday night in Detroit while appearing at a rally for the Democratic candidates for the Senate, Gary Peters, and for governor, Mark Schauer. The rare Senate candidate who's asked Obama to campaign with him, Peters also has a comfortable lead in polls.

Republicans "don't have an agenda for the middle class. They don't have an agenda for Detroit. They don't have an agenda for Michigan," Obama said. "The good news is that Mark and Gary have a different vision, a vision rooted in the conviction that in America prosperity does not trickle down from the top, it comes up from folks who are working every single day."

The election three days away will decide control of the Senate, the House and 36 governors' seats.

Republicans appear certain of at least three new seats in the Senate — in West Virginia, Montana and South Dakota. There are nine other competitive races, including six for seats in Democratic hands.

The head of the Democratic National Committee, Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz of Florida, said she was optimistic despite polls showing her party struggling just to maintain the status quo.

"Democrats will hold the Senate," she said Saturday.

Her GOP counterpart, Reince Priebus, was campaigning with Gov. Scott Walker, R-Wis., and pointed to increasing signs that Republicans will have a good election night.

"I'm feeling pretty confident about where we are across the country," he said in an interview, citing Democrats' shrinking advantage with women in key races.

"I don't think they ought to be bragging," Priebus said, asserting that "even Mitch McConnell" was outperforming Democratic challenger Alison Lundergan Grimes among female voters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Women were the focus in Kentucky on Saturday as Hillary Rodham Clinton, appearing with Grimes, endorsed a higher minimum wage and equal pay for women in remarks to more than 1,000 people at Northern Kentucky University.

"It's not, as Alison rightly said, only a woman's issue," said Clinton, a possible 2016 presidential candidate. "It's a family issue. It's a fairness issue."

In New Hampshire, Democratic Sen. Jeanne Shaheen is trying to win a second term and facing a strong challenge from former Sen. Scott Brown, R-Mass.

Shaheen planned to campaign with EMILY's List president Stephanie Schriock, whose organization is spending millions to elect Democratic women.

"There isn't a race is this country where the women vote isn't critical," Schriock said. She acknowledged that Democrats' traditional advantage with women would shrink considerably because women typically vote in smaller numbers in midterm elections.

Public research polls suggest that women have moved in the GOP's direction since September.

In last month's Associated Press-GfK poll, 47 percent of likely female voters said they favored a Democratic-controlled Congress while 40 percent wanted the Republicans to take over. In a poll released last week, the two parties were about even among women — 44 percent prefer the Republicans, 42 percent the Democrats.

Speaking on a conference call with volunteers, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., described Iowa Rep. Bruce Braley's Republican Senate opponent, Joni Ernst, as "a woman who is afraid to come and tell people how she feels."

"If we win Iowa, we're going to be just fine," Reid said. "Iowa is critical."

Women's votes have shifted sharply between presidential years and midterm elections. In 2012, women broke for Obama by an 11-point margin, according to exit polls. In 2010, when few candidates raised social issues as a major campaign theme, female voters split evenly between Democratic and Republican House candidates.

Democrats have put women's health and reproductive rights at the center of Senate campaigns in Alaska, Iowa, North Carolina and especially Colorado.

Half the ads aired by Sen. Mark Udall, D-Colo., and those who are backing his re-election have criticized GOP Rep. Cory Gardner on women's health issues.

Some ads have claimed that Gardner wants to ban certain kinds of birth control. Gardner has tried to nullify the attack by proposing that birth control pills be available over the counter, instead of requiring a prescription.

In other developments:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

___

POPULAR COACH ENTERS POLITICAL SCRUM

An endorsement for Republican Sen. Pat Roberts by popular Kansas State football coach Bill Snyder has turned into a political pileup.

Asked on camera whom he was voting for in the Senate race, the coach of the 11th-ranked Wildcats responded, "My good friend Pat Roberts, of course." That clip ended up in a political ad aired by the Roberts campaign, which brought a rebuke of sorts from Kansas State President Kirk Schulz, who reminded school employees not to endorse political candidates.

Schulz instructed staff to contact the Roberts campaign to take down the ad, according to an email given to The Associated Press and other news outlets. The Roberts campaign said it hasn't been contacted by the university.

In the email, Schulz described Snyder as "unaware it was going to be used in such a fashion" and that he was "apologetic for the resulting issues."

University officials in Schulz's office did not immediately reply to messages left by the AP.

Asked about the flap, independent candidate Greg Orman told the AP, "That's just once again another demonstration of how the Roberts campaign is willing to distort the record and ultimately use people as they have with coach Snyder."

___

KASICH, CHRISTIE AND THE LEAST FORTUNATE

Ohio Gov. John Kasich's re-election effort got a boost from New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie during a rally in Columbus. Christie, a potential GOP presidential contender, said one of the most special things about Kasich is that "the least fortunate in Ohio are not forgotten. Those folks who are facing challenges in their lives, not ignored by government, not looked past by government, but a hand extended to help them up so they have a chance to reclaim their lives." Kasich, like Christie, decided to expand the Medicaid coverage to low-income residents under the federal health care overhaul. Numerous other Republican governors have resisted such an expansion.

___

BIDEN THE GRANDMOTHER

In Colorado, Jill Biden joined Udall for a bus tour of four Denver suburbs, trying to rally Democratic activists whose well-regarded ground game is seen as the only hope for the incumbent. The race has hinged on women's issues. "I'm here as a mother and a grandmother and a woman," Biden, wife of Vice President Joe Biden, told dozens of volunteers in Longmont. "Women of my generation — and I see a couple of you here — you know how hard we had to fight to get here today," Biden continued and added, "We cannot go back and fight those battles that we had to fight so long ago."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Washington Post: "Republicans appear set to take control of Senate, but hope remains for Democrats"

By Dan Balz

November 1, 2014, 7:55 p.m. EDT

Republicans are on the cusp of taking control of the Senate in Tuesday's elections, with Democrats now dependent on their ability to navigate an increasingly narrow path to maintain their majority by the slimmest of margins, according to strategists, politicians and a Washington Post analysis of the contested campaigns.

In a campaign year marked by unending negativity and voter disgust toward Washington, strategists in both camps agree that Republicans are almost certain to pick up five of the six seats they need to regain control. They have many opportunities to grab an additional seat and, if things break decisively in their direction, could easily claim the majority. Democrats' hopes of holding on largely depend on whether they can take one or two seats currently in Republican hands.

Nevertheless, there is a good chance the final result won't be known on election night. Runoff elections are expected in Louisiana and possibly in Georgia, which would mean that those races would not be resolved for weeks. If the race in Alaska is tight, it could take days to count all of the ballots from remote villages. And if independent Greg Orman wins in Kansas, it remains to be seen whether he would caucus with the Democrats or the Republicans.

Gubernatorial races are, if anything, more dramatic and less predictable than those for the Senate. Rarely have as many gubernatorial races been as close in the final days as they are this year, with several Republican and Democratic incumbents in danger of losing. The House campaigns, however, hold little suspense, with Republicans expected to gain between eight and 15 seats.

Post reporters deployed in a dozen states through Election Day described voters as weary and often disgusted with the tone of many campaigns and the money spent on the negative ads that have been running for months — but still engaged in the final outcome.

"I hate to turn on the TV," said Don Batt, 62, attending a GOP event in Iowa. "It's burning me out." In Louisiana, the scene of some nasty politics over the years, 91-year-old Leah Chase, who holds court in the kitchen of Dooky Chase's in the Treme neighborhood of New Orleans, said, "I've never seen it this way before, this negative, darling. This has gone past the limit."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republican voters expressed deep dissatisfaction with President Obama, which appeared to be the party's most important motivating factor. "Eighteen trillion dollars in debt is enough," said Chad Bettes, 40, who lives in the Kansas City suburbs. "And Obama and [Senate Majority Leader Harry] Reid just keep putting our country further in debt."

Democrats sought to make a distinction between their assessments of Obama and their views on their state's senators. "I'm disappointed in the president, to tell the truth, said Tom Moriarty, 78, of Claremont, N.H. "But I like Jeanne. She's done a lot for the state," he said of Sen. Jeanne Shaheen (D).

Across the most contested states, Democrats and Republicans spent the weekend attempting to rally their supporters and deploying thousands of volunteer canvassers to make sure the loyalists cast ballots and to persuade the few undecided voters left after months of television ads, debates, direct-mail appeals and face-to-face prodding.

Obama, the focal point for Republican criticism, was on the campaign trail but avoiding states with the most contested Senate races. Instead, he spent Saturday in Michigan, scene of a competitive race for governor and a Senate contest that appears to be firmly in Democratic hands. First lady Michelle Obama, who has been more welcome than her husband in many states, was in Illinois on Saturday.

Other Democratic surrogates swept through the competitive Senate states in droves. Former president Bill Clinton spent Friday in Georgia, surrounded by an earlier generation of civil rights leaders, and was making appearances Saturday in Iowa.

Former secretary of state Hillary Rodham Clinton, who is also looking ahead to a prospective 2016 presidential campaign, campaigned in Kentucky and Louisiana on Saturday and is scheduled for appearances in New Hampshire on Sunday.

On Friday, a busload of Republican luminaries descended on Kansas, the unexpected scene of close races for governor and Senate. The group included New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, chairman of the Republican Governors Association; former Mississippi governor Haley Barbour; and Indiana Gov. Mike Pence.

Sen. Ted Cruz (Tex.) was scheduled for a rally this weekend in Alaska, where there are tight races for Senate and governor as well. Mitt Romney, the GOP's 2012 presidential nominee and one of the party's most requested surrogates this fall, plans to attend a rally there Monday.

The Senate

From the beginning of this election cycle, conditions have favored Republicans. Democrats are defending more seats, and many of the contested races are in states Obama lost. The president's approval rating, which has sunk to the low 40s, has not helped.

Republicans also avoided the main problem that plagued them in 2010 and 2012, which was nominating first-time candidates who turned out to be poorly prepared for general elections. Not a single tea party challenger defeated a Republican incumbent in Senate primaries this year.

But countering those factors were other realities, starting with negative perceptions of the Republican Party and congressional Republicans. Additionally, to win control of the Senate, Republicans must defeat a series of incumbents, never the easiest task.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Nobody on our side of the aisle is comfortable,” said a Republican strategist who spoke on the condition of anonymity to talk candidly. “Everybody’s optimistic, but I don’t think anybody’s comfortable.” Another GOP strategist, who spoke on the condition of anonymity for the same reason, said: “I feel pretty good. I feel skeptical about feeling good.”

As Election Day approaches, the math is daunting for the Democrats. Republicans are favored to gain Senate seats in West Virginia, South Dakota and Montana, where no Democratic incumbent is running, and Arkansas, where Sen. Mark Pryor (D) has fought hard but appears to be at significant risk.

In Louisiana, Sen. Mary Landrieu (D) is expected to lead the first round of voting Tuesday, with the Republican vote split between two candidates. But she will be an underdog against the likely Republican challenger, Rep. Bill Cassidy, in a runoff.

That would give the GOP a net gain of five seats. Then there are five other Democratic-held seats that are more competitive. In four of the races, incumbent Democrats are trying to hold off GOP challenges: Mark Begich in Alaska, Kay Hagan in North Carolina, Mark Udall in Colorado and Shaheen in New Hampshire.

Of those four, Shaheen, in a campaign against former Massachusetts senator Scott Brown (R), is seen as the most likely victor.

In Alaska, Begich’s hopes of defeating Dan Sullivan (R) now appear to depend on an elaborate get-out-the-vote operation that could be the most costly, on a per-capita basis, of any Senate campaign in history.

In North Carolina, Hagan held a narrow lead for months in her race against state House Speaker Thom Tillis (R) but has seen the margin slip as Election Day has neared. Still, Democrats were cautiously optimistic Saturday that she could win.

The races in Iowa and Colorado have been two of the closest in the country and have been seen as the contests that ultimately could determine control of the Senate. As of late Saturday, both appeared to be moving away from the Democrats.

In Iowa, Republicans got a big morale boost late Saturday when the Des Moines Register reported that its last Iowa Poll gave Republican Joni Ernst a 51-44 percent lead over Rep. Bruce Braley (D). Democrats had seen the race as dead even in late private polling and have counted on a history of superior get-out-the-vote operations in Iowa to carry the day. But with Obama unpopular even in the state that launched him in 2008, Republicans believe they can carry the day and the new survey will put Democrats to the ultimate test.

In Colorado, Udall has run into a skilled challenger in Rep. Cory Gardner (R), and his success will depend on how well he can mobilize unmarried women and Hispanics. But a Democrat reported Saturday afternoon that Udall faces serious motivational problems in getting his voters out. Democratic turnout is higher than in 2010 but Republicans are turning out in even higher numbers.

If those were the only races in play this weekend, Republicans would be highly confident about winning at least one or more to claim the majority. But Republican-held seats in Georgia and Kansas are at risk of going to the Democrats.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In Georgia, Michelle Nunn (D), the daughter of former senator Sam Nunn, is pitted against businessman David Perdue (R). Nunn and the Democrats have scored effectively with attacks on Perdue for outsourcing American jobs, and Perdue has struggled to change the subject.

Because of a Libertarian candidate on the ballot, neither Nunn nor Perdue may win the necessary 50 percent of the vote Tuesday, forcing a runoff that would be held Jan. 6 , after the new Congress has convened.

In Kansas, Sen. Pat Roberts (R) has run a weak campaign, hobbled by questions about his residency and whether he has been sufficiently attentive to his state. His Democratic opponent bowed out, leaving Roberts in a head-to-head contest against Greg Orman (I).

Adding a further twist, Orman has declined to say whether he would caucus with Democrats or Republicans, but the GOP has attacked him as an Obama supporter in the hope of persuading Republicans to stick with Roberts.

In Kentucky, Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R) is now the favorite to hold off a strong challenge from Democrat Alison Lundergan Grimes. Victory would put him in position to become Senate majority leader if his party is successful overall Tuesday.

The governors

The Cook Political Report lists 14 states with gubernatorial races rated as tossups. Ten of those tossups involve sitting governors — seven Republicans and three Democrats. In addition, the Cook Report lists one GOP-held state, Pennsylvania, as likely to fall to the Democrats.

The Rothenberg Political Report lists 11 tossups (although tilting several in one direction or another) and puts Pennsylvania in the Democrats' column.

Geoffrey Skelley, associate editor of Larry Sabato's Crystal Ball report at the University of Virginia, put it this way in a posting Thursday: "Can we be brutally frank? The governors' races are really tough to call this year."

There is no clear pattern in these races, as voters in red, blue and purple states appear unhappy with the results their governors have produced.

Republican incumbents in some or a great deal of trouble this weekend include Sean Parnell (Alaska), Rick Scott (Fla.), Nathan Deal (Ga.), Sam Brownback (Kan.), Paul LePage (Maine), Rick Snyder (Mich.), Tom Corbett (Pa.) and Scott Walker (Wis.).

Democratic incumbents in competitive races include Dan Malloy (Conn.) and Pat Quinn (Ill.). Colorado Gov. John Hickenlooper was in more trouble earlier this fall, but Democrats say he appears the most likely of the three to win, and Republicans don't disagree.

Democrats also have tough races for open seats in Arkansas, Massachusetts, Maryland and Rhode Island. Of those races, Arkansas is the most likely to fall to the Republicans, followed by Massachusetts. In Hawaii,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democrats dumped incumbent Gov. Neil Abercrombie in the primary, but Republicans will have to fight hard to claim that seat.

The voters

On Friday afternoon , Andrea Morrise of Fayetteville, Ark., was taking photos of her 8-year-old daughter, who was dressed up for Halloween as Miss Arkansas, complete with sash. Her daughter has seen so many political ads that she can recite them from memory. Into the cul-de-sac where the family lives came Senate candidate Tom Cotton (R), meeting and greeting. “I can’t get away from him,” Morrise said, laughing.

Not everyone is laughing about the campaign or the ads that have been running in states such as Arkansas at unprecedented levels. In Louisiana, almost 64,000 ads have been aired, at a cost of $24.1 million to the campaigns and outside groups. That is enough to fill three weeks of air time, according to the Center for Public Integrity. During one week in September, not a single positive ad was aired in the Louisiana Senate race.

“It bothers me how much bashing there has been,” said Gerald Simmons, eating a “Dawn of the Dead” burger at Zombie Burger in Ames, Iowa. “There already is a state of negativity. People talking smack on TV is not helping.”

But these sentiments are not universal. In Kentucky, where the McConnell-Grimes race has featured nonstop attacks for months, some voters say it goes with the territory.

“I think you have to send your message if you’re going to win, and we need Mitch to send that message right now because Grimes is a fierce competitor,” said Rodney Saner, 54, of Lexington. He added, “This is an important time for our nation, and you have to share the message if you want to make change.”

At Republican rallies, the president was the main target. “I’m just so tired of the Obama agenda,” said Bre Keaton, 34, a Kansas voter. “I want the Republicans back. . . . We’ve got to take it back.”

Ron Goodbub, 66, of Duluth, Ga., said Republican enthusiasm is “through the roof” largely because of anti-Obama sentiment. “I don’t care who you are, if you’re a Democrat, all people see is Barack Obama,” he said.

But Goodbub said he hopes that, if they take control of the Senate, Republicans have a bolder agenda than they have offered voters this fall. “If all they’re talking about is repealing the medical-device tax — really?” he said. “That’s what we’ve been knocking on doors for? That’s why we’re putting out campaign signs at 10 o’clock at night?”

Lynn Moore, a 39-year-old respiratory therapist who lives in New Orleans, offered her view of the stakes. Speaking of Landrieu, Moore said: “She has to win. We need Democratic representation with all the issues. The Democrats represent our voices, our vision. We don’t need another detrimental Republican.”

Democratic voters stood up for the president and, despite the odds, predicted success. “The Democrats are going to turn out like they usually don’t in midterms,” predicted Tim Gardner, 58, a retired nurse from Richmond, Ky., who attended a Saturday rally for Grimes.

But the final days continued to test the endurance of voters waiting for the election to end. On Friday in

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Colorado, Udall exclaimed to an audience in Buena Vista, “I’m having so much fun I want this to continue forever.”

A voice boomed out from the crowd: “Really?”

Washington Post: “Top Democratic strategists acknowledge ‘challenging’ environment as Tuesday looms”

By Chris Cillizza

November 2, 2014, 11:10 a.m. EDT

Prominent Democratic strategists are growing increasingly nervous that the national political environment is not only bad for their side but moving in the wrong direction in the final days before the election, a trend that could cost their party not only control of the Senate but also double-digit House losses.

“The environment has settled, and it’s bad,” said one senior Democratic Party operative closely monitoring the party’s prospects. The source added that Democratic candidates’ numbers among independents and seniors — two critical voting blocs — have begun to erode. “They are just not as friendly to us as they once were,” the operative said.

Those trends are borne out in several key Senate races — most notably the contest for the open seat in Iowa. State Sen. Joni Ernst (R) is leading Rep. Bruce Braley (D) by 12 points among independents in a Des Moines Register poll released Saturday night . She holds a seven-point edge among all voters.

In conversations this past week with more than a dozen Democratic strategists deeply involved in this campaign — a few who were willing to speak on the record — there was widespread pessimism about the party’s chances Tuesday:

“Challenging,” acknowledged Ali Lapp, executive director of the House Majority PAC, a super PAC spending millions on ads to promote House Democrats, referring to the national dynamic

“It’s a very challenging environment,” agreed Penny Lee, a Democratic lobbyist and longtime political aide to former Pennsylvania governor Ed Rendell.

“Unsettled,” offered Democratic pollster Fred Yang.

“The trends are not good,” said Steve Rosenthal, the veteran Democratic and labor strategist.

There were lots (and lots) of reasons given for the difficulties Democrats are facing: The Senate map. The historic trends of second-term, midterm elections — a.k.a. the “six-year itch.” Voter apathy. But the one factor that virtually every person I talked to cited as the biggest reason for the party’s predicament was President Obama.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“This off-year election has become almost entirely a referendum on the president,” said one Democratic consultant involved in many closely fought congressional races. “It’s not just anger at [the Affordable Care Act]. He has become, rightly or wrongly, the symbol of dysfunction in Washington. That has led to a demoralized Democratic base, energized Republicans. And those in the middle have an easy way of venting their frustration, and that is to punish the president’s party.”

Said another Democratic strategist knee-deep in the 2014 midterms, “It is not all Obama, but a lot of it is.” People are “very upset with government,” said the strategist, who, like others interviewed, spoke on the condition of anonymity to be candid. “And people think Democrats are in charge, so they are taking it out on Democrats more than Republicans.”

Asked for a single word to describe why this election was looking increasingly bleak for Democrats, another party consultant offered this: “Obama.”

Polling bears out Obama’s negative effect on his party’s chances this fall. In a trio of NBC/Marist University polls released Sunday, on the three key Senate races, the president’s approval rating was at 32 percent in Kentucky, 39 percent in Louisiana and 41 percent in Georgia. And, even in states Obama won in 2012, his numbers are anemic. He struggles to break out of the low 40s in Colorado, and in Iowa, be barely crests 40 percent in the Real Clear Politics polling average.

Erik Smith, a veteran Democratic operative, pushed back on the “it’s all Obama’s fault” narrative, however.

“President Obama isn’t the cause of this bad environment, but how candidates have chosen to handle his lower approval ratings has often compounded their problems,” Smith said. “While candidates may want to distance themselves from the incumbent president in their advertising and public statements, the president’s base is still strong and committed to him, and as a result that mixed message dampens their enthusiasm for the candidate. In the end, these Democratic candidates fail to win new support and lose traditional support at the same time by trying to play it too politically.”

It’s also worth noting that although there was significant pessimism among the people we talked to, roughly half of them held out hope that Democrats could still snatch victory from the jaws of defeat — noting, rightly, that races all over the country remain very close despite the eroding environment.

“Given the hand that 2014 dealt us, it’s pretty impressive that so many races are still close enough to win on turnout,” said Greg Speed, president of America Votes, a Democratic-aligned group.

Added Bill Burton, a veteran of the Obama White House: “I think it’s amazing that we’re still even talking about states like Georgia and Kansas in an environment that is this bad.”

True enough. And the unsettled nature of the electorate could well mean that we are in for a few more twists and turns before Tuesday. “It’s time to stop trying to read the tea leaves,” said Rosenthal, summing up the chaos.

Of course, with the last ads shipped and the last polls conducted, there’s not much to do but try to read the tea leaves. And from what Democrats are seeing, it doesn't look good. At all.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

NBC News: Meet the Press: "Which 2016 Presidential Potential Had the Best 2014?"

By Shawna Thomas

November 2, 2014

The 2014 election isn't over yet, but 2016 loomed over the campaign trail as presidential potentials made their way across the country in the role of surrogates. So who played that role the best in the last few months?

Michael Steele, the former Chairman of the Republican National Committee told Chuck Todd on NBC's "Meet the Press" that in terms of 2014, Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul (R) has had the best year. "He's got the organization on the ground right now. He's in all 50 states. He's got young folks gravitating towards him. He's got African-Americans taking a pause and looking at him." NBC Political Analyst Joe Scarborough agreed that Paul is talented and that he's going to run a better campaign than his father but, "He's not going to win because Main Street Republicans win and you've got two choices that we talked about here, Jeb or Chris Christie."

And he had a different take on who has had the best 2014. "Without a doubt, Mitt Romney, Mitt was right on Russia. Mitt was right on Iraq," said the MSNBC host.

As for the Democratic side, the panel agreed that former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton has some more work to do. "I don't know how you lose a book tour. That's a hard thing to lose, but she's got plenty of time to regroup," said NBC's Chief Foreign Affairs Correspondent Andrea Mitchell. Former White House Press Secretary Robert Gibbs concurred. "I don't think she's had a particularly good run with the book. I wouldn't have done as many interviews as she did. I think they hastened the process of Republican attacks."

CNN: "Polls give GOP momentum going into midterms"

By Eric Bradner

November 2, 2014, 12:59 p.m. EST

Republicans woke up Sunday to a wave of new polls that showed their Senate candidates surging ahead in key states -- including one in Iowa that looked particularly grim for Democrats -- giving the GOP a jolt of enthusiasm going into the 2014 campaign cycle's final hours.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Two days from the midterm election, Washington's political class was buzzing around news that Iowa GOP Senate hopeful Joni Ernst was 7 percentage points up in a Des Moines Register poll, and Republican candidates and surrogates popped up on the Sunday news shows, gleeful about their prospects.

"I think the wind is at our back," Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul said on CNN's "State of the Union." He added that Republicans will "in all likelihood" win control of the Senate and added: "I think people are ready for new leadership."

Fueling the Republicans' optimism was a Register poll that showed Ernst leading Democrat Bruce Braley, 51% to 44% -- prompting pollster J. Ann Selzer to tell the newspaper that "this race looks like it's decided."

Hours before the poll's release, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid spelled out what a loss in the Hawkeye State would mean for Democrats.

"Iowa is critical. There's no other way to say it," Reid said Saturday in a conference call with the Progressive Change Campaign Committee.

"Joni Ernst would mean — coming to the United States Senate — that Mitch McConnell would be leader of the United States Senate, who agrees with her on everything," he said, according to Politico.

And it wasn't just Iowa that had good news for Republicans. A new set of NBC News/Marist polls unveiled Sunday morning gave Republicans boosts in three key Senate races -- including McConnell's in Kentucky, as well as Georgia, where Democrats had hoped to pickup a seat, and Louisiana, where Democratic Sen. Mary Landrieu is in a tough race for her political career.

Those incumbent Senate Democrats have spent the fall trying to distance themselves from President Barack Obama, whose floundering state-level approval ratings have been a drag for his party down the ticket as Republicans tie their opponents to the commander-in-chief every chance they get.

"This is really the last chance for America to pass judgment on the Obama administration and its policies," former GOP presidential nominee Mitt Romney said on "Fox News Sunday."

Democrats swung back on the Sunday shows as well to make the case that their early voting numbers suggest they'll hold onto some of those seats.

Democratic National Committee Chairwoman Debbie Wasserman Schultz said on ABC's "This Week" that her party's candidates will benefit from get-out-the-vote efforts targeting people who supported Obama in 2008 and 2012, but didn't vote in the 2010 midterm elections.

"We have a ground game that I know [RNC chairman] Reince [Priebus] would take ours over theirs any day of the week," she said.

She also pointed to Democratic surrogates -- including former President Bill Clinton and Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, Obama and Vice President Joe Biden -- and said they trounce GOP surrogates like New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, Paul and Texas Sen. Ted Cruz.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Priebus shot back that "our ground game is whipping their ground game."

"Look, if Americans who want change vote on Tuesday, the Democrats are going to have a terrible night. We're going to have a great night," he said. "And it's because Barack Obama's policies and Debbie Wasserman Schultz's policies and Harry Reid's policies are on the ballot."

The GOP needs to pick up six seats to win a Senate majority, and with several other victories all but guaranteed, losses in swing states like Iowa could seal Democrats' fate.

Senate Republican leader McConnell is ahead of Democratic challenger Alison Lundergan Grimes, 50% to 41%, according to an NBC News/Marist survey released Sunday. Democrats had hoped the contest would be among their few chances to pick off a GOP-held seat or at least divert resources from other key Senate races.

Another of those targets is Georgia, but the Republican nominee there, David Perdue, has jumped to a 48% to 44% lead over Democrat Michelle Nunn, the NBC News/Marist survey found.

That lead might not be enough to clench that race. To win in Georgia, candidates must earn more than 50% of the vote -- and if neither Perdue nor Nunn are able to reach that mark, they'd face each other again in a run-off election in January.

In Louisiana, Democratic Sen. Mary Landrieu is in trouble, too. The NBC News/Marist poll found her at 44% support, but in the state's "jungle primary" she's facing two Republicans -- Rep. Bill Cassidy and tea party candidate Rob Maness. If Landrieu falls short of 50%, she'd face just one of those Republicans in a December run-off -- and without conservatives' votes being split, she'd be the underdog.

The latest survey from the left-leaning Public Policy Polling this weekend also put McConnell ahead, at 50% to 42% for Grimes. PPP also gave Republican challenger Tom Cotton a hefty 49% to 41% lead in Arkansas over Democratic Sen. Mark Pryor.

The GOP is all but certain to win seats now held by retiring Democrats in Montana, South Dakota and West Virginia. They're also favored in Alaska, Arkansas and Louisiana -- states consistently won by Republican presidential candidates.

Wins in swing state targets like Iowa, Colorado, North Carolina and New Hampshire would offer a huge boost to Republicans' chances -- and would insulate the party from potential losses in Georgia and Kansas, where independent challenger Greg Orman hasn't said who he'd caucus with and therefore can't be considered a reliable supporter of either party.

Top Democrats, trying to narrow the gap, hit the trail Sunday, including Bill Clinton, who planned four stops in Arkansas -- where Pryor is endangered and long-time Clinton foil Asa Hutchinson is expected to win the governor's race.

Hillary Clinton, meanwhile, was in New Hampshire, where Sen. Jeanne Shaheen and Gov. Maggie Hassan are both facing stiff challenges in their re-election bids. She'll also attend the funeral for long-time Boston mayor Tom Menino.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obama, who's stayed away from most Senate races this year with the rare exception of a Saturday visit to Michigan on behalf of Democratic candidate Gary Peters, is in Connecticut Sunday to campaign for Gov. Dannel Malloy.

Republicans are flocking to Kansas, where Orman is threatening to unseat Republican Sen. Pat Roberts. The party's 1996 presidential nominee, Bob Dole, and former Sen. Rick Santorum are campaigning for Roberts on Sunday.

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, a likely 2016 White House contender, is swinging through South Carolina, Illinois, Maryland and Pennsylvania. Another potential presidential candidate, Texas Sen. Ted Cruz, is with Republican Dan Sullivan in Alaska, trying to help the Republican knock off first-term Democratic Sen. Mark Begich.

The Florida governor's race -- one of the nation's tightest -- is also getting the attention of big names in both parties. Biden is campaigning for the Democratic candidate, Charlie Crist, while former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush is making stops with Republican Gov. Rick Scott.

Bloomberg: "Clinton Allies Resist Calls to Jump Early Into 2016 Race"

By Jonathan Allen

November 2, 2014, 5:00 a.m. EST

Veteran Hillary Clinton advisers say she shouldn't accelerate her early 2015 timetable for announcing whether she'll run for president, despite calls from prominent backers of President Barack Obama for her to enter the race soon after Tuesday's congressional elections.

In interviews and e-mail exchanges, six political operatives closely aligned with Clinton offered up overlapping lists of reasons why they don't expect her to jump in this year.

She's more popular when she's not directly engaged in electoral politics, she's better off waiting for things to settle out after what's expected to be an ugly election night for Democrats, and she benefits from staying out of the fray while Republican hopefuls start to tear each other apart. Moreover, they note, Clinton said at an event in Mexico City in September she'll decide "probably after" Jan. 1, 2015 .

"Can't we get through the holidays first?" asked Paul Begala, the strategist who helped Bill Clinton win the presidency in 1992 and is a consultant for the Clinton-backing super-PAC Priorities USA. "Do we really need to deny her her first Christmas with her first granddaughter? Really?"

Clinton will spend November and December focused on philanthropy, policy matters and baby Charlotte Clinton Mezvinsky, said one Clinton adviser who like most of the others spoke on the condition of anonymity because

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton is not discussing her plans publicly. A Clinton spokesman declined to comment but pointed to her past statement about timing.

Clinton, Obama

The mostly behind-the-scenes fight revolves around the question of what's best for the party now and for trying to keep the White House in 2016. But it breaks down mostly along an old fault line: Clinton versus Obama.

In September, David Plouffe, the architect of Barack Obama's 2008 primary victory over Clinton, advised her in a private session that she should make her run official sooner rather than later, and mega-donor Steve Mostyn said "if Hillary is going to run, it would be best to do it quickly post-election," according to recent reports in Politico. The New York Times also reported last month that Clinton is getting pressure to rally the party right after the midterms by jumping into the presidential race.

Mostyn and his wife Amber gave $3 million to the super-PAC Priorities USA to help re-elect Obama in 2012, and they were backers of John Edwards in 2008 before Steve Mostyn began donating to Obama that year. They are now max-out donors -- the super-PAC limits contributions to $25,000 -- for the super-PAC Ready for Hillary, which has solicited support from contributors previously associated with Obama, as well as longtime Clinton contributors.

Denying Obvious

If it's not Clinton, other Democrats will have to start assembling their campaigns in earnest soon. And, if it is her, Plouffe said, according to Politico, it would be in her interests to stop denying the obvious. The campaign he ran against her in 2008 operated on the premise that voters didn't trust her, a view that could persist if Clinton is perceived to be pretending not to run while she appears to be doing just that.

Brian Wolff, a former executive director of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee who is a longtime supporter of both Clintons, said the former Secretary of State would do well to keep her own counsel, rather than listen to what Obama's strategists want.

"Those people advised him well in winning the presidency, but clearly haven't been consistent on advising him well since," Wolff said of Plouffe and other Obama strategists. "Hillary doesn't need their advice. She's got a great team around her."

Plouffe didn't respond to a request for comment.

Donor Conference

The juxtaposition of Clinton's plans with those who want her to announce sooner rather than later will be in sharp relief in Manhattan on November 21.

Ready for Hillary is convening a donor conference that day at the Sheraton Times Square, where the Clinton Global Initiative holds its annual summits. Clinton will hopscotch across Manhattan but she'll avoid the conference, according to two people familiar with her schedule.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Instead, she'll start her day in lower Manhattan at the Conrad Hotel, where she is slated to preside over a meeting of the Global Alliance for Clean Cookstoves, a public-private partnership initiated by longtime aide Kris Balderston when he worked for Clinton at the State Department. In the evening, Clinton will make her way to Columbus Circle for the New York Historical Society's History Makers gala, where she will be honored.

Campaign Finance

Even if she were a candidate now, campaign finance law would allow her to appear at the donor conference -- so long as she didn't directly solicit money.

Clinton has tried to avoid even the appearance of coordination with the three super-PACs already supporting her potential candidacy. While many of Clinton's closest fundraisers and advisers have been engaged with Ready for Hillary, her November 21 schedule speaks to her desire to let that operation continue to build without her official blessing while she prioritizes apolitical engagements.

One Democratic strategist with ties to the Clintons said she should let the situation settle down after the midterms rather than associating herself with losses that will otherwise be blamed on Obama. Besides, Clinton's fundraising and stump speeches for candidates destined to lose -- as well as those who will win -- are sure to buy her plenty of goodwill within Democratic circles.

War Chests

The adviser familiar with Clinton's planning said she will have to signal her intentions shortly after the new year but should keep a relatively small campaign operation and let the outside groups work on building their war chests, defending her and collecting the names of supporters in the early part of 2015. If she can stand back as Republicans begin jockeying for 2016, she'll benefit, this adviser said, adding that the challenge for Clinton will be to energize her support base without getting overexposed in 2015.

That has been a danger of her recent barnstorming for Democratic candidates, which, along with a bumpy book tour this summer, has hampered her national approval ratings. She can no longer expect that Americans will view her outside the context of electoral politics, say some Democrats on both sides of the question of when she should announce.

"She has been on the stump, which is going to knock down the apolitical luster she gained as Secretary of State and drag her poll numbers back to Earth," Begala said. "I suspect she thinks that's worth it to help all those good Democrats."

Another adviser, who worked with Clinton at State, said he thinks she'll wait as long as possible before making an announcement, provided that she plans to run. Those who are advising her otherwise, he said, are pursuing their own agendas.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: "Paul: 'People are ready for new leadership'"

By Bernie Becker

November 2, 2014, 9:27 a.m. EST

Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) said Sunday that American voters might be tiring of the sort of leadership provided by President Obama and Hillary Clinton.

Paul, appearing on CNN's "State of the Union," said he was disappointed that both the president and the former secretary of State had spent recent weeks attacking businesses on the campaign trail. Democrats have employed an economic populist message calling for a higher minimum wage and other policies.

"I think there's a fundamental philosophical debate," Paul said. "I think people are ready for new leadership."

Both Paul and Clinton are expected to run for president in 2016, though Paul told CNN that he hadn't made a final decision.

"I won't deny that it would help me, if I do decide to run for president, to have traveled to 32 states and to be part of helping the Republican team," Paul said.

The Kentucky Republican added that he expected the GOP to win the Senate majority on Tuesday, but that Republicans' inability to put away incumbents in red states merely underscored the close political divisions in the country.

Looking forward to 2016, Paul expanded on his comments that the GOP needs to change its brand so that historically Democratic voters like minorities or young people will give Republican policies to battle poverty a chance.

"Our brand is so broken that we can't even break through that wall that's out there," Paul said.

"Evolve, adapt or die. I think the party has to change," he added.

He also brushed aside the idea that he might have to distance himself from his father, former Rep. Ron Paul (R-Tex.). "It's never in my mind a contrast with my father," the younger Paul said.

Boston Herald: "Hillary to be among those paying respects"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Lindsay Kalter

November 2, 2014

Fellow lawmakers, family, friends and constituents of beloved former Mayor Thomas M. Menino will gather in Boston to pay their respects today and for a procession tomorrow that honors the mark he left on the city during his five-term tenure.

Among the dignitaries will be former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, who plans to pay her respects to the Menino family today at Faneuil Hall, Menino's press secretary Dot Joyce confirmed yesterday.

This morning, Mayor Martin J. Walsh will lead elected officials from City Hall to Faneuil Hall to open the wake for the city's longest-serving mayor, who will lie in state. Among those joining Walsh will be mayors from across Massachusetts, the city's city councilors, state reps and senators and members of the congressional delegation.

The public is invited to pay respects beginning at 10 a.m.

As he lies in state, Menino will be watched over by an honor guard of former staff members, including his police commissioners, school superintendents and Cabinet chiefs. Overnight, in a symbolic touch, members of the mayor's Office of Neighborhood Services will stand guard.

"While others were finished working for the day, Mayor Menino's ONS staff responded to fires in the middle of the night, delivered toys to children through the holiday season, and attended to the nitty gritty of neighborhood life that was so important to the Mayor," a release noted.

A public Mass for Menino will be held at 11:30 a.m. today at the Cathedral of the Holy Cross.

Tomorrow, a procession — dubbed by loyal staffers Menino's "last ride home" — will stop at 10 places of significance to the former mayor as it carries him from Faneuil Hall to Most Precious Blood Church in Hyde Park for a private funeral Mass.

Those who attend the services and procession will brave temperatures in the 40s, and potentially the season's first snow shower today. Parking restrictions will be in effect, and visitors are urged to take public transportation.

Calendar:

Sec. Clinton's upcoming appearances as reported online. Not an official schedule.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

· November 2 – Boston, MA: Sec. Clinton pays respects to Mayor Thomas Menino (Boston Herald)

· November 2 – NH: Sec. Clinton appears at a GOTV rally for Gov. Hassan and Sen. Shaheen (AP)

· November 21 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton presides over meeting of the Global Alliance for Clean Cookstoves (Bloomberg)

· November 21 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton is honored by the New York Historical Society (Bloomberg)

· December 1 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton keynotes a League of Conservation Voters dinner (Politico)

· December 4 – Boston, MA: Sec. Clinton speaks at the Massachusetts Conference for Women (MCFW)

Sent from my iPhone

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Nick Merrill" <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com>
To: jbenenson@bsgco.com
"Robby Mook" <robbymook2015@gmail.com>
Date: 2/6/2015 10:18:21 AM
Subject: Re: NYT & WSJ | Econ Stories
Attachments: Rothschild Econ Doc for Chozick.pdf

I'm passing along a document that came from one of our friends, written for and sent directly to Amy Chozick for this NYT piece she's working on. Gives you a sense of what we're all up against!

From: "jbenenson@bsgco.com " <jbenenson@bsgco.com >
Date: Monday, February 2, 2015 at 10:27 AM
To: Robby Mook <robbymook2015@gmail.com >
Cc: Mandy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com >, NSM <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com >, Cheryl Mills <cheryl.mills@gmail.com >, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com >, Jacob Sullivan <Jake.sullivan@gmail.com >, Philippe Reines <pir@hrcoffice.com >, Huma Abedin <huma@hrcoffice.com >, Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hrcoffice.com >, Jim Margolis <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com >, "john@algpolling.com " <john@algpolling.com >, "cmills@cdmillsgroup.com " <cmills@cdmillsgroup.com >, Jennifer Palmieri <jennifer.m.palmieri@gmail.com >, Kristina Schake <kristinakschake@gmail.com >
Subject: Re: NYT & WSJ | Econ Stories

Mandy is right. We keep emphasizing that the most significant pain point for people is that the belief the decked is stacked against them in favor of this at the top. And they're not wrong.

Sent from my iPhone

On Feb 2, 2015, at 10:07 AM, Robby Mook <robbymook2015@gmail.com > wrote:

> Agree
>
> On Feb 2, 2015, at 9:41 AM, Mandy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com > wrote:
>
> > I think this piece turned out well.
> >
> > But when we define our goals, we have to be clear that we are concerned with helping people who are getting crushed by rising costs and stagnant incomes, not that we're worried about offending high income groups (our donors). My guess is that this sentence will cause us some problems on the left.
> >
> > > One of Mrs. Clinton's broader goals is to develop ways to address economic anxiety without sounding like a combative populist or demonizing high-income groups, said a person familiar with her thinking.
> >
> > Mandy Grunwald
> > Grunwald Communications
> > 202 973-9400
> >
> > -----Original Message-----
> > From: Nick Merrill <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com >
> > To: Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com >; Cheryl Mills <cheryl.mills@gmail.com >
> > Cc: Mandy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com >; Robby Mook <robbymook2015@gmail.com >; John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com >; Jake Sullivan <jake.sullivan@gmail.com >; Philippe Reines <pir@hrcoffice.com >; Huma Abedin <huma@hrcoffice.com >; Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hrcoffice.com >; Jim Margolis <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com >; John Anzalone <john@algpolling.com >; Cheryl Mills <cmills@cdmillsgroup.com >; Jennifer Palmieri <jennifer.m.palmieri@gmail.com >; Kristina Schake <kristinakschake@gmail.com >
> > Sent: Sun, Feb 1, 2015 11:38 pm
> > Subject: Re: NYT & WSJ | Econ Stories
> >
> > http://www.wsj.com/articles/clinton-consults-experts-to-define-economic-pitch-1422837490

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton Consults to Define Economic Pitch

By Peter Nicholas

Hillary Clinton has been consulting with an array of economists and academics—including liberal Joseph Stiglitz, former Fed chairman Paul Volcker and new faces outside the traditional orbit of Democratic policy experts—as she prepares for a likely presidential campaign that would make sluggish wage growth and middle-class prosperity a central focus.

One of Mrs. Clinton's broader goals is to develop ways to address economic anxiety without sounding like a combative populist or demonizing high-income groups, said a person familiar with her thinking. It isn't clear whether that particular question has come up in the meetings she has been having with various policy experts.

She has been using the meetings to prepare herself for a possible campaign, ground herself in the issues and tease out fresh approaches to stubborn domestic and foreign policy problems, people familiar with the matter said.

As the former secretary of state keeps a low public profile ahead of announcing her near-certain candidacy, the meetings offer clues to which issues she believes merit attention and whose advice she values. Many, but not all, participants served in Bill Clinton 's administration; others are distinguished primarily by expertise in subjects that are certain to be front-and-center in the 2016 presidential race.

Some of the meetings had the feeling of a high-octane faculty symposium and lasted for hours, say people familiar with the sessions. Pen and pad in hand, Mrs. Clinton typically has gone around the room to ask for ideas, offering comments now and then and inviting participants to make suggestions down the road.

In December, Mrs. Clinton presided over a meeting at a midtown Manhattan hotel that focused on middle-class Americans feeling pinched by slow wage growth.

Among those attending: Mr. Volcker, the architect of the "Volcker Rule," a regulatory measure barring banks from making risky bets with their own money; Jonathan Cowan, co-founder of the centrist think tank Third Way, which has been critical of some of the populist rhetoric coming from the Democrats' liberal wing; and Alan Blinder, a Princeton professor and former Fed vice chairman and economics adviser to Mr. Clinton.

Also at the meeting, according to people familiar with it, were Robert Hormats, who worked in the State Department during Mrs. Clinton's tenure and was a former vice chairman of Goldman Sachs; Richard Ravitch, a former Democratic lieutenant governor in New York, who helped New York City avert bankruptcy during a fiscal crisis in the 1970s; and Teresa Ghilarducci, a labor economist and proponent of ideas to shore up Americans' retirement savings. The Clinton team has asked her to help evaluate various policy ideas.

The participants examined a range of ideas to boost economic security, such as tax cuts for the middle class, expanded access to prekindergarten education and new ways to pay for improvements to roads and tunnels, said people familiar with the session.

"One major focus of the meeting was the miserable recent performance of wages in general and middle-class wages in particular, and what if anything the government can do about that," said Mr. Blinder.

Bernard Schwartz, a longtime Democratic donor and contributor to the Clinton Foundation, was among those who helped arrange the meeting, said people familiar with the session. Mr. Schwartz is a former chairman of Loral Space & Communications Ltd. Mrs. Clinton also has consulted with Mr. Stiglitz, a former economic adviser to Bill Clinton and author of a book about the perils of economic inequality.

The policy interests of some participants point to the issues Mrs. Clinton is likely to prioritize, notably the financial pressures faced by middle-class families. Prospective Republican presidential candidates also are talking about shoring up the middle class and, in some cases, narrowing the wage gap in America—a sign that those topics will be flashpoints in the general election.

Mrs. Clinton is the overwhelming front-runner for the Democratic nomination, but some liberals would like to see her challenged by U.S. Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D., Mass.), a populist firebrand who has described the American economic system as "rigged" in favor of the wealthy. Ms. Warren has said she won't run. In targeting income inequality, Mrs. Clinton would address a substantive issue facing the country while also making inroads with Ms. Warren's liberal followers.

Mrs. Clinton also has held foreign policy meetings in New York and Washington. A New York meeting in the summer was a "tour" of global hot spots, among them the war in Syria and Russia's incursions into Ukraine, according to people familiar with what took place.

Mrs. Clinton asked for a diagnosis of the problem and a "strategic" view of how the U.S. should act, one person familiar with the meeting said.

Those who attended included Richard Haass, president of the Council on Foreign Relations, who worked under both Republican presidents George H.W. Bush and George W. Bush; David Rothkopf, author of a new book on foreign policy-making in the George W. Bush and Obama administrations; and Dennis Ross, a diplomat with many years of experience in the Middle East peace negotiations.

More informally, Mrs. Clinton has also spoken to trusted Democratic confidants about appointments to high-level positions in her campaign, should she decide to run.

A campaign apparatus is already taking shape. John Podesta, a senior adviser to President Barack Obama, is likely to become a senior adviser to the campaign, while two Obama campaign veterans, pollster Joel Benenson and media adviser Jim Margolis, are expected to take top positions on Mrs. Clinton's campaign team, people familiar with the matter said.

"She's casting a wide net, talking to a wide range of people on a wide range of specific topics" said Nick Merrill, a spokesman for Mrs. Clinton. "Make no mistake, if she runs, she will present solutions to our toughest challenges, she will take nothing for granted, and she will fight for every vote."

On Feb 1, 2015, at 6:54 PM, Nick Merrill < nmerrill@hrcoffice.com > wrote:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ran the quote past HRC and she asked (with no prompting) that "average" come out. So here's what I shipped off to Peter Nicholas at the Journal. AS for the NYT, looks like it won't run for a few days if not next Sunday, so will circle back on that as it develops.

Thanks again to all for the feedback.

Go Seahawks!

"Expanding opportunities for hardworking Americans so that families can get ahead has been a constant fight she has waged in every job she's held. You heard it from her last fall when she was campaigning for Democrats all over the country and repeatedly laid out the challenges many Americans still face as our economy makes gains. She's casting a wide net, talking to a wide range of people on a wide range of specific topics. There's no red X on a calendar somewhere, but make no mistake, if she runs, she will present solutions to our toughest challenges, she will take nothing for granted, and she will fight for every vote."

From: Joel Benenson < jbenenson@bsgco.com >
Date: Sunday, February 1, 2015 at 5:39 PM
To: Cheryl Mills < cheryl.mills@gmail.com >
Cc: NSM < nmerrill@hrcoffice.com >, Mandy Grunwald < gruncom@aol.com >, Robby Mook < robbymook2015@gmail.com>, John Podesta < john.podesta@gmail.com >, Jacob Sullivan < Jake.sullivan@gmail.com>, Philippe Reines < pir@hrcoffice.com >, Huma Abedin < huma@hrcoffice.com >, Dan Schwerin < dschwerin@hrcoffice.com >, Jim Margolis < Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com >, John Anzalone < john@algpolling.com>, Cheryl Mills < cmills@cdmillsgroup.com >, Jennifer Palmieri < jennifer.m.palmieri@gmail.com>, Kristina Schake < kristinakschake@gmail.com >
Subject: RE: NYT & WSJ | Econ Stories

Definitely

From: Cheryl Mills [mailto:cheryl.mills@gmail.com]
Sent: Sunday, February 01, 2015 5:35 PM
To: Joel Benenson
Cc: Nick Merrill; Mandy Grunwald; Robby Mook; John Podesta; Jake Sullivan; Philippe Reines; Huma Abedin; Dan Schwerin; Jim Margolis; John Anzalone; Cheryl Mills; Jennifer Palmieri; Kristina Schake
Subject: Re: NYT & WSJ | Econ Stories

can we test every day americans next time?

On Sun, Feb 1, 2015 at 5:27 PM, Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com > wrote:
When we tested deck is stacked against "average Americans, with too many breaks for those at the top" vs. Gov regs and rules hurging biz and stopping them from creating jobs – by 49-41 among all voters and 56-33 with our MOR (middle of the road voters) . I think it's how they see themselves in this environment, which remains their big pain point that she is fighting to fix.

For the moment it also creates a slight language difference with POTUS – not a big deal but a nuance.
Joel

From: Cheryl Mills [mailto:cheryl.mills@gmail.com]
Sent: Sunday, February 01, 2015 5:22 PM
To: Nick Merrill
Cc: Joel Benenson; Mandy Grunwald; Robby Mook; John Podesta; Jake Sullivan; Philippe Reines; Huma Abedin; Dan Schwerin; Jim Margolis; John Anzalone; Cheryl Mills; Jennifer Palmieri; Kristina Schake

Subject: Re: NYT & WSJ | Econ Stories

Looks good. I think you can take out average and still communicate you mean folks in middle with "hardworking" (who likes to be average?)

if average is important I might use everyday.

cdm

On Sun, Feb 1, 2015 at 4:36 PM, Nick Merrill <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com > wrote:
Great, thank you.

Robby to your point about letting her speak for herself, I¹ve been reminding people that they should be careful to acknowledge that this is part of a process. She laid out challenges that we face in the midterms, and now she¹s thinking through how we would address them should she run. Will reinforce that when I circle back with these guys today.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Here¹s the quote again incorporating peoples¹ thoughts. John Anzalone, I think Joel addressed what you were trying to get at so I left his edits as is, but let me know if you think we¹re missing anything. Otherwise will push this in the next little while. Thanks all.

"Expanding opportunities for average hardworking Americans so that they and their families can get ahead has been a constant fight she has waged in every job she's held. You heard it from her last fall when she was campaigning for Democrats all over the country and repeatedly laid out the challenges many Americans still face as our economy makes gains. She's casting a wide net, talking to a wide range of people on a range of specific topics. There's no red X on a calendar somewhere, but make no mistake, if she runs, she will present solutions to our toughest challenges, she will take nothing for granted, and she will fight for every vote."

On 2/1/15, 4:05 PM, "Joel Benenson" <jbenenson@bsgco.com > wrote:

>Yes.
>
>-----Original Message-----
>From: Mandy Grunwald [mailto:gruncom@aol.com]
>Sent: Sunday, February 01, 2015 4:05 PM
>To: Robby Mook
>Cc: Joel Benenson; Nick Merrill; John Podesta; Jake Sullivan; Philippe
>Reines; Cheryl Mills; Huma Abedin; Dan Schwerin; Jim Margolis; John
>Anzalone; Cheryl Mills; Jennifer Palmieri; Kristina Schake
>Subject: Re: NYT & WSJ | Econ Stories
>
>I like it too.
>
>There's a word missing toward the end. I assume it should say "...she >will present SOLUTIONS to our toughest challenges..."
>
>Thx
>
>Mandy Grunwald
>Grunwald Communications
>202 973-9400
>
>
>> On Feb 1, 2015, at 3:39 PM, Robby Mook <robbymook2015@gmail.com > wrote:
>>
>> Adding Jenn and Kristina
>> Joel I agree w your edits. In particular I want to avoid any >>expectations around how big or bold her ideas will be.
>> Nick I'm sure you're already doing this but I also would push hard on >>background that we can't judge a candidate who has yet to announce--give >>her a chance to speak for herself. I know that's impossible but worth >>trying to get them to acknowledge that she's not a candidate and this is >>all speculation.
>>
>>
>>> On Feb 1, 2015, at 3:14 PM, Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com > wrote:
>>>
>>> Thanks Nick.
>>>
>>> Going for a little more conversational here with this:
>>>
>>> "Expanding opportunities for average hardworking Americans so that

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

>>>they and their families can get ahead has been a constant fight she has >>>waged in every job she's held. You heard it from her last fall when >>>she was campaigning for Democrats all over the country and repeatedly >>>laid out the challenges many Americans still face as our economy makes >>>gains. She's casting a wide net, talking to a wide range of people on >>>a range of specific topics. There's no red X on a calendar somewhere, >>>but make no mistake, if she runs, she will present to our toughest >>>challenges and she will take nothing for granted and she will fight >>>for every vote."
>>>
>>> -----Original Message-----
>>> From: Nick Merrill [mailto:nmerrill@hrcoffice.com]
>>> Sent: Sunday, February 01, 2015 2:46 PM
>>> To: John Podesta; Jake Sullivan; Philippe Reines; Robby Mook; Cheryl
>>>Mills; Huma Abedin; Dan Schwerin; Jim Margolis; John Anzalone; Mandy
>>>Grunwald; Cheryl Mills; Joel Benenson
>>> Subject: NYT & WSJ | Econ Stories
>>>
>>> As I mentioned on our call on Thursday, both the WSJ and the NYT are >>>working on stories about how HRC might approach economic policy issues >>>as a candidate. Both will have a dose of personnel name-gaming, and >>>I've spoken to both to steer them towards progressive names, which they >>>seem to both have on their own.
>>>
>>> I want to give both stories something on the record that addresses the >>>core of the story, but also speaks some of the things we all felt >>>needed a little proactive addressing, like inevitability and timing.
>>>
>>> On the inevitability question, John I tried to stick to the language >>>you suggested, though I did take the liberty of striking the word
>>>"idiot."
>>>
>>> "Increasing access to opportunity and fighting for upward mobility has >>>been an uninterrupted pursuit of hers in every job she's held. You >>>heard it from her on the campaign trail last fall, where she laid out >>>the challenges we face. She's casting a wide net, talking to a wide >>>range of people on a range of specific topics. There's no red X on a >>>calendar somewhere, but make no mistake, if she runs, she will take >>>nothing for granted, she'll present bold ideas, and she will fight for >>>every vote."
>>>
>>> Feedback welcome, but I'd like to ship this later today.
>>>
>>> Nick

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Gregory Rosalsky" <grosalsky@progressivemediausa.org>
To: "Greg Rosalsky" <GRosalsky@progressivemediausa.org>
Date: 6/20/2008 3:08:13 PM
Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Evening 06/20/08

Main Topics: McCanada and Free Trade, McCain's Flip Flop on Domestic Oil Drilling, Immigration

Summary of Shift: Scott McClellan testified on Capital Hill today. He denied Bush knew about the White House effort to out Valerie Plame but could not say the same about Dick Cheney. John McCain was in Canada today pushing free trade. Barack Obama hit McCain for his 180 on offshore drilling. Obama released a new logo and is expected to have a joint event with Hillary Clinton next week. Michael Bloomberg defended Obama in front of a Jewish audience in Florida. Moveon.org is dropping its 527 operation at Obama's request. Obama aides said he raised $22 million in May. A Newsweek poll shows Obama up by 15 points nationally.

Highlights:
1) McCain touts free trade in Canada
a. CNN's Dana Bash covers McCain's "unusual" trip to Canada, Dobbs criticizes McCain's "pandering to business special interest groups"
b. Pat Buchanan: McCain's stance on NAFTA may cost him the election
c. Dobbs calls McCain "Mr. Free Trade", blasts Carly Fiorina on outsourcing
2) McFlip-Flop on domestic oil drilling
a. Fox News' Carl Cameron says McCain has been "inconsistent" on offshore drilling
b. Senator Hutchison defends McCain's offshore drilling plan, confirms McCain has inklings to flip flop on ANWR drilling too
3) McCain and immigration
a. Obama camp accuses McCain of flip-flopping on immigration
b. Dobbs criticizes McCain's "late night meeting" with Latino leaders on immigration reform
4) Jill Zuckman: Chuck Hagel's statement that he would "think about" accepting a VP invitation from Obama is an example of disunity among Republicans
5) "CBS Evening News": There is no such thing as clean coal

Clips:

Highlight #1
CNN's Dana Bash Covers McCain's "Unusual" Trip to Canada, Dobbs Blasts McCain's "Pandering to Business Special Interest Groups" (CNN 06/20/08 7:00pm)
LOU DOBBS: Senator McCain, pandering to business special interest groups, with his unqualified support for NAFTA. But the Senator didn't deliver his pro-Free Trade pitch in this country, where millions of jobs have been lost as a result of those agreements, instead he went to Canada to talk to their business elites [...]

BASH: John McCain's visit here to Canada was quite unusual. It was a campaign trip where the candidate insisted it wasn't about politics.
[...]
[Dana Bash asking McCain a question]
BASH: Correct me if I am wrong, this is a trip that was put together and executed by your presidential campaign not your Senate office, so how is it not political?

MCCAIN: Because we didn't feel it was appropriate for the taxpayers, while I am the nominee of my party, to pay for a trip that would have accrued to the cost of the taxpayers.
[...]
BASH: Now, McCain often points to his extensive experience traveling around the world as a Senator, it's one of the reasons he thinks voters should elect him. He said today he is going to continue traveling abroad during the presidential campaign, but if his trip Canada was any example it's a pretty tough task for a candidate to travel anywhere during the heat of the campaingn and insist it's not about politics.

Pat Buchanan: McCain's Stance on NAFTA May Cost Him the Election (MSNBC 06/20/08 06:15pm)
RACHEL MADDOW: McCain was in Canada today talking up our relations with our northerly neighbor. […] After his appearance McCain released this pretty harsh statement:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[Visual of Quote]

"For Months, Barack Obama said that he would 'make sure that we renegotiate' NAFTA, demanding unilateral changes and threatened to unilaterally withdraw if he did not get his way. Barack Obama knew better. America has not had a protectionist president since Herbert Hoover, but Barack Obama held his position anyway to further his cynical political purposes in the primary campaign. Now he claims: 'I'm not a big believer in doing things unilaterally.' Barack Obama should know words matter – especially in a campaign based on rhetoric rather than a record of accomplishment."

MADDOW: […] Who's vote is McCain going after with the pro-NAFTA argument?

JOAN WALSH: […] I'm not sure this helps McCain either. I think that McCain is the one who's really looking like the flip flopper especially with this crazy flip flop on offshore oil drilling.

[…]

PAT BUCHANAN: I don't know what McCain is doing! For Heaven's sake. It's a 50 to 40 issue negative nationally. You take Ohio, Michigan, Pennsylvania they think NAFTA is a four-letter word. And he's going up to Canada praising the trade deal when we've lost 3 and a half manufacturing jobs under Bush alone. If I were Obama I would hammer him on this. Frankly he's putting at risk his election with this nonsense.

[…]

Dobbs Calls McCain "Mr. Free Trade", Blasts Carly Fiorina on Outsourcing (CNN 06/20/08 7:10pm)
LOU DOBBS: Well Senator McCain is certainly working to earn the title "Mr. Free Trade." In addition to his enthusiastic support for NAFTA the Senator is also voted for all sorts of trade deals. Voting for trade deals with Oman, Singapore, Chile, Vietnam, Central American nations, and African nations. And just in case there's any doubt, back in December Senator McCain said he would seek deals with more countries, saying, "I'm the biggest free-marketer and free-trader you will ever see." Senator McCain's position on free trade and it's impact on working people in this country and our middle class shouldn't be much of a surprise when we consider just who's giving the Senator economic advice. None other than Carly Fiorina, the former CEO of HP. She presided over the thousands of layoffs at HP and was ultimately fired herself. But not before she recieved a $21 million dollar severance package and more than a half million dollars in mortgage assistance. And it was Carly Fiorina who defended outsourcing of American middle class jobs to cheap overseas labor markets by saying, "There is no job that is America's god-given right anymore."

Highlight #2
Fox News' Carl Cameron Says McCain Has Been "Inconsistent" on Offshore Drilling (FNC 06/20/08 6:00pm)
JIM ANGLE: They say what goes around comes around. And today the two presidential candidates proved how fast that can happen. Slamming each other for basically the same thing, changing positions on economic issues [...]

CARL CAMERON: Dueling economic events. Barack Obama with Democratic Governors in Chicago ramped up his opposition to John McCain's proposed expansion of offshore oil drilling while John McCain in Canada met with business leaders, intensified his attacks on Obama as an isolationist, threatening to pull out of the North American Free Trade Agreement.

JOHN MCCAIN: Demanding unilateral changes and threatening to abrogate an agreement that has increased trade and prosperity is nothing more than retreating behind protectionist walls. [...]

CAMERON: Both candidates portray themselves as honest genuine politicians. But the truth is McCain has been inconsistent on offshore drilling and Obama's been inconsistent on trade. Perhaps a better way to put it is that they are both true politicians therefore apt to shift their positions.

Senator Hutchison Defends McCain's Offshore Drilling Plan, Confirms McCain Has Inklings to Flip Flop on ANWR Drilling Too (FNC 06/20/08 5:00pm)
MEGYN KELLY: Senator Hutchison Barack Obama recently, or just said today, that John McCain's plan for offshore drilling, something that many Americans seem to favor according to the polls, "makes no sense at all." Because he says "it wouldn't give us any appreciable savings until 2030." So what do you say about that?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

KAY BAILEY HUTCHISON: Well, what makes no sense at all is that we twiddle our thumbs while people are paying higher and higher gasoline prices, higher prices for food in the food stores, that's what doesn't make sense. In fact, I think it would have an immediate impact in this respect, we know that the futures, speculators, are driving prices up because it's very clear that Congress is doing nothing to produce more energy and therefore bigger supply for the greater demand. And so prices are going to keep going up. So the speculators are making prices go up when the fundamentals aren't there.

KELLY: Ok, there's a little bit of disagreement on that speculation issue because some people say no, speculators are in fact keeping the cost down. But I want to really get your reaction to the how much savings people would feel in the short term if we were to do offshore drilling. If we were to begin it right away.

HUTCHISON: What I'm trying to say is that I think the speculators would see that prices are going to start going down over the next five or six years because it will take a little while to be drilling but if we have the speculators out of the market, it will bring prices down very quickly. And that is the good news about John McCain's proposal. That we're going to have production, the states will be able to get royalties from it, it is an incentive for the states to do it. He is also proposing more nuclear power, which would bring down the cost of electricity. All of these proposals that he's making are going to produce more energy. The problem with the Democrats is they don't have any new energy in their plans.

KELLY: Ok, let me ask you about ANWR. It's something that John McCain has long opposed for an awful long time but now he seems to be opening the door, indicating he just might change his position on that. Some of his critics say he may just be pandering to the voters. What do you say to that?

HUTCHISON: Well, I think, when you start looking at where ANWR is and where the part that you would drill is, it's a very small section, it's a grassy tundra, 70 degrees below zero, and the people who have been advertisin g against it just haven't been there. John McCain has been there. He has said that he wouldn't do it. But I think he's beginning to see that if we have an overall goal in our country of energy independence for America, which means national security and economic security for our country in the next 10 or 15 years, that we're gonna have to do some things environmentally safe, protecting our environment, but nevertheless producing more while we are getting the other kinds of renewables and types of energy that we know will be in the future. But are not in abundance now.

Highlight #3

Obama Camp Accuses McCain of Flip-Flopping on Immigration (CNN 06/18/08 4:35pm)

WOLF BLITZER: Barack Obama […] electing to declined the federal funds for the general election has prompted charges of flip-flopping. […] Obama's camp says John McCain has contradictions of his own. […] The McCain campaign basically says there are two Barack Obamas on these various issues, bill.

BILL SCHNEIDER: Well […]the Obama campaign says back at you. They say there are two McCains on the issue of illegal immigration. On Wednesday night, John McCain held a private meeting with more than 150 Chicago-area Hispanic leaders. According to the Associated Press, several people who were at the meeting said McCain assured them he would push for comprehensive immigration reform if he's elected president. In 2007, McCain's sponsorship of comprehensive immigration reform angered conservatives and very nearly derailed his presidential campaign. At a republican debate in January, McCain was asked whether he would still vote for his original measure.

[clip of McCain]

JOHN MCCAIN: no, i would not. Because we know what the situation is today. People want the borders secured first.

SCHNEIDER: McCain's critics were reassured.

[video clip of Mike Antonovich]

SCHNIEDER: after the chicago meeting, the Obama campaign's communications director charged McCain with trying to have it both ways.

[audio clip and text from Robert Gibbs]

SCHNEIDER: right now, McCain is getting just over a third of the Hispanic vote nationwide. Last time Bush got about 40%. McCain's got to keep conservatives happy while making sure his Hispanic support doesn't collapse. How is he going to do it? His campaign says he will be addressing several major Hispanic groups in the next month.

SCHNEIDER: We asked the McCain campaign for a […] They [Tucker Bounds] said, "Despite the wildly misinformed opinions of Barack Obama's spokesman, John McCain fundamentally believes that we need to secure our border, and then move forward to address the need for immigration reform in a respectful and compassionate manner that recognizes we are all God's children. That's his position yesterday, today, and every other day, before all the groups he meets with."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Dobbs Criticizes McCain's "Late Night Meeting" with Latino Leaders on Immigration Reform (CNN 06/20/08 7:20pm)
LOU DOBBS: Senator McCain is trying to have it both ways on the issue of illegal immigration as well. He's doing it by pandering of course to ethnocentric interest groups. He assured in Chicago Hispanic leaders at a late night meeting that he would help push through legislation giving immigration reform a top priority, giving Amnesty to millions of illegal aliens [...]

Highlight #4
Chuck Hagel's Statement that He Would "Think About" Accepting a VP Invitation from Obama is an Example of Disunity Among Republicans (MSNBC 06/20/08 05:57pm)
DAVID SCHUSTER: An associated press interview this afternoon with Republican Senator Chuck Hagel of Nebraska. […] He was asked about if he was offered to be Barack Obama's running mate, and he said if it would occur I'd have to think about it. You'd have to consider it. It's the only thing you could do. Why wouldn't you?

JILL ZUCKMAN: That is so devastating. It's just so devastating. He was one of Senator McCain's closest friends in the Senate. They are both Vietnam veterans, they're both highly decorated. The war has just split them apart. And you can see how estranged they are by the fact that he would say something like this. And on top of that Senator Hagel's wife has made a contribution to Senator Obama's presidential campaign. It looks like the whole Hagel family might be moving in the Obama direction. I think its kind of a sad thing to see that friendship broken apart.

[…]

MICHELLE BERNARD: The more important story about Chuck Hagel is really what we see happening in the Republican Party. We've been talking about this for several months. There is disunity in the Republican Party. We've heard so many people say that the party as a whole will come and everyone will rally around John McCain, but we still don't see that happening. And John McCain has a lot of work to do, not only within his base but also outside his base. And I think Chuck Hagel's statement today really exemplifies just how much work he has to do within the Republican Party. If he wants to win all the states that George Bush won in 2004, Chuck Hagel's statement today made it even more difficult for him. He's got a lot of work ahead of him to do.

[…]

Highlight #5
"CBS Evening News": There is No Such Thing as Clean Coal (CBS 06/20/08 06:50pm)
WYATT ANDREWS: Coal is by far the dirtiest way America makes electric energy but you wouldn't know that from this ad campaign funded by industry. A campaign promising a future of clean coal. And its not just industry, the Presidential candidates are also pushing clean coal.

[…]

MCCAIN: "We can have clean coal technology."

[…]

JAMES HANSON: there is no such thing as clean coal today.

ANDREWS: James Hanson, NASA's expert on global warming says all coal plants, even Tampa Electric, still emit millions of tons of carbon dioxide, the most threatening greenhouse gas.

HANSON: There's no coal plant that captures the carbon dioxide and that's the main long-term pollutant.

ANDREWS: […] America's efforts to sequester carbon have stalled. The department of energy planned to fund a plant […] but pulled its funding when the price became to high. […] Florida's governor Charlie Crist even helped pull the plug on two clean coal plants because he says without a carbon solution quit clean coal.

CHARLIE CRIST: Until that time comes we want to develop more solar more nuclear more wind.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

ANDREWS: […] Until the federal government funds the research on carbon dioxide, America's dependence on coal is in long-term trouble. […]

--
Gregory E. Rosalsky
Progressive Media USA
202-609-7691 (office)
707-484-3796 (cell)
GRosalsky@progressivemediausa.org
--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "t r u t h o u t" <messenger@truthout.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 1/23/2015 7:10:21 AM
Subject: First Amendment Implications of Journalist's Five-Year Sentence

View Recent Newsletters

Tell a friend about Truthout!

Friday, January 23 2015

truthout

Donate Today!

Truthout is a 501(c)3 nonprofit organization; donations are tax deductible.

At Truthout, we are in this for one reason, and one reason alone: you. We work hard, every single day, to make you more informed than you were the day before. In turn we rely on you, too. Will you support our mission by making a tax-deductible donation today?

DONATE NOW!

Click here to donate.

(Truthout is a 501(c)(3) nonprofit. EIN: 20-0031641)

You can also donate by check, made payable to:
Truthout, P.O. Box 276414, Sacramento, CA 95827
(Please include your email address on your check.)

Or call in your donation:
213.489.1971

The Chilling First Amendment Implications of Journalist Barrett Brown's Five-Year Sentence

Candice Bernd, Truthout: Concluding a case which has lasted more than two years, and which has frightening implications for journalists and researchers of all stripes, a federal judge in Dallas sentenced journalist and transparency activist Barrett Brown to 63 months in prison on Thursday.

Read the Article

The New "Oppressed Peoples' Movement": Can the Tide of Resistance Continue?

James Kilgore, Truthout: What are some of the possibilities and tensions in the mass uprisings and new social movements that have

BuzzFlash

The BuzzFlash commentary for Truthout will return soon.

US House Passes Stringent Abortion Restrictions
Read the Article at Salon

Joni Ernst's Family Received Nearly $500,000 in Farm Subsidies
Read the Article at Raw Story

Obama Says Treating Drug Use as a Criminal Problem Is "Counterproductive"
Read the Article at The Huffington Post

Advocates Call for State Investigation Into Shooting of Black Man in Traffic Stop Read the Article at The Guardian

US Militarization and the "War on Terror" Create a Tinderbox

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

appeared in the wake of the murder of Michael Brown?
Read the Article

Sundarbans Oil Spill: An Urgent Wake-Up Call for the Bangladeshi Government

Iara Lee, Truthout: The catastrophic oil spill in Sundarbans tidal mangrove forest has mobilized activists to work even harder to prevent construction of a planned coal plant nearby.
Read the Article

Is Reinvestment a Good Strategy for the Fossil Fuel Divestment Movement?

Carlos Davidson and Cynthia Kaufman, Truthout: Fossil fuel divestment is emerging as a powerful strategy in the fight against climate change. It is crucial that activists focus on the political impact of divestment, and not get distracted by the economics.
Read the Article

Sen. Bernie Sanders | Roads and Bridges Need $1 Trillion. It Is Time to Rebuild the US

Bernie Sanders, Campaign for America's Future: "For many years we have underfunded the maintenance of our nation's physical infrastructure. That has to change. It is time to rebuild America. I will soon be introducing legislation for a $1 trillion investment, over five years, to modernize our country's physical infrastructure."
Read the Article

Dissing DuVernay and the Lessons of Selma

Sikivu Hutchinson, The Feminist Wire: The lessons of Selma itself are relevant to DuVernay's "omission" from the Academy Awards nomination for Best Director. True to Frederick Douglass' assertion that "power concedes nothing without demand," the snub of DuVernay is criminal, but of course, not unprecedented.
Read the Article

The 2015 State of the Union Address: A Major Omission

David Krieger, Nuclear Age Peace Foundation: In President Obama's 2015 State of the Union Address, the only mention of nuclear weapons was in relation to the agreement the Obama administration is seeking to negotiate with Iran.
Read the Article

Do the United States' Hungry Children Matter?

Mariana Chilton, Moyers & Company: This is supposed to be the year when the US ends its child hunger crisis. That was the promise then-president-elect Obama made during his first campaign. At that time some 12.4 million children lived in homes that self-reported as food insecure. Today there are 15.8 million such children.
Read the Article

The 1% Are Bad for Your Health - It's Time to Tax Them More

Kate Pickett, The Conversation: The evidence that large income differences have damaging health and social consequences is very strong, and in many countries inequality is increasing. Narrowing the gap is vital to improve our health and well-being.
Read the Article

"American Propagander": Six Ways Paul Reickhoff's American Sniper Column Deeply Bothers This US Veteran of Violence

Read the Article at BuzzFlash

Anti-Muslim Incidents Soar in France

Read the Article at The Local France

King Dies, New Tyrannical Leader for Saudi Arabia

Read the Article at USA TODAY

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Emily Yates, Emily Yates Does Everything: "When I first laid eyes on the guest column Paul Rieckhoff wrote about American Sniper, I thought I'd read the byline wrong. This has to have been written by the Department of Defense, I thought."

Read the Article

Richard D. Wolff | Economic Update: Spinning Out of Control

Richard D. Wolff, Truthout: This episode provides updates on Obama's State of the Union speech, the European Central Bank pumping up the money supply to stimulate Europe, forgiving Greece's debts and housing extremes in the US. We also respond to questions on global wealth inequality and Switzerland's currency maneuvers. Finally, we interview Dr. Harriet Fraad on the US economy's disastrous impact on children.

Listen to the Audio Segment

Support Truthout with a tax-deductible donation

Please add messenger@truthout.org to ensure you receive our messages

Truthout is a proud member of the New spaper Guild/CWA, Local 36047

Subscribe | Unsubscribe

Privacy Policy

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Amitabh Desai" <adesai@clintonfoundation.org>
To: "Bruce Lindsey" <blindsey@clintonfoundation.org>
john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 4/18/2012 10:58:51 AM
Subject: RE: Clinton Foundation Letter

Will do - I just left a message for Helen Clark's chief of staff. Hard to know if they'll tip off Ira but I'll try to do it delicately. Sincerely, Ami

-----Original Message-----
From: Bruce Lindsey
Sent: Wednesday, April 18, 2012 2:28 PM
To: Amitabh Desai; john.podesta@gmail.com
Cc: Laura Graham; Doug Band - PC; Justin Cooper - PC
Subject: Re: Clinton Foundation Letter

I agree with your unhappiness, but not your approach. I think you should talk with someone at UNDP and try to find out how much they have committed and if it is a grant or matching funds, what the scope of the project is, what the deliverables are, etc. Or you can wait and try to get those details from Darien.

The problem is that President Clinton apparently told Ira he supported this in concept. With Ira, if you give him an inch he will take a mile.

Bruce

----- Original Message -----
From: Amitabh Desai
To: Bruce Lindsey; john.podesta@gmail.com <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Cc: Laura Graham; Doug Band - PC; Justin Cooper - PC
Sent: Wed Apr 18 12:47:19 2012
Subject: FW: Clinton Foundation Letter

In reading the attached letter from the Barbados PM, I'm a bit inclined to recommend WJC writing back and delicately saying something like: this is an issue of shared importance and I'd like to be helpful but am not sure yet exactly what a project could or should look like (and how much it would cost and over what timeline, with what specific deliverables) and I therefore would welcome input from you (the PM) and other leaders in the region before this is discussed publicly, and I'd like you to speak with my staff (listing us and not Ira).

And/or we can call the UN Secretary General's folks and say their UNDP/energy folks should deal with us and not Ira.

The above seems like a nuclear option but at this point unless we do something, it seems like Ira is going to proceed on something that we don't really have a handle on, and it could be good, but on the other hand - and given precedence with CHAI and CCI - it could spend (a lot of) money without us knowing specifically what WJC and the world will get in terms of results (on a timeline) and/or us being able to control how WJC's name / legacy are being impacted / used in relation to this project.

Maybe I am being petty but just wanted to raise this option with you, and I'm happy to proceed as you wish. Tackling islands is something we all believe in but it's hard to know what Ira's plan is and hard to trust it since we seem to learn of things after the fact, as evidenced by us learning of this "launch" via the email below today. Thanks.

-----Original Message-----
From: Ira Magaziner
Sent: Wednesday, April 18, 2012 9:29 AM
To: Terry Krinvic
Cc: Amitabh Desai
Subject: FW: Clinton Foundation Letter

Terry:

Attached is a letter that will come to President Clinton from the Prime Minister of Barbados inviting him to speak on May 8 at a high level conference of energy Ministers from all of the Island nations in the world. The conference is being sponsored by UNDP and we will be participating. I will be there.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

UNDP is providing funds to the Clinton Foundation for our work on clean energy and we will be launching our work at this conference.

Obviously, if President Clinton can speak, that would be great. If he cannot attend but could provide a video, that would also be very helpful.

I am sorry for the short notice, but the conference has come together rather quickly.

Thanks

Ira

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Margolis, Jim" <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com>
To: "Jake Sullivan" <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com>
"Joel Benenson" <jbenenson@bsgco.com>
"John Anzalone" <john@algpolling.com>
Date: 11/19/2015 7:04:49 AM
Subject: Re: Remarks on ISIS

I'm glad you're bumping that up a bit. You cover regional responsibility, but this is a big flash point for voters.

From: Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com >
Date: Thursday, November 19, 2015 at 8:14 AM
To: Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com >, John Anzalone <john@algpolling.com >
Cc: Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com >, Speech Drafts <speechdrafts@hillaryclinton.com >, Speech Book <speechbook@hillaryclinton.com >
Subject: RE: Remarks on ISIS

We can throw some more shade at the Arabs, though. Dan and I have an idea.

From:speechdrafts@hillaryclinton.com [mailto:speechdrafts@hillaryclinton.com] On Behalf Of Joel Benenson
Sent: Thursday, November 19, 2015 8:00 AM
To: John Anzalone <john@algpolling.com >
Cc: Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com >; Speech Drafts <speechdrafts@hillaryclinton.com >; Speech Book <speechbook@hillaryclinton.com>
Subject: Re: Remarks on ISIS

I thought there is a fair amount in the fist of her three action points focused on what other countries have to do. And there is a sound bite on it in that section as well

Sent from my iPhone

On Nov 19, 2015, at 1:42 PM, John Anzalone <john@algpolling.com > wrote:

> I am clearly not a ISIS policy guy so take my comments with a grain of salt but what I thought was missing from a layman's perspective was a strong call for Middle Eastern countries to join the fight with an immediate commitment of money and ground troops (all I saw was Jordan mentioned). We have "work with our Arab partners" but I think this speech should lay out a list of countries that should be supplying troops, planes, equipment, training, intelligence and money. Call them out and call them out big. That is where the American people are. They are frustrated that this is a Middle Eastern problem being fought by America and Europe. We spent $500 million training Syrian rebels and got nothing and we defended Iraq for a decade and trained their army to see them all defect. Re-asserting the need for just training and the Suni's to rejoin the fight is not enough. She needs to outline exactly who in the Middle East should be on the battlefield with us. That is missing. She needs to call them out.
>
> The speech mentions new "no fly zones" in Syria. How does that square with Russia's current bombing campaign? Shouldn't she call out the Russians for making the situation worse? They would make her appear strong. Take on Putin here. There is language about "ending Assad's rule" which seems to defy political reality. Why go there? It is not going to happen in the algebra of defeating ISIS so why don't we stick to the task at hand.
>
> On Syrian refugees, is it enough to call just for vigilant screening? Shouldn't we call for a thorough review of how we screen to make sure the procedures are actually up to snuff? I think both the CIA/FBI heads have testified and acknowledged that our screening may not deter terrorists. And I don't think the american people feel like the screening process is adequate.
>
> All in all I worry that if we don't really call out specifically by name the Middle Eastern countries that need to join the fight in a significant way that there will not seem like much new here. This seems ore like a review of the diagnosis, a stroll down memory lane and a call for more bombing and intelligence gathering.
>
> John Anzalone
> Partner
> Anzalone Liszt Grove Research
> (o) 334.387.3121

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Website | Twitter | LinkedIn | Facebook

From: <speechdrafts@hillaryclinton.com > on behalf of Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com >
Date: Thursday, November 19, 2015 at 2:53 AM
To: Speech Drafts <speechdrafts@hillaryclinton.com >, Speech Book <speechbook@hillaryclinton.com >
Subject: Remarks on ISIS

I wanted to be sure everyone got this latest draft of our ISIS speech. I think HRC will make edits in the morning, but this is where we stand now. Please let me know by 9am if you have any major concerns.
Thanks
Dan

This email is intended only for the named addressee. It may contain information that is confidential/private, legally privileged, or copyright-protected, and you should handle it accordingly. If you are not the intended recipient, you do not have legal rights to retain, copy, or distribute this email or its contents, and should promptly delete the email and all electronic copies in your system; do not retain copies in any media. If you have received this email in error, please notify the sender promptly. Thank you.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Josh Schwerin" <jschwerin@hillaryclinton.com>
To: hrcrapid <HRCrapid@googlegroups.com>
Date: 4/15/2015 12:40:19 PM
Subject: WSJ: Clinton Foundation to Keep Foreign Donors

Clinton Foundation to Keep Foreign Donors

ByJames V. Grimaldi

April 15, 2015 7:29 p.m. ET http://www.wsj.com/articles/clinton-foundation-to-keep-foreign-donors-1429140593

The board of the Bill, Hillary and Chelsea Clinton Foundation has decided to continue accepting donations from foreign governments, primarily from six countries, even though Hillary Clinton is running for president, a summary of the new policy to be released Thursday shows.

The rules would permit donations from Australia, Canada, Germany, the Netherlands, Norway and the U.K.—countries that support or have supported Clinton Foundation programs on health, poverty and climate change, according to the summary.

That means other nations would be prohibited from making large donations to the foundation. But those governments would be allowed to participate in the Clinton Global Initiative, a subsidiary of the foundation where companies, nonprofit groups and government officials work on solutions to global problems.

Ministers from any government would be allowed to attend meetings and appear on panels at the group's meetings and their governments would be allowed to pay attendance fees of $20,000.

The new policy, which was designed to address growing concern that the donations would present a conflict of interest for a Hillary Clinton presidency, all but ensures that Mrs. Clinton's links to the charity will be a feature of the emerging presidential campaign.

The campaign did not immediately respond to a request for comment. Last month, when asked about foreign contributions, Mrs. Clinton said she was "very proud of the work the foundation does" and noted that there are "hundreds of thousands of people who support the work of the foundation."

The limits are meant to strike a balance between protecting existing programs while shielding the foundation and Mrs. Clinton from charges that foreign governments are buying influence through their donations, a person familiar with the foundation's deliberations said. The foundation will begin to release donor names quarterly starting in July. Previously the names were released annually.

"By implementing this new, even stronger and more transparent policy, the Clinton Foundation is reinforcing its commitment to accountability while protecting programs that are improving the lives of millions of people around the world," said Craig Minassian, spokesman for the Clinton Foundation.

As a direct result of the restrictions, officials will stop holding events around the world, beyond an event planned for Morocco in early May, which was considered too close to cancel. That event, the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton Global Initiative Middle East & Africa conference in Marrakesh, has been funded in part by a $1 million gift from a Moroccan-government owned phosphate-export company, OCP. A Clinton Global Initiative-Mediterranean meeting focused on the economy and scheduled for June in Athens is being canceled.

The six countries on the approved donor list are less controversial and politically sensitive than some who gave in 2014, such as Saudi Arabia, Oman and the United Arab Emirates. Still, even the allowed countries would pose issues for a Hillary Clinton administration. Canada's Foreign Department has made Clinton Foundation donations and is also leading the charge to win approval for the Keystone XL pipeline. Germany and the U.K. are two of the five countries, including the U.S., that drafted an antinuclear accord with Iran. The U.S. and Germany also differ on how best to respond to Russia's aggression in Ukraine.

The foundation plan will likely renew the foreign-gift controversy just as Mrs. Clinton's presidential campaign launched this week. Earlier this year, Mrs. Clinton came under fire from both Democrats and Republicans when The Wall Street Journal reported that foreign donations to the foundation had resumed last year after a virtual halt when she served as secretary of state from 2009-13.

Republican National Committee Chairman Reince Priebus said the new policy comes weeks after the Clinton Health Access Initiative, a charity affiliated with the Clinton Foundation, didn't disclose millions of dollars in donations from countries including Australia, Canada, Ireland, Norway and the U.K. "The Clinton Foundation receiving foreign government funding as Hillary Clinton campaigns to be president should set off alarm bells," Mr. Priebus said. "The fact that the Clinton Foundation previously failed to disclose foreign government donations should cast even greater doubt on any new policy."

The new rules for the Clinton Health Access Initiative, an affiliated but separate charity, were expected to be somewhat less restrictive than the new Clinton Foundation rules, and hadn't been completed on Wednesday. Officials said the missing disclosure was an oversight.

Ethics experts had recommended the foundation forego all foreign donations. Robert Walker, the former nonpartisan chief counsel and staff director of the Senate and House ethics committees, said the foundation likely will need to go further than its current plan.

"The only effective step would be for the foundation to cease accepting donations from foreign governments," Mr. Walker said. "It is inevitable that the foundation will, sooner rather than later, decide to forego accepting donations from foreign governments, except for those pledges already on approved multiyear cycles."

Under the new rules, approved countries would be allowed to renew multiyear pledges, or make additional contributions to new programs, an official said. Such funding would support economic development or climate-focused work of the Clinton Climate Initiative, the Clinton Development Initiative, which focuses on Malawi, Rwanda and Tanzania, and the Clinton Giustra Enterprise Partnership.

One example is a $12 million, three-year contract the Australian Department of Environment has with the Clinton Climate Initiative to create a system to monitor emissions in Kenya. The Australian pledge began in 2013 and continues until next year.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Obama administration in 2009 wanted to avoid conflicts of interest with former President Bill Clinton raising money from foreign governments that also would be working with Mrs. Clinton as secretary of state. At the time, the Clinton Foundation agreed to stop raising new money from foreign governments, with a few exceptions for multiyear pledges for health and other initiatives.

Under the agreement with the Obama transition office, the Clinton Foundation agreed to separate the Clinton Foundation and the Clinton Global Initiative and to begin disclosing all donors to the foundation. The two groups won't be divided under the new policy.

The terms also spelled out that Mr. Clinton wouldn't solicit funds for CGI and wouldn't send letters seeking contributions from potential CGI sponsors. Pledges and donations from foreign governments and government-owned companies were to be presented to the State Department for review by an ethics officer.

Documents released publicly so far under a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit filed by conservative watchdog group Judicial Watch show that the ethics officer wasn't asked to approve any new foreign donations beyond continuing pledges. The State ethics reviews are still being released.

Write to James V. Grimaldi at james.grimaldi@wsj.com

--
Josh Schwerin
Spokesperson
Hillary for America
@Josh Schwerin

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Peter Brodnitz" <pbrodnitz@bsgco.com>
To: "Mandy Grunwald" <gruncom@aol.com>
"Jeff Liszt" <jeff@algpolling.com>
Date: 2/5/2015 1:20:32 PM
Subject: Re: Bush Detroit Econ speech

Agree – the test will be when he gets to offering solutions. That's where he will probably be on weaker ground.

From: Mandy Grunwald <GrunCom@aol.com >
Date: Thursday, February 5, 2015 at 2:36 PM
To: Jeff Liszt <jeff@algpolling.com >
Cc: Jim Margolis <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com >, Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com >, John Anzalone <john@algpolling.com >, Peter Brodnitz <pbrodnitz@bsgco.com >, "Robby Mook (robbymook2015@gmail.com)" <robbymook2015@gmail.com >, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com >, Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hrcoffice.com >, Nick Merrill <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com >, Huma Abedin <huma@hrcoffice.com >, Cheryl Mills <cheryl.mills@gmail.com >, Philippe Reines <pir@hrcoffice.com >, Anson Kaye <anson.kaye@gmmb.com >, John Rimel <john.rimel@gmmb.com >
Subject: Re: Bush Detroit Econ speech

Very little in this speech that HRC wouldn't say....

Mandy Grunwald
Grunwald Communications
202 973-9400

On Feb 5, 2015, at 2:33 PM, Jeff Liszt <jeff@algpolling.com > wrote:

> It's a scary new wrapping paper for trickle down. Very much in synch with what we're hearing in groups.
>
> Then again maybe not so new:
>
> "We will extend the promise of prosperity to every forgotten corner of this country. To every man and woman, a chance to succeed. To every child, a chance to learn. To every family, a chance to live with dignity and hope." --GWB
>
> _____
> Jeffrey LISZT
> Anzalone Liszt Grove
> 928 Broadway #405
> New York, NY 10010
> www.algpolling.com
> +1 (646) 368 1947
> Skype: jbliszt
> Twitter: @anzaloneliszt @psephologist

From: Margolis, Jim [Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com]
Sent: Thursday, February 05, 2015 12:01 PM
To: Joel Benenson; John Anzalone; Jeff Liszt; Peter Brodnitz; Mandy Grunwald; Robby Mook; John Podesta; Dan Schwerin; Nick Merrill; Huma Abedin; Cheryl Mills; Philippe Reines
Cc: Anson Kaye; John Rimel; Jim Margolis
Subject: Bush Detroit Econ speech

If you haven't read Jeb's Detroit speech, take a look.
He's in a fertile zone, GOP primary electorate notwithstanding.

For those of you who've had to put up with my interest exploring 'opportunity' framing, he has some of the elements here.

Here's the full text of Jeb Bush's "right to rise" speech in Detroit

Updated by Vox Staff on February 5, 2015, 9:20 a.m. ET

Tweet (26) Share (4) +
Tweet Share

Bill Pugliano/Getty Images
Follow Vox!

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By signing up, you agree to our terms.

Thank you. I am delighted to be here. You are part of a great story - the revival of a city that means so much to all Americans. In these past few years, when confronted with grave challenges, you have seized the opportunity to reform the city you love.

And you have begun to repair the damage done by decades of mismanagement and empty promises.

I want to congratulate Governor Rick Snyder for his leadership. I want to acknowledge Secretary of State Ruth Johnson, and Attorney General Bill Schuette. And Mayor Mike Duggan for his determination to serve the city of his birth.

I want to recognize as well the hard work of Kevyn Orr, who I am proud to say is a son of Florida.

And finally, I want to recognize all those who were involved in making difficult and often painful decisions. Your work is not complete. But your efforts have captured the attention of our nation. Because across the U.S., we are asking ourselves the same questions:

How do we recapture the prosperity and opportunity that once defined cities like Detroit?

How do we restore America's faith in the moral promise of our great nation that any child born today can reach further than their parents?

This is an urgent issue: Far too many Americans live on the edge of economic ruin.And many more feel like they're struck in place, working longer and harder, even as they're losing ground.

Tens of millions of Americans no longer see a clear path to rise above their challenges. Something is holding them back. Not a lack of ambition. Not a lack of hope. Not because they are lazy or see themselves as victims.

Something else. Something is an artificial weight on their shoulders.

Today and in the coming weeks, I will address this critical issue.

And I will offer a new vision. A plan of action that is different than what we have been hearing in Washington D.C. It is a vision rooted in conservative principles and tethered to our shared belief in opportunity and the unknown possibilities of a nation given the freedom to act, to create, to dream and to rise.

We see that belief every day in action.

In oil and gas fields once given up for dry we are now assuring America's energy security. In hospitals, we are extending life and beating back once untreatable diseases. In charter schools, we are connecting students to their potential. In labs and hacker spaces, invention comes from every corner of society and the world still comes to America to learn how to create and innovate.

People know this country can be more than it is today. And that each one of us can, and must, be a part of it.

But they know this as well: We have a lot of work to do.

Today, Americans across the country are frustrated. They see only a small portion of the population riding the economy's up escalator... It's true enough that we've seen some recent and welcome good news on the economy.

But it's very little, and it's come very late.

Six years after the recession ended, median incomes are down, households are, on average, poorer ... and millions of people have given up looking for a job altogether. Roughly two out of three American households live paycheck to paycheck. Any unexpected expense can push them into financial ruin. We have a record number of Americans on food stamps and living in poverty.

The recovery has been everywhere but in the family paychecks. The American Dream has become a mirage for far too many. So the central question we face here in Detroit and across America is this: Can we restore that dream -- that moral promise -- that each generation can do better?

If we can't answer that question, no tax, no new welfare program, will save our system or our way of life. Because America's moral promise isn't broken when someone is wealthy. It's broken when achieving success is far beyond our imagination.

America is a place where, as Lincoln dreamed, any person may look forward and hope to be a hired laborer this year...and the next, work for himself... and finally, to hire men to work for him!

America, though discouraged, has not given up on the dream of Lincoln.

The dream of Lincoln is alive at 5 a.m. at a bus depot in a distant suburb or in an inner city as workers get to jobs in hotels and restaurants and hospitals. The dream is alive in the breath of a construction worker running cable under a city street in the bitter night air.

The dream is alive in the college student driving an Uber car part-time to graduate debt-free.

Lincoln's dream is alive every day nand at every moment when people choose to buy a home, start a business, enroll in school, save for the future. They know such commitments aren't easy and don't pay off right away. But they're worth doing. If Americans are working harder than ever earning less than they once did, our government and our leaders should step up, offer a plan, fix what's wrong - or they should step aside.

Let's ask how we got to this point. Let's start in Detroit.

Because in a sense, the troubles Detroit faces are an echo of the troubles facing Washington, D.C.

Decades of big government policies, petty politics, impossible-to-meet pension promises, chronic mismanagement and broken services — combined with a massive loss of jobs and competitiveness in the auto industry — drove tens of thousands of people from this city and this region.

For example: Detroit under the previous administration was so proud of shutting down businesses that hadn't paid their licenses and fees, they bragged about it in press releases. The city threatened nearly 900 businesses with closure and followed through on nearly 400 businesses, shutting them down.

Many of these were small businesses run out of homes and alley-facing garages, run by people who just wanted to take that first step up the economic ladder.

One of those business owners, Derek Little, had a simple way to describe his frustration: I'm running a legit business... They could be doing something better.

And while the city was shutting down people who were trying to build a business ...it couldn't even do its job correctly: The city was losing money writing parking tickets.

Of course, on Amtrak they lose money on the snack car. They literally have a captive audience.

But government inefficiency isn't just irritating. It's instructive. If the government can't collect parking fines, or sell snacks on a train, why would government know how to enable every citizen to move up in life?

That's why I launched the Right to Rise PAC. So that someone would speak for people who don't want to wait for the government to deliver prosperity. They want to earn it themselves. Government isn't the only issue here. There is far more at work. But in a sense, fixing government policy is the easiest problem to solve. And it's the one most responsive to the demands of voters.

So, I am getting involved in politics again, because that's where the work has to begin. The opportunity gap is the defining issue of our time.

More Americans are stuck at their income levels than ever before. It's very hard for people to go from the bottom rungs of the economy to the top. Or even to the middle.

This should alarm you. It alarmed me. The problem starts when we fear the one thing that can help unlock the economic status quo: The freedom to compete and work as a team to build great things.

Competition is messy. But it's essential. We've all seen the battles: The taxicab companies fight against web-enabled car services. The restaurants fight against the food trucks. The brick-and-mortar retailers fight against the Internet companies.

I'm not here to take sides. And I don't think government should either. Because when government protects one business against another, or tilts the field of competition, there is a clear loser: Anyone who wants to create something as a team. Anyone who wants to innovate and shake things up. Anyone who wants more choices and better service. And we know that in the end, standing against competition and dynamism is a losing battle.

In 1955, 60 years ago, the Fortune 500 list first appeared. Of the companies on that list, fully 88% don't even exist today or have fallen away. Today's Fortune 500 will be replaced by new companies that are just starting today.

This is hard for some people to accept. Because entrenched interests do not like giving up what they have. That's why they fear small competitors who have nothing to lose. You know the stories: The president of Michigan Savings Bank imparted some wisdom to the young lawyer for a small start-up company: The horse, the bank president said,'is here to stay, but the automobile is only a fad.'

The small start-up that lawyer represented... was the Ford Motor Company.We can laugh about it now because Ford and the other innovators of Detroit had the economic freedom to compete and to prove the doubters wrong.

Our nation has always valued such economic freedom because in economic freedom, each citizen has the power to propel themselves forward and upward.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This really isn't understood in Washington D.C. And you can see why: It's a company town.

And the company is government. It's all they know.

For several years now, they have been recklessly degrading the value of work, the incentive to work, and the rewards of work.

We have seen them cut the definition of a full-time job from 40 to 30 hours, slashing the ability of paycheck earners to make ends meet. We have seen them create welfare programs and tax rules that punish people with lost benefits and higher taxes for moving up those first few rungs of the economic ladder.

Instead of a safety net to cushion our occasional falls, they have built a spider web that traps people in perpetual dependence. We have seen them waive the rules that helped so many people escape welfare.

The progressive and liberal mindset believes that to every problem there is a Washington D.C. solution. But that instinct doesn't solve any problem, other than the problem of how to keep Washington's regional economy well-lubricated.

And the cost is enormous!

Let's say you're a hard-working middle-class family. You work hard. You pay your mortgage on time. As President Obama likes to say: You play by the rules.

But for President Obama, one of the rules is this: He reserves the right to change the rules.

Just last month, he thought it was a good idea to tax 529 college savings plans. Remember: 529s were created to be tax-free ways to save for college. Millions of people started them for their kids and grandkids. So it's no surprise people hated the president's idea. And he dropped it. But it was an instructive lesson in the liberal and progressive mindset. Saving for college is the responsible thing to do. But instead of embracing 529s, the liberals moved to tax them.

It's frustrating. But it shows you how they think.

And if you want to know how they act, ask Sharon DeLay. Sharon founded a recruiting company in Westerville, Ohio. Here's what she said: It's as if the politicians and regulators in Washington want me to fail - and spend all their time thinking up new ways to ensure that I do ...You either want me to be the engine of the economy or you don't!

Here's a message for Sharon and millions like her: There's a better way.Let'sine this path first by the core principles of a Right to Rise society because once we do that, the policies, the laws and the way forward will be much clearer.

Let's start with the first principle: When it comes to ensuring opportunity and a chance at success, the most important factor isn't government. It's a committed family.

Social scientists across the ideological spectrum agree on this: If you want to predict whether someone will graduate from school, go to college and move forward in life, just find out one thing: Were they raised in a loving household by two parents? If you didn't, you can overcome it, but it's very hard. If you did, you have a built-in advantage in life.

The evidence is overwhelming. Every child has a greater chance at opportunity when they are raised by loving, caring and supportive parents and a committed family. That isn't the work of government. But it's critical that governmental leaders recognize that and support it.

A second principle: Growth above all. A growing economy, whether here in Detroit or throughout this country is the difference between poverty and prosperity for millions. If you want to close the opportunity gap, grow the economy. This is a principle that concentrates the mind.

If a law or a rule doesn't contribute to growth, why do it? If a law subtracts from growth, why are we discussing it? And for what it's worth, I don't think the US should settle for anything less than 4% growth a year — which is about twice our current average. At that rate, the middle class will thrive again.

And in the coming months, I intend to detail how we can get there, with a mix of smart policies and reforms to tap our resources and capacity to innovate, whether in energy, manufacturing, health care or technology.

Third: The right to rise depends on a government that makes it easier to work than not work.

That means fewer laws restricting the labor market and reducing the penalties that come with moving up from the lowest rungs of the ladder.

Fourth: To address the income gap, let's close the opportunity gap, and that starts with doing everything we can to give every child, from every neighborhood, a great education. This won't happen overnight — trust me, I know. But I also know it works. And it takes every tool we have.

Accountability for teachers and school administrators, assessment of student learning, high standards, and choices. These key elements of school reform work and we have the results to prove it.

Finally, let's embrace reform everywhere, especially in our government. Let's start with the simple principle of who holds the power. I say give Washington less and give states and local governments more.

We make multi-billion dollar infrastructure decisions based on a labor law written in 1921. President Obama proposes making rules on the Internet using laws written in the 1930s. We regulate global airlines using laws written for railroads. Our immigration laws were written a half-century ago.

Governmental policy seems frozen, incapable and fearful of change. It is in the way. And we deserve better than this.

If we don't transform ourselves to meet new challenges and seize new opportunities, we know what happens next. Look around this city. In its history there is a warning to all of us.

A century ago, Detroit was America's great innovation hub. The Silicon Valley of its age.

It was bigger than Chicago. It was the nation's wealthiest city in 1960.

Detroit put the world on wheels and created the jobs that lifted millions of Americans into the middle class.

This city was the arsenal of Democracy and delivered the arms needed to defend freedom across two oceans.

Detroit promised prosperity and it delivered.

Sons of sharecroppers coming up from the South, farmhands from the Upper Midwest, immigrants who spoke Polish, Yiddish, Greek and Arabic.

Their children settled. They prospered. And some of their grandchildren are in this room today.

And now, you are rebuilding this city. I know you will be that great city again. Because Americans by nature work and strive to succeed.

It is already happening.

In the Madison Building, not far from here, new companies are rising. One of them, iRule, is led by two young men, one born in Russia, the other in Israel. They left secure jobs as automotive engineers to start their business in 2009. At the very bottom of the recession. Here's what one of them, Itai ben Gal said: 'We know Detroit has its baggage, but we believe we're part of the solution.'

Three years later, they have 21 employees, including Itai's father, who is the CFO.

And this activity is happening downtown, in an area once ignored.

Another Detroit entrepreneur grew up in the suburbs. He rarely came downtown as a child. But today, he works here. He lives here. This is what he said: 'We see the city for what it can be... not for what it was.'

That's how we should see everything. Not just Detroit.But in all of America.

I know some in the media think conservatives don't care about the cities.

But they are wrong. We believe that every American and in every community has a right to pursue happiness. They have a right to rise.

So I say: Let's go where our ideas can matter most. Where the failures of liberal government are most obvious. Let's deliver real conservative success.

And you know what will happen?

We'll create a whole lot of new conservatives.

I know, because I've lived it.

I come from Miami, another city that faced the same struggles as Detroit.

In my city, the schools were failing, opportunity was scarce and for too many, simply being born in the wrong neighborhood meant the American Dream was cruelly out of reach.

I joined with my friend, Willard Fair, a courageous leader in the civil rights movement.

We decided that the right to rise, was also a civil right. So we went to work to change education in Florida.

While there's much more to do, we saw lives changed and hope restored.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

You can do it, here in Detroit. We can do it, across America.

Because this morning, 320 million Americans got up ... and they are on 320 million different paths of life.

It's our goal to see them succeed.

And it's our responsibility to do everything possible to help them.

Because by their success, they will not only build prosperity for themselves. They will renew the promise of this nation when everyone, has the right to rise.

Those are the stakes. That's why we're here. Please join me in this great cause.

Thank you and may God bless you, and may God bless America.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: john.podesta@gmail.com
To: "Denis Mcdonough" <dmcdonough@barackobama.com>
"James B. Steinberg" <djsberg@gmail.com>
"Mark Lippert" <mlippert@barackobama.com>
Date: 10/23/2008 10:50:56 AM
Subject: Re: Dennis Ross

Do you know content? If inconsistent with BO positions we should ask for a different byline. He has plenty of other things he can put behind his name. If it sounds like what you would say if asked, let it go.

Sent via BlackBerry from T-Mobile

From: "Denis McDonough" <dmcdonough@barackobama.com>
Date: Thu, 23 Oct 2008 08:39:00 -0500
To: James B. Steinberg<djsberg@gmail.com>; John Podesta<john.podesta@gmail.com>; Mark Lippert<mlippert@barackobama.com>
Subject: Dennis Ross

Fellas –

Dennis was asked to write an article about transition for Sunday's Outlook, and he did it. He says that he argues that this transition cannot be "business as usual" and there cannot be a lull in efforts to stop Iran's nuclear program.

He is identified in the byline as someone who gives advice to BO.

I would have preferred Dennis not write this or at least not be publicly identified as one of our advisers, but we are where we are. If you all have serious heartburn, please let me know and I will go back at Dennis.

Thanks,
DM

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Milia Fisher" <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 5/1/2015 4:17:36 AM
Subject: Re: TWEETS 5/1

Great- will wait to send these until the reaction to Mosby announcement subsides. Twitter is on fire with the story right now.

On Fri, May 1, 2015 at 11:11 AM, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com > wrote:

> Ok
>
> On May 1, 2015 7:25 AM, "Milia Fisher" <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:
>
> Note: my new goal is to send a second round of Tweets in the PM to respond to campaign developments throughout the day.
>
> TWEETS 5/1
>
> New study: ice-loss in Antarctica increased 6 bil tons/year each year from 2003 to 2014. Cap melting faster than ever. tp://bit.ly/1JegM3y (140)
>
> If you can't keep track of Schweizer's fabrications, distortions in "Clinton Cash" @MediaMatters can help: http://bit.ly/1GCbj3A (137)
>
> RETWEETS 5/1
>
> Suggestion from KLC:
>
>
>
>
> --
> Milia Fisher
> Special Assistant to the Chair
> Hillary for America
> mfisher@hillaryclinton.com
> o: 646.854.1198 c: 858.395.1741

--
Milia Fisher
Special Assistant to the Chair
Hillary for America
mfisher@hillaryclinton.com
o: 646.854.1198 c: 858.395.1741

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Ryan Duncan" <ryan@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: "Big Campaign" <bigcampaign@googlegroups.com>
Date: 7/8/2008 7:49:55 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Morning 07/08/08

Main Topics: Maliki's Proposal for Troop Withdrawal, McCain on Immigration, Economy, Iran, Earmarks

Summary of Shift: It was a busy day for McCain today, as there was a major push by both McCain and his surrogates talking about his economic and immigration policies. In his interviews McCain addressed such issues as his plan to balance the budget by 2013, the Nogales earmarks, social security changes, offshore drilling, the gas tax holiday, the war in Iraq, Maliki's proposal for troop withdrawal, Clinton's POW remarks, his staff shakeups, Israel's offensive against Iran, Iran's nuclear weapon ambitions, immigration, and border security. Other McCain coverage focused around Clinton's comments on his POW status and how POW's can go insane and get angry sometimes, McCain's poor speaking skills and teleprompter use, and his campaign disarray over the staff shakeups. Non-McCain headlines focused on the California wildfires, Alex Rodriguez's and Cristy Brinkley's divorces, Bush's G8 Summit visit, and summer travel pains.

Highlights:
1. MSNBC: McCain Talks Recession, Maliki's Request for Troop Withdrawal, War with Iran, Economy, and Balancing the Budget
2. CNN: Testy exchange between McCain and Roberts regarding a Balance Budget and Nogales Earmark
3. FNC: McCain Downplays Staff Shake Up, Attacks Obama on Taxes, Iraq
4. MSNBC: McCain Campaign Shake-up Disarray Examined
5. MSNBC: McCain's Poor Teleprompter Use and Speaking Ability Criticized
6. MSNBC: McCain's Changing Positions on Immigration and Border Security Scrutinized
7. CNN: Yellin Describes McCain's Replacement of the Maverick Brand with that of a GWB Republican
8. FNC: VFF Chairman defends "issue advocacy ads," effects of 527's are pondered
9. Local DC-4-NBC: Local News Highlights McCain's Economic Plans as Same As Bush
10. NBC: The Today Show Discusses McCain's Economic Plan Differences From Obama
11. ABC: 5 minute Fluff Story on Cindy McCain's Life (No Clip)

Clips:

Highlight #1
McCain Talks Recession, Maliki's Request for Troop Withdrawal, War with Iran, Economy, and Balancing the Budget
(MSNBC, 07/08/08, 8:37am)
JOE SCARBOROUGH: Let's bring it right now to republican presumptive nominee Senator John McCain. Senator, thanks for being with us. […] I must say that we saw your town hall meeting yesterday and there is a woman in the crowd there that sounded a good bit, like my mother. Let's take a listen.

[Video of lady ranting about taxes]

SCARBOROUGH: Senator, how much did you pay her?

JOHN MCCAIN: Did you see the crowd reaction to her? […] But she's right. Americans don't want their taxes increased. They want their taxes kept low and they want us to stop the out of control spending. They want an energy policy that works and I hope that Mr. Pickens, will examine my energy policy because what was just said was basically what I've been saying as well. And the town hall meetings are the best part of the campaigning and I love every minute of them.

SCARBOROUGH: You know, yesterday, you have this lady talking to you, sounded a lot like a libertarian. Speaking of libertarians, Bob Barr is jumping in the race now. Some polls are showing that he's taking 5, 6, 7 percentage points away from you in states. What would you say to Bob Barr about splitting the conservative/libertarian vote?

MCCAIN: Well, welcome, I look forward to his campaign.

SCARBOROUGH: I don't know if I'd say welcome, he's taking points from you.

MCCAIN: Come on in the race, it's fine. I'm confident that at the end of the day that the republicans and democrats and independence and libertarians and vegetarians will vote for me. I got a lot of work to do. I'm the underdog and we are going to go across the country doing the kind of things you watched yesterday. And I'm confident we are going to win. But I have no illusions about the size of the challenge we face, and that's why I'm working so hard.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SCARBOROUGH: Senator, CNN had a poll come out yesterday asking Americans whether they thought we were in a recession or not. 75% of Americans said that we were. 25% said we were not. Do you believe that America is in a recession right now?

MCCAIN: I would imagine that technically there is some question amongst economists about that but the fact is Americans are hurting, they are hurting badly. You know because I've seen you talk about it, Joe and Pat and Andrea, that 80 some percent of the American people think the country is on the wrong rack. Approval ratings of congress, I saw one poll, 12 percent, the lowest in 40 years they've been taking these polls. And meanwhile, what's the answer? Go out on Fourth of July recess without passing a housing bill. I mean, look, Americans are fed up, and I understand it. And, so, if we are technically in a recession or not, I would imagine that we are, but the major thing is Americans are hurting and Americans don't like it and they think the country is in the wrong direction.

ANDREA MITCHELL: Senator, yesterday you presented your economic plan and in your written plan, you proposed balancing the budget by 2013, the end of your first term and in you also talk about privatizing social security, making another run at that. In your actual speech, you didn't mention balancing the budget. Critics have said you didn't propose any way to balance the budget to get from here to there.

MCCAIN: Oh, I sure do, Andrea, I propose a very strong restraint of spending. We are going to keep taxes low. We are going to create jobs all over America through green technology and nuclear power plants, and clean coal technology.

MITCHELL: And you think you can really balance the budget by 2013?

MCCAIN: Of course we can. I believe in America. I believe in entrepreneurship. I believe in innovation. I believe in keeping taxes low. I believe in investment, and I believe in America and I know we can do it. But we have to restrain spending. Look, it's not taxes, it's spending. Spending got completely out of control. We increased the size of government by some 40 percent. I fought against that tooth and nail. Earmarking and pork barrel spending became an epidemic, and it bred corruption. So of course we can. Of course we can. America's best days are ahead of us, not behind us.

PAT BUCHANAN: Senator, Admiral Mullins, the chairman of the joint chiefs came back from Israel saying a third front in the middle east, in other words, a war with Iran would be extremely stressful for U.S. forces. And the American class carrier has moved out of the gulf. However, the Israelis have clearly planned, they had a simulated run, 100 planes flying towards Greece. What is your position with regard to Israel unilaterally striking the nuclear plants in Iran because they seem far more concerned that the Iranian's are closer to a nuclear weapon than we do?

MCCAIN: Well, Israeli's are concerned. We are concerned. Our European friends are concerned. Sarkozy has been, President Sarkozy of France has been very outspoken on this as long, along with others. We need to impose the most rigorous sanctions on Iran and try to improve their behavior. I don't know, I keep reading and hearing in the public media of these different situations or contingencies. Look, I know that the Israelis are facing a nation that says they are dedicated to quote, wiping them off of map. I understand that they could view that as a serious threat. I believe we could modify Iranian behavior. I believe we can put the breaks on their obvious movement towards acquisition of nuclear weapons, which would destabilize the entire Middle East. Wouldn't just affect Israel, it would effect the entire Middle East. But I also have to tell you that all of us, all of us American's are committed to never seeing a second holocaust.

BUCHANAN: Senator, let me follow up. What is your attitude about, and suppose the Israelis say look, we can't wait, we have got to strike. That would of course start a war in which the United States might have to end. What should the United States say to the Israelis? You have a yellow light to go ahead? You have a green light. Or don't do this because this will start a third war, which we are not prepared to fight. What would you say to the Israelis?

MCCAIN: I can't deal in those kinds of hypotheticals. I don't know what the Israeli plans are, I don't know what the situation is as far as what they plan on doing. I can assure the Israelis and the world that we will join together and impose the most stringent sanctions that we possibly can on Iran. And to do everything we can to dissuade them from the path that they are embarked on. So I can't, I can't answer to you hypotheticals that I have no details of nor heard anything about to tell you the truth.

SCARBOROUGH: come on, senator, we hear that all the time. We deal with hypotheticals. I'm joking. Andrea has a question though about the stories that are on the newspaper today.

MITCHELL: Iraqi Prime Minister Maliki raising the idea for the first time ever of an American withdrawal, a timetable for withdrawal as part of his new agreement that is being negotiated to extend the U.S. commitment once the U.N. mandate ends. What about the Iraqi's now talking about the very kind of set time for withdrawal that you have suggested in this political campaign is not a good idea?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MCCAIN: the Iraqi's have made it very clear, including the meetings I had with the president and foreign minister of Iraq that it is based on conditions on ground. That's what I've always said. I've always said we will come home with honor and with victory and not through a set timetable. The same media outlets by the way were saying two weeks ago that Maliki said there would be no status of forces agreement. Look, he is a politician. He is a leader of a country that is finally coming together. The fact is that we and the Iraqis will deal in what is in the national security interests of both countries. And there is though no reason to assume that the Iraqis aren't going to act in what they perceive is their national interest. I believe we will enact in ours and I believe we will come home. We will withdraw. But the fragile, the victory that we have achieved so far is fragile and has to be dictated by events and the situation on the ground. Al-Qaeda's is back on their heels, they're not defeated.

SCARBOROUGH: You know Senator, before we go, the "New York Times" talking about Barack Obama's plan. He is going to be a rock star in Denver. 75,000 people. Willie and I think you should put us in charge of how you combat this. We were thinking maybe you'd dress in an Elvis uniform. You got one of those rocket-propelled backpacks; you have to do something dramatic to counteract this, right?

MCCAIN: well, I think, maybe, you remember it was the fall, Ali, I've forgotten the fight that, Evander Holyfield. No Evander Holyfield, where the guy, yeah, Tyson/Holyfield where the guy parachuted in. and hit the ring ropes. I just thought of that, maybe I could do that only not hit the ropes, just land and do that. Listen, I'm sure that senator Obama will give a great speech. He's a great, he's very eloquent and he's motivated many, many millions of people. I respect him and admire him. There are just stark differences and I think the American people will make a judgment at the end of the day on who is best to keep America prosperous and safe. And I think I can prevail there.

SCARBOROUGH: Willie, sounds like we may be out of a job before it started. Good idea while it lasted.

Highlight #2

Testy exchange between McCain and Roberts regarding a Balance Budget and Nogales Earmark (CNN 07/08/08 8:11am)

JOHN ROBERTS: Senator McCain says he wants to balance the budget by the year 2013. With President Bush's tax cuts and McCain's proposed cuts is a balanced budget even possible? Senator McCain is here now to answer those questions...

ROBERTS: So I checked with the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities a non-partisan organization yesterday. They project that by extending the President's tax cuts which you want to do, and adding in the tax cuts you are proposing the deficit for the year 2013 would be somewhere around 439 to 445 billion dollars. So I think it is a fair question to ask how would you get that number down to zero?

JOHN MCCAIN: Well, first I suggest you check in with other organizations but the fact is that there is a whole lot of economist including Nobel laureates that agree with my plan we are going to restrain spending we are going to have the economy grow again, increase revenues. Its not the problem, the problem is that spending got completely out of control we grew government by some 40 percent since the great society the spending got out of control. We restrain spending, we keep peoples taxes low we create jobs. 700,000 jobs by building new nuclear power plants. 20,000 new jobs by coal gasification so that we have clean coal technologies. New automotive technologies, and we will balance the budget. The same outfit said that we could never balance the budget in the past, we certainly have. It is spending that is out of control, my friend.

ROBERTS: Actually, I also checked with the congressional budget office

MCCAIN: Oh good

ROBERTS: and the Center for Budget and Policy Priorities numbers were more conservative, they were lower then the CBO's numbers, CBO's numbers are higher. but the number MCCAIN: Again, again they are static numbers. Not saying that revenues will increase with a strong economy and with low taxes. That is the difference. I respectfully disagree.

ROBERTS: Senator you can't get over the fact that extending the Bush tax cuts you want to do and adding in your tax cuts do take the deficit number, well actually you go from a 70 billion dollar surplus to 445 billion dollar deficit so it is those tax cuts.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

JOHN MCCAIN: You can't seem to get over the fact that it is spending that is out of control and you restrain spending and also you can't get over the fact that historically when you raise peoples taxes guess what revenues go down. Every time we have cut capitol gains taxes there has been an increase in revenues. So I am glad to have this discussion with you and obviously you disagree but the facts are that when you keep taxes low when you restrain spending as we did in 1982 when Ronald Reagan came to office then the economy grows. We have created 46 million new jobs since 1982 because of lower taxes but the spending got out of control and that obviously caused the deficit which then caused us to have to borrow money from China etc etc etc. And that's our problem that we have today is spending and not keeping taxes low and stimulating the economy.

ROBERTS: Senator, with respect I am not disagreeing with you I am just laying out some facts that some organizations, some analytical organizations have put out there. And the amount of money that you need to save MCCAIN: Actually what you are laying out is a very different opinion I have a large number of economist who agree with my point of view and I hope you will consult with them as well. I am sure you will John.

ROBERTS: Its just that I think some voters are legitimately asking the questions that the amount of money that you need to save to get down to zero is the total amount of the non-security discretionary budget now that the federal government operates on.

MCCAIN: Actually what I am hearing from voters right now is that they are worried about keeping their jobs, they want to keep their taxes low, they are worried about health care. They are worried about staying in their home. And they want us to figure, that is what I am hearing from voters all over America as I do town hall meetings everywhere. That is what I am hearing from them and that is what I am going to address. And we can do it through growing our economy and creating new jobs.

ROBERTS: Senator, I am sure you are also hearing from them about social security. Because you say that part of this plan if you are going to balance the budget is to reform social security. You have talked about the idea of private accounts as President Bush tried to get through and couldn't. What else would you do to reform social security?

MCCAIN: I would sit down with Democrats and Republicans the way Ronald Reagan and Tip O'Neal did in 1983. And they said, Okay, we have everything on the table here lets come to an agreement. The approval rating of congress right now is 12 percent last time I saw. I know how to work across the aisle I have done it with democrats and I have done it for many many years and we will sit down across the table with the backing of the American people.

ROBERTS: But do you have any ideas of what you can do?

MCCAIN: On the privatization of accounts, which you have just mentioned, I would like to respond to that. I want young workers to be able to, if they chose, to take part of their own money, which is their taxes and put it into an account which has their name on it. Now, that is a voluntary thing for younger people, would not effect any present day retirees or the system as necessary. So lets describe it for what it is. They pay their taxes and right now their taxes are going to pay the retirement of present day retirees. That is why it is broken that is why we can fix it. We can do it together Republicans and Democrats alike.

ROBERTS: Senator, on this issue of earmarks that you talk about frequently you reiterated yesterday that you have never taken an earmark.

MCCAIN: No, No

ROBERTS: I wonder, could you clarify something back in 1992 you were trying to get 5 million dollars for a wastewater treatment plant in Nogales. And you tried to get it through Congress, they wouldn't put it through Congress, so you sent a letter to then President George H. W. Bush and you said quote "I would like to request that EPA either reprogram 5 million dollars out of existing funds or earmark the amount from an appropriate account, to meet the wastewater treatment needs at the Nogales plant. Was that an earmark?

MCCAIN: Of course not, it was a request to have it put in the Presidents Budget and that is a very legitimate request so that the administration will ask for it. The definition of an earmark is a program that is put and money for it money put in in an unauthorized fashion in the middle of the night, so no it is not that and it is not the same.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

ROBERTS: All right, well Senator thanks for clearing that up for us. Appreciate it.

MCCAIN: Thanks, John. I am glad to clear it up for you. And it is good to talk to you again John, I enjoy our conversations.

ROBERTS: Good to talk to you Senator, we will see you again soon.

Highlight #3
McCain Downplays Staff Shake Up, Attacks Obama on Taxes, Iraq (FNC 07/07/08 8:25am)
GRETCHEN CARLSON: I'm going to get to that in a moment, but I want to talk about one of the headlines of the day with regard to something Bill Clinton said while he was in Aspen. Here's what he said, Senator. He said If you know anybody who was a P.O.W. for any length of time, you will see you go along for months or maybe even years, and then something will happen and it will trigger all those bad dreams and it will come back.

JOHN MCCAIN: I don't know where he gets his expertise. Look, that's, I don't know how to respond to that except to say some of the greatest moments of my life, I had the great honor of serving in the company of heroes and observing a thousand acts of courage and compassion and love, and those that I know best and love most are those that I had the honor of being led by and served with who inspired me to do things I never would have been capable of.

CARLSON: Does it appear that this is a strategy by the Barack Obama campaign? Last week it was Wesley Clark, and there were others before that as well. This week it's Bill Clinton. They seem to be attacking your strongest point.

MCCAIN: Well, they can -- whatever they want to do is fine. I think what Americans care about today is keeping their jobs, better life, educating their kids, staying in their homes. Americans are hurting right now. We're talking about the economy this week, and we're going to create jobs, keep taxes low, and Senator Obama wants to raise taxes, I want to keep them low. That's really what the American people are worried about, and that's what we're talking about at the town hall meetings across the country.

STEVE DOOCY: We had Steve Forbes on just about an hour ago, and I know

MCCAIN: He was great.

DOOCY: And he's one of your guys in your presidential posse. Anyway, he said that, quote, Obama's tax plan will destroy America because he's pretty sure he's going to raise taxes on almost everybody, and Steve Forbes quoted resolution where he would have jacked up the tax rate on people earning as little as $32,000 a year.

MCCAIN: Well, he voted for a budget resolution twice, I think, that Senator Obama did, that would have raised people's taxes everywhere, and right now he wants to raise the social security tax, capital gains tax, the tax on the, quote, wealthy. By the way, that's you guys. Watch out. And so it's a fundamental difference that Senator Obama and I have, and you come that with protectionism, his opposition to free trade, then I think you have a very potent mixture there, and we're going to be drawing out those differences throughout the campaign.

CARLSON: Senator, in the last week you've had a campaign staff shake-up, so to speak. You know have Steve Schmidt in charge. Getting back to the anger question for a moment, I think some Republicans have said that they actually would like to see some of your anger come out. Is that a plan with your campaign shake-up?

MCCAIN: Well, first of all, Rick Davis is still our campaign manager. Steve has taken on some more responsibilities. Our thanks to the fact that we've succeeded, we've had to grow our campaign and grow it dramatically, and everybody is taking on more and more responsibilities. Rick Davis is still the guy in charge, and, you know, these are the same people, by the way, that said that our campaign was dead several times, but that kind of minutia isn't that important. But your second question was --

CARLSON: Some people are wondering whether this shake-up will help you start attacking Barack Obama.

MCCAIN: I respect and admire senator Obama. There's significant differences between us. Do I get angry when we have members of congress put in $200 million to a bridge to an island in Alaska with 50 people? Sure, I do. The American people are angry. When we see spending that's completely out of control, sure. When we see corruption that former members of congress are now in federal prison, of course. When I investigated Abrommof, sure. I'm outlining a plan to improve the economy, create jobs, and keep their taxes low.

DOOCY: Before you go, senator, on the fourth of July the "New York Times" had an editorial where they took to task

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Barack Obama who's had a bunch of flip-flops recently regarding FISA, regarding also campaign finance, public financing, stuff like that, guns. We had one of their campaign guys on yesterday, and I asked him about the flip-flops, and he said we haven't flip-flopped. We've been consistent all along. Wouldn't you call them flip-flops?

MCCAIN: I think there's definitely been shifts in position and one of them is Iraq and I will be, wait and see what Sen. Obama has to say, after he returns after meeting for the first time, seeking a sit down briefing from Gen Petraeus and visiting in over 900 days . . .

[. . .]

Highlight #4
McCain Campaign Shake-up Disarray Examined (MSNBC, 07/08/08, 7:14am)
JOE SCARBOROUGH: Hey Willy, there's also a New York Times story out talking about problems with McCain?

WILLIE GEIST: Yeah, we're just reading this on the inside page A14 of the New York Times. John McCain campaign internal politics heat up again amid rivalries. There was talk, we talked about it yesterday about maybe bring Mike Murphy in and what that does. Sort of the anti-Rove faction of the McCain faction. We heard about this in Hillary Clinton's campaign, I'm not sure if it's a new story that campaigns are fighting internally, is it?

PAT BUCHANAN: This late? I mean, he had a problem last year, remember, when they burned through 22 million and he was flying coach everywhere by himself? And now you have a huge new battle between Schmidt and the Rove guys, and Crystal says Murphy's going to be coming in. This isn't good that they don't have this thing locked down.

SCARBOROUGH: Mike Murphy might be coming in. Mike Murphy and Rick Davis hate each other. Schmidt who's brought in from the Rove contingency, who the McCain old-timers don't trust.

BUCHANAN: And there's Rove in the background.

SCARBOROUGH: There's Rove in the background whispering in his ear and we are in July.

BUCHANAN: They better get it together.

SCARBOROUGH: This is a little late.

BUCHANAN: I mean how is he only four points behind? It's like a team that's made ten errors but they're only behind one run.

SCARBOROUGH: And again, like you say, you know how that story usually ends. That team that plays poorly and is still around at halftime usually wins. And if McCain gets that moment that he had in the town hall meetings, he just goes around with it, his numbers jump 15 percentage points.

BUCHANAN: Get off my back!

Highlight #5
McCain's Poor Teleprompter Use and Speaking Ability Criticized (MSNBC, 07/08/08, 7:51am)
JOE SCARBOROUGH: […] Of course, the article you wrote was about John McCain's struggles with a teleprompter and in this visual age that actually is a serious concern right?

MARK LEIBOVITCH: One would think. I think Senator McCain has actually been studying a lot of speeches that you gave on the floor of Congress recently to improve. But no, John McCain is not known for being a set speech or a set piece speaker, as they say. And he's working on it but he's not going to become Barack Obama overnight.

SCARBOROUGH: So he ain't going to be speaking in front of 70,000 people in St. Paul anytime soon?

LEIBOVITCH: I don't think they've rented out the Metro dome yet, for the acceptance speech.

SCARBOROUGH: So what does the McCain campaign do? What are you hearing they're planning to do to offset Barack Obama's advantage? Cause Barack Obama actually struggled sometimes in debates, but give him some time in front of a teleprompter in front of a big crowd, and he's Bono.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

LEIBOVITCH: Well, clearly. I think the strategy is to not even try to out Obama. I think on the contrary, the idea is to become kind of an anti-Barack candidate, Which is someone who is at home in, and McCain is very much at home in more intimate settings, such as the set of Morning Joe. Lat night comedy couches, town meeting, the back of a campaign bus. In a sense the effort is going to be to try to shrink the stage, and to try to put McCain ins comfortable settings, and actually try to emphasize a more substantial approach to the political discourse, instead of a more rock star approach. Which is clearly what Obama is very good at, and clearly what they're going to be able to achieve in Denver in that Vesco field.

ANDREA MITCHELL: […] Why do you think Obama has not accepted McCain's proposal for the town meetings? Wouldn't Obama be a good foil for McCain? Wouldn't that be a good form for him? Or not?

LIEBOVITCH: I think clearly they recognize that this is an effort by McCain to try to play to his strengths, I mean, I think if it were up to McCain and his people they would do one every week. I think clearly, this is akin to the candidate that is ahead, or the candidate that is behind trying to get the candidate who is ahead to try to debate more. I think the more they are seen together in a conversational setting, it's going to be more of a benefit for McCain. So, again, Hillary Clinton was trying to get Obama to agree to more debates when she was behind towards the end of the democratic race. And I think that this is somewhat related to that.

PAT BUCHANAN: Mark, let me ask you about McCain's acceptance speech. When you do an acceptance speech like that at a convention, you go to text and you work with it for days and days and days, you've got it down to where you almost got it memorized. And then you're frankly in a trailer, and you practice the thing. It seems to me that either McCain's going to have to do that and really work with it, or he's virtually going to have to do it with a stand up microphone. Isn't his problem, what I'm getting at, the fact that he's unfamiliar with his fresh material that's given to him. He looks at it once, they put it on the prompter, and he doesn't do well at all with it, but he'll be much more familiar, that is with his convention speech.

LIEBOVITCH: Right, I think though that you know, McCain has in the past risen to the moment and given some really well received speeches. I think in 96 at the Republican convention he gave what a lot of people said, was one of the better speeches in that whole week. He gave a speech in 2004 when President Bush was re-nominated when that actually got some very good reviews also. So McCain has proven that if he works long enough on a speech and he becomes familiar with the words he can really rise to the occasion. I think though, what the campaign might consider, and actually has been considering, is maybe a more inventive format and turning the convention hall into kind of a town hall experience. I don't think, this is just ideas that they're kicking around. But clearly, he could give the best speech of his life and he's not going to be Barack Obama, he's not going to be Ronald Reagan, he's not going to be John F. Kennedy. So McCain himself says they're going to try to be innovative but I think at the end of the day they're going to say, listen, this is someone who understands the issues, who's a good listener, who's a good communicator, in a one-on-one setting. And a speech is just a speech, and imply by saying that Senator Obama is maybe more of an orator than a leader.

Highlight #6

McCain's Changing Positions on Immigration and Border Security Scrutinized (MSNBC, 07/08/08, 9:46am)

CONTESSA BREWER: Not too long ago John McCain was at the for-front of the illegal immigration issue, helping craft a bill that would have given millions a path to citizenship. But it died in the Senate, and today McCain finds himself having to refine his message; putting security at the top of his priority list.

MCCAIN: Every nation has the requirement to secure our borders. So we've got to have the assurance that our borders are secure. And that can be done through walls in urban areas, virtual fences, UAV's, cameras sensors, etc. We can do that. We can do that. It's expensive but we can do that.

BREWER: Doug Holtz-Eakin is a policy advisor for the McCain campaign. Doug good to see you today. McCain went on to criticize Congress for being deadlocked over this issue. So why does he think any new proposal would have a better chance of getting through than the old one did?

DOUG HOLTZ-EAKIN: Well, the Senator has a long history of reaching across the aisle to solve big problems for Americans. He's recognized for years that we have multiple problems, that are border security issues and employer verification, temporary worker program. What to do with the 12 million undocumented workers. He led the effort to have a single bill, comprehensive immigration reform. Unfortunately it failed and he has now taken the lessons of that effort and he is going to go forward, trying to first secure the border and then move to the rest of the agenda that remains unfinished.

BREWER: A Gallup poll taken among Hispanic voters shows McCain losing to Barack Obama by 30 points. How does McCain with all of his work on illegal immigration, his path to citizenship, his plan for a guest worker program, why isn't he doing better among potential Latino voters?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

HOLTZ-EAKIN: Well, this is a very sad state of affairs. At the same time senator McCain was literally risking his political future watching this campaign suffer tremendous financial problems and decline in popularity, senator Obama was supporting poison pill amendments to that bill that ultimately contributed to the failure to deal with this very important issue.

BREWER: Explain what you mean by that?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: Four times, senator Obama voted for an amendment which was known to be a deal killer at a time when we needed democrats and republicans to get together and solve an issue that every American knows has to be addressed. That deal failed and senator Obama is now walking around asserting he has always been there for comprehensive immigration reform, touting his credentials, but at the crucial moment he was not there to reach across the aisle. Senator McCain was and he felt the political fall out of that. I believe Hispanic voters, like every voter will learn the record when they learn the record, they see the man, his commitment to action on behalf of all Americans and he will get their vote.

BREWER: Well, why would senator McCain then decide, after losing the battle over immigration reform, why would he go back and say okay, I learned my lesson, let me put border security at the top of the list? Why would he think that that would now woo some of these Latino voters who are currently supporting Barack Obama?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: Well, border security was always on the list. Let us remember that the bill that failed in the senate had border security, it had a trigger, it had a comprehensive list of reforms. Senator McCain's commitment to dealing with all those important issues has never changed. All he has said is that different strategy. He is committed to solving problems. He is not in this for his own political gain or his personal political future. He is in this to solve the problem that face Americans, including Latinos and Hispanics.

BREWER: Doug, have you heard anything else from Barack Obama's campaign about whether senator Obama will join senator McCain in these town hall meetings that McCain's asking for?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: Well, the American people would love to see Senator McCain and Senator Obama stand side by side and talk about the real issues. Sadly senator Obama has not taken up this opportunity.

BREWER: So you haven't heard anything back from Obama's campaign?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: No, we have not.

Highlight #7
Yellin Describes McCain's Replacement of the Maverick Brand with that of a GWB Republican (CNN 07/07/08 10:15pm)
ANDERSON COOPER: Behind the scenes their are strategy shifts. Today the McCain camp launching or relaunching an effort to re-energize their campaign and shore up its organization.

[...]

JESSICA YELLIN: [McCain] working to reconnect with voters and recapture the magic that made him a political superstar. At first blush the transformation may be hard to detect YELLIN: okay so the difference might be subtle. It [the campaign] appointed a Bush veteran to run McCain's daily operations, then it named Rudy Guilianni's campaign manager as political director.

[...]

YELLIN: ... A new backdrop doesn't give a candidate new mojo and this political observer sees deeper problems.

STUART ROTHENBERG: He started to compromise his own brand in this year when the republican brand is so damaged having a nominee like McCain with a maverick reputation is absolutely crucial. To the extent that he loses that reputation, is seen as a cookie cutter Republican, just a George Bush Republican, then his campaign is in trouble and his party is in trouble.

YELLIN: McCain was the anti-Republican Republican. The guy who broke with party orthodoxy. Opposing Bush's tax cuts, opposing off-shore drilling, and bucking the party line on immigration reform. Now he is mouthing standard Republican talking points on all these issues. One reason why Barrack Obama is branding him the next George Bush.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[...]

COOPER: Jessica if Stuart Rothenberg in your story was right, that McCain appears as just another Republican. That he is somehow selling his brand. How did that happen? What went wrong?

YELLIN: ... You're right it posses risk for McCain because it threatens to water down that Maverick brand. The thing that is important to remember is McCain's personal history. Here is a guy who was defeated in 2000 in a bitter contest with George Bush but four years later he made nice with Bush and with the party establishment and that helped him become the nominee this year.

Highlight #8
VFF Chairman defends "issue advocacy ads," effects of 527's are pondered (FNC 07/08/08 08:11am)
ANDREW NAPOLITANO: Vets for Freedom is launching a 4 month multi million dollar campaign which includes this ad. The message is aimed at countering the anti-war message of MoveOn.org will this presidential election turn into a brutal battle of warring political ads?

PETE HEGSETH (Chairman of VFF): They are issue ads talking about progress in Iraq. We don't think Americans have heard enough about the great things that are happening. They are veterans looking into the camera talking about how we need t finish the job that we started n matter who is president. This issue, progress in Iraq is much larger then any presidential campaign or any political party it is about winning a war that we are involved in and that is what the ads are about.

DAVID MARK: ... John McCain's greatest calling card is his military service his time as a POW in Vietnam. Barack Obama has found that there is a lot of blow back when you try and criticize military service.

NAPOLITANO: Are the ads themselves, hear me out, a little inconsistent with what Senator McCain wants, he wrote McCain-Feingold he really tried to keep the influence of money out of politics limit the amount of money candidates can raise, limit the amount of money candidates can spend. But you guys are totally outside of that loop. You can raise what you want and spend what you want.

HEGSETH: That's right, because we are an issue advocacy organization that is out there. We are not talking about electing any president. We are talking about an issue, a war that needs to be won. And as a veterans group I think we should have the ability to use our free speech and talk about what we fought so hard for, and that is what those ads are all about.

NAPOLITANO: David, is this the opening salvo of the 527's, that is, as you know, the section of the IRS code that allows people like Pete and his group that don't mention the name of a candidate to raise as much money as they want and spend as much money as they want. In other words will the other side start something to counter what Pete's people are doing?

MARK: Yeah, I think we are going to see a big escalation in the next three and a half months or so leading up to the election. We saw it in 2004 with the swift boat vets for truth democrats at MoveOn.org, George Soros group we are going to see it a lot over the next three and a half months.

Highlight #9
Local News Highlights McCain's Economic Plans as Same As Bush (DC-4-NBC, 07/08/08, 6:11am)
BRIAN MOOAR: […] Both presidential candidates had planned to kick off a week of head to head campaigning with a message focusing on the ailing economy. But plane problems grounded a big Barack Obama event in North Carolina. […] 500 miles short of his destination, Obama spoke to the press.

BARACK OBAMA: Senator McCain said earlier this year, that America had made and I quote, " great progressive economically over the past 8 years. He believes we're on the right track."

MOOAR: Again, Obama accused John McCain of running for a third Bush term. McCain says he wants to balance the budget and right the scales on gas prices. He proposed 35 new nuclear plants, and more oil drilling on U.S. shores.

JOHN MCCAIN: Increasing our own supply will send a message to the market and result in lower prices for oil and gas.

MOOAR: McCain was in Denver where Obama plans to accept the nomination in August. […] And both of the candidates will be here in the Nation's capitol today both of them speaking before the same Latino group just a couple of hours apart and courting a critical vote in this fall's election. […]"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Highlight #10
The Today Show Discusses McCain's Economic Plan Differences From Obama (NBC, 07/08/08, 7:17am)
ANDREA MITCHELL: […] Their biggest differences over taxes.

JOHN MCCAIN: If you believe that you should pay more taxes I'm the wrong candidate for you. Senator Obama is your man.

MITCHELL: McCain would lower the corporate tax rate, repeal the alternative minimum tax, and make the Bush tax cuts permanent. Although he used to oppose them. In contrast, Obama would raise corporate tax rates, give rebates to lower and middle income workers and the elderly, but let the Bush tax cuts expire for those making more than $250,000 a year. Experts say both would bust the budget.

FRED BERGSTEN: Both candidates, essentially, have irresponsible tax plans because they would both put in place big tax cuts, that would raise the budget deficit even more and make the problems worse over the long run.

MITCHELL: The two also disagree on trade. McCain supports trade deals like NAFTA. Obama now says he'd reopen NAFTA to negotiate tougher labor rules. Experts call that unlikely. Another major difference, the budget deficit. Obama supports paying for new programs before increasing the deficit. McCain promises to balance the budget by 2013 even though economists say that is beyond reach. And McCain proposes a summertime gas tax holiday, something Obama criticizes as a gimmick. McCain and Obama once thought that their biggest debate would be over Iraq, but now they face voters much more worried over how to fight a recession then the war.

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Myroslaw Smorodsky" <msmorodsky@uaba.org>
To:	"Myroslaw Smorodsky" <msmorodsky@uaba.org>
Date:	12/5/2014 11:40:28 AM
Subject:	FW: UABA applauds the US House of Representatives for passage of H. Res. 758 supporting Ukraine

Press Release: December 5, 2014

UABA applauds the US House of Representatives for passage of H. Res. 758 supporting Ukraine

On December 4, 2014, the United States House of Representatives, by an overwhelming vote of 411 – 10, passed H.Res.758 - "Strongly condemning the actions of the Russian Federation, under President Vladimir Putin, which has carried out a policy of aggression against neighboring countries aimed at political and economic domination."

The Ukrainian American Bar Association (UABA) applauds with great appreciation the House of Representatives for its strong expression of support for Ukraine and the Ukrainian people in their struggle to attain Western values and democracy. The text of the resolution clearly shows that the House is fully aware of the extremely dangerous significance of the Kremlin's actions against Ukraine, and its impact on international rule of law and order. It recognizes that the Kremlin has not adhered to any of its internationally made pledges regarding the territorial integrity and sovereignty of states, thus undermining the bedrock upon which European peace is built in the aftermath of World War II. Rather, Russia has intentionally trampled upon Ukraine's political and economic sovereignty and its territorial integrity for quite some time in full view of the world.

The UABA notes, however, that H. Res. 758 only expresses the sense of the House of Representatives and does not have the force of law. As such, we strongly urge that both houses of the United States Congress take under immediate consideration and in a swift and expeditious manner, pass Senate Bill S. 2828 and House Bill H.R. 5782. These bills will provide, among other things, defensive military assistance to Ukraine and would grant Ukraine Major Non-NATO Ally (MNNA) Status and are in the United States' national security interests. The implementation of such legislation into law will help Ukraine repel Putin's aggression and prevent his imperialistic ambitions from spilling over into the Baltic States and the rest of Europe.

The United States and Europe are at a historically crucial crossroad. America must take strong and decisive action to reaffirm its world leadership position and help Ukraine defend itself now! If Western governments continue on the existing path of only scolding Putin verbally and attempting to isolate him economically, then they will condemn our children and grandchildren to a probable conflagration on the European continent that will be as great or even greater than the horrors of World War II [recall Putin's recent verbal flexing of his nuclear muscle] .....and from which America will have no escape.

For further information, please contact
Myroslaw Smorodsky, Esq.
Communications Director of the Ukrainian American Bar Association (UABA)
Tel: 201-507-4500; Email; myroslaw@smorodsky.com ; Website; www.smorodsky.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Fariba Yassaee" <fyassaee@albrightstonebridge.com>
To: "Anne Hall" <Anne.Hall@APORTER.COM>
"Bill Antholis" <antholis@virginia.edu> bill.danvers@gmail.com
"Brian Katulis" <bkatulis@americanprogress.org>
"Bruce Riedel" <briedel@brookings.edu>
"Caitlin McDonnell" <cmcdonnell@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Carol Browner" <cmbrowner@me.com>
"Carole Hall" <chall@brookings.edu>
"Catherine Whitney" <Catherine.Whitney@skadden.com>
"Chris Roberts" <croberts@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Dan Benjamin" <dbenjam61@hotmail.com>
"Daniel Silverberg" <danielsilverberg@yahoo.com>
"Denis McDonough" <denis.mcdonough@gmail.com>
"Derek Chollet" <dhchollet@gmail.com>
"Don Gips?? \(don.gips@gmail.com\)" <don.gips@gmail.com> donkerrick <donkerrick@comcast.net>
"Eryn Sanders" <eryn.sepp@gmail.com>
"Fariba Yassaee" <fyassaee@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Greg Craig" <gcraig@skadden.com>
"Jamie?? Rubin" <JamesPRubin1960@gmail.com>
"Jan Stewart" <jstewart@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Jeff Smith" <jeffrey_smith@aporter.com>
"Jeremy Bash" <jeremybash@gmail.com>
"Jessica Lewis" <lewisje03@yahoo.com>
"Jim?? Miller - Department of Defense \(james.n.miller.jr@gmail.com \)" <james.n.miller.jr@gmail.com>
"Jim O'Brien" <jobrien@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Joanna Nicoletti \(info@forwardengagement.org\)" <info@forwardengagement.org>
"Joe Cirincione" <jcirincione@ploughshares.org>
"John Norris" <jnorris@americanprogress.org>
"John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
"Julianne Smith" <julsmi@gmail.com>
"Ken Lieberthal" <klieberthal@brookings.edu>
"Kurt Campbell" <kurtmcampbell@yahoo.com>
"Laura?? Huber" <lhuber@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Leon Fuerth" <hdpf@msn.com>
"Maida?? Stadtler" <mstadtler@apcoworldwide.com>
"Marcel Lettre" <marcel.lettre@gmail.com>
"Mariah Sixkiller \(mariah6@gmail.com\)" <mariah6@gmail.com>
"Martin Indyk" <mindyk@brookings.edu>
"Michael Morell" <michaelbuckeye24@gmail.com>
"Michele Flournoy" <micheleflournoy3@gmail.com>
"Pat Griffin" <pgriffin@pmj-dc.com>
"Rich Verma" <rverma@steptoe.com>
"Rob?? Malley" <rmalley555@gmail.com>
"Rose Marie Owen" <rmowen@virginia.edu>
"Samuel Berger" <sberger@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Sharon Burke" <burkese@comcast.net>
"Steve Ricchetti" <sricchetti@cox.net>
"Strobe Talbott" <stalbott@brookings.edu>
"Susan Rice" <ricesusane@aol.com>
"Suzy George" <suzygeorge8@gmail.com>
"Tamara Wittes \(twittes@brookings.edu\)" <twittes@brookings.edu>
"Tara Sonenshine" <tsonenshine@earthlink.net>
"Theodore Waddelow" <twaddelow@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Tim Roemer" <tjroemer@gmail.com>
"Tom Daschle" <Tom@DaschleGroup.com>
"Tom Donilon" <tdonilon@gmail.com>
"Tom Downey" <tdowney@dmggroup.com>
"Tommy Ross" <trossjr@gmail.com>
"Toni Verstandig" <tonigverstandig@gmail.com>
"Tony?? Blinken" <ablinken@aol.com>
"Veronica Pollack" <veronica@daschlegroup.com>
"Vikram Singh" <vsingh@americanprogress.org>
"Wendy Sherman" <wendyrsherman@gmail.com>
Date: 1/27/2015 4:26:27 AM
Subject: Brian Katulis' report on Egypt

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Brian's latest report on Egypt.

https://www.americanprogress.org/issues/security/report/2015/01/23/105168/new-anchors-for-u-s-egypt-relations/

New Anchors for U.S.-Egypt Relations

Looking to the Future and Learning from the Past 4 Years After Egypt's Revolution

By Brian Katulis & Mokhtar Awad | Friday, January 23, 2015
New Anchors for U.S.-Egypt Relations

Download the report:
PDF
Download introduction & summary:
PDF
Read it in your browser:
Scribd

In the past year, the fight against the Islamic State of Iraq and Al-Sham, or ISIS, and the nuclear negotiations with Iran have dominated U.S. policy toward the Middle East. But Egypt, as the most populous Arab country, remains a central test in the broader battle to achieve stability and progress in the region. Four years after the start of the Arab uprisings, Egypt continues to face many of the same challenges that sparked the initial protests.

The United States and Egypt should try to work together to build a set of new anchors for progress and stability at this turbulent time of transition in the Middle East. 2015 offers potential opportunities, but it will require Egypt and the United States to learn some lessons from the past four years and to look to the future. The two countries need to move beyond the old way of doing business—a heavy focus on conventional military cooperation—and look to a future where the bilateral relationship includes expanded economic cooperation and a new, more constructive diplomatic and political dialogue.

Doing so will be difficult for the United States absent a major course correction by the new Egyptian government on its political transition. Efforts to enhance cooperation between the two countries will likely remain limited, and relations are likely to be strained as long as Egypt continues down its current path of restrictions on basic freedoms and political pluralism. Given the uncertainty of the moment, the United States should prepare for a wide range of possible scenarios emerging in Egypt in the next year. But it should make a determined effort to work with Egypt to build new anchors for the relationship over the next four years.

Egypt remains in the midst of unfinished political and economic transitions. Multiple waves of protests, leadership changes, and crackdowns have traumatized Egyptians. The overall political climate in Egypt is a complicated mix of anxiety, tension, exhaustion, and hope that the country will achieve more progress in the next four years than it did in the past four.

If Egypt can build a foothold of stability and achieve economic and political progress, it has the potential to offer immense resources to the cause of regional and global stability. But the only way for Egypt to achieve long-term, sustainable security is by updating its security and economic sectors and ushering in a competitive political environment where basic liberties are protected.

In the past year-and-a-half, many Egyptians' overriding focus has been security—both basic law and order and economic stability. Ongoing violence in Egypt's Sinai Peninsula, Libya's fragmentation to the west, and Syria's ongoing bloody civil war are seen as vivid examples to avoid. The rise of ISIS and the growth of extremist groups across the region have had an enormous impact on threat perceptions inside Egypt. Next to security, Egypt's daunting economic troubles are a top priority; there is a dire need to produce economic growth and create jobs.

While President Abdel Fattah al-Sisi appears to enjoy broad political support from an exhausted population, important segments of Egyptian society have grave concerns about constraints on basic freedoms and the closure of political space. How Sisi governs and handles his country's momentous challenges will redefine what Egypt stands for as a country and its role in the region. Since the start of the 21st century, Egypt has seen its regional influence wane, held back by the sheer weight of its internal challenges and mismanagement of national assets.

The past four years have taken a serious toll on U.S.-Egypt ties. The Egyptian view of the United States is perhaps the worst it has been in recent history. Many Egyptians think the United States backed the Muslim Brotherhood, or MB, when it was in power, and others believe the United States helped support former President Mohamed Morsi's removal to stamp out Islamists. There are widespread conspiracy theories that embrace the notion that the United States wants to undermine and weaken Egypt.

In the United States, top policymakers increasingly speak of Egypt as a problem to be managed, their attention focused on avoiding the worst-case outcomes of state collapse. Today, the United States looks less to Egypt and more to countries such as Jordan and the United Arab Emirates for regional security cooperation efforts such as the anti-ISIS coalition. Moreover, the central strategic rationale for U.S.-Egyptian ties for the past 35 years—the role of the United States as guarantor of peace between Egypt and Israel—seems to have been undercut. Israeli and Egyptian leaders now tout that their bilateral relations are stronger with each other than with the United States, sending the message that Egypt upholds the peace treaty with Israel out of national self-interest, not because of U.S. assistance.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At the government level, Egypt's current leaders say that they are confused by U.S. policy, which continues to hold back delivery of some weapons systems because of America's concerns about Egypt's political transition and human rights record. The Egyptian government argues that its actions against the MB and other Islamist groups are part of Egypt's fight against the same terrorists the U.S.-led coalition against ISIS is fighting.

The continued rift between Egypt and the United States has motivated Sisi to seek to diversify Egypt's foreign support. Egypt remains in dire need of external assistance. It has received more financial support from Gulf Cooperation Council, or GCC, countries in the past year than it received from the United States over the past decade—at least $20 billion from Gulf partners in the past year-and-a-half compared with the less than $1.5 billion per year from the United States, or nearly $15 billion in the past decade. Sisi has traveled to parts of Africa and to Europe, Russia, and China during his first seven months in office in an effort to boost support and strengthen ties.

Yet Egypt and the United States continue to share common, long-term interests in stability and economic prosperity. To build new anchors for the relationship, Washington and Cairo should use the upcoming strategic dialogue planned for this year to foster more constructive conversations and to look to build a new framework for bilateral relations by 2020. The countries should seek to develop forward-looking joint approaches on three fronts:

1. Security: comprehensive security-sector modernization to meet new threats. The evolving threat from militant terrorist groups challenging state sovereignty requires Egypt to update its overall security approach. Acknowledging that current U.S.-Egypt security cooperation was built in a different era, the two countries should use the proposed strategic dialogue to outline a program for security cooperation tailored to meet today's threats. In these future strategic dialogues, the United States should offer the prospect of delivering security assistance currently being held back, as well as the restart of joint military exercises contingent upon opening a dialogue on substantial reforms to Egypt's security institutions.

2. Countering violent extremism: an open dialogue about pluralism and political reform. Egypt's government has justified restrictions on basic freedoms and closing off political space in its anti-terrorism battle, but guaranteeing these basic liberties is needed to ensure political stability and the ultimate political defeat of extremists. Egypt needs a more sustainable political environment to implement massive economic reforms, and it requires an environment that allows political actors to mature and a new spectrum of voices to emerge that denies space for extremist ideologies to thrive. The limited efforts of the Obama administration to influence Egypt's political trajectory by holding back some types of assistance have not succeeded. But these issues are important to discuss, as sensitive as they are. The United States and Egypt should seek to expand people-to-people contact, educational exchanges, and more honest discussions on the need for pluralism, countering extremism, and political reform due to these issues' impact on Egypt's overall stability and the health of the bilateral relationship.

3. Economy: organized international and multilateral support for Egypt's economic reform. Egypt and the United States should work together and in closer collaboration with regional powers in the Gulf to reform Egypt's economy to spark inclusive growth and to create jobs, breaking the cycle of foreign-aid dependency and crony capitalism of the past decades. The United States has already gradually begun to reduce its economic assistance to Egypt, and as it continues this shift, it should look to other avenues, including the private sector, to help strengthen economic ties with Egypt.

This report is based on the Center for American Progress' ongoing analysis of regional trends and a trip to Egypt in late October 2014 that included interviews with more than three dozen Egyptian government officials, politicians, economists, businessmen, religious leaders, civil society activists, journalists, and independent analysts.

Brian Katulis is a Senior Fellow at the Center for American Progress. Mokhtar Awad is a Research Associate with the National Security and International Policy team at the Center.

Sent using OWA for iPad

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Nick Merrill" <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com>
To: "Joel Benenson" <jbenenson@bsgco.com>
Date: 2/7/2015 6:23:05 PM
Subject: Re: NYT & WSJ | Econ Stories

http://mobile.nytimes.com/2015/02/08/us/politics/economic-plan-is-a-quandary-for-hillary-clintons-campaign.html?_r=0&referrer=

Economic Plan Is a Quandary for Hillary Clinton's Campaign

With advice from more than 200 policy experts, Hillary Rodham Clinton is trying to answer what has emerged as a central question of her early presidential campaign strategy: how to address the anger about income inequality without overly vilifying the wealthy.

Mrs. Clinton has not had to wade into domestic policy since before she became secretary of state in 2009, and she has spent the past few months engaged in policy discussions with economists on the left and closer to the Democratic Party's center who are grappling with the discontent set off by the gap between rich and poor. Sorting through the often divergent advice to develop an economic plan could affect the timing and planning of the official announcement of her campaign.

Although people close to Mrs. Clinton say she has not yet settled on a specific platform, she is expected to embrace several principles. They include standard Democratic initiatives like raising the minimum wage, investing in infrastructure, closing corporate tax loopholes and cutting taxes for the middle class. Other ideas are newer, such as providing incentives to corporations to increase profit-sharing with employees and changing labor laws to give workers more collective bargaining power.

Behind many of these proposals is a philosophy, endorsed by Mrs. Clinton's closest economic advisers and often referred to as inclusive capitalism, that contends that a majority of Americans do not want to punish the rich; they just want to feel that they, too, have a chance to succeed. It also calls for corporations to put less emphasis on short-term profits that increase shareholder value and to invest more in employees, the environment and communities.

Whether Mrs. Clinton's approach will be enough to satisfy the unease over growing economic disparity is unclear. In a Gallup poll conducted last month, 67 percent of Americans said they were dissatisfied with the way income and wealth are distributed in the United States. In the 2008 Democratic presidential primary, Mrs. Clinton's economic message — summed up by a frequent refrain, "If you work hard, you play by the rules, you ought to be able to get ahead" — resonated with white, working-class voters, who overwhelmingly supported her over Barack Obama.

But in the years since, Mrs. Clinton has come under criticism for delivering speeches to Wall Street banks at more than $200,000 each, roughly four times the median annual household income in the United States, and for comments she made about her family's financial situation, including a lament about being "dead broke" after leaving the White House. And she must convince a middle class that feels frustrated and left behind that she understands its struggles, even as she relies heavily on the financial industry and corporate interests to fund her candidacy.

Nick Merrill, a spokesman for Mrs. Clinton, said she had "a record of bringing people together to solve big problems, while also putting a real premium on accountability."

Asked whether creating an economic message could affect the timeline for her presidential campaign, Mr. Merrill said, "There's no red X on a calendar somewhere, but make no mistake: If she runs, she will present solutions to our toughest challenges."

Mrs. Clinton's economic plan would be more populist and reliant on the government than the centrist approach of trade agreements, welfare reform and deficit reduction associated with her husband, former President Bill Clinton.

"It's not enough to address upward mobility without addressing inequality," said Lawrence H. Summers, a Treasury secretary in the Clinton administration who is among those talking with Mrs. Clinton. "The challenge, though, is to address inequality without embracing a politics of envy."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The debate is extending beyond the Democratic Party as Republicans wade into the issues. “If Americans are working harder than ever, earning less than they once did, our government and our leaders should step up, offer a plan, fix what’s wrong,” former Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida said in a speech in Detroit last week as he laid the groundwork for his potential 2016 candidacy.

Mrs. Clinton was secretary of state when some major economic debates took hold on Capitol Hill, and as a result, her economic views are still not broadly known. Her approach to poverty was forged in the 1970s, when she went door to door while working for the Children’s Defense Fund, leaving her a committed advocate for early childhood education, equal pay for women and paid leave.

But later experiences complicated her worldview. Many of the advocates who knew Mrs. Clinton as a champion for the poor and working-class women felt betrayed in 1996 when, as first lady, she supported Mr. Clinton’s overhaul of the welfare system, which gave states more power to remove people from welfare rolls and pledged to cut federal spending on assistance for the poor by nearly $55 billion over six years. She was more skeptical about the North American Free Trade Agreement, which Mr. Clinton signed into law in 1993 and which has also been accused of hurting American workers.

After being elected in New York to the United States Senate in 2000, Mrs. Clinton had another constituency to represent: Wall Street. In 2001, she supported bankruptcy legislation that some Democrats — most notably Elizabeth Warren, now senator from Massachusetts — argued hurt working families and single mothers, and they accused her of doing the bidding of the financial industry. Mrs. Clinton has said she worked to improve the bill.

As a presidential candidate in 2008, Mrs. Clinton angered some of her Wall Street donors when she came out early in support of the regulation of derivatives and other complicated financial products and called for eliminating the “carried interest” loophole that allowed some financiers to avoid paying millions in income taxes. She also said that as president, she would create a cabinet-level position to fight poverty.

When the housing market collapsed, Mrs. Clinton, who had returned to the Senate full time after Mr. Obama defeated her, proposed legislation similar to a New Deal-era program that would allow the government to help homeowners refinance their mortgages. She voted in favor of the Emergency Economic Stabilization Act of 2008, which led to the Troubled Asset Relief Program and the multibillion-dollar bailout for automakers .

Last month, Mrs. Clinton reiterated her support for the 2010 Dodd-Frank financial regulation law. “Attacking financial reform is risky and wrong,” she wrote on Twitter.

As she dives back into domestic policy, Mrs. Clinton faces an economy in which, even amid steady job growth , weekly earnings for low- and middle-income workers have remained virtually unchanged for 15 years.

“Where has the money gone?” asked Robert B. Reich, a secretary of labor during the Clinton administration. “That is the topic that is embarrassing for people to talk about, particularly in Washington, because even mentioning it creates the potential charge of class warfare.”

Mr. Reich, who recently sent Mrs. Clinton a five-page memo laying out his ideas, said candidates in both parties needed to abandon the politically safe discussion of upward mobility for the poor and middle class that dominated the 1990s, and instead take on the stickier issue of income distribution.

“Upward mobility, equal opportunity — those are safe phrases and safe aspirations,” he said in an interview. “I don’t want to minimize their importance, but they obscure the real issue.”

Mr. Reich is one of some 200 economists and academics who have offered Mrs. Clinton ideas and guidance as she settles on an economic doctrine. Several of Mr. Clinton’s former advisers, including Alan S. Blinder, Robert E. Rubin and Mr. Summers, maintain influence. But Mrs. Clinton has cast a wide net that also includes Joseph E. Stiglitz, a Nobel laureate in economics who has written extensively about inequality; Alan B. Krueger, a professor at Princeton and co-author of “Inequality in America ”; and Peter R. Orszag, a former director of the Office of Management and Budget under President Obama. Teresa Ghilarducci, a labor economist who focuses on retirement issues, is also playing a prominent role.

Last month in Washington, a 17-person commission convened by the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank with close ties to Mrs. Clinton, presented a 166-page report on “inclusive prosperity,” which is among the numerous economic blueprints Mrs. Clinton has reviewed. For some, the solutions proposed by the committee, of which Mr. Summers was co-chairman, did not go far enough.

Dean Baker, an economist and co-director of the Center for Economic and Policy Research, has pushed the idea of a government fee on the sale or purchase of certain financial assets, which he believes could hold Wall Street accountable while funding social services. “Clinton people didn’t want to go near it,” Mr. Baker said.

Mrs. Clinton has not commented on the financial transaction tax or on profit-sharing.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She has expressed support for many of the proposals Mr. Obama laid out in his State of the Union address last month, signaling that they could help shape her agenda. In a post on Twitter, she said the speech had "pointed way to an economy that works for all. Now we need to step up & deliver for the middle class."

Mrs. Clinton frequently talks about the economic success of the Clinton administration, under which median family income, adjusted for inflation, increased to $56,080 in 1999 from $48,884 in 1993, compared with a decline to $51,017 in 2012 from $55,987 in 2000, according to census data. But she has acknowledged that a globalized economy calls for new ideas, and many are urging her to go beyond her comfort zone and address the deeper frustrations of those who have not shared in that economy's benefits.

"Long-term answers about education and skills that help change mobility don't get at the current frustrations and aggravations," said Austan D. Goolsbee, an economic adviser to Mr. Obama and a professor at the University of Chicago.

"People want to answer the question, 'Are we going to be O.K.?' " Mr. Goolsbee said. "And then the natural question is, 'Whose fault was that, and let's go find those people.' "

On Feb 6, 2015, at 12:30 PM, Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com> wrote:

Well – We need someone to get our "friends" on the phone and tell them this doesn't help;

From: Nick Merrill [mailto:nmerrill@hrcoffice.com]
Sent: Friday, February 06, 2015 12:18 PM
To: Joel Benenson; Robby Mook
Cc: Mandy Grunwald; cheryl.mills@gmail.com; john.podesta@gmail.com; jake.sullivan@gmail.com; Philippe Reines; Huma Abedin; Dan Schwerin; Jim Margolis; John Anzalone; cmills@cdmillsgroup.com; jennifer.m.palmieri@gmail.com; kristinakschake@gmail.com
Subject: Re: NYT & WSJ | Econ Stories

I'm passing along a document that came from one of our friends, written for and sent directly to Amy Chozick for this NYT piece she's working on. Gives you a sense of what we're all up against!

From: "jbenenson@bsgco.com" <jbenenson@bsgco.com>
Date: Monday, February 2, 2015 at 10:27 AM
To: Robby Mook <robbymook2015@gmail.com>
Cc: Mandy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com>, NSM <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com>, Cheryl Mills <cheryl.mills@gmail.com>, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com>, Jacob Sullivan <Jake.sullivan@gmail.com>, Philippe Reines <pir@hrcoffice.com>, Huma Abedin <huma@hrcoffice.com>, Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hrcoffice.com>, Jim Margolis <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com>, "john@algpolling.com" <john@algpolling.com>, "cmills@cdmillsgroup.com" <cmills@cdmillsgroup.com>, Jennifer Palmieri <jennifer.m.palmieri@gmail.com>, Kristina Schake <kristinakschake@gmail.com>
Subject: Re: NYT & WSJ | Econ Stories

Mandy is right. We keep emphasizing that the most significant pain point for people is that the belief the decked is stacked against them in favor of this at the top. And they're not wrong.

Sent from my iPhone

On Feb 2, 2015, at 10:07 AM, Robby Mook <robbymook2015@gmail.com> wrote:

> Agree
>
> On Feb 2, 2015, at 9:41 AM, Mandy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com> wrote:
>
> > I think this piece turned out well.
> >
> > But when we define our goals, we have to be clear that we are concerned with helping people who are getting crushed by rising costs and stagnant incomes, not that we're worried about offending high income groups (our donors). My guess is that this sentence will cause us some problems on the left.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

> One of Mrs. Clinton's broader goals is to develop ways to address economic anxiety without sounding like a combative populist or demonizing high-income groups, said a person familiar with her thinking.

Mandy Grunwald
Grunwald Communications
202 973-9400

-----Original Message-----
From: Nick Merrill <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com >
To: Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com >; Cheryl Mills <cheryl.mills@gmail.com >
Cc: Mandy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com >; Robby Mook <robbymook2015@gmail.com >; John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com >; Jake Sullivan <jake.sullivan@gmail.com >; Philippe Reines <pir@hrcoffice.com >; Huma Abedin <huma@hrcoffice.com >; Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hrcoffice.com >; Jim Margolis <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com >; John Anzalone <john@algpolling.com >; Cheryl Mills <cmills@cdmillsgroup.com >; Jennifer Palmieri <jennifer.m.palmieri@gmail.com >; Kristina Schake <kristinakschake@gmail.com >
Sent: Sun, Feb 1, 2015 11:38 pm
Subject: Re: NYT & WSJ | Econ Stories

http://www.wsj.com/articles/clinton-consults-experts-to-define-economic-pitch-1422837490

Clinton Consults to Define Economic Pitch

By Peter Nicholas
Hillary Clinton has been consulting with an array of economists and academics—including liberal Joseph Stiglitz, former Fed chairman Paul Volcker and new faces outside the traditional orbit of Democratic policy experts—as she prepares for a likely presidential campaign that would make sluggish wage growth and middle-class prosperity a central focus.
One of Mrs. Clinton's broader goals is to develop ways to address economic anxiety without sounding like a combative populist or demonizing high-income groups, said a person familiar with her thinking. It isn't clear whether that particular question has come up in the meetings she has been having with various policy experts.
She has been using the meetings to prepare herself for a possible campaign, ground herself in the issues and tease out fresh approaches to stubborn domestic and foreign policy problems, people familiar with the matter said.
As the former secretary of state keeps a low public profile ahead of announcing her near-certain candidacy, the meetings offer clues to which issues she believes merit attention and whose advice she values. Many, but not all, participants served in Bill Clinton 's administration; others are distinguished primarily by expertise in subjects that are certain to be front-and-center in the 2016 presidential race.
Some of the meetings had the feeling of a high-octane faculty symposium and lasted for hours, say people familiar with the sessions. Pen and pad in hand, Mrs. Clinton typically has gone around the room to ask for ideas, offering comments now and then and inviting participants to make suggestions down the road.
In December, Mrs. Clinton presided over a meeting at a midtown Manhattan hotel that focused on middle-class Americans feeling pinched by slow wage growth.
Among those attending: Mr. Volcker, the architect of the "Volcker Rule," a regulatory measure barring banks from making risky bets with their own money; Jonathan Cowan, co-founder of the centrist think tank Third Way, which has been critical of some of the populist rhetoric coming from the Democrats' liberal wing; and Alan Blinder , a Princeton professor and former Fed vice chairman and economics adviser to Mr. Clinton.
Also at the meeting, according to people familiar with it, were Robert Hormats, who worked in the State Department during Mrs. Clinton's tenure and was a former vice chairman of Goldman Sachs; Richard Ravitch , a former Democratic lieutenant governor in New York, who helped New York City avert bankruptcy during a fiscal crisis in the 1970s; and Teresa Ghilarducci, a labor economist and proponent of ideas to shore up Americans' retirement savings. The Clinton team has asked her to help evaluate various policy ideas.
The participants examined a range of ideas to boost economic security, such as tax cuts for the middle class, expanded access to prekindergarten education and new ways to pay for improvements to roads and tunnels, said people familiar with the session.
"One major focus of the meeting was the miserable recent performance of wages in general and middle-class wages in particular, and what if anything the government can do about that," said Mr. Blinder.
Bernard Schwartz, a longtime Democratic donor and contributor to the Clinton Foundation, was among those who helped arrange the meeting, said people familiar with the session. Mr. Schwartz is a former chairman of Loral Space & Communications Ltd. Mrs. Clinton also has consulted with Mr. Stiglitz, a former economic adviser to Bill Clinton and author of a book about the perils of economic inequality.
The policy interests of some participants point to the issues Mrs. Clinton is likely to prioritize, notably the financial pressures faced by middle-class families. Prospective Republican presidential candidates also are talking about shoring up the middle class and, in some cases, narrowing the wage gap in America—a sign that those topics will be flashpoints in the general election.
Mrs. Clinton is the overwhelming front-runner for the Democratic nomination, but some liberals would like to see her challenged by U.S. Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D., Mass.), a populist firebrand who has described the American economic system as "rigged" in favor of the wealthy. Ms. Warren has said she won't run. In targeting income inequality, Mrs. Clinton would address a substantive issue facing the country while also making inroads with Ms. Warren's liberal followers.
Mrs. Clinton also has held foreign policy meetings in New York and Washington. A New York meeting in the summer was a “tour” of global hot spots, among them the war in Syria and Russia’s incursions into Ukraine, according to people familiar with what took place.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mrs. Clinton asked for a diagnosis of the problem and a “strategic” view of how the U.S. should act, one person familiar with the meeting said.
Those who attended included Richard Haass, president of the Council on Foreign Relations, who worked under both Republican presidents George H.W. Bush and George W. Bush; David Rothkopf, author of a new book on foreign policy-making in the George W. Bush and Obama administrations; and Dennis Ross, a diplomat with many years of experience in the Middle East peace negotiations.
More informally, Mrs. Clinton has also spoken to trusted Democratic confidants about appointments to high-level positions in her campaign, should she decide to run.
A campaign apparatus is already taking shape. John Podesta, a senior adviser to President Barack Obama, is likely to become a senior adviser to the campaign, while two Obama campaign veterans, pollster Joel Benenson and media adviser Jim Margolis, are expected to take top positions on Mrs. Clinton’s campaign team, people familiar with the matter said.
“She’s casting a wide net, talking to a wide range of people on a wide range of specific topics” said Nick Merrill, a spokesman for Mrs. Clinton. “Make no mistake, if she runs, she will present solutions to our toughest challenges, she will take nothing for granted, and she will fight for every vote.”

On Feb 1, 2015, at 6:54 PM, Nick Merrill < nmerrill@hrcoffice.com > wrote:

Ran the quote past HRC and she asked (with no prompting) that “average” come out. So here’s what I shipped off to Peter Nicholas at the Journal. AS for the NYT, looks like it won’t run for a few days if not next Sunday, so will circle back on that as it develops.

Thanks again to all for the feedback.

Go Seahawks!

"Expanding opportunities for hardworking Americans so that families can get ahead has been a constant fight she has waged in every job she's held. You heard it from her last fall when she was campaigning for Democrats all over the country and repeatedly laid out the challenges many Americans still face as our economy makes gains. She’s casting a wide net, talking to a wide range of people on a wide range of specific topics. There's no red X on a calendar somewhere, but make no mistake, if she runs, she will present solutions to our toughest challenges, she will take nothing for granted, and she will fight for every vote. ”

From: Joel Benenson < jbenenson@bsgco.com >
Date: Sunday, February 1, 2015 at 5:39 PM
To: Cheryl Mills < cheryl.mills@gmail.com >
Cc: NSM < nmerrill@hrcoffice.com >, Mandy Grunwald < gruncom@aol.com >, Robby Mook < robbymook2015@gmail.com >, John Podesta < john.podesta@gmail.com >, Jacob Sullivan < Jake.sullivan@gmail.com >, Philippe Reines < pir@hrcoffice.com >, Huma Abedin < huma@hrcoffice.com >, Dan Schwerin < dschwerin@hrcoffice.com >, Jim Margolis < Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com >, John Anzalone < john@algpolling.com >, Cheryl Mills < cmills@cdmillsgroup.com >, Jennifer Palmieri < jennifer.m.palmieri@gmail.com >, Kristina Schake < kristinakschake@gmail.com >
Subject: RE: NYT & WSJ | Econ Stories

Definitely

From: Cheryl Mills [mailto:cheryl.mills@gmail.com]
Sent: Sunday, February 01, 2015 5:35 PM
To: Joel Benenson
Cc: Nick Merrill; Mandy Grunwald; Robby Mook; John Podesta; Jake Sullivan; Philippe Reines; Huma Abedin; Dan Schwerin; Jim Margolis; John Anzalone; Cheryl Mills; Jennifer Palmieri; Kristina Schake
Subject: Re: NYT & WSJ | Econ Stories

can we test every day americans next time?

On Sun, Feb 1, 2015 at 5:27 PM, Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com > wrote:

When we tested deck is stacked against “average Americans, with too many breaks for those at the top” vs. Gov regs and rules hurging biz and stopping them from creating jobs – by 49-41 among all voters and 56-33 with our MOR (middle of the road voters) . I think it’s how they see themselves in this environment, which remains their big pain point that she is fighting to fix.

For the moment it also creates a slight language difference with POTUS – not a big deal but a nuance.

Joel

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: Cheryl Mills [mailto:cheryl.mills@gmail.com]
Sent: Sunday, February 01, 2015 5:22 PM
To: Nick Merrill
Cc: Joel Benenson; Mandy Grunwald; Robby Mook; John Podesta; Jake Sullivan; Philippe Reines; Huma Abedin; Dan Schwerin; Jim Margolis; John Anzalone; Cheryl Mills; Jennifer Palmieri; Kristina Schake

Subject: Re: NYT & WSJ | Econ Stories

Looks good. I think you can take out average and still communicate you mean folks in middle with "hardworking" (who likes to be average?)

if average is important I might use everyday.

cdm

On Sun, Feb 1, 2015 at 4:36 PM, Nick Merrill <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com > wrote:

Great, thank you.

Robby to your point about letting her speak for herself, I¹ve been reminding people that they should be careful to acknowledge that this is part of a process. She laid out challenges that we face in the midterms, and now she¹s thinking through how we would address them should she run. Will reinforce that when I circle back with these guys today.

Here¹s the quote again incorporating peoples¹ thoughts. John Anzalone, I think Joel addressed what you were trying to get at so I left his edits as is, but let me know if you think we¹re missing anything. Otherwise will push this in the next little while. Thanks all.

"Expanding opportunities for average hardworking Americans so that they and their families can get ahead has been a constant fight she has waged in every job she's held. You heard it from her last fall when she was campaigning for Democrats all over the country and repeatedly laid out the challenges many Americans still face as our economy makes gains. She's casting a wide net, talking to a wide range of people on a range of specific topics. There's no red X on a calendar somewhere, but make no mistake, if she runs, she will present solutions to our toughest challenges, she will take nothing for granted, and she will fight for every vote."

On 2/1/15, 4:05 PM, "Joel Benenson" <jbenenson@bsgco.com > wrote:

>Yes.
>
>-----Original Message-----
>From: Mandy Grunwald [mailto:gruncom@aol.com]
>Sent: Sunday, February 01, 2015 4:05 PM
>To: Robby Mook
>Cc: Joel Benenson; Nick Merrill; John Podesta; Jake Sullivan; Philippe
>Reines; Cheryl Mills; Huma Abedin; Dan Schwerin; Jim Margolis; John
>Anzalone; Cheryl Mills; Jennifer Palmieri; Kristina Schake
>Subject: Re: NYT & WSJ | Econ Stories
>
>I like it too.
>
>There's a word missing toward the end. I assume it should say "...she >will present SOLUTIONS to our toughest challenges..."
>
>Thx
>
>Mandy Grunwald
>Grunwald Communications
>202 973-9400
>
>

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

>> On Feb 1, 2015, at 3:39 PM, Robby Mook <robbymook2015@gmail.com > wrote:
>>
>> Adding Jenn and Kristina
>> Joel I agree w your edits. In particular I want to avoid any >>expectations around how big or bold her ideas will be.
>> Nick I'm sure you're already doing this but I also would push hard on >>background that we can't judge a candidate who has yet to announce--give >>her a chance to speak for herself. I know that's impossible but worth >>trying to get them to acknowledge that she's not a candidate and this is >>all speculation.
>>
>>
>>> On Feb 1, 2015, at 3:14 PM, Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com > wrote:
>>>
>>> Thanks Nick.
>>>
>>> Going for a little more conversational here with this:
>>>
>>> "Expanding opportunities for average hardworking Americans so that >>>they and their families can get ahead has been a constant fight she has >>>waged in every job she's held. You heard it from her last fall when >>>she was campaigning for Democrats all over the country and repeatedly >>>laid out the challenges many Americans still face as our economy makes >>>gains. She's casting a wide net, talking to a wide range of people on >>>a range of specific topics. There's no red X on a calendar somewhere, >>>but make no mistake, if she runs, she will present to our toughest >>>challenges and she will take nothing for granted and she will fight >>>for every vote."
>>>
>>> -----Original Message-----
>>> From: Nick Merrill [mailto:nmerrill@hrcoffice.com]
>>> Sent: Sunday, February 01, 2015 2:46 PM
>>> To: John Podesta; Jake Sullivan; Philippe Reines; Robby Mook; Cheryl
>>>Mills; Huma Abedin; Dan Schwerin; Jim Margolis; John Anzalone; Mandy
>>>Grunwald; Cheryl Mills; Joel Benenson
>>> Subject: NYT & WSJ | Econ Stories
>>>
>>> As I mentioned on our call on Thursday, both the WSJ and the NYT are >>>working on stories about how HRC might approach economic policy issues >>>as a candidate. Both will have a dose of personnel name-gaming, and >>>I've spoken to both to steer them towards progressive names, which they >>>seem to both have on their own.
>>>
>>> I want to give both stories something on the record that addresses the >>>core of the story, but also speaks some of the things we all felt >>>needed a little proactive addressing, like inevitability and timing.
>>>
>>> On the inevitability question, John I tried to stick to the language >>>you suggested, though I did take the liberty of striking the word
>>>"idiot."
>>>
>>> "Increasing access to opportunity and fighting for upward mobility has >>>been an uninterrupted pursuit of hers in every job she's held. You >>>heard it from her on the campaign trail last fall, where she laid out >>>the challenges we face. She's casting a wide net, talking to a wide >>>range of people on a range of specific topics. There's no red X on a >>>calendar somewhere, but make no mistake, if she runs, she will take >>>nothing for granted, she'll present bold ideas, and she will fight for >>>every vote."
>>>
>>> Feedback welcome, but I'd like to ship this later today.
>>>
>>> Nick

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jake Sullivan" <jake.sullivan@gmail.com>
To: "Eizenstat, Stuart" <seizenstat@cov.com>
Date: 5/22/2015 8:58:28 AM
Subject: Re: Israel and Iran: Jewish People's Policy Institute of Jerusalem (JPPI)

Thanks Stu - Corey will find a time that works.

On May 22, 2015, at 8:37 AM, Eizenstat, Stuart <seizenstat@cov.com > wrote:

Jake,
Thanks. With my hat-on as Special Adviser to the Secretary of State for Holocaust Issues, I am co-chair of the European Shoah Legacy Institute conference in Prague Tuesday and Wednesday and then have a speech in Vienna for a deceased Austrian diplomat with whom I negotiated the 2001 Washington Agreement. I return to DC on Thursday afternoon and will be in the office by 4 pm. I am also available Friday. If you want to talk on this coming Monday, Memorial Day, I am open until my flight leaves for Prague around 5 pm.
Best wishes,
Stu

From: Jake Sullivan [mailto:jake.sullivan@gmail.com]
Sent: Friday, May 22, 2015 12:57 AM
To: Eizenstat, Stuart
Cc: Huma M. Abedin (huma@hrcoffice.com) <huma@hrcoffice.com >; Huma M. Abedin (huma@clintonemail.com) <huma@clintonemail.com >; John D. Podesta (John.Podesta@gmail.com) <John.Podesta@gmail.com >; Corey Ciorciari <cciorciari@hillaryclinton.com >
Subject: Re: Israel and Iran: Jewish People's Policy Institute of Jerusalem (JPPI)

Stu - there is much to discuss in here. Let's try to touch base early next week?

On May 21, 2015, at 5:34 PM, Eizenstat, Stuart <seizenstat@cov.com > wrote:

Dear Jake,

I thought it might be useful for the campaign to give you a quick summary of some of the points that were made at the JPPI conference we had on Monday and Tuesday of this week at Glen Cove, New York. Dennis Ross and I co-chair JPPI, which is based in Jerusalem, and was created by the Jewish Agency of Israel ten years ago to be a think tank for strategic issues facing Israel, the Diaspora, and USG-Israel relations. We have a group of fellows, like retired General Michael Herzog (brother of the opposition leader), Avi Gil and others. At the conference, we had Natan Sharansky, who heads the Jewish Agency; leading Jewish organizational leaders (e.g. heads of major UJA Federations around the country); leading rabbis (e.g. Norman Kurtz in Chicago, and Eric Yoffie); academics from Harvard to UCLA; a Member of the Canadian Parliament and former Cabinet Minister (Irwin Cotler)l Middle East experts like David Makovsky, Martin Indyk, and, of course, Dennis Ross, as well as Henry Kissinger and Eric Schmidt of Google, who talked about high tech in Israel. Moreover, Malcolm Honlein, the president of the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations (who I put together with Hillary through you and Huma), was there for the whole two day conference. and spoke on several occasions. We had a signficant number of Israelis there, as well.

1. ISRAEL

(1) The new Netanyahu government has very little flexibility on the peace process, given its right-wing tilt.

(2) While solid majorities of the Israeli public (over 60%) continue to support the two state solution, only a minority believe it is feasible, given Palestinian intransigence.

(3) A number of people, including, interestingly, Malcolm Honlein, felt the Prime Minister should now accept the last Kerry offer as a basis for resuming negotiations. Evidently, the last version given to Bibi did not contain language on Jerusalem (which he cannot accept), while the last version given to Abbas contained the language (but they still rejected it).

(4) There was a clear consensus that the BDS/anti-delegitimization movement against Israel was growing in Europe, and was an increasing threat.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(5) There was a grave concern that the Obama Administration, once the Iran nuclear negotiations are out of the way, will support some form of the French proposal for a new UN Resolution to supplant UN Resolution 242, endorsing the two-state solution, with 1967 borders, and with Jerusalem as the capital of both Israel and a Palestinian state. Several people felt that given the impasse in the peace process, Israel's argument that this should be left to negotiations, had a hollow ring to it. If this is going to happen, then it should be framed in ways that force the Palestinians to make tough choices, like ending claims to the "right of return". But the safest political position is to oppose what will be seen as an effort to "impose" a solution both sides will reject.

(6) There was a feeling on the part of some that Gaza was likely to blow-up again, a combination of Hamas rearming and rebuilding their tunnels, and the impact of the embargo, which has not been loosened.

(7) Israel needed to be more creative to take advantage of the open window for cooperating with the Sunni states (Saudi Arabia, the Gulf States, Egypt, Jordan) against their common enemy, Iran.

(8) Most troubling was the pervasive feeling that the US has withdrawn from a leadership position in the Middle East, leaving our allies in the Arab world, and Israel, to fend for themselves. The level of vitriol against the President was striking, to such a degree that one participant urged that he was being unfairly demonized.

2. ANTI-SEMITISM/ANTI-ZIONISM

(1) There was genuine belief that there is a substantial rise in anti-Semitism in Europe (a topic I addressed at some length). This is most evident in France (where 7000 French Jews left in 2014 for Israel, with almost double that amount expected this year); Belgium; parts of Sweden (Malmo); the Netherlands; Greece; Hungary; Ukraine; but even in the UK. Roger Cukierman, the long-time head of the CRIF, French Jewry's central organization, cited several examples of the growth of anti-Semitism during my negotiations with the French government for payments for people deported on the French railway during World War II, as Secretary Kerry's Special Adviser on Holocaust Issues. Thus, in 2001, when his first term began, 90% of school-age French Jews attended public schools; now only 30% do so, because of the intimidation in schools. It is dangerous to wear a kipot (head-covering) on the Metro. Argentine Jews are also increasingly fearful, in part because of their government's close relations with Iran, which is widely seen as having planned and funded the Hezbollah attacks in the 1990s against the Jewish community center (AMIA), and the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires.

(2) Modern-day anti-Semitism is a product of a combination of factors:

(a) Neo-Nazi/right wing parties, which have long had an anti-Semitic strain, like Le Pen's National Front in France.
(b) Left-wing parties/academics, who oppose Israel's settlement policy and occupation and import their opposition on Jews, who are seen (wrongly) as surrogates for Israel.
(c) Angry, disaffected, unintegrated Muslim young people, who identify with the Palestinians as the underdogs and address their anger for their plight and that of the Palestinians at Jews in their countries.

(3) French Prime Minister Valls estimates there are some 3000 European-born Muslims fighting in Syria and Iraq, 1000 from France, who come back to Europe, armed and trained jihadists. This was precisely the profile of the suspect in the Brussels Jewish Museum attack last year.

(4) The growth in anti-Semitism, and anti-Zionism is not limited to Europe. There is a greater security fear among Jews in both the U.S., Europe, and key Latin American countries. It was reported that 14 AEPi fraternity houses on American campuses were subject to some form of desecration. Several people said that "American campuses were our Europe".

(5) Malcolm Honlein placed special emphasis on the rise of anti-Semitism in his remarks. He said that the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations was catalyzing efforts to create a Global Forum to deal with this phenomenon, to track it, exchange information about it, and develop new ways to combat it. He said that Israel had a role to play, as well.

3. DIVISIONS WITH THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMUNITY OVER ISRAEL POLICY.

(1) There are increasingly sharp left-right divisions (J Street vs. AIPAC) within the American Jewish community over Israel. Remarkably, rabbis are reluctant to discuss Israel in their sermons for fear of alienating one faction or another.

(2) There was now a big debate over which groups can march in the annual New York City Israeli Independence Day parade, which take more liberal positions (e.g., New Israel Fund, J Street). It was generally felt best to have a "big tent" so the Democratic Party left-leaning people were not excluded.

(3) The kind of robust debate that occurs in Israel over Israeli policy, is blunted here by attacks against those who oppose the current government's policies in the West Bank.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(4) There was a clearly established (Pew and Gallup polls) drop in support for Israel among self-identified Democrats (now under 50%, with over 80% for Republicans). This could feed into making Israel a partisan issue (one of the problems with Bibi's speech to Congress) for the first time in its history, a dangerous situation.

4. IRAN NUCLEAR NEGOTIATIONS AND BEYOND

(1) This was the most emotional issue. Most of the participants who spoke on the topic (Sharansky, Kissinger, Honlein, Makovsky, Ross) were deeply skeptical of the Iranian nuclear negotiations. Clearly, Honlein and AIPAC will mount a major effort to block the agreement. There was a real foreboding (one participant called it a "panic") that the American Jewish community was going to be involved in a confrontation with the Administration, that the Republicans would use to try to drive a further wedge with Jewish voters over Israel-related issues.

(2) At the same time, there was a recognition (e.g. Kissinger) that the President would be able to overcome a veto override fight, although just barely.

(3) It was important to reassure Israel and Saudi Arabia and the Gulf States that any nuclear deal with Iran did not presage broader cooperation with Iran on regional issues. (Kissinger agreed, but felt it was inevitable over time, because Iran is a real country, with a long history)

(3) Several speakers (e.g. Ross) suggested that Israel should now begin to talk with the White House about ways to repair the damage to the relationship over the nuclear talks (if there is an agreement). Indeed, the President proposed to Bibi, in his call after the formation of the government, just that, but was rebuffed, seeing any cooperation as signaling he was giving up the fight against the deal.

(4) The options for a post-agreement reassurance included:

(a) Reassurance that the agreement would not lead to a new U.S.-Iranian alliance in the region, at the expense of our traditional alliances.
(b) Sophisticated military weapons to defend themselves against a resurgent Iran.
(c) Defense treaties, that an attack by Iran would be considered an attack against the U.S. (But this was fraught with difficulty; would it be all forms of attack or only a nuclear attack)
(d) Development of a common agenda with Israel, Saudi Arabia, Egypt and the Gulf States. This has not been initiated.

(5) The "snap-back" of sanctions was felt to be impractical. What would constitute a violation? Who would make the determination? Which sanctions would be re-imposed (US, EU, UN)?

(6) There needed to be a clear declaration after the 10/15 year period of the agreement, that a nuclear-armed Iran is unacceptable, and the U.S. would every means to stop it. Likewise, the U.S. could not afford to disengage from the region, and had to lead the coalition against Iran.

(7) There was almost no one who subscribed to the Administration's hope that over the 10/15 year period of the agreement, the Iranian regime would moderate. Far from it, the end of sanctions and the massive amount of money that would flow to Iran would strengthen the regime, provide more funds to support terrorist groups, and embolden them in the region.

I hope this is helpful in shaping Hillary's positions on these difficult issues. But more broadly, she needs to understand the great angst in the Jewish community over the cascade of challenges I have described. The empathy and appreciation she can demonstrate, would itself be important and reassuring.

Best wishes,

Stu Eizenstat

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
To: "Jake Sullivan" <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 7/16/2015 8:37:20 AM
Subject: Fwd: Action Required: Urge Members of Congress to Oppose a Bad Deal

---

---------- Forwarded message ----------
From: Mbronfein <mbronfein@gmail.com >
Date: Thursday, July 16, 2015
Subject: Fwd: Action Required: Urge Members of Congress to Oppose a Bad Deal
To: John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com >

Sent from my iPhone

Begin forwarded message:

From: "AIPAC Political Department " <grassroots@aipac.org >
Date: July 16, 2015 at 11:58:28 AM EDT
To: mbronfein@gmail.com
Subject: Action Required: Urge Members of Congress to Oppose a Bad Deal
Reply-To: "AIPAC" <membership@aipac.org >

Click here to view the web version.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Call
(202) 225-3121
to reach Senate and House members through the Capitol switchboard

E-mail your members of Congress

Find your members of Congress

Info/Questions grassroots@aipac.org

Background Information

After more than 20 months of negotiations, the United States and its negotiating partners announced a nuclear agreement with Iran. Throughout the negotiations, AIPAC outlined five critical criteria for a good deal. Unfortunately, the proposed agreement is fundamentally flawed in each of these vital areas.

The Iran Nuclear Agreement Review Act of 2015 established a procedure for congressional review of any nuclear agreement with Iran. Congress must now oppose this deal, which would leave Iran as a nuclear threshold state, thereby jeopardizing U.S. interests and posing an existential threat to Israel and other American allies.

Please call or email your members of Congress today and urge them to oppose this deal.

Phone Script

"I am calling to urge the senator/representative to oppose the Iran nuclear deal because it will not block Iran from getting a nuclear weapon."

Talking Points

- I have consistently supported diplomatic efforts to peacefully prevent Iran from obtaining nuclear weapons. I appreciate the hard work of the administration to reach a deal.
- Unfortunately, the proposed deal will let Iran become a threshold nuclear weapons state and will not guarantee international inspectors access to suspicious sites in Iran.
- Congress and the president have repeatedly said, "No deal is better than a bad deal." This is a bad deal.
- Congress must oppose this agreement, and urge the administration to negotiate a better deal that will truly prevent Iran from building a nuclear weapon.

Share this:

AIPAC

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To unsubscribe from future AIPAC emails or to confirm your e-mail preferences click here .

AIPAC | America's Pro-Israel Lobby
251 H Street NW • Washington, DC • 20001 • TEL 202-639-5200
Privacy Policy

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Adrienne Elrod" <aelrod@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "Tony Carrk" <tcarrk@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 4/25/2015 5:00:28 AM
Subject: Re: FOR APPROVAL: Simplified Talkers for Surrogates re NYT

Thank you

Sent from my iPhone

On Apr 25, 2015, at 11:52 AM, Tony Carrk <tcarrk@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

> Couple of changes on my end and then good. Saw a typo in "arrangement"
>
> - Would say author "works at an organization that has received Koch funding"
> - would just say arrangement instead of "unusual" arrangement.
>
> 1. The Times ignores the essential fact that Hillary Clinton was not at all involved in the State
>
> Department's review of the sale to the Russians, AS STATED BY THE FORMER STATE DEPARTMENT OFFICIAL WHO SERVED AS THE PRINCIPAL REPRESENTATIVE IN THIS PROCESS AT THE TIME.
>
> 4. The Times overlooks the fact that the State Department was just one of nine agencies involved in the
>
> U.S. government's review of the sale of Uranium One. IN ADDITION, THE DEAL WAS APPROVED BY THE NUCLEAR REGULATORY COMMISSION AND THE CANADIAN GOVERNMENT.
>
> On Sat, Apr 25, 2015 at 11:25 AM, Jennifer Palmieri <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:
>> Good!
>>
>> Sent from my iPhone
>>
>> On Apr 25, 2015, at 10:56 AM, Adrienne Elrod <aelrod@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:
>>
>>> Jen/Kristina/Tony -
>>>
>>> Can y'all give these a quick once over? Some of our surrogates/friends and fam who are not going on tv but just want the top lines on how to defend on this topic have asked for a super simplified version of talkers. Fallon has signed off. Thanks!
>>>
>>> Adrienne K. Elrod
>>> Spokesperson
>>> Hillary For America
>>> www.hillaryclinton.com
>>> @adrienneelrod
>>>
>>> <04.23.15 Simplified Talkers Re NYT Foundation Story.docx>
>>
>> --
>> You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
>> To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
>> To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
>> For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

--

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Milia Fisher" <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 5/1/2015 4:32:57 AM
Subject: Re: TWEETS 5/1

Great will send out now.

On Fri, May 1, 2015 at 11:23 AM, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com > wrote:

Ok to go.

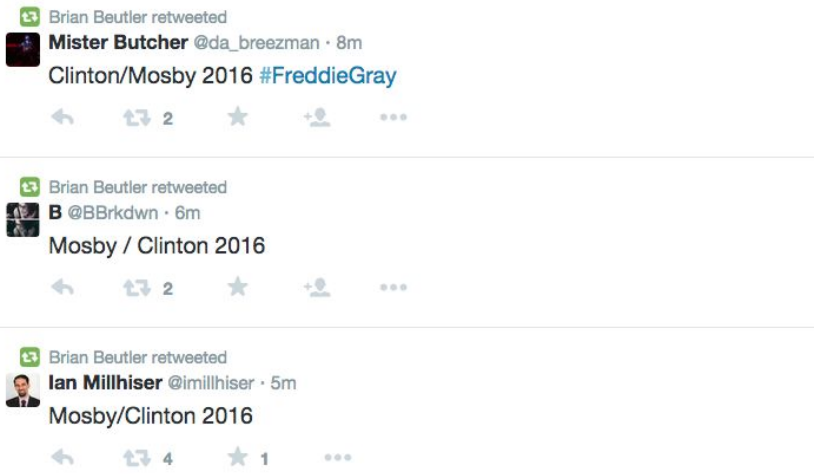
On May 1, 2015 8:15 AM, "Milia Fisher" <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

BREAKING: "The state attorney of Baltimore, in a unexpected announcement, said Friday that she had probable cause to file homicide, manslaughter and misconduct charges against the police officers in the death of Freddie Gray, who died after sustaining a spinal cord injury while in police custody.

In a news conference Friday, the state attorney, Marilyn J. Mosby, said that the death of Mr. Gray had been ruled a homicide and the police had been negligent in his death.

“We have probable cause to file criminal charges,” Ms. Mosby said. As Ms. Mosby spoke outside the War Memorial here, dozens of police officers dressed in riot gear stood nearby."- NYT

Her statement has been met with an outpouring of support on Twitter. Including:



TWEET:

Commend efforts of @MarilynMosbyEsq to seek justice for Freddie Gray and for the youth of Baltimore.

Note: "justice for the youth of Baltimore" echoes a line from her press statement. Could wait until HRC makes a statement if you're worried about getting out ahead of her.

On Fri, May 1, 2015 at 10:25 AM, Milia Fisher <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

Note: my new goal is to send a second round of Tweets in the PM to respond to campaign developments throughout the day.

TWEETS 5/1

New study: ice-loss in Antarctica increased 6 bil tons/year each year from 2003 to 2014. Cap melting faster than ever. tp://bit.ly/1JegM3y (140)

If you can't keep track of Schweizer's fabrications, distortions in "Clinton Cash" @MediaMatters can help: http://bit.ly/1GCbj3A (137)

RETWEETS 5/1

Suggestion from KLC:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

US Dept of Interior @Interior · 22h

Check out the Share the Experience photo contest winner: Polar bears at Arctic #WildlifeRefuge by Gregory Teller

193 226 View more photos and videos

--
Milia Fisher
Special Assistant to the Chair
Hillary for America
mfisher@hillaryclinton.com
o: 646.854.1198 c: 858.395.1741

--
Milia Fisher
Special Assistant to the Chair
Hillary for America
mfisher@hillaryclinton.com
o: 646.854.1198 c: 858.395.1741

--
Milia Fisher
Special Assistant to the Chair
Hillary for America
mfisher@hillaryclinton.com
o: 646.854.1198 c: 858.395.1741

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sara Du Bois" <sdubois@progressivemediausa.org>
To: "Sara Du Bois" <SDuBois@progressivemediausa.org>
Date: 4/29/2008 1:10:28 AM
Subject: [big campaign] '08 Daily News Clips - 4/29

8 Election Daily News Clips
April 29th, 2008

Candidate Tracking:

10am McCain: Health Care Speech in Tampa, FL
- Tracking scheduled for this event
12pm McCain: Luncheon in Tampa, FL

2:50pm BUSH: Remarks to National Volunteer Week from the White House

6pm McCain: Finance Event in Fort Myers, FL

News Clips:

MCCAIN HEALTH CARE NEWS

McCain Launches New TV Ad on Health Care (The Page 4/29/08)
60-second spot airing in Iowa gets specific on his approach — including his support for a refundable tax credit for insurance, community health centers and walk-in clinics.
http://thepage.time.com/2008/04/29/mccain-launches-new-tv-ad-on-health-care/
Link to video of ad: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=m6l61-zIXOE

McCain would 'put families in charge' of health care (USA TODAY 4/29/08)
By David Jackson
John McCain spent much of last week emphasizing how he's a different kind of Republican. This week, he focuses on his plans for health care, which are more aligned with President Bush and other Republicans.
http://www.usatoday.com/news/politics/election2008/2008-04-28-McCain_N.htm

McCain's Health Insurance Plan Would Not Cover Child Featured At Campaign Event (ThinkProgress 4/28/08)
By Adam Jentleson
Today at a campaign event, Sen. John McCain (R-AZ) toured Miami Children's Hospital and met with some of the facility's young patients. As The New York Times reported, McCain heard the story of Jake, a 9 year-old child with a cleft palate. Cleft palates can be fixed with a simple operation, but as Jake's father told McCain today, his family has been struggling to get their insurance company to cover the post-operation therapy Jake needs. http://thinkprogress.org/wonkroom/2008/04/28/mccain-jake/
See also: http://thinkprogress.org/2008/04/28/mccain-children-hospital/

McCain moves to middle on health care (Politico 4/29/08)
By Mike Allen and Jonathan Martin
Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) is proposing a greater federal commitment to people without health insurance on Tuesday, suggesting that states set up non-profit risk pools to help Americans who are denied coverage or can't afford it.
http://www.politico.com/news/stories/0408/9940.html

McCain rejects 'big government' takeover of health care (CNN 4/28/08)
Democrats say McCain offering continuation of Bush's health care policies
Presumptive GOP nominee says rejects "big government" solution
McCain wants to put "families" in charge of their own health care
Arizona Republican challenges doctors, insurers to lower costs http://www.cnn.com/2008/POLITICS/04/28/mccain/?iref=hpmostpop

McCain sees greater choice as U.S. health-care fix (Reuters 4/29/08)
By John Whitesides
Republican presidential candidate John McCain on Tuesday will propose more choices in health-care coverage for Americans to foster competition, drive down costs and reduce reliance on employer-based insurance.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://www.reuters.com/article/marketsNews/idUSN2841474420080429

McCain Listens to Health Care Stories (NY Times blog 4/28/08)
By Michael Cooper
When Senator John McCain toured Miami Children's Hospital here on Monday and met and listened to some of its young patients and their parents, one of the topics they brought up raised questions about how his health care plan would work.
http://thecaucus.blogs.nytimes.com/2008/04/28/mccain-listens-to-health-care-stories/

Health Care on McCain Horizon (Washington Post blog 4/28/08)
By Michael D. Shear
In Sen. John McCain's perfect health care world, individuals would each seek the ideal health insurance policy in a competitive marketplace that would drive down premiums even as prevention and healthier living reduces the cost of care.
http://blog.washingtonpost.com/the-trail/2008/04/28/health_care_on_mccain_horizon.html

McCain Hears Plea on Health Insurance (WSJ blog 4/28/08)
By Laura Meckler
Sen. John McCain kicked off a week of health care events at Miami Children's Hospital, where he heard several families talk about how they confronted medical challenges. In general, the stories had little direct relationship to the political debate under way over how to expand coverage to more Americans and reduce the cost of care. But one family, perhaps unintentionally, stepped into one of the hot policy topics.
http://blogs.wsj.com/washwire/2008/04/28/mccain-hears-plea-on-health-insurance/?mod=modValue

Dissecting McCain's Medicaid Trust Fund (ABC 4/28/08)
By TEDDY DAVIS and TALAL AL-KHATIB
As John McCain prepares to flesh out his health-reform policies during a Tuesday speech in Tampa, Fla., Democrats see pre-existing conditions as his Achilles' heel.... Holtz-Eakin Reveals Health Care Plan to ABC News...
http://abcnews.go.com/Politics/TheNote/story?id=3105455&page=1

E. Edwards v. McCain on Health Care (MSNBC 4/28/08)
By Adam Aigner-Treworgy
The Center for American progress held a conference call responding to McCain's health-care roundtable this morning and the impending rollout of his health-care proposal tomorrow. On the call, Elizabeth Edwards responded to the public back-and-forth between her and McCain on whether McCain's plan would cover people like them -- cancer survivors -- and whether McCain's Naval health-care coverage has put him out of touch with the trials of the open healthcare market.
http://firstread.msnbc.msn.com/archive/2008/04/28/952742.aspx
See also: http://www.cbsnews.com/blogs/2008/04/28/politics/fromtheroad/entry4051160.shtml

MCCAIN NEWS

The Militarist (American Prospect 4/28/08)
By Matthew Yglesias
Presumptive Republican nominee John McCain may protest that he hates war, but no American leader has promoted it more avidly. McCain is not only the most hawkish neocon on the horizon; he genuinely sees war as America's most ennobling enterprise.
http://prospect.org/cs/articles?article=the_militarist

McCain says Americans most willing to sacrifice (AP 4/28/08)
By TED ANTHONY
You look at the man today — immaculately tailored suit, ramrod-straight posture, confidently articulating complex beliefs in a swanky Midwestern hotel — and it's almost impossible to fathom who he was between 1967 and 1973....McCain doesn't want to be defined by his wartime experiences alone. But when the Arizona senator talks the talk of service and sacrifice, it's never less than crystal clear that, for five torturous years, he walked the walk.
http://ap.google.com/article/ALeqM5gxBfRO_F2zn8FytaN8v1sndZw1agD90B0QDO0

Ala. mayor apologizes for cut-rate rent deal for McCain (Seattle Times 4/28/08)
The mayor apologized Monday for giving John McCain a cut-rate rental deal on a city building and said he would ask the senator's Republican presidential campaign to pay the full amount.
http://seattletimes.nwsource.com/html/politics/2004379363_apmccaincheaprent.html

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Barbour touts moderate McCain (Washington Times 4/29/08)
By Ralph Z. Hallow
Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour yesterday said that he is too conservative to be John McCain's running mate but that the Arizona senator's maverick reputation will help him in an election in which moderates and independents will be more important than in recent years.
http://washingtontimes.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20080429/NATION/129393134/1001

McCains Keeps All Assets In Cindy's Name (Except One Checking Account) (Huffington Post 4/28/08)
John McCain has repeatedly argued that his wife's financial holdings are separate from his political life, and should remains so for the privacy of her and her children. However, as Slate pointed out this weekend, McCain has no problems keeping nearly everything the couple does own in her name:
http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2008/04/28/mccains-keeps-all-assets_n_99003.html

McCain Camp Is Neocon Redux: It's Official (Huffington Post 4/28/08)
By Jacob Heilbrunn
Speaking Monday at a fascinating on-the-record session on U.S.-Russia relations at the Nixon Center, former Reagan administration official Robert McFarlane declared that McCain's first year as president would be "neocon redux."
http://www.huffingtonpost.com/jacob-heilbrunn/mccain-camp-is-neocon-red_b_99046.html

Its Candidates Otherwise Engaged, Democratic Party Goes After McCain (NY Times 4/29/08)
By JIM RUTENBERG
With no end in sight to the nominating contest between Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama, the Democratic Party has begun its first sustained advertising campaign against Senator John McCain, introducing a new commercial this week criticizing his recent comments that he could envision a United States presence in Iraq for 100 years.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/04/29/us/politics/29ads.html?_r=1&ref=politics&oref=slogin

RNC Chairman Calls on Networks to Not Air Innacurate DNC Ad (The Page 4/28/08)
Republican National Committee (RNC) Chairman Robert M. "Mike" Duncan today called on cable news networks to not air or to pull the Democratic National Committee's (DNC) inaccurate and malicious advertisement titled "100" off the air.
http://thepage.time.com/rnc-release-on-dnc-anti-mccain-ad/

McCain: Obama and Wright do not share views (CNN 4/28/08)
Despite his newfound willingness to make political hay out of Rev. Jeremiah Wright, John McCain insisted three separate times on Monday he does not believe Barack Obama shares Wright's "extremist views."
http://politicalticker.blogs.cnn.com/2008/04/28/mccain-obama-and-wright-do-not-share-views/

McCain refuses to play "referee" on Wright flare ups (FOX 4/28/08)
by Mosheh Oinounou
Sen. McCain said Monday that he refuses to play "referee" as state and local Republicans continue to use the Jeremiah Wright issue in their races across the country.
http://embeds.blogs.foxnews.com/2008/04/28/mccain-refuses-to-play-referee-on-wright-flare-ups/

McCain's Oscillation About Wright (Atlantic Online 4/28/08)
By Marc Ambinder
It's worth pointing out that the qualitative difference between the North Carolina Republican Party advertisement and what John McCain has said about Rev. Jeremiah Wright is fairly tiny. Ostensibly, it's because Obama told Chris Wallace that Wright is a legitimate issue. But why would McCain change his position about the legitimacy of the Rev. Wright association based on something Obama said? From an ethical standpoint, injecting Wright into the campaign is legitimate or it isn't. It shouldn't matter what Obama believes.
http://marcambinder.theatlantic.com/archives/2008/04/mccain_and_wright.php

From the Left, Clinton Scolds McCain Over Republican Ads on Wright (CBS 4/28/08)
By Fernando Suarez
At a press conference in this small town outside of Greensboro, Hillary Clinton said John McCain has not done enough to stop state party officials from running television ads targeting Barack Obama's relationship with controversial pastor Jeremiah Wright.
http://www.cbsnews.com/blogs/2008/04/28/politics/fromtheroad/entry4050165.shtml?CMP=OTC-RSSFeed&source=RSS&attr=FromTheRoad_4050165

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

McCain Plans Major NY Fundraiser (NY Times blog 4/28/08)
By Michael D. Shear
Sen. John McCain will hold his first really big fundraiser next week in New York City, a gala event hosted by New York Jets owner Woody Johnson and attended by some of the biggest names in New York finance and industry. The joint fundraiser with the Republican National Committee is expected to raise about $4 million.
http://blog.washingtonpost.com/the-trail/2008/04/28/mccain_plans_major_ny_fundrais.html

McCain accused of accepting improper donations from Rothschilds (UK Guardian 4/29/08)
By Daniel Nasaw
A US campaign watchdog has accused presumptive Republican president nominee John McCain of violating election laws by accepting campaign contributions from two prominent Londoners.
http://www.guardian.co.uk/world/2008/apr/29/johnmccain.uselections2008

With the FEC Inactive, the Complaints Fly (Washington Post blog 4/28/08)
By Matthew Mosk
If the Federal Election Commission weren't paralyzed, its members would be pretty busy today. First came the complaint filed this morning by the group Judicial Watch, alleging that the use of London's Spencer House for a fundraising luncheon by Sen. John McCain was in-kind donation to the campaign by foreign nationals, in violation of federal campaign finance laws.
http://blog.washingtonpost.com/the-trail/2008/04/28/with_the_fec_inactive_the_comp.html

House Republicans say Clinton more of a threat to McCain (AP 4/28/08)
House Republicans would rather the Democrats nominate Barack Obama for president because they believe Hillary Rodham Clinton would be more of a threat to John McCain among moderate voters, said Rep. Tom Cole, the GOP's campaign chief.
http://ap.google.com/article/ALeqM5iNxTApa2sQRu0Xx99P3jt2bEXw7gD90B1QJ00

OPINIONS AND EDITORIALS

McCain's School Choice Opportunity (WSJ 4/29/08)
By WILLIAM MCGURN; Page A11
...There's a good opening here for John McCain. As a senator, he has been a forceful voice for giving lower-income moms and dads the same options for their children that wealthier parents already enjoy. What if he took this campaign into the heart of our cities – and gave a little straight talk about the scandal that their public-school systems represent in this great land of opportunity?
http://online.wsj.com/article/SB120942961057851329.html?mod=todays_columnists

A Pastor at Center Stage (Washington Post 4/29/08)
By George F. Will; A17
Because John McCain and other legislators worry that they are easily corrupted, there are legal limits to the monetary contributions that anyone can make to political candidates. There are, however, no limits to the rhetorical contributions that the Rev. Jeremiah Wright can make to McCain's campaign.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/04/28/AR2008042802100.html

BUSH NEWS

Bush hopes to kickstart peace talks during Mideast trip (AP 4/28/08)
Bush to visit Israel, Saudi Arabia and Egypt in May
The president is pushing for a peace deal before leaving office
Bush will meet with Israeli prime minister and Palestinian president http://www.cnn.com/2008/POLITICS/04/28/bush.mideast.ap/index.html

OTHER TOP NEWS

AP Poll: Clinton leads McCain by 9 points (AP 4/28/08)
By LIZ SIDOTI
Hillary Rodham Clinton now leads John McCain by 9 points in a head-to-head presidential matchup, according to an Associated Press-Ipsos poll that bolsters her argument that she is more electable than Democratic rival Barack Obama. Obama and Republican McCain are running about even.
http://abcnews.go.com/Politics/Vote2008/wireStory?id=4739626

GOP fears Pelosi power grab on Iraq (Politico 4/28/08)
By: Martin Kady II
Republicans are howling over what appears to be Nancy Pelosi's plan to bypass the House Appropriations

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Committee on the upcoming Iraq war supplemental, complaining that the move will be the beginning of the end of the usual appropriations process and will further consolidate power in the hands of a speaker who already has a lot of it. ... Staffers say Pelosi's office is considering taking $178 billion war funding bill straight to the House floor.
http://www.politico.com/news/stories/0408/9938.html

GOP plans half-million hit on Obama, Dems (Politico 4/28/08)
By: Josh Kraushaar
After weeks of controversies, Republicans now are ready to place a $500,000 bet that Obama will be a heavy burden on down-ballot Democrats.
http://www.politico.com/news/stories/0408/9933.html

Obama Adds to Distance From Pastor and Opinions (NY Times 4/29/08)
By JEFF ZELENY
If it was not clear before Monday, Senator Barack Obama said, it should be clear now: His presidential campaign has no control over what the Rev. Jeremiah A. Wright Jr., his former pastor, says or what he does.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/04/29/us/politics/29wright.html?hp

As Clinton Seeks Gas Tax Break for Summer, Obama Says No (Washington Post 4/29/08)
By JOHN M. BRODER
As angry truckers encircled the Capitol in a horn-blaring caravan and consumers across the country agonized over $60 fill-ups, the issue of high fuel prices flared on the campaign trail on Monday, sharply dividing the two Democratic candidates.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/04/29/us/politics/29campaign.html?_r=1&hp=&adxnnl=1&oref=slogin&adxnnlx=1209456664-YPkGn4gPvJKOuthDminBLg

4 US soldiers killed; militants shell Green Zone (AP 4/28/08)
By SLOBODAN LEKIC
Bombardments by suspected militants killed four U.S. soldiers Monday as troops tried to push Shiite fighters farther from the U.S.-protected Green Zone and out of range of their rockets and mortars. At least 44 American soldiers have been killed in Iraq in April, making it the deadliest month for U.S. forces since September.
http://ap.google.com/article/ALeqM5gkx-3oYeFwuWKCusr2jrojs98w8wD90B3BCG0

Is an Iranian general the most powerful man in Iraq? (McClatchy 4/29/08)
Hannah Allam, Jonathan S. Landay and Warren P. Strobel
One of the most powerful men in Iraq isn't an Iraqi government official, a militia leader, a senior cleric or a top U.S. military commander or diplomat, He's an Iranian general, and at times he's more influential than all of them.
http://www.mcclatchydc.com/227/story/35146.html

Marines launch operation in Afghanistan's Taliban territory (AP 4/29/08)
By JASON STRAZIUSO
U.S. Marines in helicopters and Humvees flooded into a Taliban-held town in southern Afghanistan's most violent province early Tuesday, the first major American operation in the region in years.
http://ap.google.com/article/ALeqM5jnypM0Yl4qSc3-IpcxPYSOj9t4KAD90B8QC89

U.N.'s Envoy To Afghanistan Sees Threats To Progress (Washington Post 4/29/08)
By Karen DeYoung; A14

--
Sara L. DuBois
Progressive Media USA
Sdubois@progressivemediausa.org
202-609-7681 (office)
410-967-7306 (cell)
--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Antonino La Rosa Presidente La Rosa Foundation" <presidente@larosa-foundation.com>
To:	podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date:	9/6/2015 9:01:50 AM
Subject:	I: Request financial support energy cooperation UE/USA.
Attachments:	Letter President Council of Ministers in Italy MATTEO RENZI.pdf Presentation Larber International Limited - english version -.pdf La Rosa Foundation and RFK Foundation.pdf JFK-RFK Save the Date_.pdf

Da: Antonino La Rosa Presidente La Rosa Foundation [mailto:presidente@larosa-foundation.com]
Inviato: sabato 5 settembre 2015 15:25
A: 'federica.mogherini@ec.europa.eu'
Cc: 'The.Secretary@hq.doe.gov'
Oggetto: Request financial support energy cooperation UE/USA.
Priorità: Alta

Vice President Federica MOGHERINI Representative of the Union for Foreign Affairs and Security Policy p.c.
Dr. Ernest Moniz Secretary of Energy USA

****

Dear Federica ,

I am Antonio La Rosa a President La Rosa Foundation (see attached doc. 1) and CEO of the Company in start up Larber International Limited, with subsidiary in Italy (see attached doc. 2).

I express satisfaction with the mandate given by the European Commission.

Russia's Gazprom has bolstered its industrial presence in the heart of Europe with two major gas deals that were announced on Friday despite ongoing tensions with Moscow over the conflict in eastern Ukraine.

Gazprom abandoned its South Stream pipeline project, designed to deliver gas from Russia to Europe via the Black Sea and Bulgaria, last year under EU pressure. The EU has instead encouraged the development of alternative supplies from the Caspian Sea and the United States.

New liquefied natural gas (LNG) exports from the United States should also be in full swing by then and likely landing on Europe's shores in significant volumes, a development which could challenge Russia's energy dominance.
Investment banks (Bank of America Merrill Lynch, JP Morgan, Goldman Sachs, Morgan Stanley and other) must help us also in the interest of our gas suppliers in the United States of America.

We ask for your help for Investment Banks support business operations aimed at cooperation between our Company Larber International Limited and the Companies authorized by the Department of Energy of the United States to export LNG in Europe.

LA ROSA FOUNDATION and Larber International Limited works to strengthen cooperation with the USA.

With the diplomatic mission of the United States of America in Italy, we have remembered Robert and John Kennedy (see attachments doc. 3-4).

We are eager to initiate a fruitful cooperation.

I look forward to hearing from you.

Yours sincerely ,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Antonino La Rosa

M. +39 393 9154197

presidente@larosa-foundation.com

Presidente La Rosa Foundation

Registered Office

Via Tre Monti n°15 – Complesso La Noria Corpo B – 98057 Milazzo(Me)

Tel. +39 06 99341261 Fax +39 06 99334996 pec: larosa-foundation@pec.it

www.larosa-foundation.com

The information transmitted is intended only for the person or entity to which it is addressed and may contain confidential and/or privileged material. Any review, retransmission or other use of this information by persons or entities other than the intended recipient is prohibited. If you received this in error, please contact the sender and delete the material from any computer.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Josh Schwerin" <jschwerin@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "Matt Ortega" <mortega@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 4/29/2015 12:06:23 PM
Subject: Re: Clinton Cash in Politico Blast

Great job by Carter, Vas and Tyson getting this called false.

a review of then-Sen. Clinton's statements and votes while the Indian nuclear deal was under debate shows that two key facts in Schweizer's argument on the topic are false, as Clinton actually publicly stated her support for the deal in 2006 and in fact voted against a "killer amendment" that the book reports she supported.

On Wed, Apr 29, 2015 at 7:04 PM, Matt Ortega <mortega@hillaryclinton.com> wrote:

> ANOTHER SNEAK PEEK INSIDE 'CLINTON CASH': HILLARY CLINTON changed her position on a 2008 nuclear agreement between the United States and India after Indian business and government interests flooded various Clinton enterprises with cash, a highly-anticipated new book alleges in a chapter obtained by POLITICO.
>
> The book - "Clinton Cash: The Untold Story of How and Why Foreign Governments and Businesses Help Make Bill and Hillary Rich" - has become a major point of contention as Clinton kicks off her 2016 bid for the White House and her team has aggressively fought to both discredit its conservative author, Peter Schweizer, and to debunk its claims before publication.
>
> The newly obtained chapter, titled, "Indian Nukes: How to Win a Medal by Changing Hillary's Mind," details a series of donations and overtures from Indians who supported the nuclear deal to the Clintons, and points to one case of an Indian-American Clinton donor - who in April 2014 pleaded guilty in an illegal contribution scheme for Clinton's 2008 run - receiving an award from the Indian government for his work in securing the agreement.
>
> Schweizer said this week on MSNBC's "Morning Joe" that the episode showed "a pattern of behavior...the proof is, you look at a series of actions in which money flows to the Clintons, either through speaking fees or Clinton Foundation donors. HILLARY CLINTON takes a course of action that benefits those donors, in many cases, I think, outlined in the book, she is reversing course on policy prescriptions as it relates to India."
>
> While Clinton's India stance evolved over the years, a review of then-Sen. Clinton's statements and votes while the Indian nuclear deal was under debate shows that two key facts in Schweizer's argument on the topic are false, as Clinton actually publicly stated her support for the deal in 2006 and in fact voted against a "killer amendment" that the book reports she supported.
>
> Asked about the allegations by POLITICO, Clinton campaign spokesman Josh Schwerin said "Clinton Cash is attempting to rewrite history to fit a pre-determined partisan narrative. It only takes a quick look at Hillary's actual voting record and statements to see that this conspiracy theory doesn't even come close to passing the smell test." Full story to post tonight on POLITICO.
>
> --
> You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRR" group.
> To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrr+unsubscribe@hillaryclinton.com .
> To post to this group, send email to hrcrr@hillaryclinton.com .

--
Josh Schwerin
Spokesperson
Hillary for America
@Josh Schwerin

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Tony Podesta" <podesta@podesta.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 8/16/2015 3:20:17 PM
Subject: RE: Today's Post story on HRC

What did you think of her point

From: John Podesta [mailto:john.podesta@gmail.com]
Sent: Sunday, August 16, 2015 3:39 PM
To: Tony Podesta
Subject: Fwd: Today's Post story on HRC

Know her?

---------- Forwarded message ----------
From: <catherinehand5@aol.com >
Date: Sunday, August 16, 2015
Subject: Today's Post story on HRC
To: jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com , john.podesta@gmail.com
Cc: lorraine@xeolux.com

Dear Jake and John:

I'm sending this to you at the suggestion of my friend Lorraine Hariton. By way of introduction, back in 1980 I helped Norman Lear create People For the American Way -- even before Tony Podesta came into the picture. I spent months traveling across the country with Norman meeting with so many people to talk about the rise of something Norman was seeing -- the rise of the Religious Right and its impact on our politics. You know the rest.

Currently, I am one of the producers of a film adaptation of the award wining children's classic, A Wrinkle in Time, that Jennifer Lee (FROZEN) is scripting for Disney. I mention this, because this book has meant a great deal to millions of young people over the past 50 years. Even Sheryl Sandberg was quoted in the New York Times during an interview for her book, Lean In, that A Wrinkle in Time was her favorite childhood book.

Wrinkle was written in 1962 and received the Newberry Award for children's literature in 1963, the year I first read it. As you will read in this note, 1963 was quite a tumultuous year. The year before, in 1962, the Cuban missile crisis threatened the world with the possibility of nuclear war. Against a backdrop of uncertainty, death, and fear, A Wrinkle in Time, came along at a time when young people needed a way to understand the changing world around them. It wasn't necessarily a conscious need, more a longing or yearning for a way to comprehend the evil that existed, and to feel comforted by a story that helped us see that it could be overcome. I think the need for a vision of a loving and empathetic universe is as needed today as it was 50 years ago.

I'm writing a book about my 50 year journey to make Wrinkle into a movie and have been doing research on the past 5 decades which moved me to write this note to Lorraine this morning.

Lorraine-

Just wanted to send along a few thoughts re today's Post story on HRC. First, hope you are enjoying your time in NY. The emails and phone calls about the campaign are very helpful.

Something struck me in reading the Post piece that you may want to consider. When Hillary speaks of the email issue or other issues, her counter is "politics as usual." Those very words are what contribute to the general feeling of her tone deafness. I have no idea what is said in your discussions, but I assume lots of very smart, savvy people are thinking about this problem everyday. Most people do not know what she really means when she says "politics as usual' and it might help her if she were more precise in her reply. What I mean by that is not to use words that mean something to people who follow politics, but use words that mean something to people who don't. And, "politics as usual' is immediately heard as "politics as usual in Clinton-world."

Take every single opportunity she has to explain in the simplest way over and over again that she represents change to a more conservative way of thinking and rather than talk about the need for inclusivity in all things for all Americans, her opponents only want to instill fear about her as a person and the change she represents.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I've been doing a little research on the big historical events over the past 50 years and it is a real awakening to take in how much change this country has been dealing with ever since 1963.

Hillary's candidacy is an accumulation of a 50-year shift in attitudes and ever since the early 1970s a backlash to this change has taken shape and strengthened. It's not a vast right wing conspiracy - it is real fear of change. When she uses the words 'politics as usual' it only helps to strengthen that backlash.

She needs to be seen and heard as someone who can lead us to a more empathetic world where we can learn to actually get along with those who are different than us.

Take a look at what happened in 1963:

George Wallace became Governor of Alabama and proclaimed "segregation now, segregation tomorrow, and segregation forever. "

Betty Friedan's The Feminine Mystique launched the reawakening of the women's movement in the United States as women's organizations and consciousness raising groups spread.

70,000 marchers arrived in London to demonstrate against nuclear weapons.

Martin Luther King, Jr. issued his Letter from Birmingham Jail.

The US Supreme Court ruled that state-mandated Bible reading in public schools was unconstitutional.

Pope Paul VI succeeded Pope John XXIII and continued the Vatican Council II. Priests were now asked to celebrate Mass in the language of the countries in which they lived, face the congregation, and not only to be heard and seen but also to signal to worshippers that they were being included because they were a vital component of the service. No longer was prayer to be seen as a performance, but active participation.

The United States, United Kingdom, and Soviet Union signed a nuclear test ban treaty.

Martin Luther King, Jr delivered his I Have A Dream speech on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial to an audience of 250,000 people participating in the March on Washington for Jobs and Freedoms.

South Vietnamese President Diem was assassinated following a military coup.

" I Want to Hold Your Hand" and " I Saw Her Standing There" were released in the U.S., marking the beginning of Beatlemania on an international level.

President John F. Kennedy was assassinated.

And the 1970s became fertile ground for even more divisiveness:

As the protests against the Viet Nam war intensified, the backlash began to take shape. When Richard Nixon won the presidency in 1968 he dismantled programs put in place by President Johnson's War on Poverty. The anti-war protests increased in frequency and no longer only w ere students protesting, but professors, scientists, and stay at home mothers.

In response to protesters, hippies and the new drug culture, President Nixon's 'silent majority,' -- mostly white working and middle class voters, were angry at what they saw as the destruction of a country they had known and loved.

The nation seemed to tear apart at the seams as America watched the live coverage of the Watergate hearings. When President Nixon finally resigned from office in 1974 the seeds of government mistrust were firmly rooted.

The women's rights movement took hold when Congress approved the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA) to the Constitution in 1972. Twenty-two of the necessary 38 states ratified with no difficulty, but the conservative faction in the country saw it as a threat to the traditional role of wife and mother and successfully fought back and defeated it.

The 1980s were a difficult period for Democrats. I remember helping to mount the Democratic convention in 1984 and standing on the podium that last night looking at a sea of waving American flags, excited that the first woman had been nominated for Vice President, inspired by Mario Cuomo's speech about the "two cities on a hill" and all I could think about was my dog. I didn't believe in any of it anymore. Reagan had done a great job of making the word liberal sound like a dirty word. Few Democrats had passion back then- we were so splintered and couldn't get along which lead to the creation of Democratic Leadership Forum and the eventual rise of Bill Clinton in 1992.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary is the embodiment of the changes that have been bubbling up since 1963. She is a woman embracing the need to include everyone at the table. But, she is falling into a trap that started in the 80s -- demonizing her opponent. That happened back in the 80s to raise funds. Direct mail campaigns for Dems, Republicans, and special interests groups had to demonize their opponents to fan the flames of fear to survive.

What Bernie Sanders represents is someone who doesn't seem to be caught in that demonizing cycle. There has to be a way for Hillary to rise above it, too, with humor, compassion and empathy. She needs new tactics, a new strategy and to breakaway fro m how she handled her adversaries in the past. She most likely first developed her deep distrust of conservative operatives in her formative years working as a lawyer during the Watergate hearings. That mistrust of Nixon and his associates left a lasting scar on so many of us. But, we need to move passed it.

Stephen Hawking said something recently that might help ground a new strategy:

“The human failing I would most like to correct is aggression. It may have had survival advantage in caveman days, to get more food, territory or a partner with whom to reproduce, but now it threatens to destroy us all. We need to replace aggression with empathy, which “brings us together in a peaceful loving state.”

Hillary needs to be President of the United States to act upon Hawking’s insight and her ability to lead must start with a new kind of campaign.

Catherine

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sara DuBois" <sara@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 8/7/2008 6:50:04 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Town Hall in Lima, OH 08/07/08

Hello All,
Just got off the phone with our tracker, Lee, on the ground in Lima, OH. Below are the notes from our call.

BIG HIGHLIGHTS:

- Asked if he would again vote for Iraq War, McCain says Saddam would've been using $ from $120/barrel oil to acquire WMDs so world's better off w/o him
- Local pol introducing McCain compares Obama to Mark Dann, OH AG caught in sex-scandal
- Calls Obama "confused," Says "I know he hasn't been in the Senate that long, but even in the real world voting for something means you support it, and voting against something means you oppose it. "
- Brings up Obama's 'inflate your tires' suggestion is "not an energy plan--that's a public service announcement"
- Says he "do[es] not recognize" increasing demand from other countries when assessing benefits of offshore drilling
- Says we ought to reduce our commitment in Sadr City, Iraqis ought to pay more
- Says we have to "focus" our military/V.A. care to 'those unique aspects to veterans care'
- Says 'I don't know much about speculation'

Lima, OH: McCain Town Hall 08/07/08
(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

Background Details

- 300-400 people, mostly white - venue at capacity
- Tracker didn't see any protesters
- Steve Schmidt in the audience; also Mike DeWine; Mark Salter lurking behind the curtains
- Seats marked "reserved" flanking podium where McCain to speak - people were personally escorted to those seats by staffers
- Pre-event fanfare: cheerleaders and boyscouts; Pledge of Allegiance
- Local pol (presumably Keith Cheney, Allen County GOP chair) speaking at beginning of event compares to Mark Dann, OH AG caught in sex-scandal
- Cong. Jim Jordan gives introductory remarks
- Adm. Tom Lynch introduces Cindy McCain
    - 'What is not obvious is that she's a loving, caring, woman of depth'
    - Mentions Jimmy's in Iran--correction: Iraq; mentions Jack in Marine
    - Brings up story of Bridget's adoption
- Cindy introduces John McCain
    - In Rwanda, I witnessed a woman who had survived the genocide - she reminded me something about my husband: putting your country first.
    - My husband embodies what is good and decent and great about USA, and that is hope.
- Audience gives prolonged standing ovation for McCain
- McCain intro before prepared remarks
    - TY Cindy, TY all for being here. thanks Meghan and Andy McCain and his wife, Lucy, for being here
    - You remember Tom's bro who played football here; TY Jim Jordan; TY Mike and Fran DeWine for all the work you do for families in USA; Mike Krites (candidate for AG)
    - I'm the underdog in this race, ok? And we may be up late b/c commentators will say we're waiting for returns from OH. I'm asking for your support.
    - BTW I wish Obama were here w/ me today. I've asked him to come w/ me to town hall meetings, b/c they're the most beautiful thing about democracy.
    - I'll try to make my remarks brief, but 'Remember, I'm a Senator'
    - To the vets - TY, you are the most patriotic people in America. It's obvious we have

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

FULL PREPARED REMARKS
I want to speak briefly about the issues at stake in this election, and about the choice that we face.

I have been called a maverick. Sometimes it is meant as a compliment and sometimes it is meant as a criticism. But what it really means is I understand who I work for. I don't work for a party. I don't work for a president. I don't work for a special interest. I don't work for myself. I work for you and for the country we love.

I spoke up against the administration for their mistakes in Iraq. I fought for the surge strategy that is going to bring our troops home with victory. I spoke up against my party for out of control spending. I spoke up against the administration and Congress … and Senator Obama, when they gave us an energy bill with more give-aways to big oil and no real solution to our energy problems.

Now, I want to take a minute here on this issue, because I think Senator Obama is a little confused. Yesterday he accused me of having President Bush's policies on energy. That's odd, because he voted for the President's energy bill and I voted against it. I voted against it because it had 2.8 billion dollars in corporate welfare to oil companies that are already making record profits. Senator Obama voted for that bill and its big oil giveaways. I know he hasn't been in the Senate that long, but even in the real world voting for something means you support it, and voting against something means you oppose it.

Just like on the energy bill, I have argued for reform and change in Washington for years, and it hasn't always made me friends with the politicians and pundits. But I don't answer to them; I answer to you. You will always know exactly where I stand and you will always know, no matter what, I will always do what I believe is right for our country.

For his part, Senator Obama is an impressive orator. I applaud his talent and success. All Americans should be proud of his accomplishment. … But Washington is full of talented talkers. And unfortunately, on issues big and small, what Senator Obama says and what he does are often two different things.

Senator Obama says he's going to change Washington. But his plan to raise your taxes and spend more of your money is not my idea of a solution to what troubles Washington. In fact, it sounds a lot like the problem. In the few years he's been in the Senate, he has requested nearly a billion dollars in pork barrel spending. That's a million dollars for every day he's been in office. We need to end this out of control spending in Washington, and when I am president it will stop.

Senator Obama says he will only raise taxes on the rich. But in the Senate, he voted for tax hikes that would have impacted those making just $42,000 per year. He has proposed tax increases on income taxes, capital gains taxes, dividend taxes, Social Security taxes – pretty much anything that you can tax, he wants to tax more. We have the second highest business tax rate in the world, and Barack Obama thinks the way to keep jobs here at home is to make it higher. Raising taxes in a bad economy is about the worst thing you could do because it will kill even more jobs and send more jobs overseas. What we need are policies that create jobs. What we need today is an Economic Surge to keep jobs here at home and create new ones. We need to reduce the tax burden on businesses that choose to make their home in the U.S. We need to open new markets to U.S. products. We need to reduce the cost of healthcare. And we need to end the out of control spending in Washington that is putting our debt on the backs of our children.

Senator Obama says he wants energy independence, but he is opposed to new drilling at home; he is opposed to nuclear power. He has said the high cost of gasoline doesn't bother him; only that it rose too quickly. He actually thinks that raising taxes on oil is going to bring down the price at the pump. He is claiming that putting air in your tires is the equivalent of new offshore drilling… That's not an energy plan; that's a public service announcement. We all agree we need to aggressively develop advanced alternative energies like wind, solar, tidal and biofuels. But we also need to develop more existing energies like safe nuclear power and clean coal. And we need to stop sending $700 billion a year to countries that don't like us very much, start drilling for more oil at home, and bring down the cost of gasoline that is killing our economy. If we are going to finally solve this problem, we need an "all of the above" approach.

On Iraq, Barack Obama says he wants peace, but even today he opposes the surge strategy that succeeded in Iraq and will succeed in Afghanistan. His policy of unconditional withdrawal – regardless of the facts on the ground – could result in renewed violence and a third Iraq war. I am going to end this war, but when I bring our troops home, they will come home with victory, leaving Iraq secured as a democratic ally in the Arab heartland.

Behind all the words, Senator Obama's agenda can be summarized as this: Government is too big, and he wants to grow it. Taxes are too high, and he wants to raise them. Congress spends too much, and he proposes more. We need more energy, and he's against producing it. We're finally winning in Iraq, and he wants to forfeit.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The bottom line is that Senator Obama's words, for all their eloquence and passion, don't mean all that much. And that's the problem with Washington. It is not just the Bush Administration, and it's not just the Democratic Congress. It's that everyone in Washington says whatever it takes to get elected or to score the political point of the day. If Senator Obama doesn't have the strength to speak openly and directly about how he will address the serious challenges confronting America, how will he be strong enough to really change Washington? We don't need another politician in Washington who puts self-interest and political expediency ahead of problem solving. We need to start putting our country first, and come together to keep American families safe and help them realize their dreams for a better life.

Question & Answer

- 1Q) Why don't you respond more aggressively to not only Obama's questions but also media's when they accuse you of flip-flopping when you're really changing your mind having listened to your constituents, e.g. immigration and fuel economy? You don't respond aggressively enough.
    - JM: Tehre's a careful balance between responding to attacks that were started a long time ago by outlets like MoveOn and left-wing agenda - and setting a positive agenda for the future of this country. There are a huge host of issues that we need to address. On offshore drilling, a few years ago, there were people who didn't care about offshore drilling, let alone support it. And then gas went over $4/gallon and we have to consider all our options. And BTW, I met with a group of "independent petroleum executives" and they said within months we could start to see results, and within - and that's from people in the business, that's not just my opinion. So we should start now. And I want you all to be proud of me.

- 2Q) "First of all, we think in Lima, OH, you're a celebrity." Given the advantages of hindsight on Iraq war, how would you vote on issue of going to war in Iraq and why?
    - JM: First, what do you think Saddam would be doing with oil at $120/barrel. I'll tell you -he'd be acquiring and using WMDs, like he'd done 2x before. There was the oil-for-food scandal, our planes were being shot at, ceasefires were breaking down, and he was a brutal dictator. There's no doubt in my mind- he told his interrogators he was committed to using WMDs,. I think we're going to see a stable but flawed democracy--BTW, right now, I'm not sure we should criticize other govts--an ally in the region, a break on Iranian influence. Let me remind you - I said initial victory would be easy and it was, and then I went over there and saw we were had the wrong strategy and said we were doomed to failure. Adn now the sruge is working.
    - JM: If he were still in power, the world would be far worse off, esp w/ all the money he'd be making off of oil and he'd have his commitment to using WMDs. that's my answer.

- 3Q) What are your feelings on status of education and what you would do to change it?
    - JM - makes questioner introduce her baby
    - JM: Cindy was a teacher of special ed before I took her out of a very good line of work. Education is a civil rights issue of the 21st century. Now all chidlren have equal opportunity to enter school, but what are we doing if we let them enter a failing school? We need choice and competition: charter schools; those who want home-schooling or school vouchers, they should do it. Look at NYC and NOLA. I also want to put bad teachers into another line of work and find it for them. Cindy and I made a choice w/ our children and decided to send our kids to a private school - Obamas also made a choice - I want every American to have the choice we had. And penalizing failing schools. And finally, NCLB has to be fixed adn we need to reauthorize it but I don't think it should be scrapped.

- 4Q) Do you recognize the small likelihood of reducing the price at the pump while demands increase from Brazil, India, China, etc? Do you recongnize that when considering how much we'll actually be saving w/ offshore drilling?
    - JM: I do not recognize that. In France they have increased their energy production through nuclear - if they can do it, so can we. If I accepted your premise, then I'd have to reject my fundamental belief that Americans are capable of rising above any challenge. Using all the options. Nuclear is safe -we can do it. And hybrid cars, e.g. GM's Volt - and that can create thousands of job, incl. in OH. When we eliminate our dependence on foreign oil, we don't care what the Saudis charge b/c we will be independent.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- 5Q) Is there any reason we can't use the oil across the pond when we fight for them?
    - JM: Let me broaden - Iraqis ought to pay more - we have to reduce our commitment and do it soon. I'd start in Sadr City, which has only recently come udner govt control.

- 6Q) Does your pro-amnesty position mean you support a North American Union / Superhighway?
    - JM: No I'm against it. It will never happen when I'm POTUS.
    - FOLLOWUP: A quote from you in Washington Times 5/29/03 where you said amnesty has to be part of any solution.
    - JM: No North American Union will take place while i'm POTUS.
    - JM: Our borders are broken, we have to secure our borders first. We also have to have comprehensive immigration reform. We failed 2x b/c American ppl didn't believe us. Then we have to have a temp worker program (work here for 2 years with tamper-proof biometric documetns and anyone who employs someone w/o these docs will be prosecuted). I know we can do this - it's a fed responsibility. We have to address the 12M people here illegally - in a human and compassionate fashion. And I'm a federalist but I will not let this issue pass.
    - One other point- illegal immigrants aren't the only problem - the Mexican govt is in a titanic struggle w/ drug cartels on are borders adn the drugs are coming over and killing our people. so we have to secure our borders.

- 7Q) My son served 2 terms in Iraq - he has some problems now. The VA system is making things difficult. What will you do to expedite him getting help?
    - JM: I don't have stats to back this up but this part of USA has probably supplied more people to help fight than any other part b/c this is the Heartland. We can't let another Walter Reed happen.
    - We have an increase in PTSD - we know that, this is a terribly tough war. Adn we have the ability to treat more ppl in the field than before. We have to focus our military medical care and our V.A. care to "those unique aspects of veterans care". For routine needs, you should have a plastic card and get care at doctor of your choice.

- I was the individual in Portsmouth that handed you a coin and I wanted to tell you that we--every vet in every city--we're all behind you. We need a person like you to run it.

- 8Q) What are you going to do to stop ppl from losing good-paying jobs, esp ppl who work in auto plants?
    - JM: I went to MI and said the old auto jobs aren't coming back - the new auto jobs are coming back. The Volt, hybrids, flex fuels. I will give Americans tax credit for buying these. I just went to CA and met w/ ppl who'd built electronic car - but it was $100K. The next time it'll be $60k. Remember how big cell phones were when they first came out? Adn now they're practically giving them away. Some straight talk - Detroit's in trouble. But there's the Volt and there's what Chrysler and Ford are trying to do. And I'll do what I can to help them.

- 9Q) A lot of politicians w/ a lot of supposed solutions. But they've failed to tell us HOW we're going to do it, esp Obama. What will your Admin specifically do in order to utilize these new tactics?
    - JM: Only 1 way, and that's the American people. Demand. We sit down GOP and Dem and force them to give us an energy policy that works. And we have to have a Cong that will allow a vote, and stay in town, stay at your desk. Adn I'll give them the credit. And it's got to be all of the above - it can just be one energy option. And we voted for an energy bill that frankly was a disgraceful failure. I voted against the energy bill, b/c it was the wrong thing to do for the American ppl, it was the right thing for special interests. There's only 1 way we've ever overcome things in USA and that's reaching across the aisle. And I can't promise you overnight success - it took 30 years to get here.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- 10Q) Are you for a 3rd layer of fences (re: immigration)?
    - JM: I'm for fences: physical, virtual. In populated areas, you need real fences. In rural areas, you can use vehicle barriers etc. I don't think it's as effective to build a wall all the way across. In less populated areas, I think we have to use high-technology more.

- 11Q) [little girl] Can I get a picture of you smiling?
    - JM: thank you [awkward] Now can I ask you to introduce this group of beautiful young people?
    - A: Lima cheerleaders.

- 12Q) How do we get the liberal press to decide to listen to us?
    - JM: It is what it is. I'm confident we can do enough communication with the American ppl that we can directly communicate with them and they with me.

- [woman says she's on McCain's Small Business Committee, thanks mccain for being great for small businesses]

- 13Q) How many jobs do you think offshore drilling will create and how good for the economy will it be?
    - JM: I want to repeat,when you increase supply, the price goes down. And I don't know much about speculation, but one of the major reasons the price has gone up so much is that India and China's demands have gone off. So there's no doubt that when we drill off our shores, the price will go down. So jobs will be created and be good for our economy - especially since they're high-paying jobs [hard to hear]. And taxes will go down, which will also help.

- 14Q) When are you going to announce your VP?
    - JM: VP is very very important. At the beginning VP has 2 duties: tiebreaking vote in Senate and to inquire daily as to the health of the Pres, and that'll probably be an important possiblity.
- 15Q) I am a single-issue voter: pro-life. So you have my vote. But I have a lot of friends who are concerned about your stance on stem-cell research, destructive embryonic research,
    - JM: Stem-cell research is an agonizing issue b/c cures for diseases are possible. I'm confident that skin-cell research is reaching a point that will make stem-cell research academic. I believe the noblest words ever written are 'all men are created equal... pursuit of happiness' and I believe that applies to the unborn and to all unborn children acorss the world. I know what it's right to be deprived of some of your rights, and I'm proud of joining ppl like DeWine and Jim Jordan to change the debate so we are protecting more of the rights of the unborn. And i will not change my views, and my record is very clear on advocacy of rights of the unborn. And I say that with all due respect to ppl who hold opposing views on the matter.
    - JM: And that brings me to judges: 2-3 SCOTUS nominations will likely come up. Alito and Roberts are 2 of the finest - I voted for them, not b/c I agreed w/ their ideology but b/c they were qualified. Obama opposed them on ideological grounds. If we voted based on ideological grounds, we'd never get anyone passed. I will make sure they're strict-constructionists.
- JM: I'm asking for your vote and active participation. We will disagree from time to time on specific issues adn that's healthy and good. But I will always always always put my country first. I have done that since I was in prison and was offered a chance to leave before my comrades. [Everett Alvarez story] These are tough times for America. I am prepared to lead.

--
Sara DuBois
Tracking / Communications Manager
ProgressiveAccountability.org
sara@progressiveaccountability.org

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

202-609-7681 (office)
410-967-7306 (cell)

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~

You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

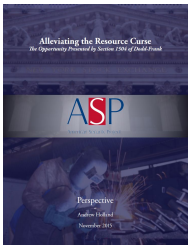
From: "American Security Project" <info@americansecurityproject.org>
To: John <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 11/24/2015 7:04:12 AM
Subject: ASP Newsletter

November 24, 2015

Facebook
Twitter
Website
YouTube
Google Plus

Top Stories

Alleviating the Resource Curse: The Opportunity Presented by Section 1504 of Dodd-Frank



ASP recently released a perspective paper written by Senior Fellow Andrew Holland. In it, he discusses the phenomenon where developing countries ironically end up worse off after experiences a resource boom. Holland argues that the best way to combat this involves a collaborate effort with the government, companies, and civil society to increase transparency. By doing so, the rewards of resources can be efficiently and fairly shared.

Click here for more.

TPP: Implications of the Trans-Pacific Partnership for Global and Regional Stability

On Thursday, November 19th American Security Project hosted "TPP: Implications of the Trans-Pacific Partnership for Global and Regional Stability." The conversation included Ambassador Carl Worker, Charge d'Affaires at the New Zealand Embassy; BGen. Stephen A. Cheney, USMC (Ret), CEO of American Security Project; Minister Kanji Yamanouchi is Minister for Economic Affairs, Embassy of Japan; and Dr.

ASP in the News

BGen. Cheney Featured in National Defense Magazine
Yasmin Tadjdeh, National Defense

ASP's Christine Todd Whitman Writes Op-ed in The Wall Street Journal About Nuclear Energy
Christine Todd Whitman

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rob Shapiro, CEO of Sonecon.

Click here for more.

Lt. General Norman Seip, USAF (Ret.) Joins ASP Board of Directors

On November 17th, American Security Project's Board of Directors unanimously confirmed Lieutenant General Norman "Norm" Seip, USAF (Ret.) as its newest member. Lt. General Seip has been an active member of ASP's Consensus for American Security and regular participant on the National Security and Climate Change Tour in recent years.

Click here for more.

Upcoming Events

Climate Change: Risks for National Security

Today, the U.S. Navy is preparing for an open Arctic, the Marines are deploying in response to historic typhoons, and the Army is preparing its bases to use less energy than they produce. Climate change is already a major consideration for US military planners. Meanwhile, American politicians continue to ignore the issue.

Join us for a discussion as ASP highlights stops from our two year national tour and the steps being taken by the US military and other agencies to prepare for the impacts of climate change to national security.

Friday, December 11, 12:00 pm - 1:30 pm

1100 New York Avenue, NW - 7th floor - West Tower
Washington, D.C

Click here to RSVP

On Our Blog

Climate, Energy, and National Security

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Paris Terrorist Attacks Aftermath: The EU Mutual Defense Clause

Steffen Westerburger

Last weekend France – for the second time this year – was hit by a series of coordinated terrorist attacks on its capital. The iconic city of love once again found itself at the main stage of international terrorism. President Francois Hollande addressed a joint session of both houses of parliament in Versailles on Monday, November 16th. He did not mince words: 'France is at war'. An unexpected move followed, the French President announced that his country for the first time in history intended to invoke article 42.7 of the EU Lisbon Treaty – the EU Common Defense and Security Policy. This move gives us an interesting insight into France's foreign policy strategy.

Climate Change, Paris, the rise of ISIS, and What "Causes" Terrorism

Andrew Holland

Over the past few days, there have been a number of discussion in the press around the country and around the world on the links between climate change and terrorism. Let us be clear – no act of terror is due to climate change, but climate change has helped to create the conditions from which terrorist groups can plot and plan.

The Relationship Between Climate Change and Terrorism: Reigniting the Debate

Anil Powers

E&E published an article about the relationship between climate change and terrorism. In it, E&E reporter Jean Chemnick discussed the "rekindling of an old feud" regarding the dangers of climate change, renewed partisan pushback, and policy strategies.

Want America to Remain Exceptional? Try Leading on Climate Change

American Security Project

It is time to realize that even if you believe that climate change is only possible, we have a responsibility as the greatest country in the world to do something about it. Not just because we are one of the largest causes of this risk, and not just because we have the resources to do something about it, and not just because climate change could really harm the United States and our personal interests.

GMOs Play a key Role in Climate and national Security

Ricky Gandhi

Climate change has had notable impacts on our environment and national security, serving as a "threat multiplier," according to the Department of Defense. The argument goes that climate change can exacerbate existing conflict by making already-scarce resources ever scarcer, such as land and water.

Nuclear Security

Improving the Relationship Between the U.S. and Iran with Ambassador Thomas Pickering

Sam Hickey

On Monday November 2, 2015, Ambassador Thomas Pickering visited American University to address Improving the Relationship Between the U.S. and Iran. Ambassador Pickering has served as Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs and U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations, Russia, India, Israel, Nigeria, Jordan and El Salvador. He has also served as Assistant Secretary of State for the Bureau of Oceans, Environmental and Scientific Affairs and as Special Assistant to Secretaries of State William P. Rogers and Henry A. Kissinger

American Competitiveness

As it Faces a Commodity Slump, Africa Needs a People-Centered Economy

John Bugnacki

After a decade of unprecedented growth, African economies appear to be in trouble. The International Monetary Fund (IMF) is now forecasting an expansion of only 3.75% for the region during this year, down from 0.5% during 2014, and the economy of the southern African state of Zambia is among the worst affected.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Public Diplomacy

What Constitutes Credibility in U.S. Public Diplomacy
Matthew Wallin
As discussion ensues over how to combat ISIS online or counter Russian propaganda, it's worth taking a look at the elements that lend to credible messaging. The importance of credibility cannot be underestimated, as it provides the initial basis by which members of a target audience decide to listen to one's message in the first place.

Fusion Energy

The Weekly Fusion: A Look at Current Advancements in Fusion Energy
Ricky Gandhi
The future of fusion energy is constantly being unfolded in front of our eyes, as every week there is some breakthrough in new technologies and designs in the nuclear fusion sector of energy. Since there is such a wealth of information, I have gathered and consolidated a list of articles geared toward the advancement of making fusion energy a reality, from within the past week.

National Security Strategy

Unlocking the Secrets of Cyber Hazards
SIGNAL Magazine
Security products are like crack to security professionals - they just cannot get enough. These products appear to be the panacea practitioners are seeking, but often are not what they seem. They do not always solve problems, and they leave security experts continually looking for yet more new products, solutions, and techniques for managing cyber risk. This raises the question: Why do enterprises and government organizations find protecting themselves from cyber crime so difficult?

Developing an Effective Anti-ISIS Strategy
Matthew Wallin
The recent terror attacks in Paris have created renewed demand to develop a real strategy for defeating ISIS. From Beirut to the Metrojet over the Sinai, these attacks show spillover from the Syrian Civil War that threatens the livelihood of people far beyond Syria's borders.

About the American Security Project

The American Security Project is a non-profit, nonpartisan public policy and research organization dedicated to fostering knowledge and understanding of a range of national security issues, promoting debate about the appropriate use of American power, and cultivating strategic responses to 21st century challenges.

American Security Project

1100 New York Avenue, NW • Suite 710W • Washington, DC 20005
Phone: 202.347.4267 | Fax: 202.470.6631
unsubscribe from this list update subscription preferences

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Margolis, Jim" <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com>
To: "Demastrie, Jesse" <Jesse.Demastrie@gmmb.com>
"Andrew Bleeker" <bleeker@bpimedia.com>
"Brian Fallon" <brianefallon@gmail.com>
"Christina?? Reynolds" <creynolds@hillaryclinton.com>
"David Binder" <David@db-research.com>
"Elan Kriegel" <ekriegel@hillaryclinton.com>
"Huma?? Abedin" <huma@hrcoffice.com>
"Jason Rosenbaum" <jrosenbaum@hillaryclinton.com>
"Jen Palmieri" <jennifer.m.palmieri@gmail.com>
"Jesse Ferguson \(HRC\)" <jferguson@hillaryclinton.com>
"Jester, Daniel" <Daniel.Jester@gmmb.com>
"Joel Benenson" <jbenenson@bsgco.com>
"John Anzalone" <john@algpolling.com>
"John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
"Kaye, Anson" <Anson.Kaye@gmmb.com>
"Kristina Schake" <kristinakschake@gmail.com>
"Lenar, AJ" <AJ.Lenar@gmmb.com>
"Mandy Grunwald" <gruncom@aol.com>
"Marlon Marshall \(HRC\)" <mmarshall@hillaryclinton.com>
"Matt Dover" <mdover@hillaryclinton.com>
"Matt Paul" <mpaul@hillaryclinton.com>
"Michael Halle" <mhalle@hillaryclinton.com>
"Michael Vlacich" <mvlacich@hillaryclinton.com>
"Nick Merrill" <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com>
"Oren Shur \(HRC\)" <oshur@hillaryclinton.com>
"Oxhorn, Liz" <Liz.Oxhorn@gmmb.com>
"Pinelo,?? Greg" <Greg.Pinelo@gmmb.com>
"Rimel, John" <John.Rimel@gmmb.com>
"Robby?? Mook \(HRC\)" <re47@hillaryclinton.com>
"Teddy Goff" <teddy.goff@gmail.com>
"Tony Carrk" <tony.carrk@gmail.com>
Date: 7/21/2015 1:18:56 PM
Subject: Re: Citizens for a Nuclear Free Iran - full spending

First wave of AIPAC spending, against the deal

From: <Demastrie>, Jesse Demastrie <Jesse.Demastrie@gmmb.com >
Date: Tuesday, July 21, 2015 at 4:17 PM
To: Andrew Bleeker <bleeker@bpimedia.com >, Brian Fallon <brianefallon@gmail.com >, Christina Reynolds <creynolds@hillaryclinton.com >, David Binder <David@db-research.com >, Jesse Demastrie <Jesse.Demastrie@gmmb.com >, Elan Kriegel <ekriegel@hillaryclinton.com >, Huma Abedin <huma@hrcoffice.com >, Jason Rosenbaum <jrosenbaum@hillaryclinton.com >, Jen Palmieri <jennifer.m.palmieri@gmail.com >, "Jesse Ferguson (HRC)" <jferguson@hillaryclinton.com >, Daniel Jester <Daniel.Jester@gmmb.com >, Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com >, John Anzalone <john@algpolling.com >, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com >, Anson Kaye <Anson.Kaye@gmmb.com >, Kristina Schake <kristinakschake@gmail.com >, Jason Lenar <AJ.Lenar@gmmb.com >, Mandy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com >, GMMB GMMB <jim.margolis@gmmb.com >, Marlon Marshall <mmarshall@hillaryclinton.com >, Matt Dover <mdover@hillaryclinton.com >, Matt Paul <mpaul@hillaryclinton.com >, Michael Halle <mhalle@hillaryclinton.com >, Mike Vlacich <mvlacich@hillaryclinton.com >, Nick Merrill <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com >, "Oren Shur (HRC)" <oshur@hillaryclinton.com >, "Oxhorn, Liz" <Liz.Oxhorn@gmmb.com >, Greg Pinelo <Greg.Pinelo@gmmb.com >, John Rimel <John.Rimel@gmmb.com >, Robby Mook <re47@hillaryclinton.com >, Teddy Goff <teddy.goff@gmail.com >, Tony Carrk <tony.carrk@gmail.com >
Subject: Citizens for a Nuclear Free Iran - full spending

See spending and spot link for Citizens for a Nuclear Free Iran below.

Citizens for a Nuclear Free Iran (against Iran nuclear deal)
7/17 – 7/27
NOTE: All spending is 7/17 – 7/23, except cable in New York, which is 7/21-27
Total $5,492,000
Ad: https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=rifQLpX_vtk

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Atlanta, ~155 GRPs, $79K – cable only

Washington DC, ~855 GRPs, $446K

Phoenix, ~660 GRPs, $186K

Los Angeles, ~460 GRPs, $570K
San Diego, ~660 GRPs, $143K
Fresno, ~410 GRPs, $35K

Hartford, ~745 GRPs, $128K

Denver, ~500 GRPs, $158K

Tampa, ~460 GRPs, $162K
Miami, ~365 GRPs, $206K
West Palm Beach, ~690 GRPs, $96K
Tallahassee, ~385 GRPs, $27K
Panama City, ~710 GRPs, $23K

Honolulu, ~440 GRPs, $46K

Chicago, ~420 GRPs, $233K

Indianapolis, ~790 GRPs, $111K

Boston, ~530 GRPs, $277K

Baltimore, ~950 GRPs, $168K

Detroit, ~825 GRPs, $229K

Omaha, ~635 GRPs, $67K

New York, ~360 GRPs, $485K – broadcast only
New York, ~45 GRPs, $60K – cable only (note different flight: 7/21 – 7/27)

Las Vegas, ~540 GRPs, $133K

Portland, OR, ~540 GRPs, $99K

Philadelphia, ~525 GRPs, $258K
Pittsburgh, ~580 GRPs, $92K

Providence, ~380 GRPs, $60K

Dallas, ~465 GRPs, $252K
Houston, ~480 GRPs, $235K
San Antonio, ~480 GRPs, $101K
Laredo, ~725 GRPs, $29K

Richmond, ~470 GRPs, $41K

Seattle, ~980 GRPs, $203K

Charleston-Huntington, WV, ~630 GRPs, $56K

Jesse Demastrie Vice President, Associate Media Director
202.338.8700 |office
202.813.4983 |direct

+gmmbcause the effect

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This email is intended only for the named addressee. It may contain information that is confidential/private, legally privileged, or copyright-protected, and you should handle it accordingly. If you are not the intended recipient, you do not have legal rights to retain, copy, or distribute this email or its contents, and should promptly delete the email and all electronic copies in your system; do not retain copies in any media. If you have received this email in error, please notify the sender promptly. Thank you.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Jesse Ferguson" <jferguson@hillaryclinton.com>
To:	"Jesse Ferguson" <jesse@jesseferguson.com>
Date:	4/21/2015 3:24:39 PM
Subject:	Memo from Brian Fallon
Attachments:	Memo - Book Update.pdf

Attached is a memo from Brian Fallon, our National Press Secretary, to update friends and allies like you on what we have already learned about the book Clinton Cash.

Yours,
Jesse

Jesse F. Ferguson
Deputy National Press Secretary and Senior Spokesperson
Hillary for America
@JesseFFerguson
Gchat: Jfferg

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"John Graham" <jgraham@fairviewinsurance.com>
To:	"John Graham" <jgraham@fairviewinsurance.com>
Date:	11/11/2015 10:18:47 AM
Subject:	FW: Maria Bartiromo booed citing Hillary Clinton's résum é - Business Insider/2016 presidential debate/ Republic ans/ Hillary wins!

subject: Maria Bartiromo booed citing Hillary Clinton's résumé - Business Insider http://www.businessinsider.com/maria-bartiromo-debate-hillary-clinton-resume-fox-business-2015-11

2016 REPUBLICAN PRESIDENTIAL DEBATE: MARCO RUBIO VS. HILLARY CLINTON
Marco Rubio was most impressive in the first Republican Presidential debate of substance. With all due respect, Fox Business was professional . On the Rubio front , his quick response to an informative Rand Paul observation on U.S. involvement within the Middle East, etc. as a matter of Military Budget Waste, says it all. You cannot be an isolationist with homeland security /ISIS targeting ours and our allies very existence. Where does this resonate? Woman voters ,who dominate Presidential electorates from either party. The safety of their family overrules even the economy if they believe the threat to the security of their children is real. In terms of the brutality of ISIS , both parties better pay attention to ISIS . Mothers get it. Russia/Egypt gets it. Hillary gets it .Marco gets it . Who has the better understanding ? The resume? Hillary Clinton.. Welcome to the 2016 Presidential Elections. Fasten your seat belts!

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Hannah Richert" <Hannah@presidentclinton.com>
To: zshaikley@clintonfoundation.org blindsey@clintonfoundation.org sstreett@clintonfoundation.org
"Tina Flournoy" <Tina@presidentclinton.com>
Date: 2/9/2013 5:09:59 AM
Subject: Re: Biweekly Report for WJC

Will do

From: Zayneb Shaikley [mailto:zshaikley@clintonfoundation.org]
Sent: Saturday, February 09, 2013 07:06 AM
To: Hannah Richert; Bruce Lindsey <blindsey@clintonfoundation.org>; Stephanie Streett <sstreett@clintonfoundation.org>; Tina Flournoy
Cc: Laura Graham (CF); Valerie Alexander; Scott Curran <scurran@clintonfoundation.org>; Ami Desai; Dennis Cheng <dcheng@clintonfoundation.org>; Bari Lurie <blurie@clintonfoundation.org>; Angel Urena; Jon Davidson; 'John Podesta' <john.podesta@gmail.com>; Ali Rubin contact <ali@chelseaoffice.com>; Brittany Doyle Contact <brittany@chelseaoffice.com>
Subject: RE: Biweekly Report for WJC

Hannah,
Can you please use the attached/below updated biweekly instead of the one I sent yesterday? It now contains input from CGI.
Thank you!
Zayneb

Biweekly Report
William J. Clinton Foundation
February 9, 2013

MAJOR DOMESTIC INITIATIVES

Alliance for a Healthier Generation

The Alliance conducted a satellite media tour with Billy Blanks and Tara Stiles to showcase the Fit for a Healthier Generation campaign aimed at making kids more active in schools. The tour reached more than 20 million people across the country.

24 Hour Fitness and Cigna have signed on to the Alliance's Healthcare Initiative and will offer their employees and employer groups, respectively, extended visits to primary care practitioners and covered visits to registered dietitians.

Clinton Health Matters Initiative

CHMI will meet with the PGA Tour later this week to finalize details on launching the CHMI community program in the Greater Jacksonville area.

CHMI met with Commissioner Kelly's team last week to discuss the details of the event on prescription drug abuse and further collaboration. Due to scheduling constraints, the event will take place in the spring on an NYC campus. Meanwhile, CHMI will be working with the NYPD to convene NYC college and university presidents to discuss ways in which these campuses can educate their students on the dangers of prescription drugs and the mixing of these drugs with other substances.

Clinton Economic Opportunity Initiative

CEO met with Kevin Langley, the former Global Chairman of the Entrepreneurs Organization (EO), to discuss possible partnership opportunities between EO and CEO. The Entrepreneurs' Organization (EO) is a global business network of over 8,000 business owners in 122 chapters and 35 countries. Conversation centered upon the possibility of leveraging EO's New York and New Orleans chapters to create a small business event geared towards providing much needed advice and support to small business owners who were still in the midst of dealing with the damages brought on by Hurricane Sandy. Kevin was able to give valuable advice and emotional support to EO member and former EMP mentee Victor Chan, a small business owner whose business survived Hurricane Katrina. Kevin counseled Victor on how best to keep his South Street Seaport area restaurant business alive amidst a host of financing and real estate issues that have threatened to put him out of business. CEO will be continuing exploratory conversations with EO around how EO New Orleans entrepreneurs could be leveraged in a similar manner to support NYC area small business owners impacted by Hurricane Sandy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Inc. magazine is currently working to gain internal approvals on two possible collaboration opportunities: 1) integration of CEO's Entrepreneur Mentoring Program into the Inc. Business Owner Council in the form of a new business accelerator program and 2) a Women's Summit in collaboration with the Clinton Foundation.

MAJOR INTERNATIONAL INITIATIVES

Clinton Development Initiative

Malawi

The trees project is being reviewed by a large purchaser of carbon credits in Scandinavia for a potential major purchase commitment (up to 40,000 tons per year). COTAP, the carbon credits broker in the US that is aiming to be the Kiva of carbon credits, has made over $3,700 in sales of Trees of Hope credits to individual buyers in the few months since signing a marketing agreement with CDI. Bank accounts have been established for Trees of Hope farmers who will be receiving their first payments from carbon sales.

CDI is working on finalizing the long-term lease agreement for the commercial farms. Discussions have begun with John McAslan on developing a master site plan for the commercial farms to help guide renovation and construction of needed infrastructure after leases are in place.

Rwanda

CDI has approached some technical schools and universities to recruit their best students for factory jobs at Mount Meru Soyco Ltd. They will conduct interviews in February and those selected will be sent to a factory in Arusha for a three-month training in March. The Soyco factory is preparing to begin buying raw materials from farmers.

Regarding the AGRA project, all crops are maturing on the field and the team hopes to begin the harvest and mobilize more farmers for the coming season by the end of this month. The CDI team has begun doing field days in the three Districts of the project area—Kayonza District, Kirehe District and Gatsibo District.

CDI has also been supporting the rehabilitation of the ISAR (Institut des Sciences Agronomiques du Rwanda) microbiology lab to be able to produce more inoculums. The lab has bought new equipment with CDI's support.

Clinton Giustra Sustainable Growth Initiative

Peru

CGSGI's cataract surgery program has reached 49, 646 surgeries. The 50,000 cataracts surgery goal is expected to be met by the end of February.

CGSGI is finalizing an MOU with the Peru's Ministry of Tourism to begin capacity building necessary to link small suppliers in Cusco, Peru with that region's hospitality and restaurant sector. The project is expected to launch in March.

Colombia

The Acceso Fund has agreed to capitalize a new Supply Chain Impact Enterprise in Cartagena, Colombia with USD $2.1 million. This enterprise is expected to begin operations in April and will procure agricultural products and seafood from local suppliers for resale to the hospitality, restaurant and supermarket markets along Colombia's caribbean coast. The business will provide distribution, warehousing, processing and logistics for the suppliers reducing the costs to both suppliers and buyers and creating opportunities for low income suppliers in the region to broaden their market opportunity and substantially increase their incomes. This is the second new enterprise capitalized by Acceso in Cartagena. The first, a hospitality labor training center, will start its first class in March.

Clinton Global Initiative

Annual Meeting

CGI currently has 127 paying members registered for the 2013 Annual Meeting. Of the total number of registrants, 106 are renewals, 61 fewer than last year at this time, and 21 are new, 9 more than last year at this time. CGI will contact each prior member who has not yet renewed over the next couple of weeks.

The United Postcode Lotteries has renewed its sponsorship for the 2013 Annual Meeting and increased from last year's amount of €300,000 euro to €400,000 euro.

CGI University

January 30 was the final application deadline for CGI U. A record number of applications was received from 3976 students, representing 136 countries and all 50 states.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

32 colleges have formally joined the newly-created CGI University Network, committing a total of $357,000 in travel stipends and seed funding for student commitment-makers from their respective campuses.
Sponsorship of CGI U currently stands at $950,000.

Commitments

The Energy & Ecosystems Track has split into two distinct tracks: the Energy Track and the Environmental Stewardship Track.

Upcoming Convenings

Eighteen mayors have officially agreed to participate in the Infrastructure Finance for Cities Task Force, co-led by CGI and the US Conference of Mayors. They represent the cities of Atlanta, Baltimore, Charlotte, Chicago, Denver, Houston, Indianapolis, Jacksonville, Louisville, Los Angeles, Mesa, New Orleans, Oakland, Oklahoma City, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Redmond, and San Francisco. The Task Force will begin work this month and culminate at CGI America in June.

Additional convenings in February include:

- Best Practices in Employee Engagement (2/8/2013)
- Impact Investing: State of the Market (2/11/2013)
- Arts & Development in Post-Conflict Communities: Why the Arts Matter for Resilient Societies (2/19/2013)
- CGI Winter Meeting (2/20/2013)
- Integrating Women-Owned Businesses in Supply Chains: A Commitment Workshop (2/21/2013)
- Haiti Action Network (2/27/2013)

Zayneb K. Shaikley
Associate Counsel & Initiative Liaison | William J. Clinton Foundation
77 Water Street, New York, NY 10005
Direct: 917.720.0295 | Mobile: 646.873.0244
zshaikley@clintonfoundation.org | www.clintonfoundation.org

This e-mail, and any attachments hereto, is intended only for use by the addressee(s) named herein and may contain legally privileged and/or confidential information. Any unauthorized use or dissemination of this message in whole or in part is strictly prohibited. If you have received it by mistake please notify the sender by return e-mail and delete this message from your system.

From: Zayneb Shaikley
Sent: Friday, February 08, 2013 11:22 PM
To: Hannah Richert - PC; Bruce Lindsey; Stephanie Streett; 'Tina Flournoy'
Cc: Laura Graham; Valerie Alexander; Scott Curran; Amitabh Desai; Dennis Cheng; Bari Lurie; Angel Urena - PC; Jon Davidson - President Clinton; 'John Podesta'; Ali Rubin contact; Brittany Doyle Contact
Subject: Biweekly Report for WJC

Hannah,
Attached and below is President Clinton's latest biweekly report.
Thanks,
Zayneb

Biweekly Report
William J. Clinton Foundation
February 8, 2013

MAJOR DOMESTIC INITIATIVES

Alliance for a Healthier Generation

The Alliance conducted a satellite media tour with Billy Blanks and Tara Stiles to showcase the Fit for a Healthier Generation campaign aimed at making kids more active in schools. The tour reached more than 20 million people across the country.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

24 Hour Fitness and Cigna have signed on to the Alliance's Healthcare Initiative and will offer their employees and employer groups, respectively, extended visits to primary care practitioners and covered visits to registered dietitians.

Clinton Health Matters Initiative

CHMI will meet with the PGA Tour later this week to finalize details on launching the CHMI community program in the Greater Jacksonville area.

CHMI met with Commissioner Kelly's team last week to discuss the details of the event on prescription drug abuse and further collaboration. Due to scheduling constraints, the event will take place in the spring on an NYC campus. Meanwhile, CHMI will be working with the NYPD to convene NYC college and university presidents to discuss ways in which these campuses can educate their students on the dangers of prescription drugs and the mixing of these drugs with other substances.

Clinton Economic Opportunity Initiative

CEO met with Kevin Langley, the former Global Chairman of the Entrepreneurs Organization (EO), to discuss possible partnership opportunities between EO and CEO. The Entrepreneurs' Organization (EO) is a global business network of over 8,000 business owners in 122 chapters and 35 countries. Conversation centered upon the possibility of leveraging EO's New York and New Orleans chapters to create a small business event geared towards providing much needed advice and support to small business owners who were still in the midst of dealing with the damages brought on by Hurricane Sandy. Kevin was able to give valuable advice and emotional support to EO member and former EMP mentee Victor Chan, a small business owner whose business survived Hurricane Katrina. Kevin counseled Victor on how best to keep his South Street Seaport area restaurant business alive amidst a host of financing and real estate issues that have threatened to put him out of business. CEO will be continuing exploratory conversations with EO around how EO New Orleans entrepreneurs could be leveraged in a similar manner to support NYC area small business owners impacted by Hurricane Sandy.

Inc. magazine is currently working to gain internal approvals on two possible collaboration opportunities: 1) integration of CEO's Entrepreneur Mentoring Program into the Inc. Business Owner Council in the form of a new business accelerator program and 2) a Women's Summit in collaboration with the Clinton Foundation.

MAJOR INTERNATIONAL INITIATIVES

Clinton Development Initiative

Malawi

The trees project is being reviewed by a large purchaser of carbon credits in Scandinavia for a potential major purchase commitment (up to 40,000 tons per year). COTAP, the carbon credits broker in the US that is aiming to be the Kiva of carbon credits, has made over $3,700 in sales of Trees of Hope credits to individual buyers in the few months since signing a marketing agreement with CDI. Bank accounts have been established for Trees of Hope farmers who will be receiving their first payments from carbon sales.

CDI is working on finalizing the long-term lease agreement for the commercial farms. Discussions have begun with John McAslan on developing a master site plan for the commercial farms to help guide renovation and construction of needed infrastructure after leases are in place.

Rwanda

CDI has approached some technical schools and universities to recruit their best students for factory jobs at Mount Meru Soyco Ltd. They will conduct interviews in February and those selected will be sent to a factory in Arusha for a three-month training in March. The Soyco factory is preparing to begin buying raw materials from farmers.

Regarding the AGRA project, all crops are maturing on the field and the team hopes to begin the harvest and mobilize more farmers for the coming season by the end of this month. The CDI team has begun doing field days in the three Districts of the project area—Kayonza District, Kirehe District and Gatsibo District.

CDI has also been supporting the rehabilitation of the ISAR (Institut des Sciences Agronomiques du Rwanda) microbiology lab to be able to produce more inoculums. The lab has bought new equipment with CDI's support.

Clinton Giustra Sustainable Growth Initiative

Peru

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CGSGI's cataract surgery program has reached 49, 646 surgeries. The 50,000 cataracts surgery goal is expected to be met by the end of February.

CGSGI is finalizing an MOU with the Peru's Ministry of Tourism to begin capacity building necessary to link small suppliers in Cusco, Peru with that region's hospitality and restaurant sector. The project is expected to launch in March.

Colombia

The Acceso Fund has agreed to capitalize a new Supply Chain Impact Enterprise in Cartagena, Colombia with USD $2.1 million. This enterprise is expected to begin operations in April and will procure agricultural products and seafood from local suppliers for resale to the hospitality, restaurant and supermarket markets along Colombia's caribbean coast. The business will provide distribution, warehousing, processing and logistics for the suppliers reducing the costs to both suppliers and buyers and creating opportunities for low income suppliers in the region to broaden their market opportunity and substantially increase their incomes. This is the second new enterprise capitalized by Acceso in Cartagena. The first, a hospitality labor training center, will start its first class in March.

Zayneb K. Shaikley
Associate Counsel & Initiative Liaison | William J. Clinton Foundation
77 Water Street, New York, NY 10005
Direct: 917.720.0295 | Mobile: 646.873.0244
zshaikley@clintonfoundation.org | www.clintonfoundation.org

This e-mail, and any attachments hereto, is intended only for use by the addressee(s) named herein and may contain legally privileged and/or confidential information. Any unauthorized use or dissemination of this message in whole or in part is strictly prohibited. If you have received it by mistake please notify the sender by return e-mail and delete this message from your system.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Brian Fallon" <bfallon@hillaryclinton.com>
To: ha16@hillaryclinton.com
john.podesta@gmail.com cheryl.mills@gmail.com craig@minassianmedia.com mpally@clintonfoundation.org
Date: 4/19/2015 1:09:27 PM
Subject: FOR REVIEW: Statement for NYT story on Clinton Cash

All,

As you are all aware, Jo Becker from the NYT's investigative unit is one of several reporters at work on stories based on material provided by the publisher of the upcoming Clinton Cash book. Jo's story is scheduled to run in as soon as one week.

Separately, this afternoon, Amy Chozick from the NYT called us to indicate she had obtained a copy of the book on her own and intends to file a separate story tomorrow. Her story will not unpack all of the book's claims -- she will leave that to Jo. Instead, she will do a more process-y story about the book's existence, the fact that the publisher has approached multiple media outlets in advance of the book's publication to spoon-feed them some of the book's research, and also remark on the fact that Rand Paul continues to drop hints about the book's contents such that it appears they may be some coordination with individual Republican campaigns.

We think this story, though it was not originated by us, could end up being somewhat helpful in casting the book's author as having a conservative agenda. Moreover, we think Amy is suspicious of the arrangements that the book's publisher has reached with the various media outlets (including her own paper). In fact, Jo Becker is apparently trying to get this story killed because she thinks it will undermine her investigative piece later this month. But so far it is running in tomorrow's paper.

Amy is seeking a response from us on what our approach is to the looming publication of the book and the apparently well coordinated rollout. We have drafted the below response, and wanted you all to see it and provide feedback before we sent it off. Please note, however, that in order to get the statement into the story, we probably need to provide it by about 8:30 tonight. So apologies for the tight turnaround, but here it is:

> "We always expected that while Hillary Clinton was focused on how to help everyday Americans get ahead, the Republicans would focus their efforts on attacks rather than ideas. It appears that this book is being used to aid this coordinated attack strategy, twisting previously known facts into absurd conspiracy theories. It will not be the first work of partisan-fueled fiction about the Clintons' record, and we know it will not be the last."

Thank you,
Brian

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Milia Fisher" <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 6/29/2015 8:56:24 AM
Subject: Re: Ben Gemen policy background

Yep I have a number and I will call him now to ask. Will circle back.

On Mon, Jun 29, 2015 at 3:54 PM, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com > wrote:
Can you call Ben and see if I can cal him at 5:00
Get a number.

On Jun 29, 2015 3:19 PM, "Milia Fisher" <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:
Trevor just followed up with the below. His cell is 917-755-5446 just in case you want to call.

_____

We've also found it successful when chatting with folks to frame energy/climate as integral to each of her four fights:

- investing in clean energy that will power the economy of the future

- protecting families from pollution

- safeguarding our country from the impacts of climate change and reducing our oil dependence

- preventing those who want to keep us trapped in the energy economy of the past from distorting our political process.

On Mon, Jun 29, 2015 at 3:14 PM, Milia Fisher <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:
Hi John-

Here's the policy background Trevor Houser sent over for the Ben Gemen interview. Policy memo attached and at the bottom in plain text. All printed for you in the office as well in case you're able to make it in.

Thanks,
Milia

Note From Trevor Houser:

"Not sure if comms gave John background, but the reporter has been asking about HRC's process for a climate and enviro policy. Jake and the team felt now was an appropriate time to work with Ben Geman on that story in an effort to:

1) underscore how seriously she takes these issues;
2) Climate and Environment are top priorities for the campaign; and
3) The campaign is leading a deliberate and thoughtful policy process that has sought input from a large number of experts and key stakeholders in the environment, clean energy, and conservation communities.

The one other thing I would flag for John is that if Ben asks whether we would support a permanent extension of the PTC/ITC we need to hedge given out solar/renewable targets. Those imply a $10-$15 billion per year price tag by 2020 and $25-$35 billion per year by 2027 if extended at current levels. May need to call for "extending and improving" or something like that."

Secretary of State Record

As Secretary, Hillary fought hard to mobilize a global response to climate change. She immediately created the first high-level post at the State Department dedicated exclusively to climate diplomacy (the US Special Envoy for Climate Change)

She put climate squarely on the agenda during her first trip as Secretary to Beijing

Hillary worked to feature climate change in the annual US-China Strategic and Economic Dialogue meeting

She helped to hammer out the breakthrough that led to the Copenhagen Accord, which, among other things, was the first international agreement in which all of the major economies – including China – committed to reduce their greenhouse gas pollution.

In addition, she worked hard as Secretary to build new coalitions to combat emissions from methane and other super-pollutants that damage the climate, as well as to launch a clean cookstove initiative that is bringing not only health but climate benefits.

In pursuing these international agreements, and the leadership we are showing at home and abroad, the United States now has a much stronger hand to play in the upcoming negotiations in Paris.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To: John Podesta, Jake Sullivan, Maya Harris and Dan Schwerin

From: Energy and Climate Team

Date: June 29, 2015

Re: Energy, Climate and Environment Policy Platform

This memo provides a brief overview of our proposed energy, climate and environment policy platform. We have developed six major policy initiatives that together offer a comprehensive strategy for a) protecting American families from pollution, b) powering the economy of the future, c) delivering energy and climate security that lasts, and d) responsibly stewarding our country's natural bounty and beauty. We are finalizing separate white papers with more detail on each of the six initiatives.

Our platform is designed to make the US the clean energy superpower of the 21st century and a global leader in the fight against climate change, and to do so in a way that provides economic opportunity and security for all Americans. We will have half a billion solar panels installed across the country by 2020 and generate enough renewable energy to power every home in the country within 10 years. During that time we will reduce US oil consumption by 20% and partner with other countries bring global oil demand growth to a halt [note: this is a proposed target we haven't yet discussed as a group].

The next decade is critical if we are going to successfully transition to a clean energy economy, deliver security that lasts, and prevent catastrophic climate change. The following is an ambitious and achievable plan of attack.

1. Smart Standards

We will fight efforts to roll back environmental protections in favor of polluters. We will defend and extend common-sense standards that make our air and water cleaner, safeguard the health of our families, reduce energy waste, driven clean energy deployment and fight global climate change. This includes full implementation of the Clean Power Plan, extension of efficiency standards for cars, trucks, airplanes and appliances, better building codes, mandatory disclosure of fracking chemicals and methane regulations on oil and gas production.

2. Clean Energy Challenge

Standards set the floor, not the ceiling. We can and must go further. We will form a new partnership with states, cities and rural communities that are ready to lead, providing competitive grants to those that exceed federal guidelines, remove barriers to clean energy access and entrepreneurship, and invest in innovative solutions that reduce energy costs, protect public health and cut carbon pollution.

As part of this bargain, we will guarantee that every agency within the federal government is working in concert to ensure Americans have the tools and resources they need to succeed. That includes investing in new technologies, both in our labs and through our tax code, and ensuring that we are maximizing the clean energy potential of public lands and public buildings. We will expand successful innovation initiatives, like ARPA-e, cut those that fail to deliver results, and ensure that public R&D supports private sector entrepreneurialism, small business creation and employment growth.

3. Modernizing North American Infrastructure

We must improve the safety and security of existing energy infrastructure in North America and ensure that the new infrastructure we build is consistent with the clean energy economy we are seeking to create. We will launch a major initiative to repair, replace and better regulate our existing pipeline and rail network to protect our families, communities, and outdoor economy from the risk of oil spills and explosions and protect the climate from fugitive methane emissions. And we'll negotiate a North American Climate Compact with Canada and Mexico that guides future infrastructure investment on the continent through ambitious emission reduction commitments, coordinated policy action, and strong accountability mechanisms.

Security that Lasts

The recent growth in domestic oil and gas production provides important economic and geopolitical benefits, but it doesn't solve the energy-related security issues that have plagued our country for decades. US gasoline prices will continue to be set by the global market, no matter how much oil we produce, leaving our economy vulnerable to supply disruptions elsewhere in the world. In addition, the more oil and other fossil fuels we burn, the more risk we bear – both to our economy and our national security - from higher sea levels and increasingly devastating storms, heatwaves and droughts.

The only way to truly safeguard our country is to reduce the amount of oil consumed both at home and around the world and make our investments, our communities and our infrastructure more resilient to climate-related risks. We will take actions necessary to drive down oil consumption in the US, and will partner with other countries to halt the growth in global oil consumption within the next ten years. We will lead the world in combatting climate change, build resilient infrastructure and ensure American families, businesses and investors have actionable information on the kinds of risks they face.

Collaborative Stewardship

We are still developing the public lands/conservation leg of the platform, which will include the following components:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

1. Royalty reform: Raise the on-shore oil and gas royalty rate on public lands to match that charged on private lands in Texas and other states and close the loophole in coal royalty policy that costs taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars per year.

2. Leasing: Take areas too sensitive for energy production, like the Arctic, off the table.

3. LWCF: Fully fund the Land and Water Conservation Fund

4. Outdoor economy: Support the growth of the outdoor economy by protecting national parks and forests and improving access to public lands for hunters and anglers and other types of recreation.

A Just Transition

As we build the energy economy of the 21st century, we cannot turn our backs on the workers and communities in the coalfields who kept the lights on and factories running during the 20th century. We will ensure that the retirement benefits of coal miners and their families are secure, invest in carbon capture, utilization and sequestration technology, and launch a major workforce and local economic development initiative for coalfield communities from Central Appalachia to the Powder River Basin.

We will also address the legacy costs fossil fuel combustion in communities disproportionately impacted by the resulting air pollution. We will provide block grants to states, cities and rural communities that develop innovative economic development and public health solutions for vulnerable communities as part of their clean energy strategy, such as the SB 535 program in California.

--
Milia Fisher
Special Assistant to the Chair
Hillary for America
mfisher@hillaryclinton.com
o: 646.854.1198 c: 858.395.1741

--
Milia Fisher
Special Assistant to the Chair
Hillary for America
mfisher@hillaryclinton.com
o: 646.854.1198 c: 858.395.1741

--
Milia Fisher
Special Assistant to the Chair
Hillary for America
mfisher@hillaryclinton.com
o: 646.854.1198 c: 858.395.1741

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Louis Seidman" <seidman@law.georgetown.edu>
To:	"Abdulaziz Altuwaijri" <aaa244@law.georgetown.edu> "Abdulwahab Sadeq" <aas78@law.georgetown.edu> "Ada Siqueira" <as3591@law.georgetown.edu> "Agustin Ignacio Barroilhet\(fwd\)" <ab2897@georgetown.edu> "Alexandra Phelan" <alexandra.phelan@gmail.com> "amanda Shandor" <amanda.shanor@gmail.com> "Amy?? Uelmen" <aju2@law.georgetown.edu> "Anna Offit \(fwd\)" <annaoffit@gmail.com> "Daniel A Hougendobler" <dah93@law.georgetown.edu> derek.webb@law.stanford.edu "Dina B. Mishra" <dina.b.mishra@gmail.com> "Edit Frenyo" <ef246@law.georgetown.edu> "Faculty?? Support" <facultysupport@law.georgetown.edu> "Han-hsi Liu\(fwd\)" <hl580@georgetown.edu> "Hisham Alsabt\(fwd\)" <ha374@georgetown.edu> "Ian M?? Kysel\(fwd\)" <imk6@georgetown.edu> IBhatty@ussc.gov "Ido Kilovaty\(fwd\)" <ik292@georgetown.edu> "Itamar J. Mann-Kanowitz \(fwd\)" <itamar.mann@gmail.com> "Jamillah Williams" <jamillah.williams@law.georgetown.edu> jofarin@hotmail.com "John M Bentil" <jmb386@law.georgetown.edu> "Jonathan?? Keim \(fwd\)" <jonathan.keim@gmail.com> "Julia Cadaval Martins" <jc2403@law.georgetown.edu> "Julia Tomassetti" <julia.tomassetti@gmail.com> "Justin S Murray \(fwd\)" <jumurray@gmail.com> "L Caplan" <lcaplan3@gmail.com> "Laura Alexander" <Alexander.Laura@gmail.com> "Law Center Staff" <LawCenterStaff@law.georgetown.edu> "Law Faculty and Visitors" <LawFacultyandVisitors@law.georgetown.edu> "Law Library All" <LawLibraryAll@law.georgetown.edu> "Lorenzo G Di Silvio\(fwd\)" <disilvio@gmail.com> mahony.christopher@gmail.com Maxtell@Princeton.edu milton@toledojunior.com.br molly.beth.wilder@gmail.com Munshis <munshisherally@gmail.com> "Nancy?? Cantalupo" <cantalun@law.georgetown.edu> nasredeen.abdulbari@post.harvard.edu oso@georgetown.edu Patrick.Glen@usdoj.gov "Rabia S. Belt" <rsb81@law.georgetown.edu> "Ramzan Alnoaimi" <ra357@law.georgetown.edu> richizquierdo <richizquierdo@gmail.com> "Ruthanne M Deutsch" <rmd8@law.georgetown.edu> "Samantha Godwin" <sgodwin3@googlemail.com> "Shana Tabak" <shanatabak@gmail.com> "Sooz Shin" <soozshin@gmail.com> ss735@georgetown.edu Sshmuely <sshmuely@MIT.EDU> tpschmidt@gmail.com Zachary.kaufman@aya.yale.edu
Date:	7/1/2015 8:20:26 AM
Subject:	Next Week's Summer Workshops
Attachments:	History Thought.docx Koplow manuscript for July 9.docx

On Tuesday, July 7, Norman Birnbaum will talk to us about “History Thought, History Imagined, History Experienced, History

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ignored: Notes Toward An Essay." On Thursday, July 9, David Koplow's topic will be "You're Gonna Need a Bigger Boat: Alternatives to the U.N. Security Council For Enforcing Nuclear Disarmament and Human Rights." Materials for both workshops are attached to this email. They will also be available on the Georgetown Law Website and, in hard copy, at Faculty Support. We meet in McDonough 492 at noon. Cookies and drinks will be served.

Mike Seidman

Louis Michael Seidman
Carmack Waterhouse Professor of Constitutional Law
Georgetown University Law Center
600 New Jersey Ave. NW
Washington, DC 20001
202-662-9102

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jake Sullivan" <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "Joel Benenson" <jbenenson@bsgco.com>
Date: 4/24/2015 11:11:44 AM
Subject: Re: Initial Economic Questions for Republicans

Great list. We're building on it.

On Apr 24, 2015, at 3:04 PM, Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com > wrote:

> Of course I meant Paul Ryan.
>
> It's just so confusing with 19 of them. It's like a football team that has its offense and defense on the field at the same time.
>
> From: Mandy Grunwald [mailto:gruncom@aol.com]
> Sent: Friday, April 24, 2015 2:52 PM
> To: jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com ; David@db-research.com
> Cc: john.podesta@gmail.com ; Jim Margolis; Joel Benenson; John Anzalone; re47@hillaryclinton.com ; jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com ; dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com
> Subject: Initial Economic Questions for Republicans
>
> On economic issues, I know Jake and his team will come up with a good list, but there are already two proposals on the table that I think we should try to get all GOPers to weigh in on:
> --Rubio's tax plan that includes dropping the top rate for those making over $400k from 39.6 to 35.
> --Rand Paul's 17% flat tax.
> Also, it would be great to get:
> --Dodd/Frank -- repeal? CFPB repeal?
> --repeal of carried interest tax break
> --repeal of oil company tax breaks
> We already have the Senators' votes on Elizabeth Warren's student loan refinancing bills. We might get the other candidates too.
> We might also get reaction to paid leave.
>
> thx
>
> Mandy Grunwald
> Grunwald Communications
> 202 973-9400
>
> -----Original Message-----
> From: Jennifer Palmieri <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com >
> To: David Binder <David@db-research.com >
> Cc: John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com >; Jim Margolis <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com >; Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com >; Mandy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com >; John Anzalone <john@algpolling.com >; Robby Mook <re47@hillaryclinton.com >; Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com >; Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com >
> Sent: Thu, Apr 23, 2015 9:43 pm
> Subject: Re: Stories for tomorrow 4.24
>
> Thanks. We do have some ideas on this, will discus in am.
>
> Sent from my iPhone
>
> On Apr 23, 2015, at 9:33 PM, David Binder < David@db-research.com > wrote:
>
> > One thing I think we need to push, that was effective in our groups, is to remind people of the wonderful things that the Clinton Foundation has done around the globe. In the midst of all this incoming stuff, can we remind the world what has been accomplished? In addition to confronting the accusations, do we also have an opportunity to insert the message below that was an effective response in our vulnerability research:
> >
> > Hillary Clinton's opponents are trying to start a controversy where none exists. The Clinton Foundation is a totally non-political charity whose work saves and improves lives at home and around the world. Because of charitable contributions to the Foundation and its programs, 8 million people have benefited from lifesaving HIV/AIDS medications, 6,000 American schools are providing kids with healthy food choices in an effort to fight childhood obesity; 28,000 African farmers have improved their crops; and 248 million tons of greenhouse gas emissions are being reduced in cities worldwide. The Clinton Global Initiative brings together people from business, labor, government, and the non-profit world to solve problems without politics or gridlock. Republican opponents want to confuse voters about the Clinton Foundation and its donors because all this good work is proof that what Hillary cares about most is helping hard-working people and families build better lives.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: Jennifer Palmieri [mailto:jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com]
Sent: Thursday, April 23, 2015 8:56 PM
To: John Podesta; Jim Margolis; Joel Benenson; Mandy Grunwald; John Anzalone; David Binder; Robby Mook; Jake Sullivan; Dan Schwerin
Subject: Fwd: Stories for tomorrow 4.24

For our eight am call tomorrow

Sent from my iPhone

Begin forwarded message:

> From: Rebecca Chalif <rchalif@hillaryclinton.com >
> Date: April 23, 2015 at 8:53:05 PM EDT
> To: Jennifer Palmieri <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com >, Kristina Schake <kschake@hillaryclinton.com >, Brian Fallon <bfallon@hillaryclinton.com >, Jesse Ferguson <jferguson@hillaryclinton.com >, Christina Reynolds <creynolds@gpg.com >, Josh Schwerin <jschwerin@hillaryclinton.com >, Jesse Lehrich <jlehrich@hillaryclinton.com >, Ian Sams <isams@hillaryclinton.com >
> Subject: Stories for tomorrow 4.24
>
> Stories for tomorrow:
>
> - Washington Post - Ros, Hamburger - Giustra profile
> - New York Times, weekender - Tony Rodham
> - ABC Brian Ross- Giustra, Canadian
> - Ruth Marcus- no quid pro quo, but this is a problem for the Clintons, typical, they blur lines all the time
> - WSJ- Cheryl holding up FOIAs for political reasons (next week)
> - Bloomberg- tbd story, has Giustra on the record (tbd time)
> - Bloomberg- Laureate
> - NY Daily News- did we tell the NY Times whether or not HRC was briefed
>
> Story Lines:
>
> 1. Nervous Dems
> 2. Playing by their own rules, fatigue
> 3. WJC isolated/wealth, foundation as a continuing drag on the campaign

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sara Du Bois" <sdubois@progressivemediausa.org>
To: "Sara Du Bois" <SDuBois@progressivemediausa.org>
Date: 6/6/2008 1:24:48 AM
Subject: [big campaign] '08 Daily News Clips - 6/6

08 Election Daily News Clips
June 6th, 2008

Candidate Tracking:

All times in Eastern Standard Time

10am McCain: Finance Reception in Coral Gables, FL

11:20am BUSH: Meeting with the People's Republic of China Earthquake Relief Efforts in Washington, D.C.

11:40am McCain: Finance Luncheon in Miami, FL

1:30pm CHENEY: Remarks at a reception for Congressional Candidate Pete Olson and the 2008 Texas State Victory Fund in Houston

1:50pm BUSH: Ceremonial swearing-in for the HUD Secretary in Washington, D.C.

2:15pm McCain: Boat Tar in Everglades Safari Park, Miami, FL

3pm McCain: Media availability in the Everglades Safari Park in Miami, Florida

News Clips:

MCCAIN NEWS

McCain Sets Sights on the Democrats Who Voted for Clinton (Washington Post 6/6/08)
By Michael D. Shear and Jon Cohen; A04
Republican Sen. John McCain envisions a November victory built in part around attracting a large number of the millions of voters who turned away from Sen. Barack Obama's promise of change during the historic Democratic primary campaign.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/05/AR2008060503513.html?hpid=topnews

Ousted Executive Provides a Feminine Face to the McCain Campaign (NYT 6/6/08)
By ELISABETH BUMILLER
Three years ago, Carleton S. Fiorina was the celebrity C.E.O. who was spectacularly fired by the Hewlett-Packard board. She produced a best-selling memoir, "Tough Choices," but for the most part spent the years after her ouster in relative self-imposed exile from public life.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/06/us/politics/06fiorina.html?_r=1&oref=slogin

Adviser Says McCain Backs Bush Wiretaps (NYT 6/6/08)
By CHARLIE SAVAGE
A top adviser to Senator John McCain says Mr. McCain believes that President Bush's program of wiretapping without warrants was lawful, a position that appears to bring him into closer alignment with the sweeping theories of executive authority pushed by the Bush administration legal team.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/06/us/politics/06mccain.html?adxnnl=1&ref=politics&adxnnlx=1212753626-dtPHe6kS2PT8TI6W6zgH+A

$21.5 Million Is a Record for McCain (NYT 6/6/08)
By MICHAEL COOPER
Senator John McCain's presidential campaign raised at least $21.5 million in May — its best fund-raising month yet — in a sign that its effort to draw donations in tandem with the Republican National Committee is yielding dividends.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/06/us/politics/06donate.html

McCain bumbles the delivery (Politico 6/6/08)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By: Jonathan Martin
As Democrats buzzed this week about their new de facto nominee, his historic candidacy and the unlikely political demise of Hillary Rodham Clinton, Republican circles were humming with another topic. The topic: Is there a way John McCain can win the presidency without giving another speech?
http://www.politico.com/news/stories/0608/10880.html

John McCain visits Orlando - says he is 'committed' to saving Everglades (Orlando Sentinel 6/6/08)
By Jim Stratton
Two days after his opponent locked up the Democratic nomination, Republican John McCain came to Orlando to raise more money and show the importance he places on winning Florida.
http://www.orlandosentinel.com/community/news/lakebuenavista/orl-mmcain0608jun06,0,1925050.story

McCain opposed Everglades funding (Miami Herald 6/5/08)
BY BETH REINHARD
John McCain will venture into the Everglades for the first time as a presidential candidate Friday, an obligatory rite of passage for politicians shoring up their environmental credentials in a crucial state. But the Arizona senator opposed spending $2 billion on restoring the national park, siding with President Bush against Florida's political establishment -- including top Republican supporters Gov. Charlie Crist and Sen. Mel Martinez.
http://www.miamiherald.com/political-currents/story/558556.html

McCain to speak about environment as he visits Everglades (South Florida Sun-Sentinel 6/5/08)
By Anthony Man
Using the Everglades as a backdrop, Republican presidential candidate John McCain plans to continue his effort to position himself as an independent thinker different from President Bush.
http://www.sun-sentinel.com/news/local/florida/sfl-flbglades0605sbjun05,0,6114790,print.story

All politics local, Florida edition (Politico blog 6/5/08)
By Ben Smith
Florida Democratic Party puts out a video attacking McCain for opposing the "Cat Fund," as we'll all learn to call it soon — the Florida Hurricane Catastrophe Fund. He's explained his opposition as a matter of federalism.
http://www.politico.com/blogs/bensmith/0608/All_politics_local_Florida_edition.html
Link to video of ad: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=orjwA3l1y4o
Link to Obama response: http://thepage.time.com/obama-camp-release-on-mccains-opposition-to-national-catastrophic-insurance-fund /

McCain theme: reform, prosperity, peace (MSNBC blog 6/5/08)
By Kelly O'Donnell
At an event that took place about an hour ago, McCain shrugged off the teleprompter that so often makes his remarks appear stilted. The copy displayed on the prompter slid up and down as its operator apparently tried guess where the senator was going. I am told the presumptive GOP nominee "decided not to give the speech." Instead, he was ad-libbing remarks that might otherwise appear prepared and scripted. He also debuted what may be the elusive theme for his candidacy: "Reform, prosperity, and peace."
http://firstread.msnbc.msn.com/archive/2008/06/05/1117397.aspx

McCain defends position on Florida measures (AP 6/5/08)
By LIBBY QUAID
Republican John McCain faced tough questions Thursday about why he opposed a measure to restore the Everglades that had broad support from Florida officials, including Republican Gov. Charlie Crist and GOP Sen. Mel Martinez....In Florida, McCain defends opposition to Everglades, hurricane insurance plans http://talkingpointsmemo.com/news/2008/06/mccain_defends_position_on_flo.php

McCain Wants a Man on Mars (Washington Post blog 6/5/08)
By Robert Barnes
Sen. John McCain told Florida newspaper editors today that he thought it would be exciting to send a man to Mars. He did not specify whether that man should be Sen. Barack Obama.
http://blog.washingtonpost.com/the-trail/2008/06/05/mccain_wants_a_man_on_mars.html

McCain Says President Should Talk More About Iraq (CBS blog 6/5/08)
By John Bentley
While campaigning and raising money in the swing state of Florida today, John McCain told the Florida Society of Newspaper Editors & Press Association that whoever becomes president needs to do a better job of keeping the American public informed about the Iraq war. "If I were president, I'd be holding a briefing once a week about Iraq," he said. "Even if it was only carried on C-SPAN."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://www.cbsnews.com/blogs/2008/06/05/politics/fromtheroad/entry4157747.shtml

McCain snubs President Bush's fundraising dinner (The Hill 6/5/08)
By Jackie Kucinich
Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) will not attend President Bush's fundraising dinner for congressional candidates in another indication that the GOP nominee is distancing himself from the man he wants to replace.
http://thehill.com/leading-the-news/mccain-snubs-president-bushs-fundraising-dinner-2008-06-05.html

McCain To Snub Bush's Fundraising Dinner (Huffington Post 6/5/08)
On the same day that a CBS News poll found that 64 percent of Americans think Sen. John McCain is the same or even more conservative than President Bush, news has leaked that McCain will be "snubbing" Bush at an upcoming fundraiser. ... But a look at McCain's public schedule finds that the presumptive GOP nominee has no other public events scheduled for the day of the Bush event.
http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2008/06/05/mccain-to-snub-bushs-fund_n_105570.html

McCain Predicts 'Very Close Race' Against Obama, Casts Self as Underdog (ABC 6/5/08)
By ED O'KEEFE
John McCain thinks he's the underdog in the race for the White House against Barack Obama, the presumptive Democratic nominee. ...GOP Contender Acknowledges Obama-Clinton Ticket Would Be 'Formidable' http://abcnews.go.com/WN/Politics/story?id=5005254&page=1
Link to video: http://abcnews.go.com/WN/Politics/story?id=5005254&page=1
Link to transcript: http://abcnews.go.com/WN/Politics/story?id=5005401&page=1

Soft on Iran (FactCheck.org 6/5/08)
John McCain is attacking Barack Obama's opposition to the Kyl-Lieberman amendment, which (among other things) called for labeling Iran's Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps as a terrorist organization. McCain claims that Obama's opposition means that he also opposed calling the IRGC terrorists. We find otherwise.
http://www.factcheck.org/elections-2008/soft_on_iran.html

Senate Intelligence Report Undermines McCain's Claims That 'Every Assessment' Justified War In Iraq (ThinkProgress 6/5/08) mccaincheney.jpgLast week, Sen. John McCain (R-AZ) sought to excuse his constant and vociferous cheerleading for the Iraq war in 2002 and 2003 by claiming that "every intelligence agency in the world" believed that Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction:
http://thinkprogress.org/2008/06/05/intell-report-false-pretenses/

Parsing the Veepstakes (The Page 6/5/08)
By Mark Halperin
...The big surprise has been the bond developing between McCain and onetime rival Mitt Romney.
http://thepage.time.com/parsing-the-veepstakes/

McCain forgets his own votes (Washington Post "Fact Checker" blog 6/5/08)
...The Democrats jumped on John McCain on Wednesday when he claimed that he had supported "every investigation" into the Bush administration's fumbled response to Hurricane Katrina. The presumptive Republican nominee twice voted against a Democratic proposal to set up an independent 9/11-style commission to investigate the causes of the tragedy, opting instead for a congressional investigation.
http://blog.washingtonpost.com/fact-checker/2008/06/mccain_forgets_his_own_votes.html

HALPERIN'S TAKE: What John McCain Underestimates (The Page 6/5/08)
By Mark Halperin
1. The astonishing enthusiasm that Obama inspires in his supporters — and how much it contrasts with the respect, but not passion, McCain enjoys from his own backers. (And the size of Obama's crowds…)
http://thepage.time.com/halperin%E2%80%99s-take-what-john-mccain-underestimates/

Obama, McCain work to expand battlefield (AP 6/5/08)
By LIZ SIDOTI
Democrat Barack Obama hopes Virginia, a former GOP stronghold with a legacy of slavery and segregation, is fertile ground as he seeks to crack the Republican bastion of the South and become the first black president.
http://ap.google.com/article/ALeqM5jr_Ww-hsebhQ64M2aI0pqxpZ0UpwD9140VS01

OPINIONS AND EDITORIALS

Iraq and the Election (WSJ 6/6/08)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This spring, the Iraqi army routed insurgents in three of their most important urban strongholds. These gains follow the success of the surge in crushing al Qaeda in the Sunni triangle, meaning that we are at last on the verge of winning in Iraq and securing a strategic victory in the Middle East. Question: Is this emerging victory – achieved at a cost of more than 4,000 American lives – something we are prepared to abandon after November?
http://online.wsj.com/article/SB121270725304950289.html?mod=opinion_main_review_and_outlooks

It's So Much Nicer on K Street (NYT 6/6/08)
The more the presidential candidates promise to rein in the rich Washington culture of influence-peddling, the more voters need a reality check.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/06/opinion/06fri2.html?ref=opinion

The Truth About the War (NYT 6/6/08)
....It has taken five years to finally come to a reckoning over how much the Bush administration knowingly twisted and hyped intelligence to justify that invasion. On Thursday — after years of Republican stonewalling — a report by the Senate Intelligence Committee gave us as good a set of answers as we're likely to get.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/06/opinion/06fri1.html?_r=1&ref=opinion&oref=slogin

BUSH NEWS

Bush Inflated Threat From Iraq's Banned Weapons, Report Says (Washington Post 6/6/08)
By Joby Warrick and Walter Pincus; A03
President Bush and top administration officials repeatedly exaggerated what they knew about Iraq's weapons and its ties to terrorist groups as the White House pressed its case for war against Iraq, the Senate intelligence committee said yesterday in a long-awaited report.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/05/AR2008060501523.html?hpid=moreheadlines

At Peace Institute Groundbreaking, War Dominates the Proceedings (Washington Post 6/6/08)
By Michael Abramowitz; A07
President Bush, whose administration has been dominated by wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and the global battle against terrorism, helped break ground yesterday on a $185 million facility for the U.S. Institute of Peace -- a government-funded think tank with the mission of preventing conflict and helping promote postwar stability operations.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/05/AR2008060502545.html

Revealed: Secret plan to keep Iraq under US control (UK's The Independent 6/5/08)
By Patrick Cockburn
Bush wants 50 military bases, control of Iraqi airspace and legal immunity for all American soldiers and contractors http://www.independent.co.uk/news/world/middle-east/revealed-secret-plan-to-keep-iraq-under-us-control-840512.html

Limbaugh: Bush donors say he'll strike Iran before term ends. (ThinkProgress 6/5/08)
Today on his radio show, Rush Limbaugh boasted about his insider access and told a caller that important Bush donors had assured him the President would attack Iran soon:
http://thinkprogress.org/2008/06/05/limbaugh-bush-donors-say-hell-strike-iran-before-term-ends/
Link to audio and transcript of Limbaugh show: http://www.rushlimbaugh.com/home/daily/site_060508/content/01125115.guest.html

OTHER TOP NEWS

New numbers are expected to show slower job growth (AP 6/6/08)
The Labor Department is releasing the latest employment report this morning and economists are expecting the unemployment rate to rise. So far this year, payrolls have contracted every month.
http://ap.google.com/article/ALeqM5jsanM66tszKz1zFq0LOG4XvWS7zAD914IC600

Did Iranian agents dupe Pentagon officials? (McClatchy 6/6/08)
By John Walcott
Defense Department counterintelligence investigators suspected that Iranian exiles who provided dubious intelligence on Iraq and Iran to a small group of Pentagon officials might have "been used as agents of a foreign intelligence service ... to reach into and influence the highest levels of the U.S. government," a Senate Intelligence Committee report said Thursday.
http://www.mcclatchydc.com/homepage/story/40080.html

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Air Force officials ousted over nuclear gaffes (CNN 6/5/08)
* "Leadership has drifted" regarding nuclear weapons, Defense secretary says
* Resignations come after report criticizing bomber flight, mistaken device shipment
* Report criticizes U.S. Air Force's reactions to incidents http://www.cnn.com/2008/POLITICS/06/05/pentagon.firings/index.html

US attorney general revising FBI probe guidelines (Reuters 6/5/08)
By James Vicini
Attorney General Michael Mukasey said Thursday that he is working to revise the guidelines for FBI investigations as the bureau seeks to transform itself into an intelligence-gathering agency that seeks to prevent terrorist attacks.
http://talkingpointsmemo.com/news/2008/06/us_attorney_general_revising_f.php

Iraq May Request Extension For U.S. (Washington Post 6/6/08)
By Karen DeYoung; A15
The Iraqi government may request an extension of the United Nations security mandate authorizing a U.S. military presence, due to expire in December, amid growing domestic criticism of new bilateral arrangements now being negotiated with the Bush administration, according to senior Iraqi officials.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/05/AR2008060503687.html

9/11 Architect Tells Court He Hopes for Martyrdom (Washington Post 6/6/08)
By Josh White; A01
Khalid Sheik Mohammed, the self-proclaimed mastermind of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, appeared publicly Thursday for the first time since his capture five years ago and calmly told a U.S. military court that he hopes for a death sentence that will allow him to die "a martyr."
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/05/AR2008060500305.html

United Arab Emirates to be first Gulf state to appoint ambassador to Iraq (McClatchy 6/5/08)
By Leila Fadel
The United Arab Emirates will be the first Gulf Arab nation to open an embassy in Iraq since the war and subsequent American occupation began five years ago, its foreign minister announced Thursday.
http://www.mcclatchydc.com/homepage/story/40057.html

DNC bans lobbyist money (AP 6/6/08)
Obama keeps Howard Dean as chair, brings in new strategists http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/24989468/

Clinton Says V.P. Is Obama's Choice (NYT blog 6/5/08)
By Adam Nagourney
Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton today disavowed a campaign by some of her supporters to pressure Senator Barack Obama into choosing her as a running-mate, saying they were acting on their own and the decision on who to pick was "Senator Obama's and his alone."
http://thecaucus.blogs.nytimes.com/2008/06/05/clinton-disavows-reports-that-she-wants-to-be-vp/
Link to Clinton statement: http://thepage.time.com/clinton-camp-response-to-vp-inquiries/

Obama, Clinton Hold Secret Meeting (CBS 6/5/08)
Former Rivals Meet To Discuss Party Unity, Says Spokesman http://www.cbsnews.com/stories/2008/06/05/politics/main4158471.shtml

Polls show Obama-McCain race tight as campaign begins (CNN 6/5/08)
* New York congressional delegation endorses Barack Obama
* Obama tells Virginia crowd DNC will no longer accept money from lobbyists
* John McCain hopes for honorable campaign, he says in Florida speech
* Poll of polls shows the two presumptive nominees just 2 percentage points apart http://www.cnn.com/2008/POLITICS/06/05/campaign.wrap/index.html

RIGHT WING WATCH

Obama among targets of robo calls in Illinois (AP 6/5/08)
A conservative advocacy group plans an onslaught of automated telephone calls targeting Barack Obama and a handful of other senators demanding they oppose a bipartisan climate change bill.
http://ap.google.com/article/ALeqM5jX38k-ipAmBN6dC25J6n9i1VpYhgD9147L3G0

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

--
Sara DuBois
Deputy Director, Tracking/Media Monitoring
Progressive Media USA
sdubois@progressivemediausa.org
202-609-7681 (office)
410-967-7306 (cell)
--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Tikkun Staff" <magazine@tikkun.org>
To:	Podesta@Law.Georgetown.Edu
Date:	7/24/2015 4:53:46 AM
Subject:	Tikkun Daily Digest: Iranian Nuclear Deal, Remembering Gaza, The Truth about Junipero Serra, The Confederate Flag, and more!

Tikkun DAILY (te•kün) To mend, repair, and transform the world.

Click on the links below to join the lively discussions taking place this week on the Tikkun Daily Blog! Unlike the carefully edited print magazine and web magazine site, Tikkun Daily is a spontaneous, open forum to which volunteer bloggers directly post their ideas and readers post their comments. You'll find a provocative variety of views here, including some with which Tikkun editors heartily disagree, so please remember that any given post is presented solely by its author and does not represent Tikkun's editorial stance. To sign up for a daily email digest with links to the day's posts, click here :

Uri Avnery and Jeffrey Sachs on the Iranian Nuclear Deal

Jul 23, 2015 10:06 pm | Rabbi Michael Lerner

Read pieces by Uri Avnery and Jeffrey Sachs on the Iranian Nuclear Deal, with an introduction by Rabbi Michael Lerner. "Iran will have a nuclear weapon that will keep Israel or the US from attacking it--a sad prospect, but probably the likely outcome whether or not there was a nuclear deal with Iran. Unless..."

comments | read more

Rabbi Michael Lerner: Remember Gaza One Year Later

Jul 08, 2015 06:45 pm | Rabbi Michael Lerner

Let us acknowledge the one-year anniversary of Israel's attacks on Gaza by revisiting some of Rabbi Michael Lerner's words, both those acknowledging the grief inspired by this (and all) conflict as well as those that inspire hope to heal the pain in our world.

comments | read more

Tikkun relies on support from readers like you.
Join our Community Today.

Warren Blumenfeld: KKK Posing as Victim of "Cultural Genocide"

Jul 09, 2015 01:00 pm | Warren Blumenfeld

Let's be clear here: the Confederate battle flag no more represents white Southern culture anymore than the swastika flag represents Gentile German culture. What these flags do have in common, though, is that they both symbolize Christian white supremacy, terrorism, treason, separation, exclusion, enslavement, murder, and in the United States, yes, cross burnings.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

comments | read more

David Harris-Gershon: An open letter to black America from a white, Jewish man of privilege

Jul 22, 2015 03:31 pm | David Harris-Gershon

Dear black Americans, I'm a white, Jewish man from Pittsburgh who, over the last year, has watched videos of Eric Garner being murdered, read about Tamir Rice being murdered, and shuddered over Ferguson after Mike Brown was murdered. On television and online, I've been confronted with disturbing images of black bodies being destroyed. And I'm telling you, I can't bear it any longer. I can't bear to learn any more details about Sandra Bland. I'm sick to my stomach, losing sleep, feeling unsteady. Yet you keep showing me images, telling me stories. And I have to look away.

comments | read more

Ibrahim Sundiata: The Confederate Flag: Heritage or Hate

Jul 20, 2015 01:56 pm | Ibrahim Sundiata

The Charleston Massacre unleashed a torrent of questions about the true nature of "The Lost Cause." Across the country we are coming to acknowledge the "Stars and Bars" as not only a symbol of the slavocracy, but also one of continuing opposition to social progress.

comments | read more

Ralph L. Cates: The Best Source of Energy from Sunlight: Concentrated Solar Power (CSP)

Jul 07, 2015 04:15 pm | Ralph L. Cates

The world needs Concentrated Solar Power (CSP) systems now. They are the most-efficient, utility-scale, renewable-energy-producing technologies known. The U.S. and countries throughout the world must seize this opportunity.

comments | read more

Deborah Meinke: A Plea for Clergy to Affirm Climate Science and Join Together in Action

Jul 22, 2015 03:46 pm | Deborah Meinke

The Clergy Climate Letter provides one way for people of faith to rally around common moral and religious values centered on earth stewardship and care for creation.

comments | read more

Dr. Mark Stoll: What Religion Tells Us About the Place of Wilderness in American Environmentalism

Jul 23, 2015 03:00 pm | Dr. Mark Stoll

We think of parks as a sensible response to urbanization and industrialization and of conservation as a logical solution to destruction of resources. Yet why were Congregationalists so interested in these issues? How did their religious values shape these movements?

comments | read more

Kathy Kelly: Pushing Up

Jul 21, 2015 03:00 pm | Kathy Kelly

"Low carbon" and "no carbon" energy and energy efficiency should be paid for by abolishing war. Lawrence is right to insist that the U.S. should view problems and conflicts created by climate change as "opportunities to work together with other nations to mitigate and adapt to its effects." But the madness of conquest must end before any such coordinated work will be possible.

comments | read more

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Tikkun relies on support from readers like you.
Join our Community Today.

Wendy Elisheva Somerson: Sweet Blossoms out the Crater: A Review of Bodymap by Leah Lakshmi Piepzna-Samarasinha

Jul 20, 2015 03:59 pm | Wendy Elisheva Somerson

With all the celebrations of gay same-ness after the Supreme Court's recent decision to legalize gay marriage, I am grateful for Leah Laskhmi Piepzna-Samarasinha's filthy gorgeous poems, which remind us how queer desires still have the power to fuck shit up. The poems in her collection Bodymap demonstrate how queer desire.

comments | read more

Miki Kashtan: The Noncontroversial Essence: Bringing People Together

Jul 10, 2015 07:24 pm | Miki Kashtan

I explained to them that this - the finding of agreements on principles in the midst of disagreements on positions - was what we would do on the day we came together... This agreement at the heart of disagreement is based on identifying what I call the "noncontroversial essence."

comments | read more

Rev. Dr. Matthew Fox: The Emerging Truth about Junipero Serra and the California Missions

Jul 10, 2015 05:00 pm | Rev. Dr. Matthew Fox

In this book Father Junipero Serra, called by some the "Father of California," is exposed in damning detail as the father of a system, the mission system, that systematically destroyed the culture of the indigenous peoples of California, who had lived at peace with the earth and more or less at peace with themselves over millennia until the Spanish arrived.There are those who say, "Don't judge an eighteenth-century person by twenty-first century standards." Well, when that person is being proposed by the pope himself as a saint and therefore a model for twenty-first century people to emulate, why wouldn't we have the right and indeed responsibility to judge?

comments | read more

Oona Taper: Darío Mekler Illustrates the Absurdities of Modern Life

Jul 08, 2015 02:24 pm | Oona Taper

Working with oils, watercolors, and acrylics, Argentinian artist Darío Mekler creates bold, colorful paintings that address the complexities of modern life. He skillfully uses fantasy and humor to illustrate human nature, painting monsters, angels, and absurd robots alongside images drawn from everyday experiences. Mekler has been creating for as long as he can remember.

comments | read more

Valerie Elverton-Dixon: The Cost of Cowardice (part two)

Jul 22, 2015 10:59 pm | Valerie Elverton-Dixon

When it comes to passing gun regulations, the United States Congress is a group of cowards. Congress-members of both parties use the second amendment as a fig-leaf to cover their cowardice while they dance to the tune of the National Rifle Association.

comments | read more

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Tikkun relies on support from readers like you.
Join our Community Today.

unsubscribe: Click here
if you are having trouble unsubscribing Click here

Copyright 2014 Tikkun Magazine. Tikkun is a registered trademark.
2342 Shattuck Avenue, #1200
Berkeley, CA 94704
510-644-1200
Fax 510-644-1255

empowered by salsa

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Myroslaw Smorodsky" <msmorodsky@uaba.org>
To:	"Myroslaw Smorodsky" <msmorodsky@uaba.org>
Date:	9/14/2014 2:16:24 PM
Subject:	FW: UABA Press Release: AMERICAN MILITARY ASSISTANCE: Is Ukraine "Waiting for Godot"?
Attachments:	14-09-14 AMERICAN MILITARY ASSISTANCE Is Ukraine Waiting for Godot.pdf

Ukrainian American Bar Association

Press Release: September 14, 2014
PDF copy attached

AMERICAN MILITARY ASSISTANCE: Is Ukraine "Waiting for Godot"?

On September 18, 2014, the President of Ukraine, Petro Poroshenko, will address a joint session of the United States Congress. No doubt he will strongly applaud the latest round of sanctions that were imposed on Russia by the United States and the European Union on September 12, 2014 in response to Russia's ongoing invasion of Ukraine. But he will also likely repeat his prior requests for immediate military aid from the United States and its Western partners so that Ukraine can defend itself from further Russian aggression. It will not be a request for "boots on the ground" but for military weapons and supplies for Ukraine's armed forces. The US and the West have made it crystal clear that their military participation in Ukraine's defense is not an option despite the fact that in 1994, Ukraine voluntarily surrendered its entire nuclear arsenal – the 3rd largest in the world – in return for guarantees in the Budapest Memorandum [pledged by Russia, the US and the UK] of Ukraine's economic and political sovereignty and the integrity of its borders.

Most of the civilized countries of the world have condemned the Russian invasion of Ukraine as an affront to international rule of law and as a violation of the numerous international treaties and agreements that require civilized countries to respect the sovereignty and territorial integrity of states. These linchpin agreements - such as the UN Charter and the Helsinki Accords - maintained peace and stability on the Eurasian continent for over 70 years. Regrettably, it is now patently obvious that Russia's actions clearly evidence that it will not abide by any promises that it has made or will make in any future treaty or other international agreement.

Numerous concerned voices in the American political, academic and mass media arena have urgently called for America and the EU to give immediate military aid to Ukraine. All of these voices recognize that despite the increased economic sanctions, the Kremlin obstinately continues its military buildup within Ukraine and continues to violate the cease-fire agreement reached in Minsk earlier this month. It now arrogantly and openly continues its military actions against defensive Ukrainian forces inside the Donetsk and Luhansk regions of Ukraine, in spite of the stronger economic sanctions imposed on September 12 by the US and EU. Currently, additional convoys of "humanitarian" trucks openly unload lethal weapons inside Ukrainian territory and Russian military forces in and outside of Ukrainian borders are bombarding Ukrainian defensive military positions within Ukraine. So much for Russia and its surrogate pro-Russian terrorists abiding by a cease-fire agreement! Putin has doubled down on his bellicose pronouncements and has vehemently restated his resolve to return Russia to the previous borders of the former USSR and even to expand the Kremlin's hegemony over the eastern parts of the European Union. He has now publicly declared the United States, NATO, and the European Union to be enemies of Russia and announced an escalated buildup of his military arsenal. Putin has also made not so veiled threats of using his nuclear military capabilities in his quest. Needless to say, the conquest of Ukraine is the Kremlin's first necessary step in achieving its imperialistic goals.

The United States [together with the UK], as a signatory to the Budapest Memorandum, has a joint and several obligation to Ukraine to protect Ukraine's territorial integrity and sovereignty. Had Ukraine not willingly relinquished its nuclear weapons in 1994, the present balance of power between Ukraine and Russia would have been substantially different and would have most likely deterred Russia's illegal invasion and "annexation" of Crimea and the blatant invasion of Eastern Ukraine . Since Ukraine kept its part of the bargain under the Budapest Memorandum, it is now time for the United States to make good on its word to guarantee Ukraine's sovereignty and territorial integrity.

It is obvious that the present economic sanctions in and of themselves are woefully deficient and will not stop Russia's unlawful aggression against Ukraine. Had Ukraine received American and Western military aid earlier in a timely fashion, Ukraine would have been in a better military posture to repel the pro-Russian terrorists and seal its border from further Russian incursion. Prior to September 5, 2014, Ukrainian military forces were in a strategic position to defeat the pro-Russian terrorists in Ukraine. On that day, NATO leaders were debating what sanctions to impose upon Russia. In response to the verbal threats of NATO leaders - which the Kremlin perceived as a shallow non-consequential scolding - that same day Moscow ordered its troops into Ukraine with superior weaponry and fire power to substantially push back the Ukrainian military from its gains painfully attained with the life and blood of many a brave Ukrainian soldier.

The question is: will Ukraine need to wait endlessly and hopelessly for American and EU military aid to arrive in the same exhausting and fruitless manner as the two characters in Samuel Beckett's absurdist play "Waiting for Godot" who wait incessantly in fervent hope for a person named Godot to appear but who never arrives?

The United States Congress has before it two bills: H.R. 5241 "Crimea Annexation Non-recognition Act" which prohibits the United States to recognize the de jure or de facto annexation of Crimea by the Russian Federation. H.R.5190, the Ukraine Security Assistance Act of 2014, provides military assistance to Ukraine and to designate Ukraine as a Major non-NATO Ally (MNNA). The Ukrainian American Bar Association strongly urges the United States Congress to expeditiously pass - on a fast-track basis - this legislation so as to signal to the world that the United States abides by its word in international agreements that it signs and will help Ukraine defend its territorial integrity and sovereignty as the quid pro quo for surrendering its nuclear arsenal. Failure to do so in a timely and expeditious manner will only reaffirm Vladimir Putin's strongly held belief that the United States is only a paper tiger – all words and no teeth.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If the United States does not keep its word regarding sovereignty and security guarantees relating to nuclear non-proliferation agreements, why should any other country such as Iran, Pakistan, India, Israel or North Korea have any faith in America's representations or promises in future nuclear disarmament negotiations and accords. Any tardiness or inaction by the United States Congress in rendering timely military aid to Ukraine will also condemn Ukraine to an endless and hopeless waiting for American assistance -- as the characters in "Waiting for Godot"-- only to have its sovereign territory painfully eroded by Russian aggression, with extensive casualties to its population, with millions of people displaced, and many a young Ukrainian soldier killed by a stronger and brutal aggressor nation whose only goal is imperial territorial expansion. If Ukraine falls, then the horrific conflagration of war will spill over into the eastern part of the European Union and will necessitate American "boots on the ground". All this may be avoided if the United States Congress acts now and fulfills its obligation and duty to give timely military assistance to Ukraine.

For further information, please contact
Myroslaw Smorodsky, Esq.
Communications Director of the Ukrainian American Bar Association (UABA)
Tel: 201-507-4500; Email; myroslaw@smorodsky.com ; Website; www.smorodsky.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jennifer Palmieri" <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "Joel Benenson" <jbenenson@bsgco.com>
Date: 5/1/2015 6:50:49 AM
Subject: Re: Heads up for call with HRC

Given this morning's am shows - which were terrible - that is no longer a great argument.

Sent from my iPhone

> On May 1, 2015, at 1:49 PM, Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com> wrote:
>
> Thanks.
> Do we have some analysis of nightly news/front pages etc to make the case that this is not being covered heavily? Or at least enough based on day to day observation, i.e. not on front pages, not on nightly news or morning news...
>
> -----Original Message-----
> From: Jennifer Palmieri [mailto:jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com]
> Sent: Friday, May 01, 2015 1:44 PM
> To: John Podesta; Joel Benenson; Jake Sullivan; Mandy Grunwald; Huma Abedin; Teddy Goff; Jim Margolis; Kristina Schake; Robby Mook; Dan Schwerin > Subject: Heads up for call with HRC
>
> While on the phone on a different topic, HRC raised Clinton Cash convo with Jake and me. It was a difficult conversation. So folks should be ready to explain why we don't think a video makes sense.
>
> Moreover, my impression is she wants a much stronger response. Which means engaging more on details that we have to date not found in our interest to do so.
>
> Just wanted to update folks.
>
> Sent from my iPhone

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: David.Willett@Sierraclub.org
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 6/17/2008 10:40:14 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Sierra Club Responds to Sen. McCain s Energy Speech elaboration on yesterday's statement...

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE: June 17, 2008
Contact: Josh Dorner, 202.679.7570 (m)
David Willett, 202.491.6919 (m)

Sierra Club Responds to Sen. McCain's Energy Speech
Speech to Follow, Expand on Failed Bush Energy Policies

Washington, D.C.—Senator John McCain is slated to give a major policy address on energy issues later today in front of an audience of oil industry executives in Houston.

Yesterday Senator McCain called for lifting a nearly three decade old federal moratorium on drilling off of our coasts. "There are areas off our coasts that should be open to exploration and exploitation, and I hope we can take the first step by lifting the moratoria," said Senator McCain.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/16/AR2008061602148.html

Yesterday's Sierra Club response to Senator McCain's announcement can be found here.
http://sierraclub.org/pressroom/releases/pr2008-06-16.asp

Statement of Carl Pope, Sierra Club Executive Director

"Instead of siding with the hardworking American families being exploited by an energy industry awash in record profits, Senator McCain supports allowing Big Oil to begin the wholesale "exploitation" of our coasts. Rather than offering consumers real relief from skyrocketing energy prices, Senator McCain's plan would merely pad Big Oil's bottom line while putting thousands of miles of pristine beaches and coastline at risk.

"While he refuses to support the incentives for renewable energy needed to make the clean energy future a reality, Senator McCain wants more of the same reckless and outdated energy policies that President Bush and his allies in Congress have pushed for the past seven years: more 'traditional coal,' more oil, and more nuclear power. These disastrous policies have enriched special interests while devastating both our economy and our environment.

"If Senator McCain is really interested in breaking our addiction to oil, putting America back to work, and tackling global warming, we urge him to reconsider his support for the failed policies of the past. It's time for Senator McCain to support the common sense plan put forth by the Senate leadership, the Consumer-First Energy Act. This plan would make sure the oil industry is paying its fair share, crack down on speculators, put our economy back on the path to prosperity, help end our dangerous dependence on fossil fuels, and fight global warming. We urge Senator McCain to choose wind farms, not more windfalls for Big Oil. "

Selected Excerpts from Senator McCain's Houston Energy Speech

Sen. McCain: "The next president must be willing to break with the energy policies not just of the current Administration, but the administrations that preceded it, and lead a great national campaign to achieve energy security for America."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Reality: Senator McCain's plan for more drilling, more coal, and more nuclear power is identical to the energy policies put forth by President Bush and his allies in Congress for the past seven years.

Sen. McCain: "Over time, we must shift our entire energy economy toward a sustainable mix of new and cleaner power sources. This will include some we use already, such as wind, solar, biofuels, and other sources yet to be invented"
Reality: Senator McCain has consistently voted against requiring utilities to produce a certain percentage of our electricity from renewable sources like wind, solar, and biomass. He also refuses to support key incentives for clean, renewable energy and energy efficiency. McCain has missed two Senate votes in the past several months when such initiatives failed to pass by a single vote (12/13/03, Vote 425; 02/06/08, Vote 8). Senator McCain continues to support billions in new and existing subsidies for nuclear power plants.

Sen. McCain: "Investigation is underway to root out this kind of reckless wagering, unrelated to any kind of productive commerce, because it can distort the market, drive prices beyond rational limits, and put the investments and pensions of millions of Americans at risk. Where we find such abuses, they need to be swiftly punished. And to make sure it never happens again, we must reform the laws and regulations governing the oil futures market, so that they are just as clear and effective as the rules applied to stocks, bonds, and other financial instruments. In all of these markets, reform must assure transparency, prevent abuse, and protect the public interest."
Reality: Senator McCain has refused to support to the Consumer-First Energy Act of 2008 (S.3044), which would crack down on speculators and price gouging.

Sen. McCain: "As for offshore drilling, it's safe enough these days that not even Hurricanes Katrina and Rita could cause significant spillage from the battered rigs off the coasts of New Orleans and Houston."
Reality: According the Coast Guard, more than 7.1 million gallons of crude oil were spilled in at least nine major incidents and 35 smaller incidents as a direct result of Hurricane Katrina alone.
http://www.uscg.mil/hq/g-cp/comrel/factfile/factcards/hurricane_katrina.htm

Sen. McCain: "At the very least, one might assume, America had surely been building new refineries to achieve a more efficient delivery of gasoline to market, and thereby to lower the prices paid by the American people – especially in the summer season. But the policymakers in Washington haven't got around to that, either. There's so much regulation of the industry that the last American refinery was built when Jerry Ford was president."
Reality: The oil industry has expanded older refineries, but in generally has purposely allowed refining capacity to languish in order to constrain supply. In Senate testimony before the Congress (November, 2005), the Chief Executive Officer of Shell stated, "We are not aware of any environmental regulations that have prevented us from expanding refinery capacity or siting a new refinery." In addition, Conoco's CEO testified, "At this time, we are not aware of any projects that have been directly prevented as a result of any specific Federal or State regulation."
Finally, BP's CEO concluded "it does not believe that any Federal or state environmental regulations have 'prevented us' from expanding refinery capacity or siting a new refinery." The Bush Administration's own EPA also concluded in 2002 that permitting requirements had "not significantly impeded investment in new power plants or refineries." (EPA, New Source Review: Report to the President (June 13, 2002))

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sen. McCain: “Nuclear power is among the surest ways to gain a clean, abundant, and stable energy supply, as other nations understand.”
Reality: While opposing subsidies for renewable energy and energy efficiency, Senator McCain supports billions in new and existing subsidies for nuclear power. Nuclear power is a dirty, dangerous, and costly distraction from the policies we really need to build the clean energy future and fight global warming. Costs for new nuclear power plants are skyrocketing, with Florida Power and Light recently estimating in a regulatory filing that a two-reactor expansion at its Turkey Point facility could cost as much as $24 billion.
http://energycentral.fileburst.com/EnergyBizOnline/2008-3-may-jun/Financial_Front_Prices.pdf

Sen. McCain: A gas tax holiday is “the most direct and obvious way to give Americans a break at the gas station.”
Reality: Most economists agree that a gas tax holiday would do absolutely nothing to lower prices at the pump. More than 200 leading economists, including 4 Nobel Prize winners, have denounced Senator McCain’s and similar plans. The Sierra Club believes it would do little else but offer Big Oil another 18 cents per gallon in profits at the pump.
http://www.bloomberg.com/apps/news?pid=20601087&sid=aTzCmqCNyLho&refer=home

All quotes are from excerpts of the text of McCain’s remarks as prepared for delivery at 5 p.m. to energy industry executives in Houston.

# #

David Willett
National Press Secretary
Sierra Club
(202) 675-6698 (w)
(202) 491-6919 (m)
david.willett@sierraclub.orgwww.sierraclub.org
--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Kristina Schake" <kschake@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
"Margolis, Jim" <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com>
"John Anzalone" <john@algpolling.com>
"Joel Benenson" <jbenenson@bsgco.com>
"David Binder" <David@db-research.com>
"Tony Carrk" <tcarrk@hillaryclinton.com>
"Teddy Goff" <tgoff@hillaryclinton.com>
"Mandy Grunwald" <gruncom@aol.com>
"Jennifer Palmieri" <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com>
"Oren Shur" <oshur@hillaryclinton.com>
"Jake Sullivan" <jake.sullivan@gmail.com>
"Marissa Astor" <mastor@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 4/19/2015 2:23:02 PM
Subject: Moving Monday's 8 am Call to Tuesday

We are moving tomorrow's 8 am call to Tuesday morning. We are set for tomorrow's plan in NH so it would be more beneficial to receive feedback on Tuesday after our first day of the trip. Marissa will send out an updated calendar invite.

Also, flagging for you that the NY Times published the first story on Clinton Cash just now. We are asking that it be updated with a quote from us. Jo Becker's longer investigative piece on the foundation and State Department ties is set to be published next Sunday. Amy's story helps us somewhat by putting the book and allegations into a political frame. Jen, Brian and I are working on this - will have updates soon.

Book Questions Clinton Donations

By AMY CHOZICK APRIL 19, 2015

http://www.nytimes.com/2015/04/20/us/politics/book-questions-clinton-donations.html?_r=0

The book does not hit shelves until May 5, but already the Republican Rand Paul has called its findings “big news” that will “shock people” and make voters “question” the candidacy of Hillary Rodham Clinton.

“Clinton Cash: The Untold Story of How and Why Foreign Governments and Businesses Helped Make Bill and Hillary Rich,” by Peter Schweizer — a 186-page investigation of donations made to the Clinton Foundation by foreign entities — is proving the most anticipated and feared book of a presidential cycle still in its infancy.

The book, a copy of which was obtained by The New York Times, asserts that foreign entities who made payments to the Clinton Foundation and to Mr. Clinton through high speaking fees received favors from Mrs. Clinton’s State Department in return.

“We will see a pattern of financial transactions involving the Clintons that occurred contemporaneous with favorable U.S. policy decisions benefiting those providing the funds,” Mr. Schweizer writes.

His examples include a free-trade agreement in Colombia that benefited a major foundation donor’s natural resource investments in the South American nation, development projects in the aftermath of the Haitian earthquake in 2010, and more than $1 million in payments to Mr. Clinton by a Canadian bank and major shareholder in the Keystone XL oil pipeline around the time the project was being debated in the State Department.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the long lead up to Mrs. Clinton's campaign announcement, aides proved adept in swatting down critical books as conservative propaganda, including Edward Klein's "Blood Feud," about tensions between the Clintons and the Obamas, and Daniel Halper's "Clinton Inc.: The Audacious Rebuilding of a Political Machine."

But "Clinton Cash" is potentially more unsettling, both because of its focused reporting and because major news organizations are expected to pursue the story lines found in the book.

Members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee have been briefed about the book's findings, which have already made their way into several of the Republican presidential candidates' campaigns.

Conservative "super PACs " plan to seize on "Clinton Cash," and a pro-Democrat super PAC has already assembled a dossier on Mr. Schweizer, a speechwriting consultant to former President George W. Bush and a fellow at the conservative Hoover Institute, to make the case that he has a bias against Mrs. Clinton.

And the newly assembled Clinton campaign team is planning a full-court press to diminish the book as yet another conservative hit job.

Mr. Schweizer and a spokeswoman for HarperCollins, which is owned by News Corporation and is publishing the book, declined to comment.

The timing is problematic for Mrs. Clinton as she begins a campaign to position herself as a "champion for everyday Americans."

From 2001 to 2012, the Clintons' income was at least $136.5 million, Mr. Schweizer writes, using a figure previously reported in The Washington Post. "During Hillary's years of public service, the Clintons have conducted or facilitated hundreds of large transactions" with foreign governments, he writes. "Some of these transactions have put millions in their own pockets."

Continue reading the main story

The Clinton Foundation has come under scrutiny for accepting foreign donations while Mrs. Clinton served as secretary of state. Last week, the foundation revised its policy to allow donations from countries like Germany, Canada, the Netherlands and Britain but prohibit giving by other nations in the Middle East.

Mr. Schweizer's book will be released the same day former President Bill Clinton and the Clintons' daughter, Chelsea, will host the Clinton Global Initiative gathering with donors in Morocco, the culmination of a foundation trip to several African nations. (A chapter in the book is titled "Warlord Economics: The Clintons do Africa.")

There is a robust market for books critical of the Clintons. The thinly sourced "Blood Feud," by Mr. Klein, at one point overtook Mrs. Clinton's memoir "Hard Choices" on the best-seller list.

But whether Mr. Schweizer's book can deliver the same sales is not clear.

Mr. Schweizer writes mainly in the voice of a neutral journalist and meticulously documents his sources, including tax records and government documents, while leaving little doubt about his view of the Clintons.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

His reporting largely focuses on payments made to Mr. Clinton for speeches, which increased while his wife served as secretary of state, writing that "of the 13 Clinton speeches that fetched $500,000 or more, only two occurred during the years his wife was not secretary of state."

In 2011, Mr. Clinton made $13.3 million in speaking fees for 54 speeches, the majority of which were made overseas, the author writes. Among the connections he tries to draw is a $750,000 speaking fee to Mr. Clinton by the Swedish telecom company Ericsson and a State Department list of new sanctions on Iran that did not include telecom.

Mr. Schweizer, president of the Government Accountability Institute, is the author of the 2013 book "Extortion: How Politicians Extract Your Money, Buy Votes, and Line Their Own Pockets," and "Throw Them All Out" about elected officials receiving insider stock tips.

--
Josh Schwerin
Spokesperson
Hillary for America
@Josh Schwerin

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Adrienne Elrod" <aelrod@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "Ian Sams" <isams@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 4/12/2015 2:19:13 PM
Subject: Re: draft surrogate talkers -- responding to day 1 attacks looks great to me!

On Sun, Apr 12, 2015 at 9:15 PM, Ian Sams <isams@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

Hey folks. Here are some points we pulled together for surrogates going on TV -- not a wide blast -- on how to respond to day one attacks on HRC. Thoughts? Adrienne/Karen/etc. can get to surrogates once we're all good.

Thanks.
Ian

OPENING DAY -- SURROGATE TALKING POINTS ON GOP ATTACKS

Today we've seen a wide range of attacks from the entire GOP field and their allies. Below are some points to respond -- keeping the focus on Hillary's desire to focus on voters while the Republicans are trotting out tired attacks on her.

- Republicans can focus on attacking her, but Hillary is focused on meeting voters and having real conversations about issues facing everyday Americans. This is the start of the different kind of campaign that Hillary wants to run -- one that is squarely focused on having a conversation with voters -- answering their questions, asking them questions and sharing ideas.

- Meanwhile, Republicans want to be the champions for those at the top. While Hillary is talking to voters and focused on everyday Americans, every single Republican candidate has offered the same tired attacks and the same economic agenda that Americans know rob them of the stability they've worked so hard for -- with a top-down agenda that would stack the deck even more in favor of those at the top.

- Americans have responded clearly that they appreciate Hillary's focus on their issues and their lives, so if Republicans want to keep their focus on tired political attacks, that's their choice.

If pressed on specific GOP attacks on foreign policy/HRC's record at the State Department, stemming from Jeb Bush's video or other attacks:

Job number one for Hillary as Secretary of State was to restore America's leadership after it was badly eroded by eight years of the Bush administration's foreign policy -- two wars, damaged alliances, diminished moral standing, no stopping Iran's nuclear program, and no action on climate. She's proud of her accomplishments.

- Hillary led the effort to build a worldwide coalition to impose the toughest sanctions in history against the Iranians, which forced them to the negotiating table and gave us our best shot at preventing them from acquiring a nuclear weapon.
- Hillary brokered a ceasefire between Israel and Hamas in Gaza, which prevented a wider war and protected Israel's security.
- Hillary stood up to Putin by strengthening NATO, encouraging Europe to find alternative sources of energy, and called him out for trying to rebuild the Soviet Empire.
- Hillary worked with President Obama to get every major developing country, including China and India, to agree for the first time to reduce their carbon emissions and be held accountable for it.
- Hillary put internet freedom, LGBT rights, and women's rights on the global agenda, and defending human rights advocates on the frontlines around the world.
- And, of course, she was part of the President's team making the decision to launch the raid against bin Laden.

Jeb Bush may attack Hillary's time as Secretary of State now, but it's just negative politics meant to gin up his Republican base.

- Jeb Bush in 2013: "Former Secretary Clinton has dedicated her life to serving and engaging people across the > world in democracy. These efforts as a citizen, an activist, and a leader have earned Secretary Clinton this year's Liberty Medal." [National Constitution Center, 6/27/2013]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

>
> Jeb Bush is advocating for the same failed foreign policy that led us to misguided wars and degraded our nation's standing in the world.
>
> - Jeb Bush on George W. Bush: "I will tell you that I'm the only Republican that was in office when he was office as President that never disagreed with him. And I'm not going to start now. Why would I do that now after two years? …I'm not going to start now. It's just – 'til death do us part." [CNN interview]
>
> --
> Ian Sams | Rapid Response Associate
> Hillary for America
> (423) 915-6592 | @IanSams
> Gchat: icsams

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
To view this discussion on the web visit https://groups.google.com/d/msgid/hrcrapid/CABd81JJxcSiv95x3%3Duc5H1fSQ5M9CZZ0deNmoNAwM%2BHKiO-p3Q%40mail.gmail.com.
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
To view this discussion on the web visit https://groups.google.com/d/msgid/hrcrapid/CANu9wN4h01QaZba_zY4EX8rBriVt9NYNEmDJdZrvBBi9Zwo%2B0A%40mail.gmail.com.
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Dumas, Clay A. EOP" <Clay_A_Dumas@who.eop.gov>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
"Breckenridge, Anita J. EOP" <Anita_Breckenridge@who.eop.gov>
"Blakemore, Emily D. EOP" <Emily_D_Blakemore@who.eop.gov>
Date: 5/7/2015 2:24:39 PM
Subject: RE: Our President's Visit to Our Hometown of Beaverton—and My Children's Request

Thanks John. Will work with Emily to make sure Anita sees and whether anything can be done.

-----Original Message-----
From: John Podesta [mailto:john.podesta@gmail.com]
Sent: Thursday, May 7, 2015 5:20 PM
To: Breckenridge, Anita J. EOP
Cc: Dumas, Clay A. EOP
Subject: Fwd: Our President's Visit to Our Hometown of Beaverton—and My Children's Request

---------- Forwarded message ----------
From: Pam and Rob and Miko and Isaac Vergun <vergun@alumni.stanford.edu <mailto:vergun@alumni.stanford.edu> >
Date: Thu, May 7, 2015 at 3:28 PM
Subject: Our President's Visit to Our Hometown of Beaverton—and My Children's Request
To: John Podesta <podesta@law.georgetown.edu <mailto:podesta@law.georgetown.edu> >

Dear Mr. Podesta,

I am contacting you with a somewhat unusual request and the hope that you might be able to convey this wish by my children to an appropriate staff person for President Obama in spite of the short notice.

Thank you. And thank you so much for the work you have been doing. I hope you are able to encourage Hillary Clinton to come out strongly to address dangers from Climate Change.

Sincerely,
Pam Vergun, Ph.D., M.P.A.

Dear Mr. President,

I hear that you are coming to our hometown of Beaverton tomorrow down the street from where my children were in a two-way Spanish immersion public school. I know this is a long shot, but I would like to tell you about the work my children and I are doing to help you stop Climate Change in case you would like to meet them.

Also, months ago, my son, who is also one of your fans, asked me to invite you to his Bar Mitzvah. Although we just learned that you will only be in Beaverton during the morning, I'm sure you would like Isaac's D'Var teaching will be on taking even more serious action on Climate Change.

My son is African-American, my daughter was born in the Marshall Islands, and my husband and I are European-American, and together we are doing all we can to impact policies especially the ones most needed to protect our planet. My son has been talking with the City of Beaverton about his petition to Mayor Doyle regarding fossil fuels and nuclear power. The links below are to the little websites I made for their Mitzvah projects, so Miko and Isaac can speak for themselves. Please glance at them to see if you could use them to inspire or highlight your own work as you have inspired us.
Miko's: >https://shalvahalizah.wordpress.com<
Isaac: >https://yitzchakadin.wordpress.com<

Thank you so much.
With Love and Blessings to you and Michelle and your daughters, Pam Vergun

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sent from my iPhone

Dr. Pamela Bea Wilson Vergun, M.P.A.

Pam and Rob and Miko and Isaac Vergun vergun@alumni.stanford.edu <mailto:vergun@alumni.stanford.edu>
3545 NW Ashland Place
Beaverton, Oregon 97006
Hm: 503-645-6642 <tel:503-645-6642>

Mo: 503-332-7633 <tel:503-332-7633>

Wherever you live, sign Isaac's petition to the City of Beaverton's Mayor Doyle and the City Council:
>https://campaigns.gofossilfree.org/petitions/divest-the-city-of-beavert >on-from-fossil-fuels-and-nuclear-power<
Thanks!
And, for more on Miko and Isaac's work to help protect our planet, please visit their websites:
Miko: >https://shalvahalizah.wordpress.com<
Isaac: >https://yitzchakadin.wordpress.com<

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Stephen Paduano" <spaduano@hfaintern.com>
To:	"John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date:	7/14/2015 3:59:31 AM
Subject:	Summarized Clips (7.14.15)
Attachments:	Daily Clips (7.14.15).docx

Daily Clips

July 14, 2015

Clinton Calls for 'Growth and Fairness Economy,' Vows Wall Street Crackdown

WaPo/Philip Rucker

- "In her most sweeping policy address to date, Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton on Monday presented her vision for a 'growth and fairness economy' built on rising incomes for middle-class workers and vowed an aggressive crackdown on Wall Street."

In Economic Address, Hillary Clinton Calls Out 'Gig' Economy

CNBC/Kate Rogers

- "[HRC] focused on ways to lift American workers and called out the sharing economy as a potential factor in dampened wage growth. The sharing economy – bolstered by high-flying start-ups including Uber, Airbnb, and Lyft – allows individuals to share products and services like offering homes and apartments for rent, or driving passengers to destinations."
- "Others argue the 'gig' economy offers workers an incredible amount of flexibility."

Hillary Clinton to Disclose Names of Top Fundraisers

WSJ/Byron Tau

- "Hillary Clinton will disclose the names of her top fundraisers, becoming the first presidential candidate in the 2016 race to pledge to do so."

O'Malley Connects Sanders' Surge to Trump's

CNN/Dan Merica

- "After speaking at the National Council of La Raza in Kansas City, O'Malley told reporters that Sanders' recent surge is because 'this is the summer of anger and discontent,' casting the liberal senator as more of a flash in the pan."
- O'Malley portrayed that Donald Trump is Sanders' equivalent in the GOP field: "I think you see that anger and disconnect being expressed in the Republican Party by Donald Trump."

Moving Past Vermont, Sanders Tries to Woo Minority Voters

AP/David Lieb, Lisa Lerer

- Bernie Sanders plans to spend more time attracting minority voters as he travels to Phoenix, Houston, and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference meeting in Louisiana later this month.

Jeb Bush Blasts Back at Hillary Clinton

Des Moines Register/Jennifer Jacobs, Jason Noble

- "In two speeches in Iowa, Bush blasted back at Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton, who during a major economic policy speech in New York earlier Monday ridiculed Bush for saying last week in New Hampshire that 'people need to work longer hours' because the drop in workforce participation has meant trouble for the economy."
- Jeb said to an audience in Ames: "Hillary Clinton has attacked me in the last few days. Which, by the way, for the record: Bring it on."

Jeb Bush Would End Fuel Rule That Aids Iowa Ethanol Industry

Sioux City Journal/Bret Hayworth

- "Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush on Monday again asserted a position that could give him trouble with some Iowa voters, as he supports an end to a federal rule that helps the ethanol industry."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- "Asked about his position on the Renewable Fuel Standard during his first Sioux City campaign stop since becoming a candidate in Just, Bush said, 'We need to phase that out over the long haul.'"

Jeb Bush to Keynote Hispanic Convention

Real Clear Politics/Andrew Deskderio

- The U.S. Hispanic Chamber of Commerce announced Monday that Jeb Bush is set to keynote its annual convention in Houston in September.

Rubio Reports Raising $12 Million, Stands Third in Overall GOP Money Chase

WaPo/Sean Sullivan

- "Marco Rubio raised $12 million for his presidential campaign through the end of last month, bringing the total hauled in by the Florida senator and his allied outside groups to about $44 million, and putting him in third place so far in the overall GOP money chase behind Jeb Bush and Ted Cruz."

Rand Paul Proposes Legislation That Will Crack Down on 'Sanctuary' Cities

Fox News

- Rand Paul has introduced the Protecting American Citizens Together Act (PACT Act), which would crack down on 'sanctuary' cities by requiring law enforcement to detain or transfer an illegal immigrants if requested to do so by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Ted Cruz at Secret Koch-Backed Fracking Lobby Group Meeting

HuffPo/Nick Surgey

- "Senator Ted Cruz, raising cash for a 2016 presidential bid, was to meet privately Monday in Denver, Colaroda, with executives from major oil and gas corporations, all members of the pro-fracking lobby group Western Energy Alliance."

Christie Slips Again in Latest Republican Poll

Politico/Ryan Hutchins

- Chris Christie's standing in the GOP field has slipped from 4% in June to 2% in July. Republican voters have also viewed the New Jersey governor less favorably since he declared his candidacy, with his favorability rating dropping from 26% to 25%.

Rick Santorum: Scott Walker's Wife Could Make Him Soft on Gay Marriage

Politico/Adam B. Lerner

- "Rick Santorum took a swipe at Scott Walker on Monday, suggesting that because Walker's wife is not outspoken against same-sex marriage, the Wisconsin governor would make a weak Republican candidate on the issue."

Donald Trump Isn't a Joke To Republican Voters Anymore

HuffPo/Ariel Edwards-Levy

- A new HuffPo/YouGov poll indicates that Republicans have changed their minds on Donald Trump. The findings show that 59% of Republican voters say they like Trump's personality, and 74% say they agree with his political positions.

As Scott Walker Enters 2016 Fray, He Feuds With Both Parties At Home

- WaPo/Jenna Johnson Gov. Walker's declaration of his candidacy comes as a partisan budget battle rages in Madison, with conservatives angry at his $250 million push to pay for the Milwaukee Bucks' new arena.

Republicans Hail Uber in Bid for Tech Cred

Politico/Tony Romm

- "Republican White House hopefuls looking to boost their tech cred are racing to hitch a ride on Uber – while Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton is keeping a cautious distance."

Eric Garner Case Is Settled by New York City for $5.9 Million

NYT/J. David Goodman

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- New York reached a settlement with the family of Eric Garner, agreeing to $5.9 million.

Pentagon Moves to Allow Transgender People to Serve Openly in the Military

NYT/Matthew Rosenberg

- "The Pentagon is moving to allow transgender people to serve openly in the military by early next year and end an 'outdated' regulation that harms the armed forces."

VA Says It May Shut Down Hospitals to Close $2.5B Budget Gap (AP)

- "The Department of Veterans Affairs may have to shut down some hospitals next month if Congress does not address a $2.5 billion shortfall for the current budget year."

Iran, World Powers Prepare to Sign Off on Nuclear Accord

WSJ/Jay Solomon, Laurence Norman, Carol Lee

- "The top diplomats from Iran, the US, and other world powers planned to sign off on a nuclear accord Tuesday and announce the deal, officials from both sides said, after struggling to resolve a late standoff over when and how to lift a United Nations arms embargo."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Brent Budowsky" <brentbbi@webtv.net>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 8/29/2015 4:06:36 AM
Subject: Question

If the campaign has a full list of Trump's verbally abusive insults of women with specific examples of specific insults against specific women, if they email details to me I would a nuclear column including a call on leading GOP women to aggressively disown him and a call on major media to aggressively report the facts in defense of women, and stop giving Trump immunity from acceptable standards of journalism coverage and presidential politics.

I would independently verify the details through my own fact checking from public sources and not mention the campaign.

Trump is an abusive sexist Joe McCarthy ready for an Edward R. Murrow and I am ready to go further than any mainstream columnist but would need to be rock solid with facts.

Sent from my BlackBerry 10 smartphone on the Verizon Wireless 4G LTE network.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To: CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date: 1/25/2015 7:03:34 AM
Subject: Correct The Record Sunday January 25, 2015 Roundup

Correct The Record Sunday January 25, 2015 Roundup:

Headlines:

Real Clear Politics: "Iowa Democrats Waiting For Hillary"

"Hanson said he supports Hillary Clinton because of her experience advocating and fighting for ordinary middle-class Americans: 'My father has worked in a factory for nearly 40 years, and my mom is a schoolteacher. These are the hardworking people that make America work.'"

Des Moines Register: "Fiorina goes after Clinton over Benghazi"

"Former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina pitted herself against likely Democratic presidential nominee Hillary Clinton at Saturday'sIowa Freedom Summit, sparking some of the event's most boisterous applause."

Time: "Here's Why Carly Fiorina Thinks She Can Best Criticize Hillary Clinton"

"Fiorina begins as a relative unknown, and trails far in the polls. In a speech to the Iowa Freedom Summit, a conservative cattle call hosted by Rep. Steve King, Fiorina offered a preview of her anti-Clinton message, which she believes she, as the only other woman in the race, is best equipped to offer."

Bloomberg: "Sarah Palin Says 'Yes We Can' Beat Hillary"

"Sarah Palin, standing before a packed room of Republicans in Iowa, cast herself Saturday as the judge of who's a real conservative and who can beat Hillary Clinton in 2016."

Boston Herald opinion: Adriana Cohen: "Sarah Palin is the perfect foil to take on Hillary Clinton"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Sarah Palin says she's seriously considering a 2016 presidential run. Why not?"

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "Scott Walker Makes His Case to Iowa Conservatives"

"Unlike other speakers here, who offered red-meat applause lines blasting President Barack Obama or presumed 2016 Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Clinton, Mr. Walker focused on his own biography."

Articles:

Real Clear Politics: "Iowa Democrats Waiting For Hillary"

By Salena Zito

January 25, 2015

A brisk 18-minute walk down Locust Street to Woodland Avenue in Des Moines separated Tom Henderson this weekend from close to every size, shape, color and gender of Republican weighing a run for their party's 2016 presidential nomination.

The Iowa Freedom Summit, held Saturday, was a testing ground for GOP hopefuls to impress voters, a little more than a year ahead of the Iowa caucuses scheduled for Feb. 1, 2016.

Henderson is the Democrat chairman of Polk County, one of the most populous counties in Iowa and where one-fifth of the state's Democrats will caucus on that day. He does not have anything on his event calendar for Democrats that is equivalent to the big GOP cattle-call held down the street — and, for now, he is OK with that.

"This year has been quiet, more like a typical presidential year rather than the one we saw in 2007 when Barack Obama first came to the state," Henderson said, recalling the regular visits by then-candidate Obama or one of his surrogates or staff members, who all spent a great deal of time team-building. "That doesn't mean there aren't people on the ground now for candidates, it just hasn't percolated up yet."

The Iowa Democratic Party is in a moment of self-reflection, explained Iowa State political scientist Steffen Schmidt.

"The establishment is in a blue funk after the catastrophic performance in the 2014 elections," he said, referring to state Democrats losing a U.S. Senate seat that many considered a sure thing, as well as a U.S. House seat and the governorship. "All of this has contributed to a sense of both malaise and panic."

Despite the absence of campaign offices and event announcements for a cluster of potential candidates that, eight years ago, had nine very different Democrats stumping the Hawkeye State to win voters' hearts, plenty of excitement is building for next year's caucuses, Henderson and others insist.

Polk County has a big impact in elections, and 25-year-old Blake Hanson is literally at the epicenter of that excitement and impact.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Des Moines law student, who grew up in the town of Sergeant Bluff, is the state treasurer of the Ready for Hillary campaign. He helped to organize the first RFH event in Iowa last January, coordinated RFH's political contributions to Iowa Democrats in the midterm elections, and advises the RFH Iowa group that is organizing in all 99 of the state's counties.

That type of person-to-person grassroots organizing is the key to success in a caucus.

Hanson said he supports Hillary Clinton because of her experience advocating and fighting for ordinary middle-class Americans: “My father has worked in a factory for nearly 40 years, and my mom is a schoolteacher. These are the hardworking people that make America work.”

Linda Nelson, chairwoman of the Pottawattamie County Democrats and former state teachers union president, said she, too, is comfortable with the pace of the race. A former Obama supporter, she said former U.S. Sen. Jim Webb of Virginia and Martin O'Malley, who just stepped down as Maryland's governor, visited the county during the midterm elections; the Run Warren Run folks — supporters of U.S. Sen. Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts — will meet with her shortly.

“But when Hillary announces, everything will change around here,” she said.

That announcement conceivably might not come until summer — which means Clinton's strategy appears to be to make this into a short campaign.

And, in many ways, that makes sense: The slower and longer her non-campaign campaign can go on, without her out there, is probably a good thing.

There is a scrutiny and a sense of voter fatigue that happen to all presidential candidates; holding back until the very end to announce can limit those, along with the number of stumbles that inevitably occur (and which today's social media promptly make appear to be as significant as the collapse of the free world).

For someone with the name Clinton — or Bush — to stay in the news but out of the fray may be the best advantage, if fundraising and campaign-building are done without officially being done.

This does not mean Clinton does not do a full-throated campaign.

She does, but she just does it on a shorter calendar.

Des Moines Register: “Fiorina goes after Clinton over Benghazi”

By Josh Hafner

January 24, 2015, 11:11 p.m. CST

Former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina pitted herself against likely Democratic presidential nominee Hillary Clinton at Saturday's Iowa Freedom Summit, sparking some of the event's most boisterous applause.

With a calm tone and polished delivery, Fiorina introduced herself to Iowans as a business-savvy outsider, the kind capable of creating real change in government.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Like Hillary Clinton, I too have traveled hundreds of thousands of miles around the globe," Fiorina said. "But unlike her, I've actually accomplished something."

That line prompted applause, hoots and hollers.

Fiorina also touted her international business experience to help position herself as one familiar with America's allies and enemies.

"And unlike Hillary Clinton, I know what difference it makes that our American ambassador and three other brave Americans were killed in a deliberate terrorist attack," she said, alluding to the 2012 attack at the U.S. embassy in Benghazi, Libya. The line brought a standing ovation from attendees, halting her mid-speech.

Still unknown to many Iowans, Fiorina touted pro-life credentials by slamming liberals in her former home state of California.

"Liberals believe that flies are worth protecting, but the life of an unborn child is not," Fiorina said.

HINTS ON A PRESIDENTIAL BID: Fiorina described America's founding fathers envisioning a country governed not by professional politicians but leaders emerging from agriculture or, like herself, business.

"To accomplish fundamental reform, it will take an understanding of the technology that is driving this century," the former tech company CEO said.

AUDIENCE REACTION: The crowd's applause indicated praise for Fiorina's business background and glee for her head-on remarks regarding Clinton.

Time: "Here's Why Carly Fiorina Thinks She Can Best Criticize Hillary Clinton"

By Zeke J. Miller

January 24, 2015, 4:12 p.m. EST

Former Hewlett Packard CEO Carly Fiorina is gearing up to announce a White House bid this year, positioning herself as the Republican party's chief critic of likely Democratic nominee former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton.

Fiorina begins as a relative unknown, and trails far in the polls. In a speech to the Iowa Freedom Summit, a conservative cattle call hosted by Rep. Steve King, Fiorina offered a preview of her anti-Clinton message, which she believes she, as the only other woman in the race, is best equipped to offer.

"Like Hillary Clinton, I too have traveled hundreds of thousands of miles around the globe," she said. "But unlike her, I have actually accomplished something. Mrs. Clinton, flying is an activity not an accomplishment."

The full Clinton excerpt is below:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We must understand our role in the world – which is to lead – and the nature of our allies and especially, our adversaries. Like Hillary Clinton, I too have travelled hundreds of thousands of miles around the globe. But unlike her, I have actually accomplished something. Mrs. Clinton, flying is not an accomplishment, it's an activity. I have met Vladimir Putin and know that it will take more to halt his ambitions than a gimmicky red 'Reset' button. Having done business in over 80 countries and having served as the Chairman of the External Advisory Board at the CIA for several eyars, I know that China and Russia are state-sponsors of cyberwarfare and have a strategy to steal our intellectual property. I know Bibi Netanyahu and know that when he warns us that Iran is a danger to this nation as well as to his own, that we must listen. And unlike Hillary Clinton I know what difference it makes that our American Ambassador and three other brave Americans were killed in a deliberate terrorist attack on the anniversary of 9-11 in Libya. And apparently unlike Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama, I know that the response of our nation must be more forceful that the arrest of a single individual a year later."

A Republican strategist told TIME last year that Fiorina could be a potent weapon for the GOP in the coming cycle. "The most effective way to criticize a woman is to have another woman do it."

Bloomberg: "Sarah Palin Says 'Yes We Can' Beat Hillary"

By Terrence Dopp

January 24, 2015, 6:37 p.m. EST

[Subtitle:] Despite expressing interest earlier, she won't say whether she will run for president.

DES MOINES, Iowa—Sarah Palin, standing before a packed room of Republicans in Iowa, cast herself Saturday as the judge of who's a real conservative and who can beat Hillary Clinton in 2016.

"Things must change for our government," Palin said. "Look at it—it isn't too big to fail; it's too big to succeed. So we can afford no retreads or nothing will change."

"We're not in a mood to give politicians a pass just because they happen to have a certain party initial next to their name," she said.

Palin, the unsuccessful 2008 vice presidential candidate and former Republican governor of Alaska, told about 1,200 people attending the Iowa Freedom Summit that the nominating process should serve as a competition, not a coronation. She never mentioned by name either Mitt Romney or Jeb Bush, two popular moderate Republicans who are skipping the summit, though she did go after Clinton, considered the Democratic frontrunner.

Despite suggesting interest in the race on Friday, Palin never said whether she was in the race, and did not name a candidate who she thinks can win.

Her prognostication on whether the GOP can defeat Clinton in a general election? With a vibrant, fresh candidate her party stands a good shot, she said. "To borrow a phrase, yes we can," she said.

Palin started a 30-minute speech addressing her latest rounds of controversy: defending both the film American Sniper and its protagonist, Chris Kyle. She also addressed the controversy that erupted recently over a picture of her youngest son, Trig, standing on top of the family's pet Labrador, saying that the pet had been trained in Iowa.

She recalled an event she recently attended in Las Vegas thrown by Kyle's widow. One veteran in the crowd held up a sign with an expletive for documentarian Michael Moore, who criticized the film. "I had my thumb up. It wasn't another finger," she said. "We were all thinking that."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Boston Herald opinion: Adriana Cohen: "Sarah Palin is the perfect foil to take on Hillary Clinton"

By Adriana Cohen

January 25, 2015

Sarah Palin says she's seriously considering a 2016 presidential run.

Why not? The GOP needs women on the ticket for many reasons, not least because it steals the Democratic Party's thunder. They want to be the "first" at breaking cultural barriers and glass ceilings. With Hillary Clinton expected to be their front-runner in 2016, they'll use her gender as a tactic to gin up support from their base — especially female voters.

I can already see Emily's List pushing out emails nationwide saying, "Let's make history by electing the first female president of the United States."

It's imperative Republicans put forward their own female leaders for the presidential ticket to counter that Democratic message.

Yes, Sarah Palin was bludgeoned in the 2008 race by the Democratic machine, which tried to discredit her unfairly and turn her into a cartoon figure. But Americans — especially Republicans — understand the game. There's a double standard in gender politics.

If you're a female leader on the Democratic ticket, you're a "hero" regardless of how many times you put your foot in your mouth, embarrass yourself or worse.

We haven't forgotten Hillary Clinton saying that we should empathize with our enemies or that businesses and corporations don't really create jobs. Both absurd statements that should disqualify any candidate — male or female — from any race, never mind the top slot.

But if you're a female conservative? Watch out! Liberals will pounce and do everything they can to marginalize a conservative woman who runs for office no matter how educated, or talented, or accomplished she is. Liberals only "tolerate" others if they agree with them and follow their agenda.

Skeptics will say Sarah Palin doesn't have a chance in the GOP race because she's too polarizing. But what about Hillary Clinton and U.S. Sen. Elizabeth Warren? They're polarizing too, with supporters and haters in equal measure.

The reality is Sarah Palin draws huge crowds at speaking engagements, has millions of social media followers and just as many supporters across the nation.

Hilary Clinton has been giving speeches to half-filled rooms.

If Sarah Palin chooses to throw her proverbial hat in the ring for 2016, there's no doubt she'd make the race exciting and bring a welcome woman's point of view to the GOP field.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "Scott Walker Makes His Case to Iowa Conservatives"

By Reid J. Epstein

January 24, 2015, 3:26 p.m. EST

DES MOINES, Iowa – Scott Walker offered this case to Iowa Republicans for his presidential prospects: He is new on the national scene, he has already enacted conservative reforms, and he plans to compete for their affection over the coming year.

The Wisconsin governor, making his first in-person introduction to conservative activists at Saturday's Iowa Freedom Summit here, offered a lengthy review of his fights with labor unions, during which he said he could "feel the power of your prayers." There was also a reminder that Mr. Walker spent his grammar school years in Plainfield, Iowa.

The crowd of about 1,000 people ate it up, offering Mr. Walker the most sustained applause thus far of the day-long event. Mr. Walker reciprocated, suggesting strongly in his big finish that he intended to run for president.

"I'm pleased to be here in Iowa today, I'm going to come back many more times in the future," Mr. Walker said to raucous applause at the ornate Hoyt Sherman Place theater here. "I'm hoping to work together with you to help us provide that kind of leadership that is new and fresh and bold and aggressive. It's been proven that common sense conservative reform from outside of Washington, D.C., can work. With your help, I have no doubt, we can move this country forward, we can have our own American revival."

The Wisconsin governor, pacing the stage without a suit jacket and with his sleeves rolled up to his elbows, was perhaps the day's most anticipated speaker. He mentioned none of his presumed opponents by name, but in his 20-minute speech he foreshadowed how he would draw a contrast between himself and a field of more established figures.

Mr. Walker noted that the state of Wisconsin is "the only one in the country with a fully funded retirement system," in a line separating him from New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, who sought to cut pledged payments to his state's pension system.

Wisconsin's property taxes are lower now than four years ago, he said. "How many governors can say that?" he said.

Mr. Walker told a familiar story about clipping coupons at the Kohl's department store, distinguishing himself from millionaire 2012 GOP presidential nominee Mitt Romney and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush.

And in a barb separating himself from Mr. Bush, vilified among conservative activists as a leading proponent of Common Core educational standards, Mr. Walker touted changes to Wisconsin's education system that, he said, aimed to restore control to local school boards.

Unlike other speakers here, who offered red-meat applause lines blasting President Barack Obama or presumed 2016 Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Clinton, Mr. Walker focused on his own biography. He said not a word about immigration, nor did he address presidential executive actions that drew ire from others here.

Instead he painted himself as someone with a record fighting all manner of enemies, especially Democrats. He spoke in detail about threats to him and his family during Wisconsin's labor fight, his faith, and, in a line that drew laughter and applause, his glee in watching liberal pundits on MSNBC on nights when he won re-election.

And Mr. Walker made sure the crowd left with the impression that he had prevailed in a tough political environment.

In Wisconsin, he said, "people like the direction they're headed. Maybe that's why I won the race for governor three times in the last four years. Three times, mind you, in a state that hasn't gone Republican for president since I was in high school more than 30 years ago, how about that?"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Calendar:

Sec. Clinton's upcoming appearances as reported online. Not an official schedule.

· February 24 – Santa Clara, CA: Sec. Clinton to Keynote Address at Inaugural Watermark Conference for Women (PR Newswire)

· March 4 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton to fundraise for the Clinton Foundation (WSJ)

· March 19 – Atlantic City, NJ: Sec. Clinton keynotes American Camp Association conference (PR Newswire)

· March 23 – Washington, DC: Sec. Clinton to keynote award ceremony for the Toner Prize for Excellence in Political Reporting (Syracuse)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To: CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date: 12/10/2014 7:44:12 AM
Subject: Correct The Record Wednesday December 10, 2014 Afternoon Roundup

Correct The Record Wednesday December 10, 2014 Afternoon Roundup:

Tweets:

Correct The Record @CorrectRecord: We need "a President who will focus on the next 100 years, not one who hopes to turn the clock back" @GovHowardDean : http://www.politico.com/magazine/story/2014/12/howard-dean-ready-for-hillary-113444.html#.VIhHGWTF-IK … [12/10/14, 11:32 a.m. EST]

Correct The Record @CorrectRecord: .@GovHowardDean : "If I have the opportunity, I will cast my vote for @HillaryClinton for President." http://www.politico.com/magazine/story/2014/12/howard-dean-ready-for-hillary-113444.html#.VIhHGWTF-IK … [12/10/14, 9:11 a.m. EST]

Correct The Record @CorrectRecord: .@HillaryClinton would be the President who America needs, @GovHowardDean writes in @politico : http://www.politico.com/magazine/story/2014/12/howard-dean-ready-for-hillary-113444.html#.VIhHGWTF-IK … [12/10/14, 8:46 a.m. EST]

Headlines:

Talking Points Memo: "Howard Dean Endorses Hillary While Group He Founded Pushes For Warren"

"Correct The Record, the American Bridge-affiliated group that is supporting a Hillary 2016 candidacy, blasted out the Dean endorsement in an email to reporters."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

ABC News: "Support for Elizabeth Warren Over Hillary Clinton Reveals Progressive Family Feud"

"Democracy for America's support shows a schism within the group. They released a statement after MoveOn's vote reiterating they would help their fellow liberals in the draft Warren effort, but Howard Dean — who started the group — wrote an op-ed today stressing his support for Hillary Clinton."

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: "Dean, in break from group he founded, backs Clinton for president"

"Former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean endorsed Hillary Clinton for president on Wednesday, giving her the support of a liberal firebrand at a time when some liberals are skeptical."

The Week blog: Speed Reads: "Howard Dean endorses Hillary Clinton for president: 'We need a mature, seasoned' leader"

"In a Politico op-ed, Dean cited three major reasons for his support. Clinton, he wrote, understands the 'institutional requirements' of the Supreme Court and would appoint worthy judges; she has a sterling record at the State Department; and she would address income inequality."

Washington Post blog: The Fix: Chris Cillizza: "Howard Dean makes the liberal's case for Hillary Clinton. It's only ok."

"The thrust of Dean's piece is that Democrats badly need another Democratic president because of rightward movement of the Supreme Court in recent years."

The Blaze: "Howard Dean Throws His Support Behind Hillary Clinton"

"Hillary Clinton hasn't said whether she's running in 2016, but she has an early backer in former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean."

Bloomberg column: Al Hunt: "Young Voters Don't Care How Old Hillary Is"

"Hillary Clinton, if she decides to run for president, would be among the oldest contenders for the office. Nonetheless, she has strong appeal among younger Americans."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: “Ready for Warren to Clinton supporters: 'It's about to get real'”

“In a fundraising email sent to supporters, the progressive group that is urging Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) to run for president touted their recent endorsement from liberal heavyweight MoveOn.org.”

Washington Post blog: The Fix: Aaron Blake: “Hillary Clinton is the ultimate Washington insider. That’s not necessarily a bad thing.”

“When it comes to someone like Clinton, though, it's hard to argue that her being a Washington insider -- or even another Clinton, for that matter -- is a massive problem for her. In fact, this poll suggests it just might help.”

NBC News: “Who Do the Wealthy Want for President? Hillary”

“Millionaires are sharply divided on their choice for the next president, according to the second CNBC Millionaire Survey released Wednesday. Yet if a vote were held now, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton would be the overall favorite.”

Washington Post: “Just how daunting is the money chase for 2016?”

“For Hillary Rodham Clinton, should she run for president in 2016, money will not be an issue.”

Wall Street Journal: “Security Gaps Detailed at American Posts”

“State Department investigators discovered numerous security deficiencies in global hot spots when reviewing U.S. diplomatic facilities in 2012 and 2013, suggesting problems were more widespread than previously known.”

Blue Nation Review opinion: Allida Black: “Today is Human Rights Day–Here’s What You Can Do”

“Eleanor Roosevelt dedicated her life to promoting this vision. Hillary Clinton dedicates her life to implementing it.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Business Insider opinion: Business Insider EIC Henry Blodget: "I Know It Sounds Crazy, But I Don't Think Hillary Clinton Will Be The Next US President"

"No disrespect to Mrs. Clinton, but I think this consensus is wrong."

Articles:

Talking Points Memo: "Howard Dean Endorses Hillary While Group He Founded Pushes For Warren"

By Dylan Scott

December 10, 2014, 12:47 p.m. EDT

The day after the grassroots group he founded announced it would help draft Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-MA) for a 2016 presidential run, former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean endorsed Hillary Clinton if she chooses to seek the White House.

"Hillary Clinton is by far the most qualified person in the United States to serve as President. If she runs, I will support her," Dean wrote in an op-ed for Politico magazine titled "I'm Ready for Hillary."

Dean's Clinton endorsement arrived almost simultaneously with Democracy for America's announcement that it would support efforts to convince Warren to run, pending its members' approval. Dean remains an active strategic adviser for the group, which he founded in 2004 ahead of his own presidential campaign.

Dean and DFA knew what the other planned to do before either went public, according to a DFA spokesperson, and the group said there are no concerns about sending conflicting messages. A recent internal DFA poll found that its members favored Warren over Clinton by nearly 20 points.

"Gov. Dean founded DFA in the hopes that it would be the strong, people-powered force in the progressive movement it is today," DFA communications director Neil Sroka told TPM in an email on Wednesday.

"When we both saw the results of our 2016 Presidential Pulse Poll, we both knew that might lead us to where we are today," he continued. "So, sure, some beltway folks might be confused, but we're confident our members won't be and, honestly, that's all that really matters."

Meanwhile, Correct The Record, the American Bridge-affiliated group that is supporting a Hillary 2016 candidacy, blasted out the Dean endorsement in an email to reporters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

ABC News: “Support for Elizabeth Warren Over Hillary Clinton Reveals Progressive Family Feud”

By Shushannah Walshe

December 10, 2014, 1:06 p.m. EST

Sen. Elizabeth Warren may be saying no to 2016, but that is not stopping her supporters and it’s revealing a possible family feud in progressive politics.

Members of the liberal group MoveOn have voted to draft the Massachusetts senator with 81.3 percent of those who voted casting the ballot in support of a draft effort. MoveOn — joined by Democracy or America — said it will launch their “Run Warren Run” draft effort, which includes spending $1 million in the first phase of the launch and setting up offices in Iowa and New Hampshire as well as assembling a "national volunteer army" on behalf of Warren. They are planning on holding their first event in Iowa next week.

Democracy for America’s support shows a schism within the group. They released a statement after MoveOn’s vote reiterating they would help their fellow liberals in the draft Warren effort, but Howard Dean — who started the group — wrote an op-ed today stressing his support for Hillary Clinton. Neither Clinton nor Warren have said they are running for the Democratic presidential nomination. Warren has repeatedly said she’s not running and Clinton has said she’s still deciding.

"Hillary Clinton is by far the most qualified person in the United States to serve as president. If she runs, I will support her,” Dean, a former Vermont governor and presidential candidate, wrote in Politico. “We need a mature, seasoned, thoughtful leader at a time when maturity and thoughtfulness are increasingly rare commodities in Washington, D.C. If I have the opportunity, I will cast my vote for Hillary Clinton for president.”

Dean founded DFA and according to the group still serves in a strategic advisory role. He originally left the DFA to lead the Democratic National Committee in 2005 and then Dean’s brother Jim took over DFA and still serves as chairman of the group.

Charles Chamberlain, executive director of Democracy for America, said in a statement they “respect” Dean’s “early support” and believe Clinton “would make a fantastic president and, should she win the nomination, DFA members will work non-stop to help her make history by becoming our nation's first woman president.” But they are still endorsing Warren.

Chamberlain cited their supporters backing of Warren in a recent member survey and added, “We've said from the very beginning of our discussions of 2016 that one of DFA's top priorities will be ensuring that the battle for the Democratic nomination is a contest, not a coronation. Our members clearly agree with that priority…and aren't ready to follow the governor's lead in making an early endorsement of Clinton."

Chamberlain said later today they will ask members to ratify their decision to join the draft Warren effort.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Senator Warren's record of standing up to Wall Street and the big banks in the fight against income inequality is inspiring Americans and progressive activists nationwide,” Chamberlain said.

MoveOn’s executive director of political action said in a statement after their vote that their members have “spoken clearly” and beginning today they are “throwing our full weight behind this Run Warren Run campaign to show Senator Warren she has the support of millions of Americans across the country.”

It’s their first presidential draft campaign in their 16 year history and said their “team-based organizing strategy” is “inspired” by President Obama's successful "grassroots campaigns." They’ve already launched a “Run Warren Run” website and video portraying Warren as a fighter for the middle class.

When MoveOn announced their vote Tuesday and DFA expressed support for the effort, Warren’s press secretary Lacey Rose said, "As Senator Warren has said many times, she is not running for president." Warren has said the same repeatedly herself, but she’s always been careful to phrase it in the present tense.

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: “Dean, in break from group he founded, backs Clinton for president”

By Peter Sullivan

December 10, 2014, 10:02 a.m. EST

Former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean endorsed Hillary Clinton for president on Wednesday, giving her the support of a liberal firebrand at a time when some liberals are skeptical.

"Hillary Clinton is by far the most qualified person in the United States to serve as President," Dean wrote in an op-ed in Politico Magazine. "If she runs, I will support her."

Dean, who caught fire among the liberal base in the 2004 presidential campaign before ultimately losing the nomination to John Kerry, gives Clinton support at a time when liberal groups are organinizing to urge Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) to challenge Clinton from the left.

Those liberal groups include Democracy for America, which was founded by Dean himself. On Tuesday, DFA announced that it was asking its members to vote to join the "Draft Warren" movement begun by another liberal group, MoveOn.org.

"Washington consultants can spout off a dozen reasons why Elizabeth Warren shouldn't run, but none of that beltway blather means a thing next to this one, simple truth: The Democratic Party and our country desperately need Warren's voice in the 2016 presidential debate," DFA Executive Director Charles Chamberlain said in a statement announcing the Draft Warren move.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Neil Sroka, a spokesman for DFA, wrote on Twitter that Dean's op-ed was placed last week, before DFA's decision to join the Draft Warren effort.

In supporting Clinton, Dean cited Supreme Court appointments, the need for experience on national security matters, and income inequality.

"Hillary Clinton will not shrink from this challenge," he writes. "In the coming months, I expect her to lay out her plans to attack income inequality and help rebuild the middle class. She knows how to sell a broad range of Americans on these policies, and has shown how to stand up against extremist economic policies."

Income inequality is the main issue spurring liberal groups to look for an alternative to Clinton. Dean acknowledges: "I am sure I will have disagreements with her as she focuses on getting Americans back to work and rebuilding an America that works for all of us."

However, he writes, "We need a mature, seasoned, thoughtful leader at a time when maturity and thoughtfulness are increasingly rare commodities in Washington, D.C."

Dean said in August that he is a "huge Hillary Clinton fan."

That was a shift from June 2013, when he told CNN that he was considering a run of his own, and said of Clinton, "She is not going to have a pass," Dean said. "There will be other people who will run."

The Week blog: Speed Reads: “Howard Dean endorses Hillary Clinton for president: 'We need a mature, seasoned' leader”

By Jon Terbush

December 10, 2014, 9:03 a.m. EST

Calling her "by far the most qualified person" for the job, former Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean said Wednesday he was throwing his support behind Hillary Clinton in 2016.

In a Politico op-ed, Dean cited three major reasons for his support. Clinton, he wrote, understands the "institutional requirements" of the Supreme Court and would appoint worthy judges; she has a sterling record at the State Department; and she would address income inequality.

"We need a mature, seasoned, thoughtful leader at a time when maturity and thoughtfulness are increasingly rare commodities in Washington, D.C.," he wrote.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Washington Post blog: The Fix: Chris Cillizza: “Howard Dean makes the liberal’s case for Hillary Clinton. It’s only ok.”

By Chris Cillizza

December 10, 2014, 9:36 a.m. EST

Liberals aren't in love with the idea of anointing Hillary Clinton as the Democratic nominee for president in 2016. And now they are doing something about it -- launching an active (and well financed) effort to draft Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren into the presidential race this week.

All of which makes the timing of former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean's Politico op-ed Wednesday morning formally endorsing Clinton's not-yet-announced presidential campaign very, very interesting. Dean became a hero to the left during his 2004 race for the Democratic presidential nomination, a bid largely premised on his staunch opposition to the war in Iraq. Over the intervening decade, Dean has remained an anti-establishment, speak-truth-to-power type and remains influential among a certain segment of liberal activists.

Dean's op-ed, then, is rightly read as a sort of "liberal's case for Hillary Clinton" and a way of pushing back against the rising Warren tide. (Remember that Dean has been in favor of Clinton's presidential campaign for a while now. "If she is president, which I hope she is, I think she is going to be a terrific president," he told CNN back in July.)

The thrust of Dean's piece is that Democrats badly need another Democratic president because of rightward movement of the Supreme Court in recent years. Writes Dean:

“America needs a thoughtful President who will appoint judges and justices who will stand up for the Constitution and the law instead of catering to the dictates of those who fund the right-wing Federalist Society. I am confident that Hillary Clinton will provide that leadership.”

That's a stone-cold winner argument to liberals who believe the Roberts Court has drastically overreached in its decisions -- "this Court has repeatedly made decisions that have harmed our country for the sake of extending a political and ideological agenda," according to Dean -- especially on matters of campaign finance and voting rights.

With Ruth Bader Ginsburg (age 81) and Stephen Breyer (76) -- both appointees of Bill Clinton -- aging, there is considerable awareness (and concern) in liberal circles about how a Republican president could remake the Court for a lifetime if elected in 2016. Dean is playing to those fears, making the argument that Clinton, as a Democrat, is better than any Republican president when it comes to picking the next members of the Supreme Court.

Dean makes a similar argument when it comes to the pet issue of Warren (and the left): income inequality. Again, Dean: "In the coming months, I expect [Clinton] to lay out her plans to attack income inequality and help rebuild the middle class. She knows how to sell a broad range of Americans on these policies, and has shown how to stand up against extremist economic policies." What Dean stays entirely away from is talking about Clinton's ties to Wall Street, a major point of contention in the eyes of liberals.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

What Dean argues broadly in the op-ed is that Clinton is the best choice among the candidates who are a) running and b) can win. It's a see-the-forest-through-the-tree argument; no, Clinton isn't the candidate liberals would dream up in a political laboratory but she is a heck of a lot better than the Republican alternatives out there. "I value and respect her enough that whatever differences may exist will be minimal compared to the tasks we really need to do for the good of restoring our country," writes Dean.

It remains to be seen whether the she's-not-perfect-but-she's-pretty good case for Clinton will be enough to convince liberals to stop actively looking for someone who fits their beliefs better. (It may not matter how convincing Dean is if Warren, who has said she isn't running and signed a letter urging Clinton to run, doesn't change her mind.) No matter what, however, that Dean felt the need to reiterate his support for Clinton and make the case for why other liberals should (or at least could) be for her is a telling indication of the nervousness among allies of the former Secretary of State about the possibility of a liberal uprising complicating her coronation for the nomination.

The Blaze: “Howard Dean Throws His Support Behind Hillary Clinton”

By Fred Lucas

December 10, 2014, 9:45 a.m. EST

Hillary Clinton hasn’t said whether she’s running in 2016, but she has an early backer in former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean.

“Hillary Clinton is by far the most qualified person in the United States to serve as president. If she runs, I will support her,” the former Democratic National Committee chairman wrote in an op-ed for Politico.

A Clinton presidential campaign is expected to face contention from the progressive wing of the Democratic party; Dean ran as an anti-establishment Democrat in the 2004 presidential race.

“I am sure I will have disagreements with her as she focuses on getting Americans back to work and rebuilding an America that works for all of us,” Dean wrote. “I value and respect her enough that whatever differences may exist will be minimal compared to the tasks we really need to do for the good of restoring our country. We need a mature, seasoned, thoughtful leader at a time when maturity and thoughtfulness are increasingly rare commodities in Washington, D.C.”

Dean was the frontrunner for a time in a crowded Democratic primary field in the lead-up to the 2004 election because of his opposition to the war in Iraq. After a disappointing showing in the Iowa caucus, he infamously bellowed the “Dean scream” that haunted the rest of his ill-fated campaign.

Dean has long been a key figure among the more progressive Democrats, many of whom have expressed support for a bid by Massachusetts Democratic Sen. Elizabeth Warren, or Vermont Independent Sen. Bernie Sanders.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Dean said it's important that Clinton be elected in order to fill future Supreme Court vacancies.

"One of the most important reasons I am supporting her is because Secretary Clinton understands the institutional requirements of the Supreme Court," Dean wrote. "More than 73 percent of Americans think the Supreme Court is no longer a fair arbitrator and is influenced by political considerations. I am one of those 73 percent. This court has repeatedly made decisions that have harmed our country for the sake of extending a political and ideological agenda that is far outside the mainstream of American traditions — on issues like campaign finance, voting rights, the rights of women and religious freedom.

"America needs a thoughtful president who will appoint judges and justices who will stand up for the Constitution and the law instead of catering to the dictates of those who fund the right-wing Federalist Society," Dean continued. "I am confident that Hillary Clinton will provide that leadership."

Bloomberg column: Al Hunt: "Young Voters Don't Care How Old Hillary Is"

By Albert R. Hunt

December 10, 2014, 6:00 a.m. EST

Hillary Clinton, if she decides to run for president, would be among the oldest contenders for the office. Nonetheless, she has strong appeal among younger Americans.

The former secretary of state, who will be 69 on Election Day 2016, beats five of her most prominent possible Republican rivals among voters 18-to-29, in some cases by as much as a 2-to-1 margin, according to a new Bloomberg Politics poll. Senator Rand Paul runs strongest against her among these voters, though he still loses by a 3-to-2 margin.

Younger people, perhaps not surprisingly, say the most important quality for a presidential candidate is a vision for the future. On this question, Clinton routs her Republican rivals among younger Americans. They prefer her to Mitt Romney, for example, by 56 percent to 36 percent.

Romney is seven months older than Clinton. The other possible Republican candidates -- Jeb Bush, Chris Christie, Rand Paul and Ted Cruz -- are five to more than 20 years younger.

Age hasn't emerged as a significant impediment to winning the youth vote in presidential contests.

"There is little reason to believe that younger people prefer young candidates," says Peter Levine, a professor at Tufts University's Center on Civic Learning and Engagement.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Young voters have been more dependably Democratic in recent elections. In the last presidential race, Barack Obama won 60 percent of 18-to-29 year-olds, according to Election Day exit polls.

Republicans did slightly better in the November midterm congressional contests, when they lost the youth vote 54 percent to 43 percent.

Some caveats: At this early stage of the presidential election cycle, younger Americans tend to be a little less informed and potentially more prone to switching allegiances. And turnout is uncertain: voters under 30 comprised 19 percent of the electorate in the last presidential race. In November, they accounted for just 13 percent. In this year's exit polls, Hillary Clinton didn't do as well as she does in the Bloomberg politics survey.

Still, her standing with 18-to-29 year olds is impressive. She is viewed favorably by this cohort by better than a 3-to-2 margin, considerably better than her standing among people 30 or older.

Similarly, her greatest advantage in head-to-head matchups and on the vision issue is with those under 30. On a vision for the future, the Republican who comes closest is Paul, a libertarian who has appealed to younger voters on privacy and other issues. He still ranks 15 points behind Clinton.

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: “Ready for Warren to Clinton supporters: 'It's about to get real'”

By Kevin Cirilli

December 10, 2014, 1:08 p.m. EST

Ready For Warren has a message to Hillary Clinton about 2016: "It's about to get real."

In a fundraising email sent to supporters, the progressive group that is urging Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) to run for president touted their recent endorsement from liberal heavyweight MoveOn.org.

"MoveOn joining the draft Warren movement is a game changer for 2016," said Erika Sagrans, Ready For Warren campaign manager. "We’re seeing a groundswell of momentum as more and more Americans see that Elizabeth Warren is a fearless progressive champion who can take on Wall Street and win for working families. And that’s exactly what she’ll do as president."

Warren has insisted that she's not running for president, but the recent news that MoveOn.org — as well as Democracy For America — would be backing the freshman senator has liberals hoping she'll change her mind.

Former Secretary of State Clinton has dominated early polling, but many liberals are concerned that Clinton is too centrist and too close to Wall Street.

The New York Times reported Sunday that MoveOn.org will invest $1 million into Ready For Warren, which

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Warren's own attorneys denounced in August, saying they had nothing to do with its creation.

MoveOn.org will also provide volunteers out of their millions of members as the kick-off to the 2016 presidential cycle is just months away.

"With MoveOn on board, things will only get bigger from here. They're making a major investment — including staff and resources, as well as the might of their millions of members," Ready For Warren officials wrote in a fundraising email. "All of this is more proof of what we already knew: This is Elizabeth Warren's moment. As a friend of mine said to me yesterday: 'It's about to get real.'"

Washington Post blog: The Fix: Aaron Blake: "Hillary Clinton is the ultimate Washington insider. That's not necessarily a bad thing."

By Aaron Blake

December 10, 2014, 11:38 a.m. EST

If there's one thing we learned in the last few elections, it's that people hate Washington. And being associated with Washington is a huge political liability.

Right? Well, maybe not.

Witness this data from Bloomberg's latest poll. The poll asked people about several aspects of Hillary Clinton's resume, and whether they thought each was a plus or a minus.

[DATA]

Almost all of these statements are some variation on Clinton being a D.C. insider. And Clinton gets positive marks on each of them. She even gets positive marks for "She has close ties to Wall Street," which is a statement that could just as easily appear in an attack ad against Hillary Clinton.

Clinton's best marks, in fact, are on the only statement actually mentioning Washington: "She has lived in Washington and worked in the federal government"; 78 percent say that's an advantage, versus just 20 percent who said it's a disadvantage. And despite President Obama's approval rating being around 40 percent, about six in 10 Americans say Clinton's work in the Obama Administration is a good thing for her.

Clinton's overall favorable rating in the poll, we would point out, is 52 percent. In other words, plenty of people who otherwise don't really like her think her lengthy career in government and insider status is a feather in her cap rather than a liability.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Those numbers call into question whether it's really a bad thing to be a "Washington insider." We suspect it is a bad thing when the candidates aren't very well-known. In that case, voting for the non-Washington candidate is the easiest way to show your contempt for Congress. When it's businessman David Perdue versus Congressman Jack Kingston in the Georgia GOP Senate runoff, that "congressman" label probably isn't helpful to people who don't really know Kingston. (We have made this argument before in regards whether the Republican Party would actually nominate a confirmed tea partier for president. We were dubious.)

When it comes to someone like Clinton, though, it's hard to argue that her being a Washington insider -- or even another Clinton, for that matter -- is a massive problem for her.

In fact, this poll suggests it just might help.

NBC News: "Who Do the Wealthy Want for President? Hillary"

By Robert Frank

December 10, 2014, 11:51 a.m. EST

Millionaires are sharply divided on their choice for the next president, according to the second CNBC Millionaire Survey released Wednesday. Yet if a vote were held now, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton would be the overall favorite.

The survey polled 500 people with investable assets of $1 million or more, which represents the top 8 percent of American households. According to the survey—a poll evenly split between Democrats, Republicans and Independents—Hillary Clinton is the top choice for 31 percent of millionaires, including 23 percent of Independent millionaires and 5 percent of Republican millionaires. Respondents got to choose among nine potential candidates in the survey: Clinton; Senator Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.); Vice President Joe Biden; Governor Chris Christie (R-N.J.); Senator Ted Cruz (R-Texas); Senator Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.); former Governor Jeb Bush (R-Fla.); Senator Rand Paul (R-Ky.) and Governor Scott Walker (R-Wis.). Clinton gets the support of 38 percent of women millionaires and 27 percent of male millionaires. Among male millionaires of both parties, Hillary is the top choice, with 27 percent. Jeb Bush comes in second among millionaires, with 18 percent. But among Republican millionaires, the former Republican Florida governor is far and away the top choice, with 36 percent support.

Washington Post: "Just how daunting is the money chase for 2016?"

By Dan Balz

December 10, 2014, 9:29 a.m. EST

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Elections should be about voters — their issues, their worries, their questions. Instead, elections increasingly have become about donors — courting them, corralling them and depending on them.

For Hillary Rodham Clinton, should she run for president in 2016, money will not be an issue. For the large and unsettled field of Republicans, it is — at least for now — almost everything. For the next year, raising the money needed to go the distance in a competitive nomination contest and beyond will be among the highest of priorities.

By the time of the 2016 election, the two major party nominees will have raised more than $1 billion. But securing the nomination, just to get to the general election, will require raising in excess of $100 million.

Spencer Zwick, who ran Mitt Romney's strong fundraising operation in 2012, said, "It's just as hard to raise $100 million for the primary as it will be to raise $1 billion for the general. . . . In the primary, every contribution you get, you are asking for it. You're working a lot harder for those dollars."

My colleagues Matea Gold and Tom Hamburger reported that, by some estimates, the leading candidate or candidates for the nomination will need to raise as much as $75 million to make it past the first round of primaries and caucuses early next year. Some back-of-the-envelope math shows what awaits the field.

Assume for now that everyone opened for business on Jan. 1, and therefore would have about 425 days to raise money through the end of February 2016. To hit $75 million would mean raising about $176,000 a day, every day, for the entire period.

Assume again that the contribution limit for individuals will be about $2,700 for the 2016 cycle. That equates to finding 65 maxed-out donors on each of those 425 days (or alternatively, sparking a prairie fire among small donors on the Internet).

It becomes more daunting, however, when you look at prospective timetables for getting into the race. Few candidates appear to be in a rush to form committees that would allow fundraising to begin. Many are talking about announcing late in the first quarter or perhaps at some point in the second quarter, although the timing of establishing a fundraising committee and formal candidacy announcement could be different.

Romney did not set up his presidential committee until the second quarter of 2011, and by the end of January 2012 had raised about $60 million in individual contributions, according to Federal Election Commission reports. If a candidate set a target of raising $60 million by the end of February 2016, starting on the first day of the second quarter or 2015, that would mean having to raise about $179,000 a day, or 66 maxed-out donors every day.

There are alternative ways of trying to survive and prosper. Rick Santorum, a former senator from Pennsylvania, burrowed into Iowa in 2011, living off the land, as it were. In all of 2011, he raised just $2 million. Yet, when the count was eventually completed, he ended up winning the Iowa caucuses, defeating Romney by the narrowest of margins.

Spurred by his success in Iowa, Santorum raised $4 million in January 2012. But it wasn't until he won three contests in a single day in February 2012 that his fundraising caught fire. As Romney's leading challenger, he raised $9 million in February and then $5 million in March. By the time he ended his campaign in the late spring, he had raised a total of just $22 million.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Romney eventually would raise about $112 million in individual contributions through May 2012, at which point the nomination was locked up. His nearest competitor, in terms of money raised, was then-Rep. Ron Paul (Tex.), with $39 million. Paul had significant success raising grass-roots money, which could become the model for his son, Sen. Rand Paul (Ky.), should he run in 2016. Former House speaker Newt Gingrich (Ga.), with $23 million, and Texas Gov. Rick Perry, with $19 million, completed the top five in money raised.

Another way to look at it is Romney vs. the field. For the nomination contest, Romney's challengers raised $137 million to his $112 million. In 2011 alone, Romney raised $55 million. His competitors raised a combined $95 million. The total pot of money contributed to Republican candidates in those 12 months was $148 million.

There's nothing to suggest that there will substantially more available for the candidates between now and when the primaries and caucuses begin in 2016. Even if there were a 10 to 15 percent increase, that's not a lot when divided among the number of candidates who are thinking about running.

If it takes $75 million to come out of the first round of contests as the leader and the total pot is only $150 million to $175 million by then, there will be a few haves and more have-nots. Others who are not favored by the donor class of the Republican Party or are not capable of building a grassroots donor army could be at a significant disadvantage.

Some candidates will do well with the big-money crowd, although history suggests that one of them will do significantly better than the others. Former Florida governor Jeb Bush, should he run, could be that candidate, or perhaps New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, although the Securities and Exchange Commission's pay-to-play rule would limit his Wall Street contributions. Perry was an effective fundraiser during his brief candidacy, but could have trouble maintaining his Texas donor base once he's out of office. Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker has one of the biggest lists of donors — big and small — of any Republican.

All this points to increased reliance by all those thinking of running on the alternative way to finance presidential campaigns, which is through the creation of candidate-centric super PACs, which are allowed to take contributions of unlimited size. Finding a financial angel or two who will bankroll a super PAC could be just as important as building a donor network to underwrite a candidacy.

The 2012 campaign was the first in which candidate-specific super PACs played a big role. Romney had the biggest by far, but Gingrich and Santorum were aided significantly by the existence of their own super PACs, funded in large part by individual donors (Sheldon Adelson for Gingrich; Foster Friese for Santorum).

Center for Public Integrity's reports on those super PACs tell an interesting story. Gingrich's super PAC, Winning Our Future, raised about $23 millionand spent about $17 million on independent expenditure ads — $13 million on ads advocating for Gingrich and $4 million attacking Romney. Santorum's super PAC, the Red, White & Blue Fund, raised about $8.5 million and spent $7.5 million on independent expenditure ads, almost all of it on ads advocating for the former senator.

Meanwhile, Romney's super PAC, Restore Our Future, spent $19 million on attacking Gingrich when he posed a threat to the former Massachusetts governor, and then, when Santorum became the leading challenger, spent $21 million on attacking the former senator. Put another way, Romney's super PAC (not counting what Romney's campaign did) spent almost as much money attacking Santorum as Santorum raised for his entire campaign.

Major donors will get a lot of attention in the coming months, more than is warranted. The scramble for money will start to stratify and possibly winnow the field long before voters get a chance to weigh in. That's hardly an ideal system.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Wall Street Journal: "Security Gaps Detailed at American Posts"

By James V. Grimaldi and Peter Nicholas

December 9, 2014, 10:25 p.m. EST

State Department investigators discovered numerous security deficiencies in global hot spots when reviewing U.S. diplomatic facilities in 2012 and 2013, suggesting problems were more widespread than previously known.

Inspections of five newly opened compounds in 2012 found failings that included deviations from security standards, along with design, construction and maintenance flaws.

Such problems "could be exploited to compromise the safety of post personnel and property," said a review that was part of seven audits conducted by the office of State Department Inspector General Steve Linick.

The review, which hadn't been made public before, was undertaken from April to October 2012, toward the end of Hillary Clinton's tenure as secretary of state. It provides the best snapshot of security when the U.S. compound in Benghazi, Libya, was attacked in September 2012, leading to the deaths of four Americans, including the U.S. ambassador to Libya.

Congressional panels investigating the Benghazi attacks concluded that State Department officials didn't beef up security despite requests from diplomats in Libya. The reviews suggest such problems went well beyond Benghazi.

Security lapses at U.S. embassies are a point of vulnerability for Mrs. Clinton should she run for president. GOP lawmakers and activists have sought to tie her explicitly to security failures.

"The inspector general's findings reveal that on Secretary Clinton's watch, security lapses were widely prevalent in the most dangerous posts in the world, not just isolated to the failures that precipitated the attack in Benghazi," said Tim Miller, executive director of America Rising, a group that opposes a potential Clinton candidacy. The group's open-records requests led to unsealing of parts of the previously classified reports.

Mrs. Clinton's spokesman referred questions to the State Department.

Mrs. Clinton, who stepped down as secretary of state in 2013, has described Benghazi as the biggest regret of her four-year tenure and has said she accepts broad responsibility for the tragedy. She has also said security decisions were made by people with more expertise and that her critics are exploiting the issue for political gain.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Of course, there are a lot of reasons why, despite all of the hearings, all of the information that’s been provided, some choose not to be satisfied and choose to continue to move forward,” she said in May during a public appearance.

The location of the facilities, all deemed at high risk of terrorism, mob action or political unrest, are blacked out in the report the inspector general’s office released. Many of the deficiencies were fixed by ambassadors and consuls general after the review started, the report said.

“Posts have concentric and overlapping security measures,” said a State Department spokesman. “So when the [Office of Inspector General] finds deficiencies, it is not fair to extrapolate that the post is insecure.”

Mr. Linick was set to testify Wednesday at a hearing by the House Select Committee on Benghazi. Of 77 security recommendations he has made since Benghazi, just five remain unresolved, according to a tally by the office.

In a separate 2013 Inspector General audit, which also hadn’t been previously reported, investigators said the U.S. Embassy and consulates in Pakistan had inadequate emergency plans in the event of a terrorist attack or political unrest, including deficient firefighting capabilities.

Many of those security breaches in Pakistan were fixed after the internal review was under way. A State Department spokesman said new firefighting equipment has been ordered.

During the Pakistan inspection, investigators found sensitive documents improperly secured, and in one instance, materials stamped “sensitive” stacked on a floor because of a shortage of filing cabinets. These problems are similar to ones found during related inspections in Libya and Afghanistan.

In one of the reports, investigators found fault with how U.S. Marines were deployed to provide additional security. Of 154 overseas posts that had Marines in 2012, 110 had medium or low threat ratings. It isn’t clear why Marines were posted to less-threatening facilities because the documentation was “deficient,” the report said.

The State Department committed an estimated $90 million to send Marines to six lower-threat posts, while some high-threat posts remain without a Marine detachment, the report said.

Blue Nation Review opinion: Allida Black: “Today is Human Rights Day–Here’s What You Can Do”

By Allida Black

December 10, 2014

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Today is International Human Rights Day, which marks the anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights on December 10, 1948. Crafted in the shadow of the horrors of the Holocaust and World War II, the Declaration gave the world the vision it needed to stand up to fear and the blueprint it craved to build a safer and more just world.

It is a bold document, based on a single premise – that the "recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world." Eleanor Roosevelt, who led the drafting and adoption of the Declaration, understood that we are all members of the human family, and that for governments to prosper and wars to cease, we must treat each other with the same respect and candor that we treat our own families. She knew this would not be easy or popular and that she would be accused of championing ideals that could never be achieved. But she persisted; knowing that without ideals, politics and policy are merely power games without a soul.

She urged America and the world to recognize that human rights "begin in small places, close to home…the places where every man, woman and child seeks equal justice, equal opportunity, equal dignity without discrimination." And that "unless these rights have meaning there, they have little meaning anywhere." But she also knew that rights come with responsibilities. For rights to exist here and around the world, we must recognize, implement, and defend them. As she often argued: "Without concerned citizen action to uphold them close to home, we shall look in vain for progress in the larger world."

Eleanor Roosevelt dedicated her life to promoting this vision. Hillary Clinton dedicates her life to implementing it. It is not simple work. "Our challenge," Hillary wrote in "Hard Choices," "is to be clear eyed about the world as it is while never losing sight of the world as we want it to be."

From the White House to the halls of the Senate and the State Department, Hillary strove to make these ideals a vibrant part of American domestic and foreign policy. Sometimes she did it with bold pronouncements on the world stage as she did in Beijing when she declared that "women's rights are human rights, and human rights are women's rights."

Sometimes she did it by creating departments like the Global Office of Women's Issues or elevating the State Department's human rights office. Other times she did it in hundreds of quiet meetings with human rights activists and dozens of town hall meetings she held in communities from Argentina to Pakistan to South Korea. These conversations were not easy. Some leaders feared for their lives, others for their families, and others challenged Hillary to do more than she could possibly do. But she did not shy away from them. Indeed, she sought them out – even when she could do no more than lend the power of her position and her stature to their defense.

But three examples stand out.

In 2011, Ugandan thugs killed David Kato, a gay rights activist, and the Ugandan minister of ethics and integrity announced that "homosexuals can forget about human rights." Rather than just mourn David and issue a formal rebuke, Hillary decided to confront, head on, the targeting of LGBT people sweeping Kenya, Nigeria, Uganda, Iran, and Russia.

She decided to return to Geneva, home of the United Nations Human Rights Council and thousands of global diplomats, on International Human Rights Day. Before an overflow audience, in remarks streamed live around the world, she confronted this outrageous behavior. LGBT people are part of the world's family. "Like being a woman, like being a racial, religious, tribal, or ethnic minority, being LGBT does not make you less human. And that is why gay rights are human rights, and human rights are gay rights."

In 2012, in the middle of our nation's most intense economic negotiations with China, Hillary had an unexpected, stark choice to make. One of China's most famous dissidents, the blind Chinese human rights activist Chen Guangcheng, had made a daring midnight escape from the guards surrounding his home, to seek sanctuary in the U.S. Mission. He did not know if he wanted to leave China and he had broken his foot during his flight. He called the Beijing Mission, which then called Hillary in the middle of the night. Hillary had worked hard to develop candid and productive relationships with the Chinese ministers so she knew how the Chinese would react and the damage the news of Chen's escape could do to the summit. But she wanted to help Chen. She instructed embassy staff to find him, bring him in, and give him medical care. The Chinese were shocked, but Hillary kept them at the table, the summit continued, and Chen enrolled in a New York law school. His family came with him.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At home, America reels from the tragic deaths of Michael Brown and Eric Garner. A bitterly divided nation once again questions whether justice is possible and whether different races can pierce the divides that separate and stereotype them. As protests erupted across the nation, Hillary challenged us not to lose sight of our common humanity. "I know that a lot of hearts are breaking, and we are asking ourselves, 'Aren't these our sons? Aren't these our brothers?' The most important thing each of us can do is to try even harder to see the world through our neighbors' eyes. To imagine what it is like to walk in their shoes, to share their pain and their hopes and their dreams. These tragedies did not happen in some far-away place. They didn't happen to some other people. These are our streets, our children, our fellow Americans, and our grief. We are all in this together, we can all do better."

We can do better. That's what human rights mean.

Eleanor Roosevelt believed it and Hillary knows it. It is hard, tiring work. It takes the courage to dream, the political skills necessary to implement the dream, and a heart fierce enough to continue the struggle. On this day, let us recommit. Let us hear Hillary's call. We must "never rest on [our] laurels. Never quit. Never stop working to make the world a better place. That's our unfinished business."

Business Insider opinion: Business Insider EIC Henry Blodget: "I Know It Sounds Crazy, But I Don't Think Hillary Clinton Will Be The Next US President"

By Henry Blodget

December 10, 2014

For the past couple of years, it has been viewed as almost a fait accompli that Hillary Clinton will be the next US president.

All the polls show her drubbing all known opponents. All the pundits seem to regard her as a shoo-in. Even Clinton's fundraisers seem to regard their biggest challenge as persuading donors that she does not have a lock on the election, thus emphasizing the need for these donors to give.

No disrespect to Mrs. Clinton, but I think this consensus is wrong.

I do not say this as a political expert. I am not a political expert. I am just an American. For fun, though, I just bet a political expert, former Editor in Chief of Slate Jacob Weisberg, that Clinton won't win. Jacob took the bet instantly and says he is looking forward to my buying him lunch in early November 2016.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To be clear:

Hillary Clinton is supremely well-qualified to be President. She has strong experience, she's smart and capable, and she would probably do a great job. She is widely and deservedly respected and admired. She also has deep connections and an immense and talented political machine, one that has been gearing up for her campaign for years.

But despite this, unless the Republicans shoot themselves in the foot and nominate a champion of the extreme right, I don't think she'll get the job.

Why not?

Four reasons, none of which are insurmountable, two of which are politically incorrect:

1) Age

2) Gender

3) Track record, baggage, and wonkiness

4) Relative lack of charmingness and likeability

A few words on each:

Age. If Hillary Clinton is elected President in 2016, she will be the one of the oldest President Elects ever. Only Ronald Reagan was older. According to this chart from Wikipedia, the average age of incoming Presidents is 54. Hillary Clinton would be 69. Ronald Reagan was also 69. And by the end of his second term, he was viewed as very old. (I'm not saying age should be a factor. I'm just saying it likely will be.)

Gender. Someday, happily, a woman will be President of the United States. Also happily, I think the country is finally ready to elect a woman as President. But across business and politics, it's still harder for women to get to the top. I think that cracking this final glass ceiling will likely take a very strong candidate. I don't think Hillary Clinton will be strong enough in 2016. (Again, I'm not saying gender should be a factor. I'm saying it likely will be.)

Track record, baggage, and wonkiness. History has shown that experience and wonkiness are not necessarily assets in American Presidential elections. On the contrary, they are often liabilities. Al Gore had tremendous experience. It worked against him in the election, as did his voting record and wonkiness. (Americans chose the candidate who had no Federal voting record -- and, thus, nothing to shoot at -- the candidate they would rather get a beer with, President Bush.) Similarly, the candidate who eventually trumped Hillary Clinton in the 2008 primaries, President Barack Obama, also had limited experience. But he was more charming and better at connecting with voters than Clinton was (see below). Lastly, a Clinton candidacy will be seen as "more of the same," and given President Obama's approval ratings, that may not be a good thing.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Relative lack of inherent charmingness and likeability. Hillary Clinton has radically improved her public speaking prowess and campaigning ability over the years, and millions of Americans are crazy about her. But she still struggles to forge an emotional connection with average voters. This natural magnetism was her husband's greatest strength, and it propelled him to two election victories despite other flaws. As talented and sharp as she is, Hillary Clinton does not share this strength, and it leaves her exposed to more charismatic candidates.

I like and admire Hillary Clinton. I would be happy to consider voting for her (as yet, I'm "undecided.") I just don't think she'll win the 2016 election unless the Republicans shoot themselves in the foot.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Tony Carrk" <tcarrk@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "Jennifer Palmieri" <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com>
"Kristina Schake" <kschake@hillaryclinton.com>
"Christina Reynolds" <creynolds@hillaryclinton.com>
"Brian Fallon" <bfallon@hillaryclinton.com>
"Jake Sullivan" <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com>
"Ron Klain" <ron.klain@revolution.com>
"Karen Dunn" <karen.l.dunn@gmail.com>
"Robby Mook" <re47@hillaryclinton.com>
"Oren Shur" <oshur@hillaryclinton.com>
"Zachary Petkanas" <zpetkanas@hillaryclinton.com>
"John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
"Sara Latham" <slatham@hillaryclinton.com>
"Josh Schwerin" <jschwerin@hillaryclinton.com>
"Amanda Renteria" <arenteria@hillaryclinton.com>
"Adrienne Elrod" <aelrod@hillaryclinton.com>
"Marlon Marshall" <mmarshall@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 10/30/2015 5:29:15 AM
Subject: RE: FOR REVIEW - Sanders Tar Sands

Adding Adrienne and some from political in case we decide this is worth reaching out to Shaheen.

From: Tony Carrk [mailto:tcarrk@hillaryclinton.com]
Sent: Thursday, October 29, 2015 6:46 PM
To: Jennifer Palmieri <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com >; Kristina Schake <kschake@hillaryclinton.com >; Christina Reynolds <creynolds@hillaryclinton.com >; Brian Fallon <bfallon@hillaryclinton.com >; Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com >; 'Ron Klain' <ron.klain@revolution.com >; 'Karen Dunn' <karen.l.dunn@gmail.com >; 'Robby Mook' <re47@hillaryclinton.com >; Oren Shur <oshur@hillaryclinton.com >; Zachary Petkanas <zpetkanas@hillaryclinton.com >; 'John Podesta' <john.podesta@gmail.com >; Sara Latham <slatham@hillaryclinton.com >; Josh Schwerin <jschwerin@hillaryclinton.com >
Cc: Tyson Brody <tbrody@hillaryclinton.com >; Emily Aden <eaden@hillaryclinton.com >; Samantha McClain <smcclain@hillaryclinton.com >; Sara Solow <ssolow@hillaryclinton.com >; Kristina Costa <kcosta@hillaryclinton.com >
Subject: FOR REVIEW - Sanders Tar Sands

Friends,

h/t to Tyson – here is more information on the tar sands hit I mentioned in my email yesterday. It is not as cut and dried since Sanders did sign a letter looking into this, but he is not outspoken on this issue at all despite Vermont environmentalists asking him to be. This may be something we want to talk to Jeanne Shaheen about since she has been more outspoken and more recently. Below is the summary and attached is the doc.

Bernie Sanders has long bragged that he opposed the Keystone Pipeline for years, calling it an "easy" decision to make. But he has been conspicuously more restrained when it comes to a pipeline between Quebec and Maine, crossing Vermont and New Hampshire.

In 2008, the oil company Enbridge filed plans to reverse the flow of the Portland to Montreal pipeline, so it could carry oil from Canada to Maine for export. This pipeline is connected to a much longer pipeline in Western Canada, the source of much tar sand oil.

In 2013, Enbridge renewed plans to reverse the flow of just the Canadian pipeline, in order to bring heavy crude from Alberta to Quebec refineries. American environmentalists became concerned this was the first step of a plan to eventually reverse the Portland to Montreal pipeline to bring tar sand oil across the border for export from Maine. 18 members of Congress, including Sanders, signed a letter to Secretary of State Kerry calling for a presidential permit and an environmental review before that could occur.

However, Sanders has not spoken about the pipeline since then. In 2014, the Canadian government gave initial approval to reverse an Enbridge pipeline to bring tar sands oil from Alberta to Quebec. The Maine and New Hampshire Congressional delegations wrote to Secretary Kerry again in concern. But even though Vermont environmental groups called out Sanders and members of their delegations by name, it does not appear they issued a statement or criticized the Canadian decision.

In October 2015, the Canadian government gave final approval to the plan to reverse the pipeline, with no outcry from Sanders. Although Enbridge claims it has no plan to transport heavy crude across the border, his restraint on this issue compared to Keystone is notable considering the Enbridge plan could affect his home state of Vermont.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: Tony Carrk [mailto:tcarrk@hillaryclinton.com]
Sent: Wednesday, October 28, 2015 7:59 PM
To: Jennifer Palmieri <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com >; Kristina Schake <kschake@hillaryclinton.com >; Christina Reynolds <creynolds@hillaryclinton.com >; Brian Fallon <bfallon@hillaryclinton.com >; Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com >; 'Ron Klain' <ron.klain@revolution.com >; 'Karen Dunn' <karen.l.dunn@gmail.com >; 'Robby Mook' <re47@hillaryclinton.com >; Oren Shur <oshur@hillaryclinton.com >; 'Zachary Petkanas' <zpetkanas@hillaryclinton.com >; 'John Podesta' <john.podesta@gmail.com >; Sara Latham <slatham@hillaryclinton.com >
Cc: Tyson Brody <tbrody@hillaryclinton.com >; Emily Aden <eaden@hillaryclinton.com >; Samantha McClain <smcclain@hillaryclinton.com >; Sara Solow <ssolow@hillaryclinton.com >; Kristina Costa <kcosta@hillaryclinton.com >
Subject: PLS REVIEW: Sanders Hits

Hi everyone,

I wanted to us all on a single thread since this document could serve multiple purposes. Attached are some hits that could either be written or deployed during the next debate on Sanders. Note: these do not include the college and $20 trillion cost of his plans since Policy is working on them. Below is a quick summary of the hits that are in the document. It might be having a call soon to discuss if people think it's worth it.

Per HRC's request, we are doing a deeper dive on Sanders's agriculture record to see if there is anything that could be problematic to Iowa.

(As always, huge credit to the team for their help building these out.)

> Also: Tyson has been working on building out Sanders's muted response to possible tar sand oil traveling through a pipeline that goes through Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont. He found one letter he signed calling for an environmental study, something Shaheen did as well. So, while he could point to that, his outrage over potential tar sands in this pipeline is nowhere near his opposition to the Keystone Pipeline. We can send around more details once it's done, but wanted to put that on the radar.

SUMMARY

Labor/Pay to Play/Sugar - Sanders, often thought of as a champion of labor unions, accepted support from a company while it was involved in a bitter labor dispute—locking out union employees for nearly 22 months. In July 2012, he accepted $10,000 in contributions from American Crystal Sugar, while the workers had been locked out for nearly a year due to failed labor negotiations. The workers' union widely opposed the company's contract proposal because it could have doubled their out-of-pocket health care costs. At the same time American Crystal Sugar was proposing to cut back on workers' health benefits, it spent more than $2 million in lobbying money and campaign contributions to politicians like Sanders in order to preserve its favorable sugar commodity program. Sanders voted to protect the sugar program.

Crime Bill –Bernie Sanders's Presidential Campaign claimed it was researching statements made by Hillary Clinton in support of the 1994 crime bill in order to attack her in the Democratic Primary. But Sanders voted in support of the bill in 1994, and repeatedly spoke in support of it. Then Rep. Sanders criticized opposition to the bill and hoped President Clinton would be able to pass it. Furthermore, in his 2006 campaign for Senate, Sanders' campaign strongly highlighted Sanders support for the 1994 crime bill. His campaign boasted of the billions Sanders had provided to law enforcement since being elected, and used his support of the 1994 crime bill to prove Sanders was "tough on crime."

Guns - Sen. Sanders's progressive bona fides are called into question with his record on reducing gun violence. When he successfully ran for the House in 1990, he got the tacit endorsement of the NRA after pledging not to support the Brady Bill, which included waiting periods to receive weapons. Once in the House, he kept his word, voting against the legislation five times. Although he voted against the bill, he voted for an amendment that created the so-called "Charleston loophole," which allows people to purchase a weapon after three days even if their background check is incomplete. Later, Sanders, despite wanting to hold essentially every corporation accountable for something (such as fast food companies accountable for obesity), voted to protect gun manufacturers from legal liability. He also voted to strip millions from gun research, something the NRA has wanted to prevent officials from learning about gun violence. (NOTE: This doesn't include the guns from Vermont to New York)

LGBT (Marriage & Civil Unions) - Sen. Sanders is attacking Secretary Clinton, claiming she has been inconsistent and late to supporting marriage equality. But Sanders is rewriting history on his own record. In 2000, Sanders was reluctant to take a clear stand on civil unions and marriage equality, and did not speak out forcefully on the issue. Sanders called for an end to the divisiveness of the opposition, saying there were "a dozen other issues out there that are as important or more important as that issue." While other Vermont politicians were moving forward the cause, Sanders remained relatively quiet. Moreover, his oft-touted opposition to the Defense of Marriage Act omits Sanders's reasoning: he thought DOMA injected the federal government into a states issue.

Repealing Obamacare & Replacing it with State-Run Single Payer - Sen. Sanders has long advocated for a single payer, Medicare-for-all health plan that is administered by the states. His plan would repeal the Affordable Care Act, as well as Medicare, TRICARE, Medicaid, and SCHIP. His proposal would cost roughly $15 trillion. Vermont tried to implement a single payer plan but scrapped it because it would cost too much.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Wall Street (Commodities Futures Modernization Act) - Sen. Sanders repeatedly touts his opposition to the repeal of Glass-Steagall. What he fails to mention is that he voted for the legislation that included the Commodities Futures Modernization Act, signed into law by President Clinton. The Act exempted regulation of credit default swaps and derivatives. Sanders himself blamed the CFMA for Lehman's bankruptcy. Sanders's spokesperson said he voted for the bill because it was part of a larger bill that would have shut down the government had it not passed.

Ethanol - Sanders has voted to end ethanol subsidies. He hedged his answer on the Renewable Fuel Standard including ethanol earlier in 2015, but has subsequently come out in support.

Export-Import Bank - Sanders is a long critic of the Export-Import bank, calling it corporate welfare. However, roughly 3,000 small businesses rely on loans from the bank.

Nuclear Energy - Sanders voted for a waste removal compact that moved radioactive waste from Maine and Vermont to a dump site near a tiny community in Sierra Blanca, Texas. Sanders said the compact was "good environmental policy" and said he was "in strong support of the bill." Critics of the deal said that the site was not only environmentally unsound, but also near a small community that was low income and largely Hispanic. The compact was opposed by LULAC and the NAACP, and a local opponent to the deal called it "environmental racism."

NOTE: President Clinton signed the bill in 1997.

Immigration - Sanders's record on immigration is mixed. While he voted for the 2013 comprehensive bill, he opposed the McCain-Kennedy comprehensive bill. Sanders's objection was over guest worker program which he said drove down wages for American workers. As recent as this summer, Sanders used similar language about low-skill (and even high-skill) immigrants drive down wages for American citizens. Immigration advocates criticized him for those comments.

Sanders Not Straight on His Tax Plan - Sen. Sanders has not told the American people how much he is going to raise taxes and who is going to pay for them. When confronted on details of his tax plan, he simply says "it's coming." When he is asked what the highest rate would be, he demurs.

Sanders Not Straight on His Spending - Sen. Sanders has not told the American people how much his plans will cost and how he will pay for them. When asked for specifics, he demurs. When other estimates show trillions in new spending, he simply rejects them without offering his own estimate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Wilson Center" <wwics@wilsoncenter.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 6/20/2015 3:01:26 AM
Subject: Invitation: A New Foreign Policy for America

To view this email as a web page, click here

Special Event

Wilson Center

A New Foreign Policy for America

In an era of new and emerging global threats, Senator Chris Murphy believes there is an urgent need to refocus the traditional debate between isolationism and military interventionism. Join us as Senator Murphy outlines the eight principles for a new foreign policy vision that seeks to maintain U.S. global leadership but looks beyond our traditional military toolkit for engaging the world.

In discussion with the Wilson Center's Aaron David Miller, he will set these principles in the context of current international crises, from nuclear negotiations with Iran, to the rise of ISIS in Iraq and Syria, to Russian aggression in Eastern Europe.

Keynote

The Honorable Christopher S. Murphy
U.S. Senator and member, U.S Senate Committee on Foreign Relations

Moderator

Aaron David Miller
Vice President, New Initiatives and Distinguished Scholar, Wilson Center

RSVP NOW »

Forward to a Friend

RSVP NOW

Monday, June 22, 2015
12:00-1:00 pm

6th Floor Flom Auditorium

Directions

Wilson Center
Ronald Reagan Building and International Trade Center
One Woodrow Wilson Plaza
1300 Pennsylvania, Ave., NW
Washington, D.C. 20004

Phone: 202.691.4000

wwics@wilsoncenter.org

Privacy Policy

© Copyright 2015, The Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars , All Rights Reserved.
Subscriber: podesta@law.georgetown.edu | Manage your Subscriptions | Unsubscribe from All

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To: CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date: 10/17/2014 7:53:19 AM
Subject: Correct The Record Friday October 17, 2014 Afternoon Roundup

Correct The Record Friday October 17, 2014 Afternoon Roundup:

Tweets:

Correct The Record @CorrectRecord: HRC fought to address global hunger & food security #WFD2014 #HRC365 http://www.huffingtonpost.com/hillary-clinton/attacking-hunger-at-its-r_b_214351.html …[10/16/14, 4:01 p.m. EDT]

Headlines:

Bloomberg: "Hate-Watching Hillary"

"Clinton has her own machinery focused on rebutting the attacks. Correct the Record, a project of the super-PAC American Bridge, is officially charged with defending all Democratic candidates against Republican attacks, but they've largely focused on Clinton, said spokeswoman Adrienne Elrod. On Monday, as Republicans attacked Clinton for her speaking fees at UNLV, Correct the Record responded with comments from graduates praising her."

CNN: "Why is this 10-year old so excited to meet Hillary Clinton?"

MACY FRIDAY: "I like her because, like, she is running for president and a lot of people think that girls shouldn't be president because they are not as smart or they shouldn't have the same rights. And she is just a good role model for girls because, you know, she is just sort of, like, to everybody, 'Girls can be awesome, too.'"

New York Times: First Draft: "Turning 10, Clinton Presidential Library Celebrates Itself"

"The celebration will begin with a kickoff reception on Nov. 9, but the city expects to be invaded by Friends of Bill on Nov. 14, when Bill and Hillary

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton are expected to join a picnic at a tent set up on the center's grounds."

Associated Press, via WBKO: "Bill Clinton to Campaign for Grimes on Tuesday "

"Bill Clinton will campaign with Democratic Senate candidate Alison Lundergan Grimes in western Kentuckyon Tuesday."

MSNBC: "Making Clinton's argument for her"

"Now, as Panetta echoes Clinton's recent criticisms of the president's foreign policy, some wonder whether she might be grateful for him again — and what he's hoping to get out of his bridge-burning."

The Atlantic: "Leon Panetta and Hillary Clinton: It's Complicated"

[Subtitle:] "Reporters have focused on how the former defense secretary's memoir praises her and criticizes the president. The book itself tells a different story."

Fortune: "Anne-Marie Slaughter on Obama's failure to recognize ISIS extremism"

"The alarming assessment of this former Princeton dean echoes that of another top Obama official, former CIA and Defense Secretary Leon Panetta, who last week said Americans should be prepared for a '30-year' war with the terrorist ISIS. Both Slaughter and Panetta have criticized the White House for failing to intervene in Syria—the birthplace of ISIS—nearly three years ago."

Hollywood Reporter: "Hillary Clinton Flying Monkey Signs Hung Throughout Brentwood Ahead of Upcoming Fundraiser"

"Guerrilla street artist SABO, who made headlines with his Gwyneth Paltrow "Obama Drone" poster, has struck again -- this time ahead of Hillary Clinton's upcoming Democratic fundraiser at Tavern restaurant in Brentwood, Calif."

Articles:

Bloomberg: "Hate-Watching Hillary"

By Lisa Lerer

October 17, 2014, 6:48 a.m. EDT

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[Subtitle:] Inside the Republican machine scrutinizing Clinton's every word.

Hillary Clinton is drawing large, cheering crowds at virtually every stop as she campaigns for Democrats in the midterm elections. Back in Washington, another audience is equally engrossed, though much less enraptured, by her every word.

While Clinton rallied voters Wednesday night in Kentucky, Republicans in the capital monitored her appearance on a livestream broadcast. Inside the Louisville convention center, a GOP campaign tracker recorded video of Clinton hand-in-hand with Senate candidate Alison Lundergan Grimes in front of a backdrop of red, white, and blue lights. When the event was over, the watchers were ready.

"Hillary didn't mention Mitch once. Odd strategy in GOP state," tweeted Tim Miller after Clinton'sWednesday appearance with Grimes, who is trying to unseat Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell. Miller is the executive director of America Rising PAC, a Republican research group stockpiling ammunition to use against Clinton and her allies during the 2014 election and, he hopes, the 2016 presidential.

Though the former secretary of State is months away from announcing whether she'll make a second bid for the White House, a whole industry is already defining her image. At least 10 groups list defeating Clinton as their primary mission, according to a review of Federal Election Commission filings, and Democrats say they're preparing for as much as $500 million in spending on attack ads during the 2016 election aimed at her. Her allies have created their own organization to push back, an effort run by longtime supporters but technically unaffiliated with Clinton.

In event after event, Republicans record Clinton's statements, scrutinize them for any gaffes, and bank footage. The stream of midterm jabs hint at the onslaught that could come later. Republicans see these individual strikes as building blocks for a larger message that generally falls along three major themes: Clinton is too rich, too disconnected, and too much like Obama.

"The more Americans have seen Hillary Clinton over the past year, they less they've liked her," said Kirsten Kukowski, a spokeswoman for the Republican National Committee, referencing polling that shows Clinton's approval rating falling over the past few months. "Clinton has only reinforced how out of touch she is and how many vulnerabilities she still has in the run up to 2016."

Both the attackers and defenders are political canaries, testing early messages to see what sticks. It's not an easy task: Clinton has been a fixture of American political life for more than two decades. Most voters already have strong opinions about her tenure as first lady and senator, never mind her husband's. Her decision to formally re-enter the political fray on behalf of Democratic congressional candidates, though, is creating fresh material and opportunities to define her after her popular stint at the State Department.

"It's an opportunity to gather ammunition," Miller said. "The more that she is out on the campaign trail owning the record of the Democratic Senate majority and the Obama administration over the last six years, the more we'll be able to use in 2016."

Clinton's midterm schedule is part of her gradual transition from diplomat to private citizen to candidate after a six-year absence from campaigning. The appearances give her a chance to try out campaign themes, even audition potential speech lines.

Last week in Pennsylvania, she delivered her most partisan remarks since leaving the State Department, praising the Democratic Party, “which stands for families, stands for working people, stands for fairness and justice.” On Monday in Colorado, she stopped at a coffee shop and cracked a joke about pot, touching on a controversial issue that's certain to be asked of presidential candidates next year. Still on her schedule are stops in Michigan, Rhode Island, and a number of other states.

In Kentucky, she presented herself as an advocate for working families, offering a strident defense of the health care plan, raising the minimum wage, and equal pay for women. “I believe with all my heart no one who works hard every day should have to end up still living in poverty,” she said. “Not in this state, not in this country.”

Since leaving Obama's Cabinet, she's made more than 100 appearances, and her adversaries have watched every one they could. In event after event, Republicans record Clinton's statements, scrutinize them for any gaffes, and bank footage.

And they're not targeting their responses solely to conservatives.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A speech last month by Lloyd Blankfein, CEO of Goldman Sachs, at last month's annual meeting of the Clinton Global Initiative prompted the RNC to blast out video of Blankfein joking about his long relationship with the Clintons, a message more likely to resonate with liberals worried about Clinton's ties to Wall Street. In August, Republicans condemned her for skipping Netroots Nation, an annual gathering of Democratic activists, to go on a book tour.

“Never miss an opportunity, right now, to frame her accurately and hold her accountable with voters who are going to be active all the way to 2016,” said Kevin Madden, a Republican strategist who worked on Mitt Romney's presidential campaigns. “We're no longer in a 24-hour news cycle, we're in a 24-second news cycle.”

So far this week, Republicans have attacked Clinton for the $225,000 speaking fee she was paid to address an annual dinner hosted by University of Nevada, Las Vegas Foundation, a non-profit that raises money for the school. (Clinton has said she donated the fee to her family's foundation.) They circulated images of the private plane Clinton and her husband took to a campaign event in Iowa, after Bloomberg Politics reported that state Democrats paid $50,000 for the couple's transportation. They jumped on comments by Grimes, who has refused to say if she voted for Obama, with a chart that showed similarities between Clinton and Obama's views. And the RNC got media attention for a political comment on the 404 error page of their website: “What do Hillary Clinton and this link have in common? They're both 'dead broke.'”

The majority of the assault has been left to America Rising, an opposition research firm formed after the 2012 campaign by former Romney campaign staffers. On their website, they post images and videos of their barbs in hopes of taking them viral. To reporters, they shoot a regular torrent of Clinton criticism into in-boxes.

Still, Clinton remains popular - recent polling shows her approval rating lower than her State Department days but still positive - making her a tougher target on the campaign trail. Even McConnell avoided attacking her this week, pivoting quickly to Obama, a much easier mark with an approval ratings at 40 percent.

“We're good friends. She's doing what candidates for president do,” McConnell said of his former Senate colleague in an interview with NBC News. He added: “One thing I think is noteworthy: Alison Grimes doesn't have any trouble announcing she voted for Hillary Clinton, even though, apparently, she doesn't want to say she voted for Barack Obama.”

Clinton has her own machinery focused on rebutting the attacks. Correct the Record, a project of the super-PAC American Bridge, is officially charged with defending all Democratic candidates against Republican attacks, but they've largely focused on Clinton, said spokeswoman Adrienne Elrod. On Monday, as Republicans attacked Clinton for her speaking fees at UNLV, Correct the Record responded with comments from graduates praising her.

“The truth of the matter is she's the only one who's really getting attacked,” said Elrod, an Arkansas native and long-time Clinton backer. “They're trying to throw the kitchen sink at her.”

It's a feeling shared by Clinton supporters. After her Kentucky speech, the crowd poured out of the convention hall, passing vendors selling “First Dude” and “Hillary 2016” buttons. The activists were fired up for the November election, but perhaps even more excited for the one after that. “I'm a Hillary girl,” said Missy Harris, a 49-year-old letter carrier in Louisville. “And she's going to need a lot of support.”

Lynn McCrary, a retired speech pathologist, said the attacks only motivate Clinton backers. “The Republicans are just trying to pull any old thing out on here,” she said, as she walked out toting a sign that read “Shatter the Glass. Break the Ceiling.”

“They are fearful of Hillary because they know she wields a lot of power.”

CNN: “Why is this 10-year old so excited to meet Hillary Clinton?”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Dan Merica

October 17, 2014, 12:59 p.m. EDT

Macy Friday can't remember what she was thinking when -- mouth agape, eyes bugged -- she shook hands with Hillary Clinton in Denver this week. It all happened so fast, she says.

What she does remember is the national response to the photo of her reacting with pure, unadulterated excitement to meeting the former secretary of state.

Media outlets pounced on the story. The Washington Post captured the reaction perfectly, writing that Macy had a "look on her face that has never been witnessed by anyone who is not a dad chaperoning a minivan full of teenagers at a One Direction concert."

But why was Macy so excited? What does she like about Hillary Clinton? And who else would she react that way to meeting?

CNN spoke with Macy Friday over the phone Thursday. Here is our conversation:

CNN: How did you get to meet Hillary Clinton?

Macy: I went to Union Station unsuspecting that she would come. I had seen her in the elections and I have heard a lot about her. I was just like, 'Wow.' I was excited because, I thought, she was saying hi to a lot of people. I didn't think she was going to say hi to me. They went into a coffee shop and we were like, 'Oh no, they are going to leave.' And then, she came out and she is like, 'Hey you.' And I didn't know who she is talking to. And then I realized it was me and I went up and I turned back at my family. (long pause) I had never met anybody famous before. (long pause) I turned back at my family and I, like, I, you know, made the face.

CNN: What did you think about all the attention your photo received?

Macy: Well, I love it. Because, well, it is not just because... I think Hillary Clinton is a a really good role model for girls of all ages and it [the reason she liked the attention] isn't just because it got a lot of cool places. I am just happy because people know that a younger girl still looks up to somebody like that.

CNN: What is it about Secretary Clinton that you look up to?

Macy: I like her because, like, she is running for president and a lot of people think that girls shouldn't be president because they are not as smart or they shouldn't have the same rights. And she is just a good role model for girls because, you know, she is just sort of, like, to everybody, 'Girls can be awesome, too.'

[Editor's note: Clinton herself has said she has yet to make a decision on whether she will run for president.]

CNN: You are 10. When you were born, Hillary Clinton had been well known for 20 years. How much did you know about her when you met earlier this week?

Macy: I didn't know, too, too, too much. I knew that she was the first lady for a while. And her husband is Bill Clinton. And her daughter Chelsea just had a baby. And her niece's name is Macy. And that is my name. And when I first went up to her, I said, 'Macy,' and she said that is one of her favorite names.

CNN: Who are some other famous people you would be as excited to see as you were with Secretary Clinton?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Macy: Oh gosh, well, Selena Gomez, Katy Perry, probably Michelle Obama and Barack Obama. Hmmm... Taylor Swift. Did I already say Taylor Swift? Probably One Direction.

CNN: A local anchor in your hometown joked that you would be the first women president. Would you ever want to do that?

Macy: Maybe! It is a really hard job. I think, I think, maybe.

CNN: Do you think you could do it?

Macy: Yeah!

CNN: If Hillary Clinton runs for president, what would your advice be to her?

Macy: I would say that even if you are different or you are a different gender, it doesn't matter what you look like. I don't know, like, if you wear glasses. Everybody can be awesome.

CNN: If you could vote in 2016, would you vote for Secretary Clinton?

Macy: Yes, totally.

CNN: Thanks Macy...

Macy: Thank you. And one more thing: Make sure if Finn [her 12-year old brother] does give you the permission to use the photo, give him photo cred!

(CNN did use the selfie that Finn took of his family and Clinton. And, yes, he did get the photo cred. Also, some question and answers were edited for clarity.)

New York Times: First Draft: "Turning 10, Clinton Presidential Library Celebrates Itself"

By Amy Chozick

October 17, 2014, 9:30 a.m. EDT

They grow up so fast. The William J. Clinton Presidential Center in Little Rock, Ark., turns 10 next month. To celebrate, it has a 10-day party planned that includes screenings of the documentaries "The War Room" and "The Hunting of the President," a "Party Like It's 1999" concert and a "Handbags for Hillary" exhibit.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The celebration will begin with a kickoff reception on Nov. 9, but the city expects to be invaded by Friends of Bill on Nov. 14, when Bill and Hillary Clinton are expected to join a picnic at a tent set up on the center's grounds.

The Capital Hotel has been reserved for Clinton friends, many of whom lived in Little Rock to work on Mr. Clinton's 1992 and 1996 campaigns.

On Saturday, Nov. 15, Mrs. Clinton has an event related to her "No Ceilings" effort at the Clinton Foundation. A Sunday brunch will address the impact the presidential center has had on Little Rock. Hosts will include Bruce R. Lindsey and Stephanie S. Streett, former Clinton White House aides and Arkansans who now oversee the library. The Clintons are also expected to stop by a local food bank.

Arkansans often say the Clinton library, a sleek, box-shaped building off the highway, looks like a giant mobile home perched on the side of the Arkansas River. The library, with its archival images of the Clinton-Gore campaigns and glossy retelling of Mr. Clinton's presidency, has attracted visitors and brought more than $2.5 billion in economic development to the area.

Associated Press, via WBKO: "Bill Clinton to Campaign for Grimes on Tuesday"

[No Writer Mentioned]

October 17, 2014, 10:37 a.m. EDT

Bill Clinton will campaign with Democratic Senate candidate Alison Lundergan Grimes in western Kentuckyon Tuesday.

This will be Clinton's third trip to the Bluegrass State to stump for Grimes. In August he spoke at a Lexington fundraiser and a campaign rally in Hazard, the latter providing footage for a statewide TV ad.

Clinton's visit comes after Hillary Clinton told thousands of people in Louisville on Wednesday to send Grimes to Washington to improve Kentucky's health care reforms under the Affordable Care Act and to raise the minimum wage.

Republican Sen. Mitch McConnell will hold a three-day bus tour through Kentucky's coal country beginningMonday. He has criticized Grimes for appearing with the Clintons, noting their support for Democratic President Barack Obama and his energy policies.

Grimes has said she disagrees with Obama on coal.

MSNBC: "Making Clinton's argument for her"

By Alex Seitz-Wald

October 17, 2014, 8:08 a.m. EDT

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton and former CIA director Leon Panetta go back a long way.

She was the first person the then-congressman met when he walked into the Arkansas Governor's mansion in 1992, shortly after her husband had won the presidency. "Hillary was warm and welcoming. She extended a hand and spoke briskly. 'I'm glad you're here,'" she told him, according to his new memoir, "Worthy Fights."

Now, as Panetta echoes Clinton's recent criticisms of the president's foreign policy, some wonder whether she might be grateful for him again — and what he's hoping to get out of his bridge-burning.

The pointed critique of Obama in "Worthy Fights" — Panetta wrote that the president too often "relies on the logic of a law professor rather than the passion of a leader" — generated headlines. In interviews on his book tour, Obama's former defense secretary portrays the current president as dithering and reactive.

At a book discussion Tuesday night in Washington, Panetta all but endorsed Clinton. "She's smart, she's experienced, and she's tough. What the hell else do you want?" he said. Would he support her if she ran for president again, as he did in the 2008 Democratic primary over Obama? "Sure. Absolutely."

And there's plenty more praise for Clinton in the pages of his memoir.

Some progressives, including The Nation magazine and msnbc's Rachel Maddow, have noted that Panetta now works for a consulting firm co-founded by some Clinton State Department alumni, including longtime spokesperson Philippe Reines. The suggestion is that the Clinton and Panetta camps worked together around the book.

Asked for comment, Reines forwarded a request to a spokesperson for the firm, Beacon Global Strategies. The spokesperson Michael McKeon warned even before a question was put to him that "some questions hatched by conspiracy theorists are too silly to merit a serious reply."

Asked to debunk the idea that the Clinton and Panetta camps collaborated on the book, McKeon replied: "[E]ncouraging conspiratorial types by advancing silly question doesn't solve anything. Have a good day."

A followup email wasn't returned.

A spokesperson for Panetta's publisher was no more forthcoming, demurring on an interview request. "Secretary Panetta wrote this book for the readers and Penguin Press is thrilled with their reaction," the spokesperson said.

Vice President Joe Biden called Panetta's criticisms of Obama "inappropriate," saying Panetta and other former administration officials who write memoirs should at least wait until the president they served is out of office.

Bill Burton, a former White House spokesperson and early Obama campaign aide, suggested that Panetta's view of events is embellished. "The timing is unfortunate. The version of history is revisionist," he told msnbc. "But at the end of the day, there are more pressing issues than some book a former administration official is trying to sell."

Panetta has responded to the criticism by saying that he's essentially dishing out tough love. He says he wants Obama to succeed and that that will only happen if the president learns from past mistakes. "I don't think you put history on hold," he told one interviewer.

Other observers wonder if he has his eye on the next potential occupant of the White House. As The New York Times' Mark Landler pointed out, Panetta's book leaves out or downplays some known disagreements he had with Clinton.

It's not hard to see how Panetta's criticisms of Obama could help Clinton, who will need to dodge Republican accusations that she's merely the third term of an unpopular president. They're similar to ones Clinton herself made in an explosive Atlantic interview earlier this year, when she knocked the president's "don't do stupid stuff" mantra and called his decision to not arm Syrian rebels earlier a "failure."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On issues where Clinton splits from the president, Panetta takes her side. And in other places where Clinton is vulnerable, like the Benghazi attack, he downplays her responsibility.

"It's like he's working from a checklist and just going down and hitting each box he needs to, to back up Hillary," said one former State Department staffer who worked under Clinton and asked to remain anonymous so as not to imperil job prospects in a potential Clinton administration.

Clinton, who faces perils if she distances herself too aggressively from the president, later backed off her criticism in the Atlantic interview.

Obama's unpopularity is such a conundrum for Clinton allies that some privately joke about urging Joe Biden to run in 2016 so that the vice president assumes the "third term" mantle from Clinton.

Why would Panetta help Clinton? At 76, Panetta seems eager to return to the farm in California that he often flew back to on weekends. It's hard to imagine what job he would want in Washington that he hasn't already had.

There are, however, part-time presidential commissions, like the president's Intelligence Advisory Board. And he could join the top echelon of elder statesmen like Brent Scowcroft and Zbigniew Brzezinski, both of whom have served on the board and seem have endless opportunities to speak or write or consult.

Besides, he's hardly alone among Democrats — or Americans for that matter — in turning his back on Obama. Former President Jimmy Carter has also chided Obama on similar grounds as Clinton.

And Panetta has known Clinton for over 20 years, writing in his book that she's one of the "few people in politics whose acumen I more admired."

Why wouldn't he want to do everything he could to help make her president — for his party, for his country, and for himself?

The Atlantic: "Leon Panetta and Hillary Clinton: It's Complicated"

By Peter Beinart

October 17, 2014, 11:00 a.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] Reporters have focused on how the former defense secretary's memoir praises her and criticizes the president. The book itself tells a different story.

I'm thinking of teaching my journalism students about Leon Panetta's book tour—as a case study in how to game the press.

Since Worthy Fights came out a couple of weeks ago, the headlines have been largely consistent: Hillary Clinton is terrific; Barack Obama, not so much. Panetta launched this meme with a couple of choice sentences in the book itself. Hillary, he wrote, "was a luminous representative for the United States in every foreign capital, as well as a smart, forceful advocate in meetings of the president's top advisers." Obama, by contrast, "relies on the logic of a law professor rather than the passion of a leader."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Since then, the former defense secretary has repeatedly stoked the fire by telling interviewers things like: “These last two years, I think he [Obama] kind of lost his way.” “Barack Obama does not like that process of engaging in politics, and I think that hurts his presidency.” And, most recently, Hillary Clinton “is somebody that I’ve seen who’s dedicated to this country. She’s smart, she’s experienced, and she’s tough. What the hell else do you want?” in a president.

It all makes for a pretty tidy narrative, unless you actually read the book. That’s because Worthy Fights itself offers little specific evidence of Clinton’s smarts, toughness, or luminosity as secretary of state. Panetta notes that they agreed about (1) sending more troops to Afghanistan in 2009, (2) launching the raid to kill Osama bin Laden, (3) not swapping Guantanamo Bay prisoners for Bowe Bergdahl, and (4) arming Syria’s rebels.

Decision No. 2 looks good in retrospect. Decision No. 1 doesn’t, given what a mess Afghanistan remains. Decisions Nos. 3 and 4 remain arguable, at least to me. Either way, Panetta’s brief acknowledgment that on certain issues he and Clinton agreed—without virtually any details about the way she argued her case inside the administration, the way she swayed foreign leaders and publics to America’s side or the way she viewed the world—hardly substantiates the over-the-top adjectives he showers on her.

When it comes to Clinton’s time as first lady, the incongruity grows even greater. As Panetta notes gingerly in Worthy Fights, he and Hillary disagreed on the two most important economic questions of Bill Clinton’s first term: whether to prioritize reducing the budget deficit or stimulating the economy, and how hard to push for health-care reform.

As budget director and then White House chief of staff, Panetta was among the Clinton administration’s staunchest deficit hawks. Hillary, by contrast, “picked at our economic program, asking why there wasn’t more room for health care reform and other initiatives” that Panetta considered too costly. Once Clinton’s first budget passed, Panetta “thought we should move welfare first” while “Hillary demanded that we … not relegate health care to the back burner again.” Throughout the health-care fight, Panetta acknowledges, he and the first lady “were on opposite sides” and “she vented her frustration about me.” For his part, Panetta calls the “health care team” that Hillary led “painfully naïve about politics.”

Panetta’s description of his tangles with Clinton over domestic policy in the White House years are actually more detailed than his description of their agreements on foreign policy in the Obama years. What’s more, the historical verdict is far clearer. It is now Beltway conventional wisdom that the Clinton administration’s decision to emphasize deficit reduction in its initial budget helped pave the way for the economic boom of the late 1990s and restored the Democratic Party’s reputation for fiscal responsibility. It’s also conventional wisdom that the administration’s decision to push for health-care reform rather than welfare reform in 1994 undermined Bill Clinton’s centrist reputation and helped enable the Gingrich takeover of Congress that fall.

Given that Hillary Clinton’s role in the push for health-care reform remains the most significant domestic-policy episode of her career, one might have thought it would inform Panetta’s judgment of her. But he never factors it into his overall assessment of Hillary’s presidential fitness—either in the book or the book tour. And as a result, the press has ignored Panetta’s description of the episode almost entirely.

You can’t blame Panetta too much for this. Like most former administration officials, he’s trying to both vindicate his own actions and stay on the right side of powerful people (which means Hillary, the prospective president, more than Obama, the soon-to-be-former one).

Under normal circumstances, it would be a tricky balance. But it’s a lot easier when so many in the media feel entitled to sum up a book they haven’t actually read it.

Fortune: “Anne-Marie Slaughter on Obama's failure to recognize ISIS extremism”

By Nina Easton

October 17, 2014, 11:40 a.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton’s ex-policy director predicts a 10 to 15 year “brutal conflict” in the Middle East combining both religious war and territorial claims.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I spoke with Anne-Marie Slaughter, Hillary Clinton's former policy director who now heads the New America Foundation, at last week's Fortune Most Powerful Women Summit, where she warned that the spread of ISIS, combined with civil war in Syria, is setting off the equivalent of the 17th century Thirty Years War, "which decimated one-third of Europe's population."

The alarming assessment of this former Princeton dean echoes that of another top Obama official, former CIA and Defense Secretary Leon Panetta, who last week said Americans should be prepared for a "30-year" war with the terrorist ISIS. Both Slaughter and Panetta have criticized the White House for failing to intervene in Syria—the birthplace of ISIS—nearly three years ago.

"This White House refused to recognize both the spreading and fueling of extremism," she told me. "It was evident that unless we intervened it was just going to spread. But the White House did not want to get involved in another Middle East war so we effectively limited our assistance to humanitarian aid on the side."

Slaughter says the U.S. should continue attacks on ISIS from the air, rather than deploying troops on the ground. "ISIL [also known as ISIS] wants images of U.S. troops again knocking down villages. That's how they recruit—[calling] the United States the great enemy against Islam."

In the complicated web of that widening conflict, she also called on the Obama administration to defang Syrian strongman Bashar al-Assad—an ISIS enemy—by using the U.S. military to destroy his air force. "The Syrian government has massacred 200,000 people," she said. "I wouldn't go to war with him but [say to him] we are going to bomb your air force to stop you from dropping barrel bombs on your people."

Slaughter also offered advice on dealing with another autocrat—Russian President Vladmir Putin. The U.S., she said, should isolate him by appealing directly to the Russian people, who –under the spell of an effective propaganda campaign — have rallied behind Putin and his aggressions in Ukraine.

"You really have to react more positively to the Russian people, using the media, [finding] ways of saying, 'Look this is not Russia against the West. You've got a leader that is leading you to economic disruption and poverty for a long time to come.'"

Hollywood Reporter: "Hillary Clinton Flying Monkey Signs Hung Throughout Brentwood Ahead of Upcoming Fundraiser"

By Tina Daunt

October 17, 2014, 8:47 a.m. PST

[Subtitle:] The conservatives' answer to Shepard Fairey is also working on a fake website designed to mock Clinton and the Democratic Party

Guerrilla street artist SABO, who made headlines with his Gwyneth Paltrow "Obama Drone" poster, has struck again -- this time ahead of Hillary Clinton's upcoming Democratic fundraiser at Tavern restaurant in Brentwood, Calif.

The Los Angeles artist early Friday hung signs depicting Wizard of Oz flying monkeys holding "Hillary 2016" signs from traffic lights and pasted them on utility boxes near the San Vicente Boulevard restaurant.

Although, as SABO told The Hollywood Reporter on Friday, one poster near a Whole Foods had been "violently" torn down.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"All these leftists, I'm tired of their s—," SABO said via email.

The Louisiana native, who moved to Los Angeles in 1987 to attend the prestigious Art Center of Design in Pasadena, has become the conservatives' answer to liberal artists like Shepard Fairey — but much meaner.

His caricature of former House Speaker Nancy Pelosi twerking, which helped launch the conservative website Breitbart California, triggered demands for an apology from a cross section of angry Democrats. And when Texas lawmaker Wendy Davis came to L.A. to raise money last year, SABO lampooned her as "Abortion Barbie."

In addition to the flying monkey posters, SABO has been busy working on a fake Tavern website, which brutally ridicules Clinton and the Democratic Party. He also has an entire section of his website, Unsavory Agents, dedicated to the former Secretary of State, who will be in Los Angeles on Oct. 20 for the Democratic senatorial fundraiser hosted by Jeffrey Katzenberg, Steven Spielberg, Alan Horn and other top industry execs at Tavern.

"It sickens me to see just about every California Republican I run across pull out the white flag in surrender to the coming coronation of Hillary Clinton," SABO wrote on his website. "They've all but given up with out a hint of a fight. Let this image be a reminder to them that our lady in waiting is not invincible. Obama came out of nowhere and knocked her off her perch without so much as trying."

In a recent interview with The Hollywood Reporter, SABO said Hollywood and politics have become a focal point of his guerrilla art, particularly with his "Drone" campaign, which also features Samuel L. Jackson, Alec Baldwin and Jon Stewart.

"I think the drone campaign encapsulates how I feel about Hollywood," he says. "You know, it's kind of like a double or triple entendre in that, I mean, if you listen to one of these celebrities go on, they're like, droning on and on and on about how they love Obama or the left or the Democrats, or they drone on about how much Republicans suck, and in a way, much the way an unmanned aircraft flies through the air, these people fly through the airwaves."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jorge A. Vilches" <jorgevilches@fibertel.com.ar>
To: ol53@cornell.edu rfeinberg@ucsd.edu podesta@georgetown.edu bkotschwar@georgetown.edu
albright@georgetown.edu
Date: 10/8/2014 6:02:05 AM
Subject: Fw: " No Vulture Left Behind "

October 7, 2014

no vulture left behind

Argentina's griesamess Made in USA

by JORGE VILCHES*

http://www.counterpunch.org/2014/10/07/no-vulture-left-behind/

"America's Best Political Newsletter." Out of Bounds Magazine
counterpunch
Tells the Facts, Names the Names

Judge Griesa,

Your rulings are non-performing as neither Argentina's legitimate restructured bondholders nor the Cayman Islands vulture funds have received a single cent, and possibly never will if you remain in office.
Your judgments are also non-compliant as you have uniquely and ackwardly twisted an entire body of previously solid and functional jurisprudence to fit your purpose, to the extreme of illegally withholding hundreds of millions of dollars which belong to their rightfull owners while sophomorically declaring a sovereign nation-state in "contempt of court".
Furthermore, all of your decisions are absolutely un-compliable as literally no-one would ever receive a single cent if they were followed (vulture funds be advised...)

"We're Now In The Soup"

Talking about money, "gold is money, the rest is credit" were J.P.Morgan's famous words.
As per official court records, yours will surely be "we are now in the soup"(sic).
But it's definetly your soup we are in Sir... a very gooey, distasteful legal-financial "gringo gumbo" of your own cooking indeed Your Honor.

Prof. Dr. Anna Gelpern --undisputed Princeton scholar and unequivocal top-tier authority on this specific subject matter-- has left on record in no uncertain terms that " The world of sovereign debt is (now) deeply dysfunctional" ...courtesy of Your Honor.

Judge Griesa, you have overplayed your Wall Street-centric hand while in the process deeply messed up the sovereign debt market to the tune of $ 55 Trillion dollars (3.5 times US GDP)

Made in USA

Actually, your Griesamess so far has

(a) thwarted the world's largest ever and most successfull sovereign debt re-structuring process in history.
(b) negatively and unnecessarily tinkered with the fate of millions upon millions of people, way beyond Argentina's (according to the IMF)
(c) produced zero positive outcomes (no creditor received a cent, and possibly never will) thus setting a perfect example of what every judiciary anywhere should not never ever do.
(d) left the Euro's huge sovereign debt with an un-manageable precedent that will necessarily bite back.
(e) literally shoved Argentina under the bus while trying hard to push the sovereign debt market out of the US dollar sphere of influence.
(f) biasly favored highly suspicious Cayman Island US political campaign heavyweight contributors (also known as Vulture Funds for a reason) who never ever lent out a single cent to anyone.

Nouriel Roubini (no introduction required) has left on record that your un-believable judgments "...risk destroying the current international regime for the orderly restructuring of sovereign debts..."(sic)

By the way Your Honor: China, Russia, and Iran are most grateful for all of your hard, un-sollicited work in their favor.
For example, for the first time ever, now a foreign country (China) is going to establish a base in Argentine territory, the very first one in the Americas from Alaska to Tierra del Fuego.
Are you happy Sir ?
Does the White House fully grasp the impact of your pedantry ?

The perfect debt storm

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Joseph Stiglitz --no introduction required either-- quote:
" (your decisions) threaten to upend global sovereign debt markets, harm developing nations, and challenge New Yorks position as a global financial capital..."

Thanks to your unique 'legal' gibberish Your Honor, the sheer facts today are that

(1) Restructured bond holders still left unpaid as your financial hostages (collateral damage ?) by merrily blocking Argentina's traditionally prompt payments as if you had any right to do so.
(2) Argentina is unnecessarily having to struggle with international financial markets after having already paid back USD $ 195+ billion of its sovereign debt service since its 2001 default.
(3) CDS non-collection: why isn't ISDA happy yet ? CDS is supposed to be insurance against default, isn't it ? What's missing then ?
(4) Bank of New York Mellon has been dismissed from Argentina and sued (not thanked a bit for their dis-service)
(5) Citibank probably running the same fate as BoNYM (life and US judiciary can be simultaneously silly and tough, can't they ?)
(6) Ditto J.P.Morgan, which together with Citi both have been authorized twice by Your Honor for a "one-off, one-time only" payment (go figure...)

Your pound of flesh

92.4% of creditors reached agreement with Argentina, for a reason (common sense)
Yet you insist in that even 99.99% of acceptance wouldn't be enough because 100% is the minimum required, right ?
So, according to your griesamess entropic logic, a 0.01% creditor can torpedo the whole process... meaning that restructuring of sovereign bad loans is impossible (albeit badly needed)

Judge Griesa, it's obvious that vulture funds couldn't possibly collect anything (let alone the 1600% profit they pretend) if 92.4% of creditors didn't get haircutted.
In other words, once that 92.4 % of creditors are strongly haircutted only then do the vultures come around (under your protection) and at their expense collect their lion's share, right ?

So let's be crystal clear on this: the larger and the more widely accepted the haircut by the restructured bondholders then the more and better the vultures can collect as their prey recovers faster and healthier, thus leaving more funds available for THEM thanks to the financing thus rendered by the restructured bond holders.

Instead, Argentina time and again has offered the vulture fund friends a 300% profit on their investment by paying them exactly the same as restructured bondholders (92.4% of creditors)
But vulture funds are way more ambitious than that...

The vulture 'business model'

VFs buy fully repudiated bonds after a sovereign debtor has already defaulted (a.k.a. in 'state of bankruptcy' where no valid transaction takes place) then sit tight waiting for every other creditor to help out the defaulted country by accepting a steep haircut. Later, taking advantage of the refreshed payment capacity of their recovering prey (thanks to everybody else's haircut) they pounce in with YOUR support harassing their victim while claiming to collect 100% plus plus plus. And just in case that US justice isn't able to support their business goals as you have, they buy CDSs (Credit Default Swaps) as insurance...

So, rogue creditors need rogue courts, but when they do find them (as in this case) they make a good team don't they ?
"Champerty" made all this flagrantly illegal, but you don't seem to care much about it, do you ?

Real vulture birds are needed by nature because they recycle dead carcasses, a good thing.
Vulture funds are terribly harmful to the world economy because they prey upon deeply hurt (yet recoverable) economies... only if they weren't supported by rogue courts.

Still, one practical problem-person for this 'vulture medley' is the 800 lb. gorilla watching the scene from a high limb while munching away his morning bananas: debts that can't be paid, won't be.
Let alone if such payment of debt corresponds, for good reason, to utterly un-enforceable contracts such as sovereign debt bonds which, by definition and as the whole wide legal world knows perfectly well (except you) is strictly voluntary. This is not an opinion, it's lack of internationally accepted law, and it's also history Sir.

The US Dept. of Justice made it clear to you by stating in their Amicus Curiae brief
... sovereign debt restructuring will become substantially more difficult, if not impossible, if holdout creditors are allowed to use novel interpretations of boilerplate bond provisions (pari passu clauses) to interfere with the performance of a restructuring plan accepted by most creditors..."

If this "soup" of yours were the glory that your long-postponed retirement had envisioned, chances are judge Griesa that history will not (and should not) be benevolent with you.
It will be daunting and hardly elegant to find a way out of the hole you have dug up for yourself and for the rest of the world.
Unless...

No vulture left behind

Now, thanks to your muddled-headed rulings Sir

(7) The $ 55 Trillion sovereign debt market has been left fully befuddled in the midst of your very personal legal-financial 'gringo gumbo' limbo mess.
(8) Vulture funds miss their money Sir and, the way things are going, they may also end up hating you as the possibility of collecting what they had expected (1600% profits) is getting farther and farther away.
(9) Ironically, your New York City should decline as legal venue for global debt as already warned by the Treasury and State Dept. in their 'Amicus Curiae" brief which you have thoroughly and repeatedly read out loud

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(10) The US shamefully converted into "clearing house" for vulture funds full discovery (precise information) of Argentinas seizable assets worldwide so that they dont waste time, money and energy finding that out.
(11) SCOTUS and the US Court of Appeals left in shameful disgrace by tacitly upholding your judgments by ignoring the case and supporting full "discovery" as stated above.
(12) The US Attorney General and the US Solicitor General have been proved to be blatantly non-compliant by not applying "comity" powers to stop you dead on your tracks.

Is yet there any bigger fish to fry all by yourself Sir ?

The 'Griesamess Doctrine'

Let's go through a dozen of additional consequences as back-drop

(13) The UN Human Rights Council, the world's highest intergovernmental human-rights body, by a 33 to 5 vote has condemned and will investigate vulture fund activities (which you approve of and foster)
(14) The UN General Assembly by a 124 to 11 vote has approved the preparation of a convention to avoid vulture funds activities (which you approve of and foster)
(15) The International Capital Market Association (ICMA) has proposed new terms for sovereign debt bonds in order to reduce the risk of being disrupted by vulture funds (which you approve of and foster)
(16) The Organization of American States (OAS) has voted overwhelmingly in favor (29-1-1) of Argentina against your Cayman Islands vulture funds friends ((which you approve of and foster)
(17) Your parochial judgments should provoke "reciprocal adverse treatment of the United States in foreign courts"(sic) as per US Supreme Court Chief Justice Dr. Antonin Scalia.
(18) Your pedantic rulings have prompted the United Nations Commission of Experts on Reforms of the International Finances to design an efficient and fair system for the restructuring of sovereign debt.
(19) No one involved in your Griesamess "soup' can follow your line of thought Sir, including TBTF trustees banks, governments, the IMF, Euroclear, ICMA, bondholders, the UN, ISDA... not one Your Honor.

There's also (20) your hardly-credible Special Master Dan Pollack (also friend of yours maybe ?) who has surely enjoyed your ride so far to the tune of $ 250,000 per month for setting forth a most negative US foreign and financial policy.
This "Griesamess Doctrine" of yours (for lack of a better term) includes the flamboyant and certainly unique idea (21) of a NYCity court imposing 'contempt sanctions' on a sovereign... a rightfully aggrieved sovereign nation state which had most successfully remedied its 2001 default until you came around with unmitigated support for highly suspicious Cayman Islands vulture funds.

To top it all off, your have (22) ruled that Argentina's payments to legitimate restructured bondholders are "illegal" (?!) and (23) recently declared a law of the sovereign Republic of Argentina to also be "illegal"... while (24) you are constantly confusing bonds subject to Argentine law, with other bonds subject to English law or Japanese law....

Prof. Dr. Anna Gelpern, again "...Up to half the debt could be in or out depending on how these questions are resolved... it's scary.
It's impossible to make this stuff up...

Civics 101

No matter what, sovereign nation states cannot sign away their rights, same as individuals, remember ?
So, does 'nation state' and its corresponding (by definition) unwaiverable sovereign decision-making powers and unsurrendable jurisdictional immunities mean anything to you Sir ?

Let's try Latin (maybe it works this time around) : 'par in parem imperium non habet'
Simpler, yet possibly more convincing, as per US Supreme Court Chief Justice Dr. Antonin Scalia, you are setting forth "...a substantial invasion of sovereignty"(sic) Got it now Your Honor ?

By the way, claimants to a sovereign nation-state's resources include not only formal creditors.
The precedence principle in this case mandates priority to pensioners, for example.
Are you aware of that Sir ?

Down to Earth

No Sir, this is not a run-of-the-mill Chapter 11 bankruptcy.
On the one hand you have an ultra-suspicious type of "plaintiff", namely Cayman Island US political campaign heavyweight contributors, a.k.a. Vulture Funds.
On the other hand you have a sovereign nation-state, namely the Republic of Argentina, however 'recalcitrant'(sic) you may have deemed it to be.

The term "sovereign Republic of Argentina" has been mentioned in your court records dozens and dozens of times, if not hundreds.
The etymology of the term "Republic" origins in Latin thru 'res-publica' meaning "public thing, matter or affair"
The subject matter at hand is Argentina's collective public debt affecting 42 million people and their offspring.
It doesn't get any more "public" than that, Sir.
So Your Honor, this subject matter is within the scope of public law NOT private law.

"Sovereign" means "supreme independent authority not subject to any other power or state"
"What Leviathan giveth, Leviathan taketh away" remember ?
Surely you get the picture by now, don't you Sir ?
It's not called "sovereign debt" for nothing.

No Your Honor, your parochial Contract Law is not applicable because this is not a family restaurant bankruptcy in the Upper East

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Side.

Dr. Griesa plays chicken

Georgetown U. Prof. Dr. Adam J. Levitin has been thorough and precise describing the worldwide implications of your judgments.
His must-read Wall Street Journal piece describing "the Mother of Collective Action battles" can be found at http://www.creditslips.org/creditslips/2014/07/whose-fault-is-the-argentina-debacle.html

The political and policy impact of your tortuous, harmful legal acrobatics is what Dr. Levitin calls "... a high-stakes game of chicken with a sovereign state... that U.S. courts cannot and should not win..."

True enough, Executive Branch "comity" powers should have cut your rogue performance down to size.
But you were curiously yielded right of way for your legal nonsense possibly because the White House has been too busy fighting one of its multiple (7) Nobel Peace Prize wars, some of which have been lost already while the few remaining ones are defeats-in-progress.

Be it as it may, the final outcome for all intents and purposes has been a shameful milestone of biased judicial partiality through which debt-relief is being forced to turn into unsustainable debt-pain.

Even current New York Federal Reserve Vice-President Thomas Baxter got his fair share of the Griesamess entropy by raising serious concern regarding the impact of your rulings upon the flow velocity of the $2.6 Trillion payments system. Besides your self-evident bias, this dilettante judiciary experiment of yours has led to literally NOWHERE

Dr. Levitin adds :
"The U.S. monopoly on violence ends at the border; at that point, it becomes a matter of foreign relations and not an issue for the judicial branch."
"Argentinas intransigence may have angered the courts, but abstention would have been the right approach"

Abbott & Costello
Who's on first ?

Not a single party directly or indirectly involved in your Griesamess "soup' can follow your line of thought Sir.
Not Argentina, not TBTF trustee banks, not the restructured bondholders, not Euroclear, not ISDA, not ICMA, not UNCTAD, not the IMF, not the US Treasury Dept., not the Fed, not the United Nations... eventually, not even your vulture funds !
What are all these stakeholders supposed to do, keep waiting till you retire, or are impeached, or pass away (whichever comes first) ?
Has anything constructive or positive been left for future sovereign debt-restructuring processes or you also plan on the whole wide world not having any ever again ?
There are $ 55 Trillion of sovereign debt dollars waiting out there Sir, ready to take your gringo gumbo limbo as 'legal' precedent.

Judge Griesa, you have managed to engender a lose-lose, all-and-sundry lose monster, which will also eat you up Sir.

What's on second ?

You have flipped the 'pari passu' equitable treatment criterion on its head by now 'compelling'(sic) the Argentine State to pay vulture funds FAR FAR FAR MORE and FAR FAR FAR BETTER than restructured bondholders to the tune of 1600%. If your absurd rulings were complied with, vulture funds would be paid EVERYTHING plus plus in a lump sum right NOW (principal, 12-year accrued interests with country risk PREMIUM of 10-15% p.a., punitive charges + astronomical legal fees) in the event that ANY interests at all are paid to the restructured (haircutted) bond holders on their discounted debt, which has always been promptly serviced by Argentina to the tune of $ 195+ billion since its 2001 most-successfully managed default.

The above is exactly OPPOSITE to "equitable" and fully ignores the fact that the sovereign nation-state Republic of Argentina couldn't possibly avoid DEFAULT (as in Chapter 9 insolvency, think Detroit... you follow ?). Let's now recall your own opinion (on official court record) regarding 'pari passu' on June 15, 2004: " ...(such possibility)... seems to me a very odd interpretation of the 'pari passu' clause"
What or who made you change your mind Sir ?

The US Constitution (Article I, Section 8, Clause 4) foresees bankruptcy for a reason Your Honor.
For any country other than the US (which can print dollars at will, something that's changing fast, beware) until its HUGE bad loans are restructured, as per Economics 101 all that's left is deflation Sir.
Hyperinflation of its currency is another choice...which immediately also leads to deflation, the dreaded status where everybody loses, let alone creditors.

Judge Griesa, you are either unbelievably ignorant, inept and mis-informed, and/or vested interests overwhelm your decisions.
Have you ever taken into account the required DEFAULT RISK that super PREMIUM interest rates (10 - 15 % p.a.) necessarily meant for the original creditors that lent money to Argentina ?
They knew that allright THEN, why don't YOU now ?

The market stakeholders knew perfectly well that the probability of default was embedded in the interest rate.
And if banks convinced little old widows otherwise, then go after the banks, not Argentina.

Resign, just resign

Sir, you may feel good trying to play super-hardball as a farewell grand finale to your prolongued career since President "Tricky Dick" Nixon ushered you into office, but you are way above your league.
So it's high time for you to just accept your Griesamess, do no further harm, and simply resign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Thus, the whole wide world will finally welcome a decision of yours.
And may the Lord forgive your sins.
At the very least, Pope Francis surely will.
He is Argentine.

Jorge Vilches
Former op-ed columnist for The Wall Street Journal - New York jorgevilches@fibertel.com.ar

Se certificó que el correo no contiene virus.
Comprobada por AVG - www.avg.es
Versión: 2014.0.4765 / Base de datos de virus: 4037/8341 - Fecha de la versión: 10/07/2014

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Eizenstat, Stuart" <seizenstat@cov.com>
To: Jake.Sullivan@gmail.com
Date: 6/26/2015 9:33:39 PM
Subject: Re: Letter

I agree. The question is whether this will be in the agreement, since it is outside the 10 year window.
Stu

----- Original Message -----
From: Jake Sullivan [mailto:jake.sullivan@gmail.com]
Sent: Saturday, June 27, 2015 02:22 AM
To: Eizenstat, Stuart
Cc: John.Podesta@gmail.com <John.Podesta@gmail.com>; huma@hrcoffice.com <huma@hrcoffice.com>
Subject: Re: Letter

I read that to mean that it not acquire 25 kgs of HEU, which surely is the White House position!

> On Jun 26, 2015, at 5:51 PM, Eizenstat, Stuart <seizenstat@cov.com> wrote:
>
> Jake,
>
> Right after the paragraph #5, is the paragraph to which I referred. It says, in part, "Most importantly, it is vital for the United States to affirm that it is US policy to prevent Iran from producing sufficient fissile material fron a nuclear weapon-or otherwise acquiring or building one-both during the agreement and after it expires."
>
> This should a point Hillary could take-up.
>
> I hope this is helpful. Best wishes,
>
> Stu
>
> ----- Original Message -----
> From: Jake Sullivan [mailto:jake.sullivan@gmail.com]
> Sent: Friday, June 26, 2015 01:07 PM
> To: Eizenstat, Stuart
> Cc: John.Podesta@gmail.com <John.Podesta@gmail.com>; huma@hrcoffice.com <huma@hrcoffice.com>
> Subject: Re: Letter
>
> Stu - which line in the letter are you referring to? I don't have it in front of me but don't recall a specific section on fissile material.
>
>
>
>> On Jun 26, 2015, at 12:39 AM, Eizenstat, Stuart <seizenstat@cov.com> wrote:
>>
>> Dear Jake,
>>
>> The Washington Institute letter complicates not only Kerry's efforts, but also Hillary's response, especially the insistence after the 10 year period that Iran have less nuclear fuel than needed for one bomb.
>>
>> I will be with Dennis Ross this weekend in Jerusalem, since we co-chair the Jewish People's Policy Institute, and we have our annual board meeting. I will get more texture on the letter.
>>
>> Best wishes,
>>
>> Stu

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Mollie Culver, Garcetti for Mayor 2013" <info@ericgarcetti.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 12/17/2012 6:47:47 PM
Subject: He Made Us Proud

Eric Garcetti FOR MAYOR 2013

Friend:

This past Saturday, Eric made us all proud at the first televised Mayoral debate. Click here to watch a clip!

As Mayor, Eric will aim high and deliver big – and that's what he did at the debate. In fact, the only journalist to score the debate declared that Eric had the edge over the competition!

While others focused on attacks, Eric was the only candidate to offer a specific agenda -- a plan to create 20,000 green jobs in solar installation, energy efficiency, green manufacturing and water conservation, and a commitment to make DWP both coal-free and nuclear-free. Click here for more information.

The debate was organized by the L.A. League of Conservation Voters, giving Eric a chance to share his unmatched environmental record. Eric authored the nation's largest green building ordinance, legislation making L.A. the nation's largest city with a solar feed in tariff, L.A's solar zoning ordinance to accelerate solar installation, and the nation's largest local clean water initiative, which directs $500 million to clean and protect our ocean, beaches, wetlands, lakes, rivers and water system.

The difference in this race is Eric didn't just vote for these groundbreaking policies. He wrote them. Click here to read more about Eric's environmental leadership.

Eric's big night at the debate capped another incredible week for our campaign. Eric won an important endorsement from the Teamsters, followed by the endorsement of progressive champion and former Councilwoman Jackie Goldberg. And as always, Eric spent the week criss-crossing L.A., meeting voters in Boyle Heights, Westchester, Mar Vista, Van Nuys, Northridge, North Hollywood, and Downtown. Check out our photo album from this weekend's activities here.

While others are winding down for the holidays, our campaign is focused on the hard work that must be done before the new year. The next fundraising deadline is December 31, and it represents a critical milestone for our campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Please click here to keep our momentum going into 2013 by donating today. The time to act is now -- there are just 78 days before the March 5th primary.

Please donate $25, $50, or $100 now to help us finish the year strong!

Thank you for all of your support and hard work. We couldn't do it without you.

Mollie Culver
Campaign Manager
Garcetti for Mayor 2013

PS. Be sure to sign up for a volunteer shift to make calls and knock on doors at our campaign headquarters.

Eric Garcetti- Los Angeles Mayor 2013
United States

Paid for by Garcetti for Mayor 2013
FPPC ID# 1341339
22647 Ventura Blvd. #301 Los Angeles, CA 91364
Additional Information is available at ethics.lacity.org
This email was sent to john.podesta@gmail.com . Unsubscribe . | Created with NationBuilder .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Milia Fisher" <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 8/5/2015 6:40:33 AM
Subject: Flagging message from Carl Page

John-

Manny flagged the below message from Carl Page, Larry Page's brother, who will be at the clean tech roundtable today. Copying Trevor in case you want to talk it through before the event.

Trevor will be there to meet you 15 minutes in advance of the roundtable. His cell is 917-755-5446 .

Thanks!

Milia Fisher
(858) 395-1741

Begin forwarded message:

> From: Emanuel Yekutiel <eyekutiel@hillaryclinton.com >
> Date: August 5, 2015 at 1:30:39 PM PDT
> To: Josh Becker <becker.josh@gmail.com >, Trevor Houser <tghouser.hrc@gmail.com >, Milia Fisher <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com >, Michael Smith <msmith@hillaryclinton.com >
> Subject: Fwd: Hillary Clinton Climate Video for Today
>
> For the clean tech roundtable. Carl Page (Larry Page's brother) just sent me this in response to my reminder email. Can you please also make sure John sees this so he is prepared for Carl's presence tonight?
>
> Thanks!
> ---------- Forwarded message ----------
> From: Carl Page <carlpage@gmail.com >
> Date: Wed, Aug 5, 2015 at 1:26 PM
> Subject: Re: Hillary Clinton Climate Video for Today
> To: Emanuel Yekutiel <eyekutiel@hillaryclinton.com >
>
> Thanks! Looking forward to it.
>
> A few big errors in the film that could be improved.
> (I work with ecoAmerica.org and take climate messaging very seriously though I don't speak for them.)
>
> First is you fail to mention the #1 reason for why companies like Facebook and Google and Apple use so many renewables. Energy that always gets cheaper.
>
> You say "provide a million solar panels" without saying why, except the self-sacrifice austerity, saving the grandkids argument which is weak. The right argument is pro-prosperity!
>
> The correct reason conservative businesses, and Americas people should buy solar and wind, is because:
>
> These solar and wind systems provide cheap energy whose price will never go up. Once the loans are paid off, which doesn't take very long, they provide free prosperity.
>
> The price of gas and oil go up and down depending on the marketing strategies of big oil companies and their staunch lobbyists known since Teapot Dome as the Grand Oil Party. Exxon promises its shareholders that the price of gas will go up!
>
> Oil barons have been known to raise the price of oil just so they can blame the President for it.
>
> Americans don't need to be chained to the volatile price of gas. Fossil fuels aren't just dirty, they are expensive. Beyond the price at the pump, they cost lives, when our military is called on to defend foreign oil owners who don't always share our values, to secure reserves that we don't really need.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

#2 big missing element is, as W would say... "Fool me once-- you can't ever fool me again".
Carl Pope's latest post is RIGHT ON TARGET.

The Coal companies are junk bonds. They are going Bankrupt, not because of the EPA, but because we don't need their dirty expensive electricity anymore.

Big Oil still gets top dollar for their stock, because few people understand what a house of cards they have built. Let's stop before we get fooled again.

The atmosphere doesn't have room for much more carbon pollution. We cannot burn more than 1/4th of the remaining oil, we would die trying.

Big oil pretends that the stranded assets of underground oil have value on their balance sheets, and sell stock to gullible public on that basis.

Nothing disappears faster than a counterfeit currency, discovered.
After years of lax Republican regulation, the banks fake mortgage backed securities were exposed and collapsed. In order to prevent the complete collapse of the economy, the taxpayers had to rescue the economy. Another example of how Republicans privatize profit and socialize risk.

Today Republican corporate welfare sends huge subsidies and tax breaks to the fossil fuel industry. This makes alternatives such as renewables and nuclear power look more expensive than they should. The attempt it is not working.

The only reason Republicans have so much power is because they have dinosaur friends. America's people can take power back from the oil barons and build a prosperous economy.

When energy gets cheaper, we get more jobs. But we also get cheaper products, and cheaper transportation. Oil is very expensive energy, compared to what is right around the corner with today's technology.

The Whale oil industry didn't die when we ran out of whales. It got replaced by rock oil. Next the Rock oil industry will die when it fails to prevent renewable and nuclear energy from replacing it with cheaper healthier alternatives.

(arl

Carl Page
Anthropocene Institute
M: 415 830 3527

Reality is not determined by consensus, no matter what journalists, politicians and lawyers think.

On Wed, Aug 5, 2015 at 12:43 PM, Emanuel Yekutiel <eyekutiel@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

> Hi everyone,
>
> We're looking forward to seeing you at 5 PM today for the Clean Tech Roundtable will John Podesta at 66 Acacia Drive in Atherton. Please do park farther down on Acacia Dr. as the spots right around the house will be blocked off. My cell is 415-203-7122 if you need anything.
>
> We'd like to show you all our most recent campaign video on climate change, but, in the event that we can't show it at the house, I have pasted it below!

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=_ZwguLJVxsM&feature=youtu.be Thanks again,

--
Manny Yekutiel
Hillary for America
415-203-7122

--
Manny Yekutiel
Hillary for America
415-203-7122

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sara Du Bois" <sdubois@progressivemediausa.org>
To: "Sara Du Bois" <SDuBois@progressivemediausa.org>
Date: 6/9/2008 1:09:32 AM
Subject: [big campaign] '08 Daily News Clips - 6/9

08 Election Daily News Clips
June 9th, 2008

Candidate Tracking:

All times in Eastern Standard Time

5:30pm McCain: Finance Reception in Washington, DC

6:30pm McCain: Finance Reception in McLean, VA

News Clips:

MCCAIN NEWS

McCain Extends His Outreach, but Evangelicals Are Still Wary (NYT 6/9/08)
By MICHAEL LUO
...Mr. McCain's outreach to evangelicals has been a quiet courting, reflecting a balancing act: his election hopes rely on drawing in the political middle and Democrats who might be turned off should he woo the religious right too heavily by, for instance, highlighting his anti-abortion position more on the campaign trail.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/09/us/politics/09mccain.html?partner=rssnyt&emc=rss

In Crowd Size, Obama Has the Edge (WSJ 6/9/08)
By LAURA MECKLER; Page A5
...The disparity in crowd size between the two candidates is striking, as are the candidates' oratorical abilities when they speak before those large gatherings. But does it even matter? Experts and political consultants say that in some respects, it does, though the crowd size isn't nearly as important as it might seem.
http://online.wsj.com/article/SB121296861597155771.html?mod=special_page_campaign2008_topbox

John McCain's Ohio disconnect (LA Times 6/9/08)
By Peter Wallsten
Republican Party machinery in the state helped get President Bush into office, but it's not firing yet on McCain's behalf.
http://www.latimes.com/news/politics/la-na-ohio9-2008jun09,0,1838453.story

Obama Would Win Big -- in Europe (WSJ 6/9/08)
By John D. McKinnon, John W. Miller and Marc Champion
While the race between Barack Obama and Republican rival John McCain remains close among U.S. voters, Europeans have given their hearts to the likely Democratic nominee.
http://online.wsj.com/public/article/SB121295864168055409.html?mod=special_page_campaign2008_leftbox

Old Partisan Gulf Is Back, Broad and Looming Large (NYT 6/9/08)
By JOHN HARWOOD
Strange as it sounds, the first five months of the 2008 campaign lacked the most powerful force in contemporary politics: partisanship fueled by ideology.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/09/us/politics/09caucus.html?scp=1&sq=&st=nyt

McCain: To Russia, without love (Salon 6/9/08)
By Mark Benjamin
John McCain and his national security advisor both want to get tough with Russia -- but one of them got paid to say so. Does McCain have another lobbyist problem? ...the sound of sabers rattling is music to the ears of Randy Scheunemann, the McCain campaign's senior foreign policy and national security advisor. ...until very recently he was paid to support that stance.
http://www.salon.com/news/feature/2008/06/09/mccain/

McCain and Obama: The odd candidates (Politico 6/9/08)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By: Carrie Budoff Brown and Jonathan Martin
To understand the stylistic gulf between Barack Obama and John McCain, first consider their cultural references.
http://www.politico.com/news/stories/0608/10926.html

McCain FEC complaints filed, TV ad runs (Baltimore Sun blog 6/9/08)
by Jill Zuckman
Campaign Money Watch, a non-profit watchdog group, files a complaint today with the Federal Election Commission asking it to investigate two possible violations of campaign finance law by Sen. John McCain's campaign.
http://weblogs.baltimoresun.com/news/politics/blog/2008/06/mccain_fec_complaints_filed_tv.html
Link to video of ad: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=b8OXXZCn9QI

McCain, Obama Overlap on Environment, Immigration, Guantanamo (Bloomberg 6/9/08)
By Kristin Jensen
The next president plans to issue new policies to address global warming, overhaul immigration laws, advocate more government transparency and close the U.S. detention center at Guantanamo Bay.
http://www.bloomberg.com/apps/news?pid=20601070&sid=aH8EMkkeMCtw&refer=politics

Senator Graham: McCain's Policies Would "Absolutely" Be An Extension Of Bush's (Huffington Post 6/8/08)
Senator John McCain has aggressively tried to distance himself from Bush in an effort to avoid being tagged by Democrats as running for Bush's third term. However,
... McCain's chief surrogate, Senator Lindsey Graham, did not adhere to that message during his appearance o n ABC's This Week, with George Stephanopoulos.
http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2008/06/08/senator-graham-mccains-po_n_105916.html
Link to video: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=sKm87MV_u_4

McCain, Obama reject NYC offer on town hall (AP 6/8/08)
By SARA KUGLER
John McCain and Barack Obama rejected an offer Sunday from Mayor Michael Bloomberg and ABC News to host the first proposed presidential town hall because they do not want it limited to one television network.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/08/AR2008060800575.html

How to Beat a Rock Star: 'Substance.' (Newsweek 6/16/08 Issue)
By Holly Bailey and Jon Meacham
John McCain spoke with NEWSWEEK... about the general election, Barack Obama, Iraq, prewar intelligence and the press. Edited excerpts:
http://www.newsweek.com/id/140470

The unhappy warrior (Politico 6/808)
By: Jonathan Martin
Openly frustrated by what they see as an ongoing double standard in the press's treatment of his campaign, Sen. John McCain and his aides have been aggressively denouncing unfavorable stories as "smear jobs" and "scurrilous attacks," while the candidate himself has launched a series of stinging attacks on Sen. Barack Obama.
http://www.politico.com/news/stories/0608/10919.html

In Energy Policy, McCain, Obama Differ on Role of Government (WSJ 6/8/08)
By Stephen Power
Arizona Republican John McCain and Illinois Democrat Barack Obama say a lot of the same things about energy and environmental policy: Both want to reduce U.S. reliance on foreign oil and fight global warming. Both want binding caps on greenhouse-gas emissions. Both see a stepped-up role for nuclear power.
http://online.wsj.com/public/article/SB121296676181055711.html?mod=special_page_campaign2008_topbox

Iraq, Not Economy, Frames the Presidential Debate (Washington Post 6/8/08)
By Perry Bacon Jr.; A11
With the country confronting a rising jobless rate, soaring gas prices and a shaky stock market, voters say their biggest concern is the economy. But it is the debate over Iraq that could define the contest between Sen. John McCain and Sen. Barack Obama.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/07/AR2008060702124.html

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Each Party Is Set to Hunt The Other's Usual Ground (Washington Post 6/8/08)
By Dan Balz; A01
The 2008 general election will pit the best-organized nomination campaign in the history of modern Democratic politics against the battle-tested machinery of the Republican Party, with both Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) determined to shake up an electoral map that has been virtually static over the past two elections.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/07/AR2008060702222.html?hpid=topnews

A study in contrasts (Chicago Tribune 6/8/08)
By Mark Silva
In their age, experience, race, faith in the power of government and views of a complex world, Sens. Barack Obama and John McCain offer American voters one of the sharpest contrasts in candidates for the presidency in modern times, at least on a par with the Johnson-Goldwater and Reagan-Mondale elections.
www.chicagotribune.com/news/nationworld/chi-obama-mccain-differencejun08,0,3350838.story

Long, busy summer lies ahead of McCain and Obama (AP 6/8/08)
By CHARLES BABINGTON
Long summer lies ahead of Barack Obama, John McCain, with votes to chase, conventions to hold http://www.newsweek.com/id/140624

Race issue may prove tricky for McCain campaign (Newsday 6/8/08)
BY TOM BRUNE
Now that Barack Obama has clinched the Democratic nomination, Republican John McCain faces the unprecedented, and tricky, task of building a campaign against the first black presidential candidate of a major party in a general election campaign.
newsday.com/services/newspaper/printedition/sunday/news/ny-bzheard085717463jun08,0,6497110.story

Ohio suburbs key for McCain (Cincinnati Enquirer 6/8/08)
BY HOWARD WILKINSON
...It is no accident that on the night John McCain wrapped up the GOP presidential nomination, he placed a call to a gathering at the Butler County Republican Party headquarters. He needs those people to be his new best friends.
http://news.cincinnati.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=2008806080342

McCain Breaks With Bush On Critical Matter Of Golfing During The Endless And Pointless Wars They Both Love So Much (Huffington Post 6/8/08)
By Jason Linkins
John McCain has made it clear that he wants voters to think of him as a Straight Talky McMaverick who's never been shy to stand apart from the failed policies of President Bush. Unfortunately, McCain has always struggled to come up with examples where the difference between the two men can be discerned. So far we have 1) was slightly more into the terrible idea known as the "Surge," and 2) is a little bit more environmentalish in that he likes the environment and is sorry that he's got no real effective ideas to help the environment http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2008/06/08/mccain-breaks-with-bush-o_n_105918.html

McCain Anti-War Ad Coming to Colorado (KRDO Colorado 6/8/08)
By SCOTT HARRISON
It mentions the military tradition in his family, and his own experience as a Vietnam prisoner of war. However, a new anti-war political ad from Republican presidential candidate John McCain focuses on opposing the war in Iraq.
http://www.krdo.com/Global/story.asp?S=8448508

The wife U.S. Republican John McCain callously left behind (UK's The Daily Mail 6/8/08)
By Sharon Churcher
...McCain likes to illustrate his moral fibre by referring to his five years as a prisoner-of-war in Vietnam. And to demonstrate his commitment to family values, the 71-year-old former US Navy pilot pays warm tribute to his beautiful blonde wife, Cindy, with whom he has four children. But there is another Mrs McCain who casts a ghostly shadow over the Senator's presidential campaign.
http://www.dailymail.co.uk/femail/article-1024927/The-wife-John-McCain-callously-left-behind.html

Tom DeLay's wife plans to vote against McCain (Washington Times 6/8/08)
By Stephen Dinan
Tom DeLay will vote for John McCain but the former House Republican leader said his wife, Christine, is planning to vote for Libertarian presidential nominee Bob Barr.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://www.washingtontimes.com/news/2008/jun/08/tom-delays-wife-plans-vote-against-mccain/

MCCAIN TO OPEN UP FUNDRAISERS TO PRESS (MSNBC 6/7/08)
By Kelly O'Donnell
...McCain advisors expect to have a new policy on fundraiser coverage as early as next week. The campaign expects to include a print pool with no still or video coverage inside fundraisers where McCain appears and makes remarks.

McCain Adviser: McCain's Tax Plan 'Will Bring The Budget To Balance By The End Of His First Term' (ThinkProgress 6/7/08)
Sen. John McCain's (R-AZ) rhetoric on the budget has become increasingly muddled in recent months. McCain has gone from pushing a balanced budget by 2012, to a balanced budget by 2017, to a "who cares" approach. A brief timeline:...
http://thinkprogress.org/2008/06/07/holtz-eakin-deficit/

Obama assails McCain over Everglades vote (LA Times 6/7/08)
By Terry McDermott
The Arizona senator defends his opposition to a 2007 restoration bill, saying it was larded with pork-barrel projects. The sharp exchange may signal a contentious general-election season ahead.
http://www.latimes.com/news/politics/la-na-campaign7-2008jun07,0,1967339.story

Clinton Bloc Becomes the Prize for Election Day (NYT 6/7/08)
By JODI KANTOR
Now that a would-be first female president is ending her quest for the White House, the race is more about women than ever before.

McCain camp notes a word missing from Hillary exit speech (Politico blog 6/7/08)
By Jonathan Martin
...the McCain folks have been on-message in trying to pick off the disaffected Clinton supporters that undeniably do exist (and I saw more than a few in the National Building Musuem today...). Clinton didn't hurt this cause by not mentioning McCain a single time in her speech today.
http://www.politico.com/blogs/jonathanmartin/0608/
McCain_camp_notes_a_word_missing_from_Hillary_exit_speech__.html

McCain camp: Lean mode will win (Politico 6/7/08)
By: Mike Allen
Advisers to Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) told reporters Friday that Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) will get a sharp bounce in the polls that could last most of the summer, but they said Republicans have built a muscular campaign that can prevail in a brutal political environment.
http://www.politico.com/news/stories/0608/10908.html

McCain deploying staff, expanding advertising (AP 6/7/08)
By LIZ SIDOTI
With his Democratic foe now certain, Republican John McCain is deploying dozens of staffers into battleground states, boasting of improved fundraising and expanding his advertising into some of the most competitive terrain of the general election.
http://apnews.myway.com/article/20080607/D9152K080.html
Link to PowerPoint of McCain strategy briefing: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=4tiDACmM4eM

No Clones and No Crazies (NEWSWEEK 6/7/08)
Howard Fineman
What John McCain is looking for in a vice president candidate.
http://www.newsweek.com/id/140549/output/print

Talk of War and Family Highlights McCain's Kickoff Commercial (NYT 6/7/08)
By JULIE BOSMAN
...If Mr. McCain has developed a reputation as a warmonger, with his strong support of the Iraq war and his campaign-trail jokes about bombing Iran..., this advertisement is an effort to smooth over that perception. It also puts the best possible spin on his support for the unpopular Iraq war... Drawing on the McCain family's history of military service sends the message that Mr. McCain is rich in experience and strong on national security, two areas that have formed the core of his argument against Senator Barack Obama.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/07/us/politics/07adbox.html?_r=1&oref=slogin

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Link to video of ad ("Safe"): http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=J1OUxBvlLr0
See WSJ "McCain Stresses 'Safe' Theme In Ad Campaign": http://online.wsj.com/public/article/SB121279048063753137.html?mod=special_page_campaign2008_leftbox

Abortion-Rights Advocates Take Aim at McCain (WSJ blog 6/6/08)
By Amy Schatz
Abortion rights activists are using Saturday's anniversary of a milestone in the pro-choice movement to focus a little fire on one of Republican presidential candidate John McCain's potential weak spots.
http://blogs.wsj.com/washwire/2008/06/06/abortion-rights-advocates-take-aim-at-mccain/

McCain Says It's Unclear Whether Bush Wiretapping Was Legal (NYT blog 6/6/08)
By Michael Cooper
Senator John McCain, whose campaign has sent conflicting signals about whether he believes President Bush acted within his rights in ordering wiretapping without warrants, said Friday in Florida that it was "ambiguous" whether the program was legal.
http://thecaucus.blogs.nytimes.com/2008/06/06/mccain-says-its-unclear-whether-bush-wiretapping-was-legal/#more-5323

McCain Economic Adviser Derides Bush (Washington Post blog 6/6/08)
By Michael D. Shear
Republican Sen. John McCain's top domestic policy adviser derided President Bush's knowledge of the economy, saying in an interview published today that Bush knows nothing about the economy except taxes.
http://blog.washingtonpost.com/the-trail/2008/06/06/mccain_economic_adviser_deride.html#more

A Well-Connected Campaign Firm Resurfaces (Washington Post blog 6/6/08)
By Matthew Mosk
When Republican Sen. John McCain's presidential campaign hit the financial skids last summer, he reported that he owed one of his largest vendors $1,079,000. The debt was owed to a computer company, called 3eDC. The firm has close ties to McCain campaign manager Rick Davis and his lobbying partner Paul Manafort.
http://blog.washingtonpost.com/the-trail/2008/06/06/a_well-connected_campaign_firm.html

OPINIONS AND EDITORIALS

A Campaign We Can Believe In? (NYT 6/9/08)
By William Kristol
Republicans I've talked to are alarmed that the McCain campaign doesn't seem up to the task of electing John McCain.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/0a6/09/opinion/09kristol.html?_r=1&ref=opinion&oref=slogin

McCain's Evangelical Problem (Washington Post 6/9/08)
By Robert D. Novak; A17
Shortcomings by John McCain's campaign in the art of politics are alienating two organizations of Christian conservatives. James Dobson's Focus on the Family is estranged following the failure of Dobson and McCain to talk out their differences. Evangelicals who follow the Rev. John Hagee resent McCain's disavowal of him.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/08/AR2008060801689.html

Stop Raising Cash (Washington Post 6/9/08)
Mr. Obama and Mr. McCain should use the federal financing system for the fall campaign -- and reform it afterward.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/08/AR2008060801677.html

Obama and McCain, the same? (LA Times 6/8/08)
Not quite. But here are their surprising policy overlaps.
http://www.latimes.com/news/printedition/opinion/la-ed-obamacain8-2008jun08,0,3502370.story

One Historic Night, Two Americas (NYT 6/8/08)
By FRANK RICH
Barack Obama's resolutely cheerful embrace of the future is a wildly different vision of America than John McCain's promise of vigilant conservation of the past.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/08/opinion/08rich.html

Iraq helped Barack topple Hill, but could hurt him vs. Mac (Boston Herald 6/8/08)
By Bill O'Reilly

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cutting through all the fog, there are two primary reasons behind Barack Obama's stunning victory over the Clinton machine: authenticity and the war in Iraq....Now Obama has achieved the nomination, but his winning primary strategy on Iraq could come back to haunt him in the general election, when the far left becomes rather insignificant. Already John McCain is painting Obama as a terror appeaser who would snatch defeat from the jaws of victory in Iraq.
http://news.bostonherald.com/news/opinion/op_ed/view/2008_06_08_Iraq_helped_Barack_topple_Hill__but_____/srvc=home&position=recent

EDITORIAL: Lobbyists and Washington politicians (Washington Times 6/7/08)
He insists he will curtail the influence of lobbyists and return government "to the people." His anti-lobbyist statements have aroused among the loudest cheers at his phenomenal rallies. He has declared: "I am in this race to tell the corporate lobbyists that their days of setting the agenda in Washington are over. They have not funded my campaign, they will not get a job in my White House, and they will not drown out the voices of the American people when I am president." Mr. Obama's anti-lobbyist stance strikes a chord among Americans.
http://washingtontimes.com/news/2008/jun/07/editorial-lobbyists-and-washington-politicians/

BUSH NEWS

Citing History, Bush Suggests His Policies Will One Day Be Vindicated (Washington Post 6/9/08)
By Dan Eggen; A03
Meet George W. Bush, time traveler. ...President Bush leaps forward as well, envisioning a distant future in which Iraq is a tranquil democracy, Palestinians live peaceably alongside Israelis and terrorism is a tactic of the past.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/08/AR2008060802255.html

Tough Words From This Cheney on U.S. Mideast Policy (Washington Post 6/9/08)
By Michael Abramowitz; A15
Looks as though another former Bush administration official is off the reservation. But don't expect the kind of fierce counterattack the White House and its friends waged recently against former press secretary Scott McClellan after the release of his tell-all book.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/06/08/AR2008060801820.html

Bush: Obama choice a 'powerful moment' (Baltimore Sun blog 6/8/08)
by Mark Silva
Bush calls the Democrats' choice of Barack Obama 'good for our democracy.'
http://weblogs.baltimoresun.com/news/politics/blog/2008/06/bush_obama_choice_a_powerful_m.html

First Lady Laura Bush Arrives In Afghanistan (ABC blog 6/8/08)
By Jonathan Karl Reports
Urging the world to "stand more strongly with Afghanistan," First Lady Laura Bush visited remote Bamiyan province, where the Taliban regime prompted international outrage by destroying two giant Buddhist statues in 2001.
http://blogs.abcnews.com/politicalradar/2008/06/first-lady-laur.html

Europeans View America As A 'Force For Evil' Under Bush (ThinkProgress 6/6/08)
Last April, President Bush traveled to Europe to attend his final NATO summit. While there, he openly advocated that the alliance incorporate former Soviet republics Ukraine and George as full NATO members in an effort to "lay down a marker" for his "freedom agenda" legacy. However, NATO rebuffed, a "remarkable rejection of American policy in an alliance normally dominated by Washington."
http://thinkprogress.org/2008/06/06/european-bush/

Bush Considers New Economic Stimulus (CBS/ AP 6/6/08)
President Bush is considering new measures to help stimulate the battered economy, the White House said Friday as unemployment and oil prices soared and Wall Street sank.
http://www.cbsnews.com/stories/2008/06/06/national/main4161478.shtml

OTHER TOP NEWS

Voters Rank Economy As Election's No. 1 Issue (WSJ 6/8/08)
By Susan Davis
With drivers paying an average of $4 a gallon for gas for the first time and the U.S. posting a fifth straight month of job declines, the economy is at the forefront of the presidential race. The issue provides one of the starkest contrasts between Republican John McCain and Democrat Barack Obama, http://online.wsj.com/article/SB121296650917055695.html?mod=special_page_campaign2008_leftbox

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Gas price record reaches $4 a gallon (CNNMoney 6/8/08)
By Mark M. Meinero and Ben Rooney
AAA's daily survey tops the milestone for the first time after a 1.7-cent rise. Lundberg survey nears $4 as well.
http://money.cnn.com/2008/06/08/news/economy/gas_prices/?postversion=2008060809

Opening shot in the battle over crime (LA Times 6/8/08)
By Richard B. Schmitt, Los Angeles Times Staff Writer
On a website he calls ExposeObama.com, Floyd G. Brown, the producer of the Willie Horton ad..., is preparing an encore. ...Though in this presidential race crime has taken a back seat to the war in Iraq and the economy, some Republicans think Obama is vulnerable on the issue -- and they hope to inject it into the campaign.
http://www.latimes.com/news/politics/la-na-crime8-2008jun08,0,3386050.story

Gay Anglican U.S. bishop enters into civil union (Reuters 6/8/08)
By Jason Szep
The openly gay U.S. Episcopal bishop at the center of the Anglican church's global battle over homosexuality, has entered into a civil union with his longtime partner at a private ceremony.
http://www.reuters.com/article/lifestyleMolt/idUSN0840650920080608

The Long Road to a Clinton Exit (NYT 6/8/08)
By PETER BAKER and JIM RUTENBERG
By the time the campaign tracked down the small-city Indiana mayor, Bill Clinton was in a lather. Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton had lost the North Carolina primary that evening and was eager to offset it with a win in Indiana. But a vote-counting delay in one county threatened to rob her of a prime-time victory speech.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/08/us/politics/08recon.html?ref=politics

Ending Her Bid, Clinton Backs Obama (NYT 6/7/08)
By ADAM NAGOURNEY and JEFF ZELENY
Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton formally threw her support behind Senator Barack Obama on Saturday, clearing the way for Mr. Obama to head into the general election with a plan to challenge Senator John McCain in typically Republican states.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/06/07/us/politics/07cnd-campaign.html?hp
Link to transcript: http://thepage.time.com/full-transcript-of-clintons-concession-speech/
Link to video: http://youtube.com/watch?v=CtAeJoi1y0M
Link to Obama response: http://thepage.time.com/obama-statement-on-clintons-endorsement/

Al Franken Wins Endorsement for Senate (AP 6/7/08)
By PATRICK CONDON and BRIAN BAKST
Franken wins Senate endorsement in Minnesota, overcoming - for now - uproar over past jokes http://abcnews.go.com/Politics/wireStory?id=5021429

Huckabee Helps Choking NC Candidate With Heimlich (AP 6/7/08)
Former Republican presidential candidate Huckabee uses Heimlich to save choking man http://abcnews.go.com/print?id=5022407

POLLS

Daily Presidential Tracking Poll (Rasmussen 6/8/08)
Obama 48%
McCain 40%
http://rasmussenreports.com/public_content/politics/election_20082/2008_presidential_election/daily_presidential_tracking_poll

Poll finds electorate split between Obama, McCain (CNN 6/6/08)
* Barack Obama leads John McCain 49 percent to 46 percent among registered voters
* Poll: more than one in five voters say they may change their minds before November
* Ralph Nader and Bob Barr are both vying for independent voters
* Without Sen. Clinton, 60 percent of her Democratic supporters would vote for Obama http://www.cnn.com/2008/POLITICS/06/06/poll.mccain.obama/index.html

Gallup Daily: Obama 46%, McCain 45% (Gallup 6/6/08)
Obama 46%
McCain 45%
http://www.gallup.com/poll/107737/Gallup-Daily-Obama-46-McCain-45.aspx

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

OTHER

Test your John McCain IQ (Chicago Tribune 6/8/08)
How well do you know the Republican candidate for president?
http://www.chicagotribune.com/news/politics/chi-mccain-quiz,0,4099240,post.triviaquiz

--
Sara DuBois
Deputy Director, Tracking/Media Monitoring
Progressive Media USA
sdubois@progressivemediausa.org
202-609-7681 (office)
410-967-7306 (cell)
--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Adam Jentleson" <Ajentleson@americanprogress.org>
To:	"big campaign" <bigcampaign@googlegroups.com>
Date:	5/27/2008 6:12:58 AM
Subject:	[big campaign] FW: PRESS CALL TODAY: NATIONAL SECURITY EXPERTS RESPOND TO SENATOR MCCAIN'S FOREIGN POLICY SPEECH

FYI

Center for American Progress Action Fund

For Immediate Release
May 27, 2008

Contact
Allison Price, 202.481.8190
aprice@americanprogressaction.org

PRESS CALL TODAY: NATIONAL SECURITY EXPERTS RESPOND TO SENATOR MCCAIN'S FOREIGN POLICY SPEECH

WASHINGTON, D.C. – TODAY, Tuesday May 27, at 2:00 PM EDT the Center for American Progress Action Fund will host a conference call with the Director of CAPAF's Sustainable Security Program, Reuben Brigety, nuclear non-proliferation expert Joseph Cirincione with the Ploughshares Fund and the President of the National Security Network Rand Beers.

WHAT: PRESS CALL – McCain Foreign Policy

WHEN: TODAY, Tuesday, May 27 2008 at 2:00PM EDT

WHERE: By telephone 866.682.6100, ID: McCain Foreign Policy

WHO: Reuben Brigety, Director, Sustainable Security Program at the Center for American Progress Action Fund

Joseph Cirincione, President, Ploughshares Fund

Rand Beers, President, National Security Netw ork

Please email Allison Price if you are planning on attending the call -aprice@americanprogressaction.org

About the Center for American Progress Action Fund

The Center for American Progress Action Fund transforms progressive ideas into policy through rapid response communications, legislative action, grassroots organizing and advocacy, and partnerships with other progressive leaders throughout the country and the world. The Action Fund is also the home of the Progress Report and ThinkProgress.

If you would rather not receive future email messages from Center for American Progress Action Fund, let us know by clicking here.
Center for American Progress Action Fund, 1333 H St. NW, Washington, DC 20005-4707 United States

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sara Latham" <slatham@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 3/13/2016 1:25:56 AM
Subject: Fwd: Ethnic Outreach Summary | March. 9 - 12

Begin forwarded message:

From: Jared Mueller <jmueller@hillaryclinton.com >
Date: March 13, 2016 at 12:35:51 AM EST
To: Amanda Renteria <arenteria@hillaryclinton.com >, Marlon Marshall <mmarshall@hillaryclinton.com >, Sara Latham <slatham@hillaryclinton.com >
Cc: Laura Rosenberger <lrosenberger@hillaryclinton.com >, Elizabeth Renda <erenda@hillaryclinton.com >, Milia Fisher <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com >, Sally Marx <smarx@hillaryclinton.com >, Brynne Craig <bcraig@hillaryclinton.com >, Kari Thurman <kthurman@hillaryclinton.com >
Subject: Ethnic Outreach Summary | March. 9 - 12

All,

Below is an end-of-week ethnic outreach update with the latest since Wednesday, for communities we have prioritized going into the 3/15 states. Please let me know if you have any questions -- and huge credit to Laura, Kari (among others) for their work on many of these communities:

###

Bosnian Americans

- Earned media: St. Louis endorsement event with Bosnian leaders covered on KMOV evening news (video)

- Bosnian Americans for Hillary call with Ambassador Chris Hill, Laura Rosenberger, and Bosnian American HFA-OH Field Organizer Maja Tosic locked for Monday, 3/14 (RSVP link here)
- Together with Digital, refining post from Maja T. on her family's escape from Bosnia and her work as a HFA organizer in NH, NV and OH
- Worked with Team HFA-MO on printed materials for endorsement of St. Louis Bosnian leaders, including those invited to meet with HRC in December
- Clay Pell coordinating with Bosnian activists on ongoing earned media opportunities in constituency outlets

  - Note: as appropriate, we have been amplifying our relevant Bosnian outreach efforts with Albanian American Democrats

Greek Americans

- Earned Media (under development): Greek News plans to write a column about Hillary's policy on Greece following call; Policy working to connect the reporter with Julie Smith or another Europe policy expert
- Greek Americans for Hillary call with Governor Dukakis, John Podesta, and Amb. Eleni Tsakopoulos Kounalakis attracted ~100 RSVPs and ~70 attendees
- Amb. Kounalakis working on a draft accomplishments one-pager for Policy Team's review

Irish Americans

- Earned media: HRC's Youngstown visit to an Irish pub with Congressman Ryan covered by press corps (video)
- Irish Americans for Hillary call with Jake Sullivan locked for Monday, 3/14 (RSVP link here)
- Jake Sullivan post for The Feed on HRC's Northern Irish record in works; digital working on finalizing, Sunday for Monday
- Irish Americans for Hillary phone bank in NE Ohio amplified online by local and national Irish Am Dems (tweets here and here)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Muslim Americans (multiple nationalities)

- Worked with Team HFA-Florida to support logistics/provide Muslims for Hillary talking points for a pre-FL conference call with Floridian Muslim leaders

Polish Americans

- Earned media: Journalist, cultivated through conference and individual follow up calls, covers WJC visit on front page of Chicago's Polish News (permanent link)
- Continuing to work with national Polish Dems leaders (led by Maureen Pikarski) on amplifying this week's outreach efforts and identifying leaders for March and April states

Ukrainian Americans

- Earned media: HRC's statement on Nadiya Savchenko earned Cyrillic and English language coverage in Ukrainian outlets, and amplification online (tweet)
- Worked with Ukrainian American activists in D.C., at Ukrainian religious organizations, and elsewhere to promote her statement
    - A DNC staffer later saw our BCC email blast to community leaders forwarded back to her on the "major Ukrainian listservs, including one that includes all the main Ukrainian press outlets."

On Wed, Mar 9, 2016 at 8:30 AM, Jared Mueller <jmueller@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

Wanted to send across a few update bullets on this outreach this morning:

- Last night we locked Ambassador Eleni Tsakopoulos Kounalakis to join tomorrow's Greek Americans for Hillary call, where she will introduce John (who will introduce Governor Dukakis). She is working to push the invite out to her networks and is happy to intro John

- Kari and I are working with Team Ohio to organize an Irish American phone bank in Greater Cleveland this week - which we'll amplify once it's held
- On the Polish outreach side, the DNC's ethnic outreach team and its Polish American vice chair were very happy about JDP's Pulaski Day tweets and were working to amplify it with Polish Dems nationwide
- Given the focus on St. Louis within March 15th media markets, we're reconnecting with Bosnian leaders in Missouri today to see about organizing a Bosnian Americans for Hillary phone bank and other earned media in the run-up to their primary
- We're also evaluating options for additional Irish Americans for Hillary outreach, building on the well-received Irish fact sheet, including a brief meeting with Irish-Am leaders and a blog post from Jake or another FP validator to personalize her work in Northern Ireland

Will share additional updates as programming and products are locked in over the course of the week. Thank you!

On Sun, Mar 6, 2016 at 9:02 PM, Jared Mueller <jmueller@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

Below is a summary of our ethnic outreach efforts over the past week. In particular it's been great to see the reception of the Irish fact sheet the campaign published yesterday, which we've pushed Irish American Democrats to promote — typical tweet here .

Priorities for next week include locking in a Greek-American call with Governor Dukakis, an Italian-American call with Congresswoman DeLauro, continuing our Irish outreach efforts in the run-up to St. Patrick's Day, and building our network of identified ethnic leaders in March and double-battleground states. Huge thanks to Laura for her (and her foreign policy team's) very generous support of this work!

######

Ethnic Outreach Summary: February 29th - March 6th

CONFERENCE CALLS COMPLETED

- Albanian Americans for Hillary call with Ambassador Chris Hill and Albanian- American leaders (including the publisher of America's largest Albanian periodical)
-

Polish Americans for Hillary call with Ambassador Chris Hill and Polish-American leaders, including elected officials, Polish-language media personalities, and Polish-American alumni of the Clinton Administration from

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Illinois and Michigan

- Syrian Americans for Hillary call with Laura Rosenberger and national Syrian American community leaders and donors

DIGITAL AND POLICY OUTREACH

- Casimir Pulaski Day tweet queued up for @johnpodesta for Monday, March 7th
- Irish Americans for Hillary collateral developed by Teams Digital and Policy
  - Digital generated an Irish Americans for Hillary share graphic
  - Policy has created a fact sheet for Irish Americans, which has been publicly released and picked up by IrishCentral and Irish activists on Twitter (link)

EARNED MEDIA

- Coverage for Polish Americans for Hillary call on Chicago Polish Radio
  - Andrew Mikolajczyk of Radio Chicago attended the call in order to report it on his radio program
- IrishCentral* covered the release of the campaign's Irish affairs fact sheet (link)
- Pre-Massachusetts Primary Surrogate Appearances from Clay Pell on
  - Grecian Echoes, the largest Greek American radio program on the East Coast (based in Newton, Massachusetts)
  - Portuguese-American radio stations in Massachusetts

INDIVIDUAL OUTREACH

- Meeting to discuss Michigan ethnic outreach (and other topics) with Rep. Sandy Levin
- Outreach calls by Clay Pell and Jared Mueller to
  - American Muslim leaders in D.C. and Virginia
  - Croatian American community leaders in New Hampshire and Pennsylvania
  - French-Canadian American leaders in Maine
  - Irish American leaders in D.C., Massachusetts, New York,
  - Italian American leaders in D.C. and Maryland
  - Polish American leaders in Connecticut, Illinois, Massachusetts, and Michigan
- Outreach calls and emails by Terry Lierman to Irish American and American Muslim supporters of Governor Martin O'Malley's presidential candidacy

PLANNING

- Laura connected with Ambassador McFaul on the Obama 2008 campaign's general election ethnic outreach strategy; we have the '08 strategy documents and will use those as a model for the 2016 general, building on the foundation of our primary outreach
- Jared working on conference calls for the week ahead: Charlie is reaching out to Dukakis for his availability for a Greek Americans call, and Erin and Maura are putting asks out to Tom DiNapoli and Rosa DeLauro for an Italian Americans call

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
To:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
Date:	6/26/2015 12:35:10 AM
Subject:	H4A News Clips 6.26.15
Attachments:	6.26.15 H4A News Clips.docx

H4A News Clips

June 26, 2015

LAST NIGHT'S EVENING NEWS

All three networks reported on the Supreme Court decision on the Affordable Care Act. Jeb Bush, Marco Rubio and Ted Cruz have all claimed that they would repeal ACA if elected to office. ABC and NBC reported that Univision has decided to take the Miss USA Pageant off the air after Donald Trump's derogatory comments about Mexican immigrants. Trump claims Univision apologized to him yesterday morning, but Univision has called his comments insulting to immigrants. Trump has threatened to sue them for dropping the pageant from their lineup.

LAST NIGHT'S EVENING NEWS..... 1

TODAY'S KEY STORIES..... 5

State Dept. Gets Libya Emails That Hillary Clinton Didn't Hand Over // NYT // Michael Schmidt – June 25, 2015 5

State Department says 15 e-mails missing from pages Hillary Clinton provided // WaPo // Karen DeYoung – June 25, 2015..... 7

SOCIAL MEDIA..... 8

Deidre Walsh (6/25/15, 10:29 am) - Rules Committee Chairman Pete Sessions says he plans to introduce a bill to repeal & replace Obamacare next week -- the first of MANY coming..... 8

Generation Forward (6/25/15, 3:33 pm) - #TBT when @BernieSanders caved under pressure from the NRA and didn't support the Brady Bill http://www.sevendaysvt.com/vermont/whos-afraid-of-the-nra-vermonts-congressmen-thats-who/Content?oid=2435066 8

David Chalina (6/25/15, 5:01 pm) - CNN/WMUR/New Hampshire GOP primary poll #'s: Bush 16%, Trump 11%, Paul 9%, Walker 8%, Fiorina 6%, Rubio 6%, Carson 5%, Christie 5%..... 9

Dan Merica (6/25/15, 4:10 pm) - Clinton campaign, via @Ann_OLeary, fundraising off how Bush, Huckabee and Rubio responded to the SCOTUS decision..... 9

Phil Elliott (6/25/15, 2:19 pm) - Pro-Rubio super PAC up with first 60-second ad. Topic: a nuke deal with Iran. Includes cameo for PM Netanyahu: https://youtu.be/mqqZfDpFofg..... 9

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 9

Hillary Clinton's 'All Lives Matter' Remark Stirs Backlash // NYT // Alan Rappeport – June 25, 2015..... 9

New Hampshire Poll Shows Bernie Sanders in Dead Heat With Hillary Clinton // NYT // Katharine Seelye – June 25, 2015..... 10

If Hillary wins, would she have to give up this former first lady perk? // WaPo // Al Kamen – June 25, 2015 11

State Department Says Hillary Clinton's Email Disclosure Was Incomplete // WSJ // Byron Tau – June 25, 2015 12

Clinton Didn't Turn Over All Work E-Mail to State Department // Bloomberg // Billy House – June 25, 2015 13

State Department says it can't locate 15 Hillary Clinton emails // Fox News – June 26, 2015..... 14

State Dept.: 15 emails missing from Clinton cache // AP // Bradley Klapper & Matthew Lee – June 25, 2015 16

State Dept.: Hillary Clinton didn't turn over all Libya emails // Politico // Rachel Bade – June 25, 2015.. 18

Why the Clinton-Bush rivalry is really a food fight // Politico // Kate Bennett – June 25, 2015..... 19

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Billionaire GOP donor deletes ‘lesbian’ joke about Hillary Clinton // Politico // Annie Karni – June 25, 2015 21

State Department calls Clinton's email records incomplete // Reuters // Lesley Wroughton – June 25, 2015 22

Report: Clinton Libya emails surface // USA Today // Michael Winter – June 25, 2015..... 23

The Gender Subplot // National Journal // Charlie Cook – June 26, 2015..... 24

State Department: ‘Limited’ Number of Hillary Clinton Emails Are Missing // National Journal // Ben Geman – June 25, 2015..... 25

Hillary Clinton to Anti-Obamacare Republicans: 'Move On' // National Journal // Eric Garcia – June 25, 2015 27

Hillary Clinton won’t have to fight Obama’s battles on health care // MSNBC // Alex Seitz-Wald – June 25, 2015 28

Hillary Clinton’s big diss to Bill de Blasio // Page Six // Ian Mohr – June 25, 2015..... 29

Sid Blumenthal’s Israel Michegas // The Daily Beast // James Kirchick – June 26, 2015..... 30

Google says Hillary Clinton will be the next president // CNET // Chris Matyszczyk – June 25, 2015..... 32

Fifteen Libya Emails Missing From Clinton Cache // Sky News US Team – June 26, 2015..... 33

Clinton Lawyer, Soros Back Anti-Voter ID Lawsuits // Washington Free Beacon // Joe Schoffstall - June 26, 2015 35

Karma Chameleon in Chief // Washington Free Beacon // Matthew Continetti - June 26, 2015..... 36

Moroccan Government Lobbyists Ready for Hillary // Free Beacon // Lachlan Markay – June 25, 2015 39

How Hillary Clinton’s Campaign Signifies A New Era For Women’s Rights // Elite Daily // Aisha Moktadier – June 25, 2015..... 40

American schools are 'more segregated than they were in the 1960s,' says Hillary Clinton // Politifact // Linda Qiu – June 25, 2015..... 42

Benghazi panel says Hillary Clinton didn’t turn over all Libya emails, despite her claims // The Washington Times // Stephen Dinan - June 25, 2015..... 48

Bill Maher: Hillary plays ‘hide-and seek’ while Putin allows tough marathon interviews // The Washington Times // Douglas Earnst – June 25, 2015..... 50

State Dept: Clinton did not turn over some emails // CNN // Elise Labott – June 25, 2015..... 50

FNC’s ‘Special Report’: Schweizer’s Clinton Cash Scandals Cause Hillary to Drop in Polls // Breitbart News – June 25, 2015..... 52

Bernie Sanders closes on Hillary Clinton in New Hampshire Democrats poll // The Guardian // Ben Jacobs – June 25, 2015..... 53

Hillary wraps up New York fundraising swing with private shopping trip to ultra-expensive Bergdorf Goodman one day after boasting about her plans to help 'poor people, people of color, and the elderly' // The Daily Mail – June 25, 2015..... 53

Hillary Clinton's lead over N.H. Democrats dwindling, poll finds // CNN // Jennifer Agiesta – June 25, 2015 55

In Hillary Clinton’s journey, a history of Jewish kinship // J Weekly // Ron Kampeas – June 25, 2015..... 57

Hillary Clinton is not honest and trustworthy, voters say, but is still the Dem frontrunner // Washington Times // David Sherfinski – June 25, 2015..... 59

Hillary Clinton's Newest Consultant Was A Major Keystone Lobbyist // HuffPo // Sam Stein – June 25, 2015 60

Hillary Clinton Has Hired a Former Keystone Pipeline Lobbyist // The New Republic // Rebecca Leber – June 21, 2015..... 61

Hillary celebrates ruling: 'Yes!' // The Hill // David McCabe – June 25, 2015..... 63

Election 2016: 'Chelsea's Mom' Is Hillary Clinton's Fan Love Song // International Business Times // Ginger Gibson – June 25, 2015..... 63

Hillary Clinton Wears Epic '90s Outfit in TBT Pic Congratulating Supreme Court's Obamacare Decision // E! // Brett Malec – June 25, 2015..... 64

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 65

DECLARED..... 65

O’MALLEY..... 65

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Here's what climate hawk Martin O'Malley would do as president // Grist // Ben Adler – June 25, 2015 65

SANDERS 68

A pro-O'Malley super PAC goes after Sanders on guns // WaPo // John Wagner – June 25, 2015 68

Claire McCaskill, a major Clinton ally, unloads on Bernie Sanders // Politico // Daniel Strauss – June 25, 2015 69

Bernie Sanders Calls For 65% Top Estate Tax Rate // Forbes // Ashley Ebeling – June 25, 2015 70

For first time, O'Malley-linked group goes after Sanders // CNN // Dan Merica – June 25, 2015 71

Pro-Martin O'Malley Super PAC Targets Bernie Sanders // TIME // Sam Frizell – June 25, 2015 73

MARTIN O'MALLEY AD HITS NOT HILLARY CLINTON — BUT BERNIE SANDERS? // First Look // Lee Fang – June 25, 2015 74

Bernie Sanders Gains on Hillary Clinton in Bloomberg Early-State Polling // Bloomberg News // John McCormick – June 25, 2015 75

Bernie Sanders Responds to Claire McCaskill Attack: This Is a First // Bloomberg News // Arit John – June 25, 2015 78

Sanders: My Views Resonating With Women as Campaign Keeps Rising // Bloomberg News // Alexa Papadopoulos – June 25, 2015 80

This new anti–Bernie Sanders video shows Martin O'Malley is getting desperate // VOX // Andrew Prokap – June 25, 2015 80

Bernie Sanders joins push for DC statehood // The Hill // Tim Devaney – June 25, 2015 81

UNDECLARED 82

WEBB 82

Jim Webb Criticized for Comments on Confederate Flag // NYT // Alan Rappeport – June 25, 2015 82

Bernie Sanders Attacked For Not Being Liberal Enough // The Weekly Standard // Michael Warren – June 25, 2015 83

OTHER 83

Terry McAuliffe's other job // Politico // Gabriel Debenedetti – June 26, 2015 83

Democratic civil war ends, for now, as House approves final trade measures // WaPo // Paul Kane – June 25, 2015 86

Democratic Field Champions Health Care as Human Right // Real Clear Politics // Andrew Desiderio – June 25, 2015 89

GOP 90

DECLARED 91

BUSH 91

Jeb swipes at Obama over Iran deal // Politico // Adam Lerner – June 25, 2015 91

Jeb Bush cast as 'villain' in GOP fight for recognition // CNN // Ashley Killough – June 25, 2015 91

Florida Voter Purge Fiasco May Complicate Jeb Bush's Appeal To Minorities // HuffPo // Scott Conroy – June 25, 2015 93

Jeb Bush, Donald Trump running first and second among 2016 GOP field: poll // The Washington Times // David Sherfinski – June 25, 2015 99

Jeb Bush did not appoint a guardian for a rape victim's fetus, but he fought for one // Politifact // Joshua Gillin – June 25, 2015 100

Is the poverty rate worse now than it was in the 1970's? // Politifact // Joshua Gillin – June 25, 2015 102

Jeb Bush did say women should 'find a husband' to get off welfare -- in 1994 // Politifact // Joshua Gillin – June 25, 2015 103

Political group makes five points about Jeb Bush's record // Politifact // Josh Gillin – June 25, 2015 104

Jeb Bush Shakes Money Tree in Manhattan Two More Times // The Observer // Ken Kurson – June 25, 2015 107

For-Profit Charter Operator In Jeb Bush Video Has A Checkered Past // Buzzfeed // Molly Hensley-Clancy – June 25,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

2015..... 109

Pro-Jeb Bush Super PAC runs first online ad in New Hampshire, Iowa // Miami Herald // Patricia Mazzei – June 25, 2015..... 111

Jeb Bush Leads New Hampshire GOP Poll; Donald Trump in 2nd Place // Latinos Post - June 26, 2015. 111

RUBIO..... 112

In N.H., Marco Rubio Is Pressed on Trade and Immigration // NYT // Jeremy Peters – June 25, 2015. 112

Marco Rubio is playing to win The Sheldon Adelson Primary // WaPo // James Hohmann & Elise Viebeck – June 25, 2015..... 113

Rubio plans early-state ad blitz // Politico // Alex Isenstadt – June 25, 2015..... 115

A Canadian idea Rubio likes // Politico // Danny Vinik – June 25, 2015..... 115

Marco Rubio discusses health care, veterans in NH visit // WMUR 9 // Jennifer Crompton – June 25, 2015 117

First on CNN: Rubio slams Obamacare ruling // CNN // Dana Bash – June 25, 2015..... 118

Marco Rubio defends courting Koch Brothers in New Hampshire // CNN // Theodore Schleifer – June 25, 2015 119

Marco Rubio Campaign Buys 'Several Million' Dollars' Worth Of Airtime For Ads in Early Primary States // ABC News // Jonathan Karl – June 25, 2015..... 120

Marco Rubio, Jeb Bush vow to continue fighting Obamacare after Supreme Court ruling // Palm Beach Post // George Bennett – June 25, 2015..... 120

Marco Rubio gives Obama an ‘F’ on VA issues // The Washington Times // David Sherfinski – June 25, 2015 121

Rubio Gives Veterans Cool Grenade Stress Balls at New Hampshire Town Hall // Slate // Jeremy Stahl – June 25, 2015..... 122

Rubio: My luxury yacht 'is cleverly disguised as a fishing boat' // The Hill // Ben Kamisar – June 25, 2015 122

PAUL..... 123

Rand Paul slams Obamacare ruling, Warren says too late // The Boston Herald // Joe Dwinell, Zuri Berry, & Chris Cassidy – June 25, 2015..... 123

Rand Paul Said to Take on the IRS, Again // Bloomberg News // Richard Rubin – June 25, 2015..... 124

VAT Chance: Rand Paul, Ben Cardin Push to Change Tax Code // Bloomberg News // Richard Rubin – June 25, 2015..... 126

Rand Paul and AAPS Want to Bring You Liberty.... From Safe Healthcare // HuffPo // Dr. Jason Johnson – June 25, 2015..... 128

Rand Paul's Courtship With Evangelicals: Will It Be Enough to Win the GOP Primary // The Christian Post // Shane Vander Hart – June 25, 2015..... 129

Rand Paul: The Supreme Court ‘Missed An Opportunity Here’ // The Daily Caller // Al Weaver – June 25, 2015 133

CRUZ..... 134

Ted Cruz Speaks to the Right, Shuns Party Leaders // WSJ // Janet Hook – June 25, 2015..... 134

Ted Cruz Calls Supreme Court Justices 'Robed Houdinis' Over Obamacare Decision // The National Journal // Marina Koren – June 25, 2015..... 135

Ted Cruz on Obamacare Subsidies Decision: "Supreme Court's Judicial Activism Violating Their Oaths Of Office" // Real Clear Politics // Ian Schwartz – June 25, 2015..... 137

Ted Cruz, angered by Obamacare ruling, tells ‘rogue justices’ to resign and run for Congress // The Washington Times // Seth McLaughlin – June 25, 2015..... 137

Ted Cruz is bashing John Roberts after years of praising him // Business Insider // Colin Campbell – June 25, 2015 138

GRAHAM..... 139

Graham Blasts Hillary’s ‘Sleazy’ Associates, State Department Management // Free Beacon // Alana Goodman – June 25, 2015..... 139

Lindsey Graham Criticizes Hillary Clinton on Equal Pay // Free Beacon // Joe Schoffstall – June 25, 2015 140

How Lindsey Graham Would Defeat the Islamic State // Free Beacon // Daniel Wiser – June 25, 2015 141

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SANTORUM..... 143

Santorum returns focus to culture wars in Iowa speech // The Des Moines Register // William Petroski - June 25, 2015..... 143

Rick Santorum: “European Socialist” Obama Believes In Revolutionary Model That Led To Reign Of Terror // Buzzfeed // Christopher Massie – June 25, 2015..... 145

HUCKABEE..... 146

Huckabee calls court’s health-care ruling an ‘act of judicial tyranny’ // WaPo // Philip Rucker – June 25, 2015 146

Mike Huckabee: 'Donor Class' Pushed Senate Republicans To Approve Obama's Fast-Track Trade Authority // HuffPo // Samantha-Jo Roth – June 25, 2015..... 147

Mike Huckabee: The Supreme Court just issued 'an out-of-control act of judicial tyranny' // Business Insider // Colin Campbell – June 25, 2015..... 147

Mike Huckabee: Get government out of veterans’ health care business // The Washington Times // David Sherfinski – June 25, 2015..... 148

CARSON..... 149

Ben Carson: The Supreme Court Overstepped on Obamacare // TIME // Dr. Ben Carson – June 25, 2015 149

Carson says GOP must offer ‘really appealing’ ObamaCare alternative; Congressman King reacts to ruling // Radio Iowa // O. Kay Henderson – June 25, 2015..... 150

Ben Carson In 2014: Communists Have “Infiltrated Our Society” // Buzzfeed // Christopher Massie – June 25, 2015..... 151

TRUMP..... 152

Univision Severs Ties With Donald Trump and Beauty Pageants // NYT // Alan Rappeport – June 25, 2015 152

Are Donald Trump’s poll numbers too good to be true? // Politico // Daniel Strauss – June 25, 2015.... 153

Donald Trump Leads All But Bush in New Hampshire // TIME // Phillip Elliott – June 25, 2015..... 155

Donald Trump says 'hypocrite' Neil Young asked him for money // FOX News – June 25, 2015..... 156

UNDECLARED..... 157

WALKER..... 157

Scott Walker to announce 2016 intentions next month // CBS News // Stephanie Condon – June 25, 2015 157

Corruption Charges Against Walker Are Baseless, Supporters Say // The Daily Beast // Peter Fricke – June 25, 2015..... 158

Scott Walker says Barack Obama told Coast Guard global warming is top threat to military and world // Politifact // Tom Kertscher – June 25, 2015..... 159

Scott Walker’s Jobs Program Didn’t Work // The Daily Beast // Betsy Woodruff – June 25, 2015..... 161

CHRISTIE..... 165

Chris Christie to Announce Decision on 2016 Campaign // NYT // Nick Corasaniti – June 25, 2015..... 165

Chris Christie to announce 2016 bid as early as next week // Politico // Alex Isenstadt – June 25, 2015 165

JINDAL..... 167

Bobby Jindal’s identity causes a Twitter storm in India // WaPo // Rama Lakshmi – June 25, 2015..... 167

Indians on social media mock Bobby Jindal candidacy // LA Times // Shashank Bengali – June 25, 2015 167

Bobby Jindal’s fateful choice // WaPo // Jennifer Rubin – June 25, 2015..... 169

Jindal’s Facebook showing matches his lagging poll numbers // McClatchy // David Lightman – June 25, 2015 170

Bobby Jindal presidential bid sparks Twitter mockery // BBC – June 25, 2015..... 172

KASICH..... 173

John Kasich Appeals to Iowa as He Ponders White House Bid // NYT // Trip Gabriel – June 25, 2015.. 173

OTHER..... 175

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GOP insiders expect no harm from Confederate flag controversy // Politico // Kyle Cheney – June 26, 2015 179

Republicans Cite Health Care Ruling in Pushing Candidacies // NYT // Alan Rappeport – June 25, 2015 182

GOP lawmakers: Time to move on from Obamacare repeal // Politico // Manu Raju & Burgess Everett – June 25, 2015 183

The Supreme Court Just Did Republicans a Big Favor // The New Yorker // John Cassidy – June 25, 2015 186

Republicans to fight Obamacare through election campaign despite ruling // Reuters // Susan Cornwell – June 25, 2015 188

After Charleston shootings, poll highlights race dilemma for Republicans // Reuters // John Whitesides – June 25, 2015 190

GOP presidential hopefuls in Colorado for conservative summit - and a marijuana policy grade // The Washington Times // Jennifer Harper – June 25, 2015 191

GOP lawmaker: Blumenthal Benghazi deposition should be released // The Hill // Martin Matishak – June 25, 2015 192

THE LID: Glass Half Full for GOP After Obamacare Decision // NBC News // Carrie Dann & Andrew Rafferty – June 25, 2015 193

Supreme Court Lets GOP Candidates Off the Hook on Obamacare // The Daily Beast // Betsy Woodruff – June 25, 2015 193

GOP chairman: Only way to fix healthcare is to elect Republicans // The Hill // Ben Kamisar – June 25, 2015 195

GOP Field Renews "Repeal Obamacare" Battle Cry // Real Clear Politics // Caitlin Huey-Burns – June 25, 2015 196

Republican Presidential Candidates Blast Supreme Court Ruling // The Daily Caller // Alex Pappas – June 25, 2015 198

Conservatives Unleash Fury at One-Time Hero John Roberts // Bloomberg News // Sahil Kapur – June 25, 2015 199

Republicans Go On Obamacare Offensive: 'A Reckless Law' // The Weekly Standard // Daniel Halper – June 25, 2015 201

OTHER 2016 NEWS..... 202

Obamacare ruling: Six takeaways for 2016 // Politico // Glenn Thrush & Kyle Cheney – June 25, 2015. 202

GOP, Democrats seek campaign cash from Obamacare ruling // USA Today // Fredreka Schouten – June 25, 2015 205

Campaign swag and “Made in America” in the 2016 election // CBS News // Jenna Sakwa – June 25, 2015 206

TOP NEWS..... 207

DOMESTIC..... 207

Obamacare Ruling May Have Just Killed State-Based Exchanges // NYT // Margot Sanger-Katz – June 25, 2015 207

Supreme Court’s Obamacare ruling benefits way more people in red counties than blue // WaPo // Philip Bump – June 25, 2015 209

Supreme Court Rules That Disparate Impact Claims Are Allowed Under Fair Housing Act // Buzzfeed // Chris Geidner – June 25, 2015 210

INTERNATIONAL..... 211

Putin Breaks Silence With Call to Obama // NYT // Peter Baker – June 25, 2015..... 211

ISIS Attacks Two Towns in Northern Syria // NYT // Ben Hubbard – June 25, 2015..... 212

Palestinians press International Criminal Court to charge Israel // WaPo // William Booth – June 25, 2015 214

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS..... 216

A Bush vs. a Clinton? // WSJ // Daniel Henninger – June 25, 2015..... 216

Hillary Clinton has to attack Bernie Sanders // WaPo // Jennifer Rubin – June 25, 2015..... 218

It's Official -- Bernie Sanders Has Overtaken Hillary Clinton In the Hearts and Minds of Democrats // HuffPo // H.A. Goodman – June 25, 2015 220

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

State Dept. Gets Libya Emails That Hillary Clinton Didn't Hand Over // NYT // Michael Schmidt – June 25, 2015

The State Department said on Thursday that 15 emails sent or received by Hillary Rodham Clinton were missing from records that she has turned over, raising new questions about whether she deleted work-related emails from the private account she used exclusively while in office.

The disclosure appeared to open the door for Republicans on Capitol Hill to get more deeply involved in the issue. Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, who is running for president, said he planned to send a series of questions to the State Department about the missing emails and about why it allowed her to use the personal account.

Republicans said that the State Department's statement was likely to increase pressure on the House speaker, John A. Boehner of Ohio, to subpoena the server in Mrs. Clinton's home that housed the account.

Hillary Rodham Clinton in New Hampshire on Monday. Sidney Blumenthal, a close confidant of Mrs. Clinton, turned over emails about Libya to a House committee.Sidney Blumenthal, Hillary Clinton's Confidant, Turns Over Memos on LibyaJUNE 15, 2015

Mrs. Clinton has said that she gave the State Department about 50,000 pages of emails that she deemed to be related to her work as secretary of state and deleted roughly the same number. She said the messages she deleted were personal, relating to topics like yoga, family vacations and her mother's funeral.

Her longtime confidant and adviser Sidney Blumenthal, responding two weeks ago to a subpoena from the House committee investigating the 2012 attacks in Benghazi, Libya, gave it dozens of emails he had exchanged with Mrs. Clinton when she was in office. Mr. Blumenthal did not work at the State Department at the time, but he routinely provided her with intelligence memos about Libya, some with dubious information, which Mrs. Clinton circulated to her deputies.

State Department officials then crosschecked the emails from Mr. Blumenthal with the ones Mrs. Clinton had handed over and discovered that she had not provided nine of them and portions of six others.

Nick Merrill, a spokesman for Mrs. Clinton, who is running for president, said that she had given the State Department "over 55,000 pages of materials," including "all emails in her possession from Mr. Blumenthal."

The chairman of the House committee, Trey Gowdy, Republican of South Carolina, said that many of the emails that Mrs. Clinton had not handed over showed that "she was soliciting and regularly corresponding with Sidney Blumenthal, who was passing unvetted intelligence information about Libya from a source with a financial interest in the country."

"It just so happens these emails directly contradict her public statement that the messages from Blumenthal were unsolicited," he said. Mr. Blumenthal identified the source of his information as Tyler Drumheller, a former high-ranking C.I.A. official, according to a person with knowledge of his testimony to the Benghazi panel. Mr. Drumheller was part of a group that sought to do business in Libya.

Supporters of Mrs. Clinton have argued that the committee's mission has crept far beyond its original scope: to investigate the Benghazi attacks, which killed four Americans, including Ambassador J. Christopher Stevens. Republican committee members have said that they are within their right to look into her email use because the resolution that created the panel directed them to examine how the administration complied with previous inquiries into the attacks. Mrs. Clinton's emails relating to the attacks were not handed over to any of the panels conducting those inquiries.

Other panels in Congress may consider investigating the matter. Mr. Graham, who oversees a Senate subcommittee with sway over the State Department's budget, said that the department "seems to have a system that is not working very well" in regards to its production of documents to Congress.

"I'm going to ask them whether they think Mrs. Clinton has handed over everything she should and what they are going to do about it," he said. "And if they give me runaround responses, we'll drag them up on Capitol Hill and make them answer these questions in public."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While the State Department acknowledged that it did not have several of Mrs. Clinton's emails, it also told the Benghazi committee that it had not turned over other messages of hers. The department said that it had not done so because the contents of those messages fell outside the requests made by the committee.

"The State Department is working diligently to review and publish the 55,000 pages of emails we received from former Secretary Clinton," it said in a statement.

That statement is unlikely to satisfy the committee, which believes it has been clear in its requests. Members of the panel have contended that the State Department has withheld documents to protect Mrs. Clinton and grind the investigation to a halt. State Department officials have said that one of the reasons it has taken so long to produce documents is that the department's record-keeping system is cumbersome. They have also said that the committee has not been specific enough in its requests.

State Department says 15 e-mails missing from pages Hillary Clinton provided // WaPo // Karen DeYoung – June 25, 2015

The State Department said Thursday that it could not locate "all or part" of 15 e-mails provided last week to the House Select Committee on Benghazi by Sidney Blumenthal from his exchanges with then-Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton.

The committee chairman, Rep. Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.), who has raised repeated questions about whether Clinton covered up her activities related to the September 2012 attacks on the U.S. mission in Benghazi, Libya, called the State Department disclosure "significant and troubling."

It was the first indication that some 55,000 pages of e-mails from a private server Clinton used while in office were not a complete record of her work-related correspondence, and the latest turn in what has become a contentious political battle pitting committee Republicans against Clinton and committee Democrats, who have charged Gowdy with trying to undermine her presidential campaign.

When the existence of the private server was revealed, Clinton said she had discarded "personal" e-mails and gave the rest to the State Department. The department then culled about 300 e-mails related to Benghazi in response to a committee subpoena. Many were from Blumenthal, a former Clinton White House aide and a close friend, who forwarded what he said were inside intelligence reports from sources with access to the Libyan government between 2011 and 2013. The documents, which were publicly released last month, shed no new light on the Benghazi attack.

The committee then subpoenaed Blumenthal, who appeared for a closed-door deposition last week. He also supplied the committee with additional Libya-related e-mails that Gowdy said at the time might not have been among those culled by the State Department.

In response to a committee query, Gowdy said in a statement Thursday, "the State Department has informed the Select Committee that Secretary Clinton has failed to turn over all her Benghazi and Libya related records. This confirms doubts about the completeness of Clinton's self-selected public record.

"This has implications far beyond Libya, Benghazi and our committee's work," he said, and "conclusively shows her email arrangement with herself, which was then vetted by her own lawyers, has resulted in an incomplete public record."

An official at State, speaking on the condition of anonymity under ground rules imposed by the department, said there were "a limited number of instances — 15 — in which we could not locate all or part of the content of a document from [Blumenthal's] production within the tens of thousands of e-mails she gave us. … The substance of those 15 e-mails is not relevant to the 2012 attacks in Benghazi."

At the same time, the official said, some of the documents Clinton had already turned over "do not appear" in Blumenthal's "production to the committee."

SOCIAL MEDIA

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Deidre Walsh (6/25/15, 10:29 am) - Rules Committee Chairman Pete Sessions says he plans to introduce a bill to repeal & replace Obamacare next week -- the first of MANY coming Generation Forward (6/25/15, 3:33 pm) - #TBT when @BernieSanders caved under pressure from the NRA and didn't support the Brady Bill http://www.sevendaysvt.com/vermont/whos-afraid-of-the-nra-vermonts-congressmen-thats-who/Content?oid=2435066 …

David Chalina (6/25/15, 5:01 pm) - CNN/WMUR/New Hampshire GOP primary poll #'s: Bush 16% , Trump 11%, Paul 9% , Walker 8%, Fiorina 6%, Rubio 6%, Carson 5%, Christie 5%

Dan Merica (6/25/15, 4:10 pm) - Clinton campaign, via @Ann_OLeary, fundraising off how Bush, Huckabee and Rubio responded to the SCOTUS decision.

Phil Elliott (6/25/15, 2:19 pm) - Pro-Rubio super PAC up with first 60-second ad. Topic: a nuke deal with Iran. Includes cameo for PM Netanyahu: https://youtu.be/mqqZfDpFofg

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE

Hillary Clinton's 'All Lives Matter' Remark Stirs Backlash // NYT // Alan Rappeport – June 25, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton is facing backlash for saying that "all lives matter" in an African-American church in Missouri on Tuesday, offending some who feel that she is missing the point of the "black lives matter" mantra.

Mrs. Clinton's remarks at Christ the King United Church of Christ in Florissant, Mo. — only a few miles north of Ferguson, where a black teenager was shot by a white police officer last August — came during a broader discussion of civil rights in America.

She was talking about how a disproportionate number of young people of color are out of school and out of work and, explaining that everyone needs a "chance and a champion," she recalled how her mother was abandoned as a teenager and went on to work as a maid.

"What kept you going?" Mrs. Clinton remembered asking her mother. "Her answer was very simple. Kindness along the way from someone who believed she mattered. All lives matter."

The remark caused a stir on social media, with some African-Americans on Twitter suggesting that Mrs. Clinton had lost their votes.

The Rev. Renita Lamkin, who was in the audience at the event, told NPR that Mrs. Clinton's comment did not go unnoticed.

"That blew a lot of support that she may have been able to engender here," she said.

The phrase "black lives matter" has become a rallying cry in the last year for demonstrators amid a spate of episodes around the country, including the 18-year-old Michael Brown's death in the St. Louis suburb of Ferguson, where white police officers have been accused of using excessive force against black suspects.

Judith Butler, a professor at University of California, Berkeley, summed up the frustration with the use of "all lives matter" in The Times in January.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"When some people rejoin with 'All Lives Matter' they misunderstand the problem, but not because their message is untrue," she wrote. "It is true that all lives matter, but it is equally true that not all lives are understood to matter which is precisely why it is most important to name the lives that have not mattered, and are struggling to matter in the way they deserve."

Mrs. Clinton has not been opposed to using the phrase in the past, declaring that "yes, black lives matter" at a gala in New York last year.

The controversy comes as Mrs. Clinton has sought to address racial issues in a more direct manner than she was able to in 2007, when she was running against someone who would go on to become the first black president.

Donna Brazile, a Democratic strategist who is black, defended Mrs. Clinton and said that her remarks on Tuesday should be taken in the context that she was discussing her mother.

New Hampshire Poll Shows Bernie Sanders in Dead Heat With Hillary Clinton // NYT // Katharine Seelye – June 25, 2015

The next time Hillary Rodham Clinton visits New Hampshire, she need not look over her shoulder to find Bernie Sanders; the Vermont Senator is running right alongside her in a statistical dead heat for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination, according to a CNN/WMUR poll released on Thursday.

The poll shows Mrs. Clinton drawing 43 percent of likely Democratic primary voters compared to 35 percent for Mr. Sanders, but with a margin of sampling error of plus or minus five percentage points, the race is a statistical tie.

While Mrs. Clinton has been enormously popular in New Hampshire, her favorable ratings have dropped almost 20 points since February, while Mr. Sanders's have been climbing. And his negatives are lower than hers. So their net favorability ratings (favorable minus unfavorable) are now equal, at 55 percent.

In her favor, however, is that most voters appear to view Mrs. Clinton as by far the stronger leader, and as having the personal characteristics that are most presidential. She also trounces Mr. Sanders on her perceived ability to handle important issues, with more voters saying she is best able to handle the economy, terrorism, trade and health care.

Working against her is the hefty 28 percent who view her as the "least honest."

Working to Mr. Sanders's advantage: Most voters believe he "best represents Democrats like yourself" and "cares the most about people like you." The one issue that voters said he was better able to handle than Mrs. Clinton was dealing with "big banks and corporations."

The poll, conducted by the University of New Hampshire, interviewed 1,010 voters from June 18 to 24. The margin of sampling error for the entire poll was plus or minus three percentage points, but for the 360 likely Democratic primary voters who were interviewed, it was plus or minus five percentage points.

A Suffolk University poll last week also found Mr. Sanders making headway against Mrs. Clinton, trailing her by 10 percentage points, just outside that poll's margin of sampling error of plus or minus four percentage points.

If Hillary wins, would she have to give up this former first lady perk? // WaPo // Al Kamen – June 25, 2015

There will doubtless be all manner of novel situations to deal with if Hillary Clinton becomes the first woman to occupy the Oval Office.

One question will be whether The Kennedy Center will have its first male honorary chair on the center's board of trustees. The six current honorary chairs are, by tradition, the current and former first ladies: Michelle Obama, Laura Bush, Hillary Rodham Clinton, Barbara Bush, Nancy Reagan and

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rosalynn Carter.

So would Bill Clinton, as First Gent, become a member of the board?

Center spokesman Michael Solomon, in response to our inquiry, e-mailed: “We have had a long tradition at the Kennedy Center of inviting each First Spouse to be an Honorary Chair of the Kennedy Center and we are honored by their participation. We do not expect to alter that tradition at any time in the future.”

But then would this mean another first? A husband and wife team on the board at the same time?

Eventually, but not immediately, one former Obama White House lawyer told us. It would seem Hillary Clinton would probably have to give up her chair at the center while she was president. It could be a conflict of interest and the general principle is that the Commander-in-Chief doesn’t take on side government tasks.

On the other hand, if Jeb! wins, then first lady Columba Bush would be asked to be an honorary chair, which would mean that, for the first time, three people from the same family would be honorary chairs.

It’s only an honorary thing with no real responsibility. But you’re guaranteed good seats.

State Department Says Hillary Clinton’s Email Disclosure Was Incomplete // WSJ // Byron Tau – June 25, 2015

The State Department said Thursday that former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton didn’t turn over at least 15 emails that appear to be work-related from her personal server, contradicting her claims that all relevant emails were in the hands of the federal government.

The emails in question were uncovered as part of a subpoena from a congressional committee to Sidney Blumenthal, a longtime Clinton confidant and former White House aide in Bill Clinton’s administration.

At least 15 emails given by Mr. Blumenthal to the committee—which is investigating the 2012 Benghazi, Libya, attack—don’t match any in the archive of more than 30,000 emails turned over by Mrs. Clinton to the State Department late last year, the department said.

Four Americans, including Ambassador Chris Stevens, were killed in the assault on a U.S. diplomatic facility in Libya.

A State Department official said there were “a limited number of instances”—15—“in which we could not locate all or part of the content of a document from his production within the tens of thousands of emails she gave us.”

“Those instances are described in a letter the department sent today to the Committee,” the official said.

The missing emails contradict Mrs. Clinton’s claims that all work-related emails from her personal server are in the hands of the government, as required by federal record-keeping laws.

Mrs. Clinton chose to use her personal email account for government business during her four years as secretary of state, an arrangement that was legal, though discouraged, during her tenure.

Emails Show Clinton Was Warned Over Security in Benghazi Ahead of Attack (May 22)

At a March news conference, Mrs. Clinton said her team had conducted a thorough search of her email server, turning over all work-related correspondence after the department requested it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I responded right away and provided all my emails that could possibly be work-related," she said, adding that she deleted remaining personal emails from the server.

On Thursday, a spokesman for Mrs. Clinton said: "She has turned over 55,000 pages of materials to the State Department, including all emails in her possession from Mr. Blumenthal."

Referring to the emails Mr. Blumenthal provided to the committee, the spokesman said: "We do not recognize many of those materials and cannot speak to their origin."

The State Department has made public more than 800 emails related to the 2012 Benghazi attack and plans to make others public in the coming months, as ordered by a federal judge.

Republicans on the Select Committee on Benghazi, which has been probing both the 2012 attacks, as well as Mrs. Clinton's email arrangement, said the missing emails raised questions about the thoroughness of her disclosures. Democrats have painted the committee's work as tainted by partisanship, contending the panel has strayed far from its investigation into the attack.

"This has implications far beyond Libya, Benghazi and our committee's work. This conclusively shows her email arrangement with herself, which was then vetted by her own lawyers, has resulted in an incomplete public record," said Rep. Trey Gowdy, chairman of the GOP-led panel.

"This Benghazi select committee has become the committee to investigate Hillary Clinton. Period," Rep. Elijah Cummings, the top Democrat on the panel, said last week.

Clinton Didn't Turn Over All Work E-Mail to State Department // Bloomberg // Billy House – June 25, 2015

Hillary Clinton didn't turn over to the U.S. State Department all the work-related e-mail from her personal account relating to Libya and Benghazi, as she had previously said she had.

Nine e-mails and parts of six others couldn't be found among documents Clinton provided in response to a request from the State Department, the agency said in a letter to the Select House Committee investigating the 2012 terror attacks in Benghazi.

U.S. Representative Trey Gowdy of South Carolina, chairman of the panel, said Clinton's selection of e-mails to provide to the State Department resulted in an incomplete public record. Clinton, now the leading Democratic presidential candidate, exclusively used a private e-mail account while serving as secretary of state.

"The revelation ... is significant and troubling."

U.S. Representative Trey Gowdy

"The revelation these messages were not originally produced to the State Department by Clinton is significant and troubling," he said.

Clinton's use of a private e-mail address and home server has become a focus of the House committee's probe of the Obama administration's handling of attacks on a U.S. diplomatic compound in Benghazi and a nearby Central Intelligence Agency outpost that killed four Americans. It's also become a distraction for Clinton as she campaigns for president.

Document Production

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Nick Merrill, a spokesman for Clinton's campaign, said "she has turned over 55,000 pages of materials to the State Department."

In December, Clinton turned over about 30,000 e-mails to the department. About 850 pages that the State Department deemed Benghazi-related were turned over to the House committee in February.

The New York Times reported earlier that the State Department said Clinton hadn't handed over several Libya-related e-mails.

The 15 missing or incomplete e-mails aren't related to the 2012 attacks in Benghazi, according to a statement from the State Department. The latest date on any of them is two weeks before the attacks, according to the statement.

All of the e-mails are exchanges between Clinton and Sidney Blumenthal, a long-time Clinton confidant, and are work-related, according to the State Department. The existence of the e-mails came to light after Blumenthal, who was subpoenaed to appear before the House panel investigating Benghazi, turned over copies of communications with Clinton to the committee.

Libya Memos

Lawmakers complained about e-mails that they said either weren't provided by Clinton to the State Department or by the department to the panel in response to its request.

Merrill said Clinton turned over "all e-mails in her possession from Mr. Blumenthal."

Blumenthal, though not employed at the State Department at the time, providing Clinton with memos about Libya.

Topics among the nine e-mails produced by Blumenthal that were missing entirely from those turned over by Clinton included the death of Muammar Qaddafi's son, the suspicious death in Austria of a former Libyan prime minister and defector from Qaddafi's regime, and dissatisfaction among Libyan rebels in 2011 with the amount of tactical and air support they were receiving against Qaddafi forces.

State Department says it can't locate 15 Hillary Clinton emails // Fox News – June 26, 2015

The State Department said Thursday that it cannot locate 15 work-related emails from Hillary Clinton's private server released this week by the select committee probing the 2012 Benghazi attacks, a revelation that the head of the committee described as "significant and troubling."

The emails consist of more in a series of intelligence reports passed to her by longtime political confidant Sidney Blumenthal, officials told The Associated Press.

At the least, the existence of the emails turned over by Blumenthal but not by Clinton directly contradicts Clinton's news conference in March in which she claimed that all work emails from her personal server were turned over to the State Department.

The revelation will also raise further questions about the presidential hopeful's use of a personal email account and server when she served as secretary of state, as well as the decision to wipe the server.

Rep. Trey Gowdy, R-S.C., chairman of the Select Committee on Benghazi, called the revelations "significant and troubling."

"This confirms doubts about the completeness of Clinton's self-selected public record and raises serious questions about her decision to erase her personal server—especially before it could be analyzed by an independent, neutral third party arbiter," Gowdy said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When asked for comment by Fox News, a Clinton official said "not only did she turn over all emails that she had from Blumenthal, she actually turned over more than a dozen emails that were not included in what he handed over to the House committee. We do not have a record of other correspondence between her and Mr. Blumenthal beyond that which was turned over to the State Department."

"In terms of the documents provided by Mr. Blumenthal to the House committee, we do not recognize many of those materials and cannot speak to their origin," the official said.

Clinton's use of the non-governmental email while in office was not publicly disclosed until earlier this year, after the committee sought her correspondence related to the Benghazi attack. She says the single account for personal and professional purposes was a matter of convenience, and says all her work emails were included in the 55,000 pages of documents she later handed over to the State Department. Clinton claims that emails of a personal nature were destroyed.

The State Department informed the Select Benghazi Committee on Thursday that they are no longer certain that's the case, officials told The Associated Press.

The emails missing from the State Department's records include missives from Blumenthal in which he sends media accounts about the killing of one of Libyan dictator Muammar Qaddafi's sons, various reports on internal politics among Libya's rebels and news of the assassination of a former Qaddafi minister in Vienna.

Gowdy told Fox News' Megyn Kelly last week that Blumenthal was merely forwarding information from someone who may have had business interests in Libya.

Gowdy said that Blumenthal has never been to Libya, is not an expert on the country and therefore "has no idea" as to the validity of the information he was sending to Clinton.

"Not only was [Blumenthal] providing unvetted, uncorroborated, unsubstantiated intelligence to our top diplomat, he was just simply forwarding on intelligence that somebody by the name of Tyler Drumheller was sending him," Gowdy said.

Clinton's responses to Blumenthal's emails are brief. In one from March 2012, she passes on an adviser's skepticism regarding one of Blumenthal's reports about political intrigue in post-Qaddafi Libya, saying: "This strains credulity based on what I know. Any other info about it?"

And after a long August 2012 note from Blumenthal about Libya's new interim President Mohamed Yousef el-Magariaf, Clinton writes: "Another keeper -- thanks and please keep `em coming." Four days later, she responds to a follow-up reports about el-Magariaf, saying: "Fascinating. I had a very good call w him."

Gowdy said Thursday that the emails show Clinton "was soliciting and regularly corresponding with Sidney Blumenthal -- who was passing unvetted intelligence information about Libya from a source with a financial interest in the country. It just so happens these emails directly contradict her public statement that the messages from Blumenthal were unsolicited."

State Dept.: 15 emails missing from Clinton cache // AP // Bradley Klapper & Matthew Lee – June 25, 2015

The State Department cannot find in its records all or part of 15 work-related emails from Hillary Rodham Clinton's private server that were released this week by a House panel investigating the 2012 attack in Benghazi, Libya, officials said Thursday.

The emails all predate the Sept. 11 assault on the U.S. diplomatic facility and include scant words written by Clinton herself, the officials said. They consist of more in a series of would-be intelligence reports passed to her by longtime political confidant Sidney Blumenthal, the officials said.

Nevertheless, the fact that the State Department says it can't find them among emails she provided surely will raise new questions about Clinton's use of a personal email account and server while secretary of state and whether she has provided the agency all of her work-related correspondence, as she claims.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rep. Trey Gowdy, chairman of the Select Committee on Benghazi, released a statement Thursday saying, "This confirms doubts about the completeness of Clinton's self-selected public record and raises serious questions about her decision to erase her personal server — especially before it could be analyzed by an independent, neutral third-party arbiter."

When asked about the discrepancy, Nick Merrill, a Clinton campaign spokesman, said, "She has turned over 55,000 pages of materials to the State Department, including all emails in her possession from Mr. Blumenthal."

Clinton is running for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination.

Clinton's use of the non-governmental email while in office was not publicly disclosed until earlier this year, after the committee sought her correspondence related to the Benghazi attack. She says the single account for personal and professional purposes was a matter of convenience, and says all her work emails were included in the 55,000 pages of documents she later handed over to the State Department. Emails of a personal nature were destroyed, she says.

The State Department informed the Select Benghazi Committee on Thursday that they are no longer certain that's the case, according to officials who spoke on condition of anonymity because they weren't authorized to speak publicly on the matter. The officials said Julia Frifield, the assistant secretary of state for legislative affairs, confirmed that nine emails and parts of six others that the committee made public Monday couldn't be located in the department's records.

As for 46 other, previously unreleased Libya-related Blumenthal emails published by the committee, officials said all are in the department's records. They weren't handed over to congressional investigators because they had no relevance to events in Benghazi and did not correspond to the committee's request, the officials said. The officials added that they are willing to provide emails outside the committee's initial request, but warned that doing so would require more time.

The emails missing from the State Department's records include missives from Blumenthal in which he sends media accounts about the killing of one of Libyan dictator Moammar Gadhafi's sons, various reports on internal politics among Libya's rebels and news of the assassination of a former Gadhafi minister in Vienna. The last email was sent Aug. 28, 2012, two weeks before the Benghazi attack, and none focus particularly on the eastern Libyan city.

Clinton's responses are brief. In one from August 2011, she tells Blumenthal she will be in Paris the next day to meet rebel leaders and says she had "to resort to new iPad" because she didn't have electricity or Blackberry coverage after Hurricane Irene.

In another from March 2012, she passes on an adviser's skepticism regarding one of Blumenthal's reports about political intrigue in post-Gadhafi Libya, saying: "This strain credulity based on what I know. Any other info about it?"

And after a long August 2012 note from Blumenthal about Libya's new interim President Mohamed Yousef el-Magariaf, Clinton writes: "Another keeper — thanks and please keep 'em coming." Four days later, she responds to a follow-up reports about el-Magariaf, saying: "Fascinating. I had a very good call w him."

Clinton's critics are likely to focus less on the substance of the emails than on the fact that they weren't shared with the State Department.

Gowdy, a South Carolina Republican, has pressed for an explanation of why Blumenthal gave the committee emails not previously shared by the State Department. The suggestion has been that either the department or Clinton was hiding something.

Gowdy said Thursday that the emails show Clinton "was soliciting and regularly corresponding with Sidney Blumenthal — who was passing unvetted intelligence information about Libya from a source with a financial interest in the country. It just so happens these emails directly contradict her public statement that the messages from Blumenthal were unsolicited."

Clinton aides say her submission to the department included all emails from Blumenthal and a dozen more exchanges that weren't in the records he provided the House committee. They said some from Blumenthal's record, which was provided as a Microsoft Word document, couldn't be confirmed as having been sent as emails.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

State Department officials also questioned the provenance of some exchanges because they weren't formatted as emails.

State Dept.: Hillary Clinton didn't turn over all Libya emails // Politico // Rachel Bade – June 25, 2015

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton withheld from the State Department several emails related to Libya, the State Department confirmed Thursday night — calling into question her insistence that she has handed over her complete public record.

The 2016 Democratic front-runner did not hand over 15 exchanges with longtime Clinton ally Sidney Blumenthal on the security situation in the Middle Eastern nation. The existence of the new correspondence only came to light days ago after Republicans subpoenaed the former Clinton White House adviser's records and he turned them over.

Clinton has said she cooperated with the House Benghazi Committee investigation by handing over all work-related communications, which she stored on her own personal server against official record-keeping rules.

"This confirms doubts about the completeness of Clinton's self-selected public record and raises serious questions about her decision to erase her personal server — especially before it could be analyzed by an independent, neutral third-party arbiter," Benghazi panel Chairman Trey Gowdy said in a statement.

The South Carolina Republican said the implications go "far beyond Libya, Benghazi and our committee's work."

"This conclusively shows her email arrangement with herself, which was then vetted by her own lawyers, has resulted in an incomplete public record," he continued.

Clinton has come under fire for circumventing government rules instead of using an official State Department email address, with critics accusing her of hiding behind a shroud of secrecy. Clinton, for her part, turned over more than 30,000 work emails to state as part of its document production to the Benghazi committee. The rest, she said, were personal in nature — about Chelsea's wedding or yoga, she said.

Then, her team wiped her server clean, they say.

Barred from working at the State Department by the Obama administration, Blumenthal was being paid $10,000 a month by the philanthropic Clinton Foundation at the time. He was also advising friends working on a new business venture in Libya — and one of those business partners is said to have been the author of the intelligence memos Blumenthal passed along to Clinton.

Blumenthal told the committee the emails were unsolicited, but Republicans say a number of the emails Clinton did not turn over suggests they were, including responses where she encouraged her old friend to continue writing.

"These new messages in many instances were Clinton's responses, which clearly show she was soliciting and regularly corresponding with Sidney Blumenthal — who was passing unvetted intelligence information about Libya from a source with a financial interest in the country," the panel statement continues. "It just so happens these emails directly contradict her public statement that the messages from Blumenthal were unsolicited."

Democrats on the panel, however, have challenged that assertion and questioned Gowdy's definition of "unsolicited," arguing that simply a response to an email does not constitute solicitation.

State, meanwhile, says it is working quickly to produce all the emails it does have.

"We have confirmed that the emails Secretary Clinton provided the Department include almost all of the material in Mr. Blumenthal's production," a state official said in a statement. "The State Department is working diligently to review and publish the 55,000 pages of emails we received from former

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Secretary Clinton, according to FOIA standards so they are available to the general public and the media. All of the materials that she provided will be reviewed as part of this effort."

Why the Clinton-Bush rivalry is really a food fight // Politico // Kate Bennett – June 25, 2015

For Capricia Marshall, the accidental death of former White House chef Walter Scheib—whose body was found in New Mexico earlier this week—brought back memories of a master cook whose culinary passion was also, in an odd way, intensely political.

In fact, the mostly untold back story to Scheib's amazing career at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue is one of a Clinton-Bush family rivalry that played out in the kitchen as much on the campaign trail.

"I'll never forget when Walter arrived for his interview, to cook for Hillary for the first time," recalls Marshall, who as White House social secretary worked in tandem with Scheib to create countless menus, events and "special occasion" meals. "He had a vision, and it was amazingly in the same vein as hers. They went on and on about the great products in this country, the farms, the fisheries—they just gelled."

Marshall says it was Mrs. Clinton who wanted the new chef to usher in her plan of how the first couple would entertain; Hillary wished to showcase the best of what America had to offer, the robust and diverse products from each state. "Walter and I worked very, very closely to achieve that goal," says Marshall, who, at 32, was the youngest White House social secretary on record when she took on the post in 1997.

But things went very differently after George W. Bush was elected. The new president was partial to Velveeta sandwiches and more, er, traditional food, particularly the sort of parochial tastes one might find at a Texas roadstop. "I found myself thinking with profound nostalgia of Mrs. Clinton and her passion for inclusion, her interest in learning about and trying new foods, and her desire to show off her nation's best to visitors foreign and domestic," Scheib later wrote in his 2007 memoir, White House Chef.

Scheib was summarily replaced in late 2004 by Laura Bush. (After his death this week, Laura Bush released a statement saying, "Walter was an astounding talent.")

According to Marshall, the Maryland-raised Scheib was constantly trying to come up with creative ideas during the Clinton years, even pushing Hillary Clinton into new concepts of culinary outreach. "One of my favorite Walter stories was when we had a big event coming up, the 50th anniversary of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization; it would be the quintessential American event, the eyes of the world would be on us, and we really had to think hard about what to serve," Marshall said in a phone interview. For the event, Scheib suggested bison—not exactly a household meat, but one that was certainly American. "Hillary was like, 'What!? Bison?' It just sounded so unusual, for a minute I thought, uh-oh, this is a gamble he might not want to take." But Scheib convinced the first lady with a tasting. "It was phenomenal, of course. We went with it."

Schieb also gave cooking lessons to a high-school age, Chelsea Clinton. "Chelsea was interested in different types of food, and different types of cooking. He completely understood that this house wasn't only a venue for official events, press conferences and briefings, but it was also a home." Marshall remained close with Scheib after she departed the White House.

Marshall called upon the chef when she launched the Diplomatic Culinary Initiative and the American Chef Corps during her tenure as chief of protocol at the State Department from 2009 to 2013. As she says, "A huge part of that came from my discussions with Walter."

Marshall was shocked to learn he died while hiking. "I loved it when he would bring us into the kitchen and say, "Try this! Try this!" It's really such a sad thing to one day have a friend just not be here anymore."

And for the Clintons, it meant the loss not only of a friend, but a political ally who managed to be simpatico with a stove. The family said in a statement: "Walter used his immense talents not only to represent the very best of American cuisine to visiting leaders, but to make a difference in people's lives across the country."

Billionaire GOP donor deletes 'lesbian' joke about Hillary Clinton // Politico // Annie Karni – June 25, 2015

Hedge-fund billionaire Daniel Loeb — one of the biggest and most feared investors on Wall Street and a vocal backer of same-sex marriage — posted a joke speculating about Hillary Clinton's sexuality on his personal Facebook page.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Dear Abby,” he posted May 9. “My husband is a liar and a cheat. He has cheated on me from the beginning, and when I confront him, he denies everything. What’s worse, everyone knows that he cheats on me. It is so humiliating. Also, since he lost his job 14 years ago, he hasn’t even look for a new one. All he does all day is smoke cigars, cruise around and shoot the bull with his buddies, while I have to work to pay the bills. Since our daughter went away to college he doesn’t even pretend to like me, and even hints that I may be a lesbian. What should I do? Signed Clueless.”

“Dear Clueless,” the post continues, “Grow up and dump him. Good grief woman! You don’t need him anymore! You’re running for President of the United States. Act like one.”

The anti-Clinton diatribe wasn’t Loeb’s own joke or words — it appeared to be a right-wing meme that has been circulating online since Clinton’s first run. The same faux “Dear Abby” column was also posted on the Facebook page of actor Kevin Sorbo, best known for his role as Hercules in the TV series “Hercules: The Legendary Journeys.”

The resurfacing of the old attack on the Clintons this cycle — on the page of a prominent billionaire — indicates how ugly attacks could get if Hillary Clinton gets into the uncharted territory of a general election.

Loeb, who bundled money for Barack Obama in 2008 before turning on him and backing former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney in 2012, has shown interest in a few of the GOP candidates this cycle.

Before Chris Christie became embroiled in the Bridgegate scandal, Loeb had publicly touted the New Jersey governor’s leadership style and urged him to run for president. But he’s been silent on Christie since, and has yet to commit publicly to any 2016 candidate.

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, meanwhile, has been courting Loeb for his recently launched campaign. And last year, Bush headlined a benefit gala chaired by Loeb to raise money for Success Academy Charter Schools.

Loeb promptly deleted the Dear Abby post after POLITICO contacted his office about it.

“This widely circulated, old meme ended up on my Facebook page inadvertently and as soon as I was informed of it, I took it down,” Loeb said in a statement. “ As a longstanding public supporter of gay and women’s rights, it does not represent my views.”

The Clinton campaign declined to comment for this report.

State Department calls Clinton's email records incomplete // Reuters // Lesley Wroughton – June 25, 2015

Hillary Clinton did not hand over at least 15 emails from her time as secretary of state, the U.S. State Department said on Thursday, undercutting her claim that the 30,000 work emails she provided from her personal server were a complete record.

The department learned the email record was apparently incomplete after Sidney Blumenthal, an old friend and informal adviser to Clinton, provided several previously undisclosed emails to U.S. lawmakers investigating the deadly 2012 attack on diplomatic staff in Benghazi, Libya.

The 15 emails were either missing from the records Clinton provided or included only in partial form. The department said they were not relevant to the attacks on Benghazi although copies posted online showed that they discussed the turmoil in Libya more generally.

Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill said in an email on Thursday that the Democratic presidential candidate had given the department "all emails in her possession from Mr. Blumenthal."

He said he could not explain the origins of the additional correspondence Blumenthal provided in response to the lawmakers' subpoena.

Clinton, the favorite to become her party's nominee for the 2016 presidential election, has weathered criticism that she side-stepped record-keeping and transparency rules by using only a private email account for her work. The private address was connected to a server in her home.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The arrangement was made public in March, more than two years after she stepped down as the top U.S. diplomat. Clinton said she used the private email account for the sake of convenience and broke no rules.

Recent polls show more than half of all voters say she is not trustworthy, in part because of her email habits, although this has not put a deep dent in her popularity among Democrats.

Trey Gowdy, the Republican congressman in charge of the select committee investigating the Benghazi attack, said Clinton's incomplete email record "raises serious questions".

"This has implications far beyond Libya, Benghazi and our committee's work," Gowdy said in a statement. "This conclusively shows her email arrangement with herself, which was then vetted by her own lawyers, has resulted in an incomplete public record."

In March, Clinton said in an impromptu news conference at the United Nations headquarters that she gave the State Department all emails she sent and received that "could possibly be work-related".

She said the 30,490 emails she handed over in December after the State Department asked for her records included all that referred to Libya or Benghazi, as well as all work-related correspondence from what her office described as "long-time friends".

She said that once those copies were made, all her emails, including another 30,000 or so that were deemed personal, were deleted from the server.

Clinton spokesman Merrill declined to respond when asked whether some emails might have been deleted at an earlier date, before the State Department made its request.

Report: Clinton Libya emails surface // USA Today // Michael Winter – June 25, 2015

The State Department has received 15 Libya-related emails that Hillary Clinton did not hand over from the personal computer server she used while secretary of state, officials told The Associated Press on Thursday.

The emails were between Clinton and her longtime adviser Sidney Blumenthal. He surrendered them after being subpoenaed by the House committee investigating the Sept. 11, 2012, attacks by Islamists on two U.S. diplomatic compounds in Benghazi. Ambassador Christopher Stevens was among four Americans who died.

The panel released the emails this week.

All of the emails pre-date the attacks. Citing unnamed officials, AP describes them as "more in a series of would-be intelligence reports" sent by Blumenthal, with "scant words written by Clinton herself."

Clinton has said she turned over about 30,000 work-related emails from her time in office. An equal number she deleted were "private" or "personal" and pertained to her daughter Chelsea's wedding, her mother's funeral, family vacations and yoga.

Clinton said she used one account for work and personal business out of convenience.

"She has turned over 55,000 pages of materials to the State Department, including all emails in her possession from Mr. Blumenthal," said Nick Merrill, a spokesman for Clinton's presidential campaign.

The Gender Subplot // National Journal // Charlie Cook – June 26, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

One of the biggest questions in next year's presidential election will be what role gender will play in the voting and outcome, particularly if former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton wins the nomination. Over the past six presidential elections, Democrats have swept the female vote, by 8 points in 1992, by 16 points in 1996, by 11 points in 2000, by just 3 points in 2004, by 13 points in 2008, and by 11 points in 2012. Meanwhile, Republicans have carried the male vote four times: in 1996 (by 1 point), in 2000 and 2004 (both by 11 points), and in 2012 (by 7 points). Democrats came out ahead among men in 1992 (by 3 points) and 2008 (by 1 point). So while Republicans do have a problem with women voters, Democrats have one with men.

In looking at the women's vote, however, race is a major factor that cannot be ignored. Among white women, Democrats broke even in 1992 and won by 5 points in 1996—but Republicans have swept this group in the past four elections, by just 1 point in 2000, but by 11 points in 2004, 7 points in 2008, and 14 points in 2012. Democrats obviously hope that Clinton will be able to reverse this trend, but even if she can, by how much?

Given that Clinton is unlikely to be able to match President Obama's turnout and support levels among minority and young voters, how can she make up for that? If there is a sphere in which she could conceivably outperform Obama, it is likely to be among women—arguably those who do not also fall into either the "minority" or "young" categories, as Obama did especially well with both minority and young women.

In the new NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll conducted June 14 through 18, which surveyed 1,000 adults, the gender gap in attitudes toward Clinton is striking. When asked whether they had a "positive," "neutral," or "negative" view of Clinton, women gave her a net positive score of +18 points (52 percent positive, 34 percent negative), while men gave her a net negative score of -13 points (48 percent negative, 35 percent positive)—a 31-point spread. Among white women, Clinton had a net positive score of 1 point (44 percent positive, 43 percent negative), while among white men, she was at -22 points (53 percent negative, 31 percent positive), a 23-point gender gap.

The NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll, conducted by Democratic pollster Fred Yang and Republican pollster Bill McInturff, did find an interesting distinction between white women who are college-educated and those who are not. Clinton had a 13-point net positive rating among white women who have attended college (51 percent positive, 38 percent negative) but an 8-point net negative rating among white women who haven't (47 percent negative, 39 percent positive). Apparently consistent with this finding, Clinton also had a net positive rating of 15 points among suburban women (51 percent positive, 36 percent negative), although this cross-tab included suburban women of all races, ages, and levels of educational attainment. (Once you slice the data too finely, the margin of error goes through the roof unless you are combining multiple surveys.)

In Clinton's recent campaign-kickoff speech, she made a clear play for the women's vote, attempting to maximize her strength there while not exacerbating her considerable problem with men—a delicate balance. Should she win the nomination, it is unlikely that she will double down on her strength with (most) women by choosing a female running mate. It will be interesting to see, however, whether the eventual Republican presidential nominee—assuming that it is not former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina, the only woman running on the GOP side—opts to fill out the top of the ticket with someone like Sen. Kelly Ayotte of New Hampshire or New Mexico Gov. Susana Martinez, a Hispanic woman who isn't in Congress and isn't of Washington.

Republicans are obviously acutely aware of their problem with women voters. Witness Sen. Cory Gardner's effort to blunt the Democrats' narrative about a Republican "war on women" by pushing to make more contraception methods available over the counter. The strategy worked exceedingly well for him, getting him out of the corner he was in for having once supported Colorado's controversial "personhood" amendment. Less certain is how aware Democrats are of their problem with men voters, specifically white men.

There are plenty of subplots in the unfolding presidential election, but the gender fight is among the most interesting of them—and one that will be critical to the outcome.

State Department: 'Limited' Number of Hillary Clinton Emails Are Missing // National Journal // Ben Geman – June 25, 2015

All or parts of 15 emails that Hillary Clinton confidante Sidney Blumenthal gave to a House committee cannot be located among the thousands of pages of emails that Clinton turned over to the State Department, the agency said Thursday night.

The State Department downplayed the discrepancy, but it's likely to intensify GOP questions and criticism about Clinton's claim that she provided State with all the work-related emails kept on her private server late last year.

"We have confirmed that the emails Secretary Clinton provided the Department include almost all of the material in Mr. Blumenthal's production. There are, however, a limited number of instances—15—in which we could not locate all or part of the content of a document from his production within the tens of thousands of emails she gave us," a department official said on condition of anonymity.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The official said, "The substance of those 15 emails is not relevant to the 2012 attacks in Benghazi."

Rep. Trey Gowdy, the GOP chairman of the committee, pounced on the revelation, stating that Clinton's unusual use of a private email account and server "has resulted in an incomplete public record."

"This confirms doubts about the completeness of Clinton's self-selected public record and raises serious questions about her decision to erase her personal server—especially before it could be analyzed by an independent, neutral third party arbiter," Gowdy said in a statement Thursday.

Nick Merrill, a spokesman for Clinton's presidential campaign, defended the completeness of her disclosure. "She has turned over 55,000 pages of materials to the State Department, including all emails in her possession from Mr. Blumenthal," Merrill said

Blumenthal, a longtime Clinton family ally who has consulted for pro-Hillary Clinton advocacy groups, sent her a suite of memos on Libyan intelligence issues in 2011 and 2012, when Clinton was secretary of State.

Blumenthal told the panel that the memos, which Clinton circulated to top aides, were written by a former high-level CIA officer.

The memos showed Blumenthal keeping Clinton abreast of his work to parry GOP attacks. In one case, an Oct. 1, 2012 email from Blumenthal to Clinton, with the subject line "H: Romney's last gambit. Got done and published. Sid.," passed along a piece in Salon about then-presidential candidate Mitt Romney's plans to go after President Obama over the Benghazi attack.

Another message passed along links to several Media Matters blog posts and noted, "Got all this done. Complete refutation on Libya smear. Philippe can circulate this links"—likely a reference to Clinton aide Philippe Reines.

According to State, the nine emails with Clinton that Blumenthal provided but State could not locate include a March 21, 2011 message with press clips about the death of one of Muammar el-Qaddafi's sons, a late August 2011 memo titled "Inside NTC latest," which is a reference to the National Transitional Council that countered the Libyan leader, and others.

“Excellent!"Rick, Executive Director for PolicySign up form for the newsletter

Portions of six others are missing, State said.While Blumenthal provided documents that State cannot locate, the department official also noted that there are "instances where the Department has produced portions of Secretary Clinton's correspondence with Mr. Blumenthal that did not appear in his production to the Committee."

In addition to the revelation about the Blumenthal emails State could not locate, Gowdy said State "also turned over a new set of Clinton emails that were responsive to previous committee requests regarding Libya and Benghazi, but for some reason were not previously given to the committee under subpoena."

Hillary Clinton to Anti-Obamacare Republicans: 'Move On' // National Journal // Eric Garcia – June 25, 2015

Hillary Clinton, while saying the Affordable Care Act isn't "perfect," is embracing the law at the outset of her presidential campaign, following Thursday's Supreme Court decision upholding a key piece of Obamacare.

The Supreme Court rejected the plaintiff's arguments in King v. Burwell, upholding subsidies in every state, regardless of whether its exchange was federally or state-run.

"I applaud the Supreme Court's decision to affirm what the authors of the Affordable Care Act clearly intended and wrote into law: that health insurance should be affordable and available in every state across the country," Clinton said in a statement.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton also argued that it's time for Republicans, who have voted to repeal or dismantle the law more than 50 times, to "move on."

"Now that the Supreme Court has once again re-affirmed the ACA as the law of the land, it's time for the Republican attacks to end," Clinton said.

While acknowledging unspecified imperfections in the law, Clinton highlighted several of its more popular components, like health insurance companies no longer being able to discriminate against people for preexisting conditions.

Clinton also pointed to her own push for health care reform, which included an ill-fated attempt during her husband's administration, adding "I'm not going to stop now." Despite the Affordable Care Act still drawing divided public support, Clinton shows no signs of walking away.

Whether she wanted it or not, though, Clinton is going to be put on the defense regarding Obamacare during her presidential campaign. That was on clear display Thursday, with Republican presidential contender Jeb Bush choosing not to go after the Supreme Court (Chief Justice John Roberts, who wrote the majority opinion, was appointed by his brother), but to focus on Clinton and President Obama.

"This is the direct result of President Obama," Bush said in an email to supporters. "He deliberately forced ObamaCare on the American people in a partisan and toxic way."

Bush said Clinton would be "more of the same" when it came to health care, adding that there needed to be a conservative president who would "repeal and replace Obamacare with a conservative solution."

He also used the occasion to fundraise, saying the only way to prevent four more years of the same policies was "to make the most generous contribution you can afford right now to stop her."

Hillary Clinton won't have to fight Obama's battles on health care // MSNBC // Alex Seitz-Wald – June 25, 2015

If Hillary Clinton takes the oath of office on January 20, 2017, she'll inherit a health care reform law that will be already seven years old and likely deeply entrenched, thanks in part to Thursday's Supreme Court ruling upholding the subsidy system for state-based exchanges.

Health care has been one of the defining issues of Clinton's long career in public life, capped by an ambitious but ultimately doomed effort to create a universal health care system under her husband's administration in 1993. By securing the future of the Affordable Care Act, the court's ruling could allow Clinton to complete one of the biggest unfinished goals of her career by building on the law that bears her one-time rival's name.

"This morning, the Supreme Court sided with common sense and America's families, and confirmed again that the Affordable Care Act is the law of land – and it's here to stay," Clinton said in an email to supporters. "The next president will either protect and expand health care for every American, or undo the progress we've made."

Clinton has already telegraphed that she'd work hard to overhaul the mental health and addiction treatment systems, vowing to make the heroin and pharmaceutical epidemic "a big part" of her campaign. And she'll likely be forced to confront a host of other health care issues, like rising health care costs.

Politically, the ruling preserves the status quo. While Republicans will keep talking about repealing Obamacare as long as it motivates their base, most probably know it's now practically infeasible. And the GOP remains deeply divided on how to replace the law, making it unlikely the party will unite behind an alternative.

Clinton will likely not feel much pressure to endorse major changes to the law. While only eight percent of Americans think the Affordable Care Act is working well, according to a new NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll, most say the want the law preserved and improved rather than nixed. Among Democrats, whom Clinton will need to win over in the primary election and turnout in the general election, more than three-quarters think the law is working.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obamacare didn't sink Obama in 2012 and will likely be even less of an issue in 2016, when repealing it would mean actively taking away healthcare from millions of Americans.

In his remarks in the Rose Garden Thursday, Obama said it was time to switch from defense to offense on health care. After five years of relentless attacks, three elections, a mismanaged roll out, and two legal challenges that went all the way to the Supreme Court, the existence of the law is finally secure.

"The Affordable Care Act is here to stay," he said. "There will be parts of the law that will still need to be improved. And if we can stop refighting old political battles that keep us gridlocked, then we could actually make the law work even better for everybody."

White House Press Secretary Josh Earnest said that in its waning days, the Obama administration will focus on implementing the law to maximize its impact. That will include pushing more governors to expand Medicaid and create their own exchanges.

But improvements on top of the existing statute will likely have to wait until the next presidency.

When asked Obama, Clinton has often spoken of her potential presidency as finishing some of the big projects Obama started, noting that his administration had to prioritize saving the country from the Great Recession.

"I think the president has done an extraordinary job in dealing with a terrible set of issues he inherited," Clinton said in a response to question from msnbc on the economy in New Hampshire last week. "There's a lot more work still be done, but boy am I glad where we are now than where we were."

During the 2008 Democratic presidential primary, it was Clinton who pushed the other candidates to come up with comprehensive health reform plans. And hers included the controversial mandate for individuals to hold health care, which Barack Obama slammed then before ultimately making it a cornerstone of his own health law.

Now, she might finally have the chance to not only defend a national health law that strives for universal health access, but to expand it.

And thanks to the Supreme Court, she won't have to fight Obama's battles on Obamacare.

Hillary Clinton's big diss to Bill de Blasio // Page Six // Ian Mohr – June 25, 2015

Lady Gaga and Tony Bennett brought down the house at a Hillary Clinton fundraiser at the Plaza Hotel on Wednesday night. But Democratic insiders were also buzzing over who wasn't in the high-powered house — Bill de Blasio.

Spies told Page Six Bennett and Gaga played a "tour de force" one-hour set of solo numbers and duets at the $1,000 and $2,700-a-ticket affair.

"They worked really hard. It was stunning," said a source. After singing, "Gaga talked about why she's voting for Hillary and then said she'd 'leave the honors to Tony' to introduce Clinton," who sat with Gaga's mom and Bennett's wife.

Clinton gave an "informal speech." But witnesses said the biggest moment of the night was a symbolic kiss-off by Clinton to de Blasio when Public Advocate Letitia James — who's first in line of succession to the mayor — was given the "most coveted speaking spot of the evening," introducing the singers.

One source said, "It was profoundly significant to all the top donors and political activists. Everyone in the room got it — it was an elevation of [James] over de Blasio, at his expense." The mayor has famously refused to endorse Hillary, although he managed her 2000 Senate campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"It was telling," said the source. "It was a major opportunity for James to present herself and a real breakthrough moment. It was a statement that city Democrats couldn't care less what de Blasio's saying. They're not looking to de Blasio to tell them what to do."

Guests included Tribeca Film's Jane Rosenthal, Richard and Lisa Perry , Mort and Linda Janklow, Robert Zimmerman, Alan and Susan Patricof, and Charles Myers.

Another insider said: "There's a tremendous amount of resentment in Hillary's camp that de Blasio hasn't endorsed her." Some even theorized that de Blasio's secretly hoping to run for president himself if Hillary's campaign implodes.

But another insider laughed off the idea as "fantasy baseball on acid. He does want to be a national figure. But how does he mobilize the country if he can't mobilize city Democrats?"

Sid Blumenthal's Israel Michegas // The Daily Beast // James Kirchick – June 26, 2015

The notorious Clinton operative pushes pro-Israel Libyan in his emails to Hillary, but sells his son's anti-Israel book in public.

It's a shame that Hillary Clinton wasn't able to convince the Obama White House to let Sidney Blumenthal serve under her at the State Department. Blumenthal, the liberal journalist-turned-Clinton family consigliere, earned himself quite the reputation during the bruising 2008 Democratic primary, when his main job seemed to be sending out mass emails chock full of links to lurid stories about Barack Obama culled from the very "vast right-wing conspiracy" that he had combatted his entire adult life.

According to Politico, for his efforts, Blumenthal earned the moniker "Sulfur-Breathing Spawn of Hell" from Obama campaign staffers. That Clinton ever thought she had a chance of putting Blumenthal on the State Department payroll says something about her chutzpah.

If only those embittered Obama staffers had let bygones be bygones and harnessed the acumen of the inveterate emailer, they might have been able to strike a major blow for Middle East peace.

Buried in the pages of once-confidential missives that Blumenthal sent to Clinton during her tenure at the State Department, since subpoenaed by a congressional committee investigating the 2011 attack on the U.S. consulate in Benghazi, was a claim that the then-interim President of Libya, Mohammed Yussef el-Magariaf, wanted to "seek a discreet relationship with Israel." According to a "sensitive source," Blumenthal wrote, "political realities in Libya at present will dictate that this relationship be handled in a low key manner, but the new President of Libya shares many common friends and associates with the leaders of Israel and intends to take advantage of this situation to improve the lot of the Libyan people."

It's entirely possible that this information was overly optimistic, if not entirely false. Forwarding the email onto an aide, Clinton expressed skepticism, prefacing her remark that the news was "encouraging" with "if true." When Seymour Hersh, himself a man known for an overactive imagination, questions the validity of your information (as he did Blumenthal's claims, made in another email to Clinton, that Hersh was preparing to interview an ousted Muammar Qadaffi hiding in Chad), it's a discouraging sign.

But what's most revealing about Blumenthal's giddy hopes for a potential Libyan-Israeli rapprochement is how much it differs from other sentiments he had expressed about the Jewish state. For it wasn't so long ago that Sidney Blumenthal was hawking the vitriolic anti-Israel book published by his son, Max, and attacking those who had criticized it.

In the course of a short career, the younger Blumenthal gradually exiled himself from respectable journalistic outlets, and so several years ago decided to reinvent himself as Israel's most outspoken and extreme Jewish antagonist, at one point writing for a Beirut-based newspaper aligned with the Assad regime in Syria, before deciding that the blood-drenched regime in Damascus was no longer to his liking. His 2013 book Goliath is so venomous in its denunciations of Israel, and so strident in its defense of terrorism against it, that Eric Alterman, himself a harsh critic of Israel and a columnist for the far-left Nation magazine, concluded that it "could have been published by the Hamas Book-of-the-Month Club (if it existed) without a single word change once it's translated into Arabic."

"[W]hat's most revealing about Blumenthal's giddy hopes for a potential Libyan-Israeli rapprochement is how much it differs from other sentiments he had expressed about the Jewish state."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The book is replete with comparisons of Israeli Jews to Nazis, and calls for the ethnic cleansing of Jews from the Middle East. The book's last chapter, "Exodus," a riff on Jewish biblical history and the Leon Uris tome of the same name, envisions the reverse Exodus of the Jews out of their homeland. Asked at a 2013 event about what he believes should happen to Israel's Jews, Blumenthal fils responded, "There should be a choice placed to the settler-colonial population" (that is, the Jewish population): "Become indigenized…you have to be part of the Arab world." Those who don't? "The maintenance and engineering of a non-indigenous demographic majority is non-negotiable." In other words, leave or suffer.

When Max's book came under attack from Alterman, Sidney did what he does best: he launched what Buzzfeed described as "an online campaign" against the Nation columnist. According to Alterman, "I worried that by telling the truth about his son's book, I would soon hear of nasty e-mails about me sent by Sid to our mutual friends and professional acquaintances. Call it 'bizarre,' if you will, but sadly, that's just what happened."

It's one thing to love your son, and another entirely to endorse his controversial work (Sidney hosted a book party for Max) and attack those who criticize it. By doing so, Blumenthal the elder identified himself as a sponsor of his son's calumnies.

Not that everyone hated Goliath. Frazier Glenn Cross, the 73-year-old white supremacist who murdered three people at Kansas Jewish Community Center and retirement home last year, was one of Blumenthal's biggest devotees. "Jew journalist Max Blumenthal exposes and explains this attempt by a foreign government Israel, to buy the presidential election for the neo-con, war-mongering republican establishment," Cross wrote on a Ron Paul fan site in 2012, referencing an interview Blumenthal gave on the Russian government-funded RT network. A survey of a white supremacist web forum run by Cross found over 300 references to Blumenthal and his work, with posters lauding his exposes of nefarious Jewish influence.

Last year, Max earned himself the distinction of being barred from the German Bundestag after he chased the leader of the country's Left Party into a toilet, demanding to know why the parliamentarian had put the kibosh on a talk Blumenthal was scheduled to give at the invitation of two Left Party members. Scheduled to speak on the day after the anniversary of Kristallnacht, outraged party members initiated a petition criticizing their colleagues' hosting Blumenthal, which they said amounted to "stoking obsessive hate and demonization of Israel with an anti-Semitic argument pattern and trivialization of the Holocaust."

The Clintons value loyalty about all else, and it's hard to imagine Sidney Blumenthal doing anything that would make Hillary consider him a liability. But Blumenthal's freelance diplomacy raises an intriguing question: who is the real Sidney Blumenthal? The one promoting Israel's interest in the broader Middle East by trumpeting a Libyan politician eager to make peace with the Jewish state? Or the one who promotes his son's work portraying Israel as a uniformly ghastly, racist country and American Jews as its disloyal double agents?

Google says Hillary Clinton will be the next president // CNET // Chris Matyszczyk – June 25, 2015

Google, be blessed.

You have given me almost two more years of my life that I never thought I'd have. You have saved me from endless hours and days of purgatorial pain. You have offered me closure, even before the doomed affair had truly begun.

My apologies. I'm not wrecked on Retsina. I'm merely reading reports that Google's very fine search engine has already indicated that Hillary Clinton will be the next president of the United States.

Of course, there's a touch of hyperbole here. But I suspect there might be one or two political partisans who will be experiencing intensely hyperbolic reactions when they hear of it.

You see, Google search has responded to the question: "Who will be the next president?" with a card that answered: Hillary Clinton.

I know, I know. You were still holding out for either Ted Nugent or the Hulk Hoganesque intellect of Donald Trump.

Instead, as the Next Web reported, two formulations of the same question both throw up results that suggest that in 2016, the revolution will be Clintonized.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Nerds will surely rush to explain that Google's search engine reacts to optimized results, and these two happened to be results that appear to be -- but aren't -- definitive answers. One, after all, is from renowned independently-minded performer Glen Beck.

There is no suggestion that Google's engineers are machinating to offer a coronation before the 18-month ululation.

I suspect, though, that a few conspiracy theorists will be ready to offer concerns about Google's alleged dark arts.

One imagines that a sizable proportion of Google's youthful staff might lean more to port than starboard. However, let me toss in one exalted conspiracy theory, merely for the amusement of those who cannot get enough of them .

Wouldn't it be delicious if this was a ploy by Bernie Sanders supporters to combat the notion that the Clinton nomination is a foregone conclusion?

Fifteen Libya Emails Missing From Clinton Cache // Sky News US Team – June 26, 2015

The US State Department has said it cannot find 15 emails from Hillary Clinton's private server that were released by a House of Representatives panel investigating the 2012 attack in Benghazi.

The emails, which all pre-date the 11 September attack on the US diplomatic compound, contain intelligence reports passed to Mrs Clinton by her long-time adviser Sidney Blumenthal, officials have said.

Several previously undisclosed emails were handed over to the State Department by Mr Blumenthal, which revealed it did not have a complete record from Mrs Clinton's time in office as Secretary of State.

File photo of Stevens, then U.S. ambassador to Libya, in meeting of delegation of African Union with Transitional Council, in Benghazi

US ambassador Chris Stevens and three other Americans were killed in 2012

The 15 emails were either missing from the records she provided, or included only in partial form.

They include a media account about the killing of one of Moammar Gaddafi's sons, reports on internal politics among Libyan rebels and news of the assassination of a former Gaddafi minister in Vienna.

Play video "Hillary Clinton 'Sensitive' Emails"

Video: Hillary Clinton 'Sensitive' Emails

The last one was sent 28 August, 2012 - two weeks before the Benghazi attack.

Nick Merrill, a spokesman for Mrs Clinton, said the Democratic presidential candidate had given the department "all emails in her possession from Mr Blumenthal".

He said he could not explain where the origin of the additional correspondence Mr Blumenthal had provided in response to a subpoena.

Mrs Clinton - the front-runner for the Democratic nomination for the 2016 presidential election - has faced strong criticism that she flouted record-keeping and transparency rules by using a private email account for her work.

The private address was connected to a server in her home.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mrs Clinton has insisted she used the private account for convenience and has broken no rules. The account was revealed in March, more than two years after she stepped down as the top US diplomat.

Trey Gowdy, the Republican congressman who heads the select committee investigating the Benghazi attack, said the incomplete email record "raises serious questions".

He said: "This has implications far beyond Libya, Benghazi and our committee's work.

"This conclusively shows her email arrangement with herself, which was then vetted by her own lawyers, has resulted in an incomplete public record."

In March, Mrs Clinton said that she had given the State Department all the emails she sent and received that "could possibly be work-related".

She said the 30,490 emails she handed over in December included all those that referred to Libya or Benghazi, along side work-related correspondence from "long-time friends".

She said that after those emails were copies, all her correspondence - including another 30,000 that were deemed personal - were deleted from the server.

It comes after an Islamic-State militant thought to have been involved in the attack in Benghazi was reportedly killed in a drone strike in Iraq last week.

Four Americans, including US ambassador Chris Stevens, were killed during the attack on the US outpost in Benghazi on 11 September 2012.

Clinton Lawyer, Soros Back Anti-Voter ID Lawsuits // Washington Free Beacon // Joe Schoffstall - June 26, 2015

George Soros and Clinton lawyer Marc Elias engaging in multi-state effort to overturn ID laws.

Hillary Clinton's top campaign lawyer is behind a multi-state push challenging voter identification laws implemented in recent years, efforts that are expected to reach numerous other states ahead of the 2016 elections.

Marc Elias, a top campaign lawyer for Hillary Clinton and a partner at the Washington, D.C., law firm Perkins Coie, has filed lawsuits in three states thus far. The nationwide campaign is being fueled with money from the liberal billionaire George Soros.

Elias first began exploring the possible challenges back in January 2014. Soros then became involved, vowing to throw his weight behind the effort in collaboration with Elias.

"We hope to see these unfair laws, which often disproportionately affect the most vulnerable in our society, repealed," Soros told the New York Times.

"It is disingenuous to suggest that these laws are meant to protect against voter fraud, which is nearly nonexistent," Soros political adviser Michael Vachon added. "Clearly they are meant to give Republicans a political advantage on Election Day."

Soros has pledged $5 million to propel the campaign. Elias did not return a request for comment concerning his dealings with Soros or the total number of lawsuits they plan on bringing forward. A request for comment from George Soros's press office was also not returned by press time.

Democrats ramped up their efforts last month to challenge voter ID laws implemented by Republican legislatures and governors, claiming that the laws disenfranchise minority voters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The first in the series of lawsuits was filed in Ohio on May 8. Three weeks later, on June 1, a second suit was filed in Wisconsin. On June 11, a third lawsuit was filed in Virginia. Further suits are expected to follow in other states.

Elias is working independently on behalf of his firm, Perkins Coie, though the Clinton camp supports the effort. Perkins Coie has pulled in more than $40 million from Democratic clients since 2000.

The suits came as Hillary Clinton made comments about voting in a number of public speeches.

During a speech in Houston on June 4 at historically black Texas Southern University, Hillary Clinton called for a universal, automatic voter registration for 18-year-olds along with early voting up to 20 days before an election.

“I call on Republicans at all levels of government with all manner of ambition to stop fear-mongering about a phantom epidemic of election fraud and start explaining why they’re so scared of letting citizens have their say,” Clinton said during the speech.

True the Vote, a right-leaning vote-monitoring organization, sees the campaign as a political stunt to rile up apathetic voters who may not have the same excitement for Clinton as they did for Obama.

“Mrs. Clinton’s decision to shuffle voting reforms to the top of her policy platform has now been viewed as a purely political move to rally the potentially apathetic Obama coalition prior to 2016,” True the Vote said in a statement.

“The political calculus is simple: the potential benefits of victory outweigh the lasting efficacy of debates over real election reform. It is a very rare thing to see election experts on both the left and right agree that Clinton-sanctioned demagoguery and litigation are not based in objective facts and promising any success in the courts.”

While Soros and other Voter ID opponents say the laws disenfranchise minority voters, one state showed the opposite outcome: minority turnout in Georgia skyrocketed after the law went into effect.

According to a review conducted by the Atlanta Journal-Constitution, turnout among African Americans and Hispanics drastically increased from 2006 to 2010.

“Georgia first adopted a voter ID law in 2005 and won court approval to implement it in 2007. The law has now been in place for two major statewide general elections: 2008, when the presidential race was on the ballot, and 2010, when voters selected a new governor,” AJC writes. “Prior to the new law, voters had been able to present one of 17 forms of identification, including a utility bill.”

“Elections data reviewed by the AJC show that participation among black voters rose by 44 percent from 2006—before the law was implemented—to 2010. For Hispanics, the increase for the same period was 67 percent. Turnout among whites rose 12 percent.”

Karma Chameleon in Chief // Washington Free Beacon // Matthew Continetti - June 26, 2015

Hillary Clinton is a woman without conviction, a woman who doesn’t know. She was first lady of a southern state, she sat on the board of directors of Wal-Mart from 1986 to 1992—but is there any record of her voicing opposition to Wal-Mart’s labor practices, of her opposing the sale of the Confederate battle flag? Until recently, has there been any moment in the decades following her appointment to that board, in the many years in which she has been egregiously prominent in public life, when she led on, was prominently identified with, the issue of the flag or racial matters in general?

They say Obama’s audacious. What’s truly remarkable, though, is his potential successor’s blatant contempt for the politics of principle and conviction—her unique ability to adopt, quickly and seamlessly, the most expedient position at any moment, to flaunt her temporary stance with the righteousness and self-regard of a longtime committed activist.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Her husband campaigned in the ’90s as a tough-on-crime neoliberal who would lock up criminals, even put them to death, who challenged the racism of Sister Souljah, promised to “mend” affirmative action, worked hard to recover the Democratic position in white working class precincts. Hillary was his active partner. Nor did she denounce her husband’s policies when she ran for Senate in 2000 and 2006 and for president in 2008, when the chances of her nomination rested on her ability to win “beer track” white and Hispanic Democrats.

It is only today, when the Democratic Party of Barack Obama has veered left, written off the white working class, and been seized by a practically religious enthusiasm for cultural reformation and purgation, that Clinton has called for an “end to the era of mass incarceration,” said America has “to face hard truths about race and justice,” and launched a campaign, in the words of the New York Times, “focused more on mobilizing supporters in the Great Lakes states and in parts of the West and South than on persuading undecided voters.”

What we have, on issue after issue, is a presidential frontrunner uninterested in leadership, who holds an ambivalent attitude toward notions of political courage and intellectual independence, who is devoted exclusively and mechanically to the capture of high office. She has latched on to the president’s ad hoc and failing Iraq policies because her party’s base supports them; gone from opposing same-sex marriage as recently as a few years ago to marching at the vanguard of America’s latest Cultural Revolution and saying that “deep-seated cultural codes, religious beliefs, and structural biases have to be changed”; pledged to “go further” than Barack Obama’s constitutionally dubious executive amnesty despite being silent when her husband signed tough immigration bills in the ’90s, and despite having voted for an amendment that helped kill a pro-immigration bill in 2007; waffled on a trade agreement that she backed while secretary of state; somehow avoided committing to an intelligible and consistent position on the Keystone Pipeline despite taking money from the anti-Keystone billionaire Tom Steyer. Is there any doubt that this supposed pro-Israel Democrat will back whatever nuclear agreement President Obama is able to reach with Iran, no matter how much he capitulates to the ayatollah’s demands?

Hillary Clinton’s approach to politics is cynical, uninspiring, robotic. She’s a chef who follows the recipe without exception, who’s too afraid of failure to challenge the authority of either her superiors or her customers. She’ll be a president suitable for the age of intelligent machines. Like a Terminator she is fixated on her mission—though the Terminator has more personality, greater charm. There’s an assumption behind all her latest moves, a programming code that determines the automaton’s behavior: that the country’s demographics and culture have changed to such an extent that a winning campaign needn’t do more than identify and mobilize core supporters by assuming the various poses most likely to drive them to the polls. There’s the chance the code could be garbage.

Clinton isn’t the first politician who’s inconsistent—far from it. What she and her husband have pioneered is a mode of inconsistency, an entire lifestyle of ideological flexibility the goal of which isn’t public-minded but wholly self-interested. “The only way a man can remain consistent amid changing circumstances is to change with them while preserving the same dominating purpose,” Churchill wrote in “Consistency in Politics” (1932). But the dominating purpose Churchill had in mind was a public one: the common good. And the pursuit of the common good often requires the statesman to disagree with public opinion—to challenge his base, or indeed the majority.

Earlier this year Bill Clinton identified the dominant purpose behind his family’s inconsistency: “I gotta pay our bills.” Blessed with loquacity, smarts, and personal charisma, the man from Hope, Ark., used political office as a means to acquire fame and fortune. Unable to go into business, or perhaps uninterested, convinced that his good and the public good are synonymous, he derived riches from his political talent: lucrative friendships, generous supporters, speaking audiences ready to pay.

The maintenance of what Mickey Kaus calls the “Clinton mode of production” requires at least one member of the family to hold office, so that powerful and wealthy people might obtain a frisson of access and influence through financial gift-giving. What the Clintons understand is that the easiest way to hold office, and thereby keep up the mansions and private jets and villas and beach vacations, is to flatter and cater to the ever-changing morality and self-conception of the liberal ruling caste, to understand what troubles their guilty consciences, to put yourself forward as the representative of their fluctuating and malleable concerns.

Such an approach requires a canny operator able to obscure changes in policy behind a smooth veneer of likability and guile—and if we have learned anything so far in this campaign it is that Hillary Clinton is not such an operator. She is clumsy, stilted, tentative, suspicious, rehearsed, monotonous. She might satisfy, but does she inspire? Do any of the voters nodding their heads at her latest declaration of the conventional wisdom consider themselves “Hillary Clinton Democrats”? What does she stand for besides her own ambition?

It would take someone like Bill Clinton to overcome another obstacle: The differences between the primary electorate and the general one. The social issues on which the left is proclaiming victory may become insignificant next year when voters compare them to a moribund economy and a collapsing international order. The combination of an uninspiring and untrustworthy candidate and a political environment hostile to the incumbent party might overwhelm Hillary Clinton’s meager skills. Like Boy George, Hillary doesn’t quite know how to finesse the contradiction between her past and her present, between what she’s selling and what the general electorate might want. Voters are fickle, after all. They come and go.

Moroccan Government Lobbyists Ready for Hillary // Free Beacon // Lachlan Markay – June 25, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Lobbyists representing an arm of the Moroccan government have donated thousands of dollars to Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign and a super PAC supporting it, public records show.

The firm, Nurnberger & Associates, reported that its employees donated $1,500 to Clinton's campaign last month in a Monday filing with the Department of Justice disclosing its work on behalf of the Moroccan American Center for Policy (MACP).

The firm reported another $5,000 in contributions last year to Ready for Hillary, a now-defunct pro-Clinton super PAC. Ralph Nurnberger, the firm's principal, served on the group's national finance council.

The previously unreported donations suggest additional ties between Clinton and the Moroccan government, which has donated millions to the Bill, Hillary, and Chelsea Clinton Foundation and received favorable treatment from the State Department while Mrs. Clinton served as secretary.

The MACP is a nonprofit owned by the Moroccan government. "Chief among the Center's objectives is to assist the Kingdom of Morocco in its efforts to obtain American support to construct a stable, progressive, democratic, and economically dynamic region in North Africa," according to its website.

To that end, it secured a lobbying contract with Nurnberger in 2009 by way of another firm, the Amani Group (since renamed GrayLoeffler). That firm's founder and partner, the former Democratic congressman William Gray, co-chaired Clinton's 2008 presidential campaign.

Nurnberger submitted a registration statement to the Justice Department, pursuant to the Foreign Agent Registration Act, just eight days after Clinton was sworn in as secretary of state in 2009.

In the years that followed, it reported lobbying State Department officials on MACP's behalf. In 2011, the firm met three times with Lorraine Hariton, a former Clinton campaign finance committee member tapped by the secretary as the department's special representative for commercial and business affairs.

The last meeting took place on Oct. 18, 2011. Days later, State announced that Hariton would "lead a delegation of American entrepreneurs, early-stage investors, non-governmental organization representatives" on a trip to Morocco and two other North African nations.

Clinton and the Moroccan government have enjoyed a mutually beneficial relationship, as reported by Politico's Ken Vogel last month. A state-owned mining company last month paid more than $1 million to host the annual meeting of the Clinton Global Initiative in Marrakesh.

Vogel reported that the meeting faced criticism from the Sahrawi people of the Western Sahara, who accused the Clintons of buddying up with a regime that they say represses advocates for independence from Morocco.

"Hillary Clinton sold her soul when they accepted that money," one former employee of the Moroccan mining company told Vogel.

The MACP has also faced criticism for what the critics describe as "smear tactics" designed to discredit political forces advocating Western Saharan independence.

"If you are looking only for the totally biased and slanted Moroccan royalist line on the Western Sahara, this group I guess works well enough," wrote Charles Liebling, chairman of the group United States Citizens for Western Sahara, in a 2012 blog post.

"If, however, accuracy, truthfulness, international law, and balanced analysis are concerns, I suggest you go elsewhere," he said.

Neither MACP nor Nurnberger returned requests for comment.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On September 5, 1995, Hillary Clinton gave a speech at the Fourth World Conference on Women held in Beijing, where she declared, “It is no longer acceptable to discuss women’s rights as separate from human rights.”

As Clinton moves forward in her presidential campaign, women’s rights and gender topics have remained at the forefront of her platform.

She has broken her campaign into four “fights,” one of which is tackling social issues affecting the strength of American families.

These issues include the wage gap between genders, paid leave and addressing human rights within the LGBT community.

In her 1995 speech at the Fourth World Conference on Women, Clinton stated, “We need to understand there is no one formula for how women should lead our lives. That is why we must respect the choices that each woman makes for herself and her family.”

This statement rings true even in today’s feminist movement, a word or concept that has seemingly constructed an air around itself as being “untouchable,” “dismissive” or “irritating.”

While there are many women’s rights issues occurring all over the globe, such as abuse, trafficking and being denied a right to education, there is still a good amount of women’s rights issues in our own nation that cry for attention as well.

The United States of America is one of seven countries that have not ratified The Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), which is considered the international bill of rights for women.

According to the Rape, Abuse and Incest National Network (RAINN), there about 293,000 victims of rape and sexual assault every year. According to the National Coalition Against Domestic Violence (NCADV), over 10 million women and men are physically abused by an intimate partner, with highest percentage of victims being women between the ages of 18 to 24.

In terms of Clinton’s bold statement about respecting the choices a woman makes for herself, access to abortions for women in the United States is shrinking, due to increased restrictions.

Some of these restrictions include late-abortion bans, long waiting periods, clinic regulations and bans on insurance coverage.

Taking away a woman’s right to a legal abortion forces her to turn to more clandestine means, thus jeopardizing health and safety.

These are just a few examples of women’s rights issues within the boundaries of America.

Clinton’s platform for strengthening America’s families includes addressing the wage gap between men and women. A woman, on average, makes $0.78 to every dollar earned by a man. Black women make $0.64 to every dollar and Latinas make $0.56 to every dollar.

For many families, these few cents lost per dollar really add up, creating difficulty in being able to provide and save.

Even outside of the family, single working women should be able to take home the same amount a man has made, not less because of her anatomy.

Anatomy is not synonymous with skill or worth.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In order to deal with the wage gap, Clinton aims to pass the Paycheck Fairness Act, which, according to Congress, “amends the portion of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 (FLSA) known as the Equal Pay Act to revise remedies for, enforcement of, and exceptions to prohibitions against sex discrimination in the payment of wages.”

She also is proposing a raise in minimum wage and the introduction of paid leave so Americans will not have to sacrifice their income because of a newborn child, taking care of a sick family member or being sick themselves.

Human rights within the LGBT community is also being addressed by Clinton’s platform.

She aims to help give LGBT Americans and their families the rights to “live, learn, marry and work free from discrimination.”

In her famous 1995 speech in Beijing, she stated, “Women’s rights are human rights,” and has extended this assertion to include the LGBT community, in her recently-released video, featuring many married LGBT couples.

The video ends with a moving statement that “being LGBT does not make you less human. And that is why gay rights are human rights. And human rights are gay rights.”

Clinton plans to combat discrimination against the LGBT community and has a record of being heavily involved in the international movement to end this discrimination around the globe.

She produced a daring and equally heroic statement in her 2011 address in Geneva, when it came to international human rights, saying, “It is violation of human rights when people are beaten or killed because of their sexual orientation, or because they do not conform to cultural norms about how men and women should look or behave.”

It is no doubt there are many social issues at the forefront of the next presidential race, with women’s and gender issues being main topics.

When we search “feminism in the United States,” or “women’s rights in the United States,” we are met with links to historical movements such as those ranging from about 1848 to 1970.

However, the fight is long from being a part of history.

The movement toward gender equality in the United States and around the globe is a slow fight that will continue to take more time.

Hillary Clinton’s platform is indicative of the progress we have already achieved, and how much further we have to go.

American schools are 'more segregated than they were in the 1960s,' says Hillary Clinton // Politifact // Linda Qiu – June 25, 2015

Speaking at a black church near Ferguson, Mo., Hillary Clinton applauded efforts to remove Confederate flags before challenging America to own up to its racist past and confront "hard truths" about bigotry in the present.

The shooting in Charleston, S.C., was no isolated incident, but an extreme manifestation of institutionalized racism, she said.

"The truth is equality, opportunity, civil rights in America are still far from where they need to be," Clinton said on June 23. "Our schools are still segregated, in fact, more segregated than they were in the 1960s."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Supreme Court declared segregation "inherently unequal" and unconstitutional in its landmark 1954 Brown vs. Board of Education decision. Sixty years later, have we really regressed and resegregated?

It’s important to note that modern school segregation is not the same as the government-sanctioned social system that the Supreme Court struck down in 1954. Segregation today refers to the level of isolation of minority students, which can be measured in a variety of ways. Clinton's comment omits a lot of nuance.

Not quite Jim Crow

The Clinton campaign pointed us to a passage in a 2014 study by UCLA Graduate School of Education’s Civil Rights Project that tracked the amount of southern black students attending white schools in the South. By that yardstick, schools are slightly less integrated now than they were in 1968. That’s the year the Supreme Court mandated the enforcement of desegregation in Green vs. County School Board and diverse classrooms really started to become reality.

Clinton, however, bookended the 1960s as the point of comparison and her claim doesn’t hold true for the better part of the decade. Jim Crow laws were still in place until the 1964 Civil Rights Act, and despite the Brown decision, most black students in the South still didn’t attend white schools,"the kind of schools that provided strong potential opportunities for diverse learning experiences," according to the study. In 1967, one in 100 black students went to a white school. In 1960, it was one in 1,000.

"It’s true that segregation for blacks is worse today than it was in 1968, but it’s certainly not worse than 1964 and before," said Gary Orfield, a UCLA professor of education and lead author of the study Clinton cited.

Even if we take 1968 to represent the 1960s, Clinton’s claim has issues if we look at different ways of measuring segregation. The UCLA report also considers how many black students are isolated in overwhelmingly black schools. Across the United States, fewer black students attend these schools now than they did in 1968 (four in 10 versus six in 10), signalling a decline in segregation.

A separate study by Charles Clotfelter, a professor of public policy and economics at Duke University, measured the potential for black and white students to interact. According to that data, segregation has been declining since the 1970s, albeit at a slower rate in the past decade.

Rainbows here, black and white there

Clinton’s blanket statement also leaves out regional and demographic nuances in the UCLA study.

According to that data, the South is now the least racially divided region in the United States when it comes to school segregation, and no state in Dixie is among the top five most segregated by any yardstick. For example, a third of black students are isolated in black schools in the South, compared to half of black students in the Northeast and 40 percent on average. How did the South surpass the rest of the nation in diversity? It’s a mixture of the judicial mandates in the 1960s and modern geography.

"The South is really the only place where we seriously enforced desegregation," said Orfield, the lead author of the UCLA study.

"Large school jurisdictions," added Clotfelter, the Duke professor. "That means that it's not possible to slice up into such small bits, like a metropolitan area where the districts dramatically differ."

In contrast, the densely populated cities of the Northeast and West are becoming more and more segregated. On the Pacific coast, Clinton’s claim is on the money: Latino students are now more isolated than black students and "more segregated than they’ve ever been," according to Orfield.

"Latinos have increased more than five times over in the number of students since the 1960s," he said. "Demographics is the largest factor (in their segregation) but there’s a lot of history as well. There was never was much of a desegregation effort for Latinos."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Two steps forward, one step back

Clinton does have a strong point that American schools have relapsed into monochrome. Classrooms were the most diverse from the 1970s through the early 1990s. At peak integration, four out of 10 black southern students attended a white school, while less than a third of all black students attended black schools.

"We've lost a lot of the progress we gained, no doubt about that," Clotfelter said.

Experts say the backslide was the consequence of a series of judicial decisions, beginning with Milliken vs. Bradley in 1974, a relatively unheard of but seminal case in the desegregation saga. Criticized by some as "one of the worst Supreme Court decisions" ever, Milliken dealt with Detroit's plan to integrate students by busing them from the intercity to the suburbs. The court ruled that such a plan was unconstitutional, arguing that black students had the right to attend integrated schools within their own school district, but were not protected from de facto segregation.

"That decision … said the racial disparities across districts would remain outside the reach of policymakers," Clotfelter wrote in piece exploring the impact of Milliken. "The maximum amount of interracial contact one could strive for, then, would be limited by the two remaining factors: balkanization of jurisdictions and household choices about where to live."

Court-mandated desegregation was dealt its own deadly blow by three rulings from the Supreme Court between 1991 and 1995. According to the court, integration was only a temporary federal policy and after the historical imbalance was righted, school districts should reclaim local control and were released from desegregation orders.

Since then, school segregation has been intrinsically tied to the racial gaps in housing and income, leading to the re-emergence of the color line. Economic segregation, which disproportionately affects black and Latino students, is increasing, pointed out Orfield. He noted that in California, Asian and white students are 10 times more likely to go to a high-quality school than Latinos and therefore dramatically more likely to attend college.

"We've lost something very vital," he said. "Inequality is very related to the double segregation of low-income racial minorities and (their) isolation from the middle class, from the best teachers, the best curriculum. That has become very profound."

Our ruling

Hillary Clinton said, "In America today, our schools are more segregated than they were in the 1960s."

Overall, experts say and the data shows that the United States has taken two steps forward and one step back, but hasn't quite reverted to pre-Civil Rights levels of segregation. Clinton would have been more accurate setting her time frame a little later. But she has a strong point that the country has fallen back from the high levels of diversity that existed from the 1970s to the early 1990s. On the whole, we rate her statement Mostly True.

Speaking at a black church near Ferguson, Mo., Hillary Clinton applauded efforts to remove Confederate flags before challenging America to own up to its racist past and confront "hard truths" about bigotry in the present.

The shooting in Charleston, S.C., was no isolated incident, but an extreme manifestation of institutionalized racism, she said.

"The truth is equality, opportunity, civil rights in America are still far from where they need to be," Clinton said on June 23. "Our schools are still segregated, in fact, more segregated than they were in the 1960s."

The Supreme Court declared segregation "inherently unequal" and unconstitutional in its landmark 1954 Brown vs. Board of Education decision. Sixty years later, have we really regressed and resegregated?

It's important to note that modern school segregation is not the same as the government-sanctioned social system that the Supreme Court struck down in 1954. Segregation today refers to the level of isolation of minority students, which can be measured in a variety of ways. Clinton's comment omits a lot of nuance.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Not quite Jim Crow

The Clinton campaign pointed us to a passage in a 2014 study by UCLA Graduate School of Education's Civil Rights Project that tracked the amount of southern black students attending white schools in the South. By that yardstick, schools are slightly less integrated now than they were in 1968. That's the year the Supreme Court mandated the enforcement of desegregation in Green vs. County School Board and diverse classrooms really started to become reality.

Clinton, however, bookended the 1960s as the point of comparison and her claim doesn't hold true for the better part of the decade. Jim Crow laws were still in place until the 1964 Civil Rights Act, and despite the Brown decision, most black students in the South still didn't attend white schools,"the kind of schools that provided strong potential opportunities for diverse learning experiences," according to the study. In 1967, one in 100 black students went to a white school. In 1960, it was one in 1,000.

"It's true that segregation for blacks is worse today than it was in 1968, but it's certainly not worse than 1964 and before," said Gary Orfield, a UCLA professor of education and lead author of the study Clinton cited.

Even if we take 1968 to represent the 1960s, Clinton's claim has issues if we look at different ways of measuring segregation. The UCLA report also considers how many black students are isolated in overwhelmingly black schools. Across the United States, fewer black students attend these schools now than they did in 1968 (four in 10 versus six in 10), signalling a decline in segregation.

A separate study by Charles Clotfelter, a professor of public policy and economics at Duke University, measured the potential for black and white students to interact. According to that data, segregation has been declining since the 1970s, albeit at a slower rate in the past decade.

Rainbows here, black and white there

Clinton's blanket statement also leaves out regional and demographic nuances in the UCLA study.

According to that data, the South is now the least racially divided region in the United States when it comes to school segregation, and no state in Dixie is among the top five most segregated by any yardstick. For example, a third of black students are isolated in black schools in the South, compared to half of black students in the Northeast and 40 percent on average. How did the South surpass the rest of the nation in diversity? It's a mixture of the judicial mandates in the 1960s and modern geography.

"The South is really the only place where we seriously enforced desegregation," said Orfield, the lead author of the UCLA study.

"Large school jurisdictions," added Clotfelter, the Duke professor. "That means that it's not possible to slice up into such small bits, like a metropolitan area where the districts dramatically differ."

In contrast, the densely populated cities of the Northeast and West are becoming more and more segregated. On the Pacific coast, Clinton's claim is on the money: Latino students are now more isolated than black students and "more segregated than they've ever been," according to Orfield.

"Latinos have increased more than five times over in the number of students since the 1960s," he said. "Demographics is the largest factor (in their segregation) but there's a lot of history as well. There was never was much of a desegregation effort for Latinos."

Two steps forward, one step back

Clinton does have a strong point that American schools have relapsed into monochrome. Classrooms were the most diverse from the 1970s through the early 1990s. At peak integration, four out of 10 black southern students attended a white school, while less than a third of all black students attended black schools.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We've lost a lot of the progress we gained, no doubt about that," Clotfelter said.

Experts say the backslide was the consequence of a series of judicial decisions, beginning with Milliken vs. Bradley in 1974, a relatively unheard of but seminal case in the desegregation saga. Criticized by some as "one of the worst Supreme Court decisions" ever, Milliken dealt with Detroit's plan to integrate students by busing them from the intercity to the suburbs. The court ruled that such a plan was unconstitutional, arguing that black students had the right to attend integrated schools within their own school district, but were not protected from de facto segregation.

"That decision … said the racial disparities across districts would remain outside the reach of policymakers," Clotfelter wrote in piece exploring the impact of Milliken. "The maximum amount of interracial contact one could strive for, then, would be limited by the two remaining factors: balkanization of jurisdictions and household choices about where to live."

Court-mandated desegregation was dealt its own deadly blow by three rulings from the Supreme Court between 1991 and 1995. According to the court, integration was only a temporary federal policy and after the historical imbalance was righted, school districts should reclaim local control and were released from desegregation orders.

Since then, school segregation has been intrinsically tied to the racial gaps in housing and income, leading to the re-emergence of the color line. Economic segregation, which disproportionately affects black and Latino students, is increasing, pointed out Orfield. He noted that in California, Asian and white students are 10 times more likely to go to a high-quality school than Latinos and therefore dramatically more likely to attend college.

"We've lost something very vital," he said. "Inequality is very related to the double segregation of low-income racial minorities and (their) isolation from the middle class, from the best teachers, the best curriculum. That has become very profound."

Our ruling

Hillary Clinton said, "In America today, our schools are more segregated than they were in the 1960s."

Overall, experts say and the data shows that the United States has taken two steps forward and one step back, but hasn't quite reverted to pre-Civil Rights levels of segregation. Clinton would have been more accurate setting her time frame a little later. But she has a strong point that the country has fallen back from the high levels of diversity that existed from the 1970s to the early 1990s. On the whole, we rate her statement Mostly True.

Benghazi panel says Hillary Clinton didn't turn over all Libya emails, despite her claims // The Washington Times // Stephen Dinan - June 25, 2015

Former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton didn't turn over all of her work-related emails to the department despite her claims to have done so, the Benghazi investigative committee charged Thursday in a statement raising new questions about the Democratic presidential candidate's email practices.

Rep. Trey Gowdy, South Carolina Republican and the Benghazi panel chairman, said the State Department informed his panel that it did not have in its possession some emails related to Benghazi and Libya that Mrs. Clinton had exchanged with longtime confidant Sidney Blumenthal, and which he turned over to the committee.

If true, it suggests that Mrs. Clinton either did not perform a full search, intentionally shielded some messages, or had some other hiccup when she claimed to have belatedly complied with federal law and turned back to the department some 30,000 messages from her time as secretary.

The Associated Press said there were 15 messages that the State Department said it couldn't find in its own records that Mrs. Clinton provided.

"This confirms doubts about the completeness of Clinton's self-selected public record and raises serious questions about her decision to erase her personal server — especially before it could be analyzed by an independent, neutral third-party arbiter," Mr. Gowdy said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mrs. Clinton set up her own email server at one of her homes, in New York, and used an account she issued herself, rather than an account on State Department servers, to conduct business during her four years in office.

She said the arrangement was done out of convenience.

Federal law requires that officials ensure their emails, which are considered potential government records, be stored on official servers for archival purposes. Mrs. Clinton did not comply with that requirement until nearly two years after she left office, and only after the Benghazi investigative panel discovered her unique email arrangement.

At a dramatic press conference and in follow-up communications from her attorney, she said she had gone through all of her messages and decided which of the more than 60,000 from that period were personal and which were related to government business.

She said she found 30,000 that she deemed official and turned them over to the State Department in paper form. She said another 32,000 were private and she expunged them, then wiped her server clean.

A court has ordered the department to make all of the official messages public, and the department had already turned over several hundred related to Benghazi and Libya more generally, so the committee could complete its probe into the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2012, which killed Ambassador J. Christopher Stevens and three other Americans.

However, Mr. Gowdy said, the emails Mr. Blumenthal exchanged with Mrs. Clinton during her time in office were business-related but weren't part of the set that the State Department sent.

He demanded that the department say whether it had withheld the emails, or whether Mrs. Clinton never turned them over in the first place.

The messages Mr. Blumenthal produced also contradict Mrs. Clinton's claim that his advice was "unsolicited."

"This has implications far beyond Libya, Benghazi and our committee's work. This conclusively shows her email arrangement with herself, which was then vetted by her own lawyers, has resulted in an incomplete public record," Mr. Gowdy said.

The messages in question don't go to the heart of the Benghazi attack, Democrats said.

Mrs. Clinton's presidential campaign didn't immediately respond to a request for comment Thursday night, nor did a spokesman for Rep. Elijah E. Cummings of Maryland, the ranking Democrat on the Benghazi committee.

A Clinton campaign spokesman told The Associated Press that they believe she fulfilled her obligations.

"She has turned over 55,000 pages of materials to the State Department, including all emails in her possession from Mr. Blumenthal," spokesman Nick Merrill told the wire service.

They also questioned whether some of the messages Mr. Blumenthal turned over were really emails, saying they appeared to be formatted as other types of documents.

Bill Maher: Hillary plays 'hide-and seek' while Putin allows tough marathon interviews // The Washington Times // Douglas Earnst – June 25, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Comedian Bill Maher used Russian President Vladimir Putin's press schedule to mock former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton's "hide-and-seek" press strategy.

The HBO "Real Time" host said on his official website Wednesday that Mr. Putin recently gave a marathon interview with an Italian paper.

"Maybe it helps to be a sociopath, but the guy regularly does three-hour-plus press conferences in front of a hostile press — contrast that with Hillary Clinton's game of hide-and seek," Mr. Maher said.

The sentiment of the comedian's blog post echoes The New York Times' Amy Chozick, who announced a series in May that would address Mrs. Clinton's avoidance of the press.

"Since she declared her candidacy on April 12, Hillary Rodham Clinton has answered just seven questions from reporters. This is the first installment of a regular First Draft feature in which The Times will publish questions we would have asked Mrs. Clinton had we had the opportunity," the paper reported May 6.

Mr. Maher told Maureen Dowd for her May 30 op-ed "Hooray for Hillarywood?" that he will vote for Mrs. Clinton, but he will not donate $1 million to her campaign as he did for President Obama.

State Dept: Clinton did not turn over some emails // CNN // Elise Labott – June 25, 2015

The State Department has not been able to find emails from former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's private server in its archives, State Department officials said Thursday.

The officials said the State Department is missing all or part of 15 emails from longtime confidant Sidney Blumenthal released this week by a House panel investigating the 2012 attack on the U.S. diplomatic facility in Benghazi, Libya. Blumenthal provided the Select Committee on Benghazi with the emails.

"She has turned over 55,000 pages of materials to the State Department, including all emails in her possession from Mr. Blumenthal," said Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill on Thursday.

Officials said the exchanges with Blumenthal were not among the 55,000 pages of emails Clinton handed over to the State Department, even though Clinton insisted she gave her former agency all of her work-related correspondence from private account during her time at State.

"We have confirmed that the emails Secretary Clinton provided the department include almost all of the material in Mr. Blumenthal's production," one of the officials said. "There here are, however, a limited number of instances 15 in which we could not locate all or part of the content of a document from his production within the tens of thousands of emails she gave us."

But the official added, "The substance of those 15 emails is not relevant to the 2012 attacks in Benghazi."

Rep. Trey Gowdy, chairman of the committee, has petitioned Clinton and her former aides to reveal what they know about the attack at an American diplomatic compound that killed four Americans. Gowdy's recent attention has turned to any emails between Clinton and Blumenthal.

Gowdy's committee has located emails between the pair and has asked the State Department to turn over their copies of the correspondence, which it said it did Thursday in a letter to the committee.

"This confirms doubts about the completeness of Clinton's self-selected public record and raises serious questions about her decision to erase her personal server -- especially before it could be analyzed by an independent, neutral third party arbiter," Gowdy said in a statement on Thursday. "This has implications far beyond Libya, Benghazi and our committee's work. This conclusively shows her email arrangement with herself, which was then vetted by her own lawyers, has resulted in an incomplete public record."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A Clinton aide says they do not recognize many of the materials Blumenthal turned over to the committee and cannot speak to their origin.

They do not, the aide said, have a record of other correspondence between her and Mr. Blumenthal beyond that which they turned over to the State Department.

The aide also said that Clinton turned over all emails from Blumenthal, including more than a dozen emails that were not included in what he handed over to the House committee.

The missing emails are likely to fuel Republican charges that Clinton is hiding emails from her private server. The committee believes almost half of Clinton's public record on the attacks can be uncovered by looking at her emails with Blumenthal.

Gowdy's committee released 179 pages of emails on Monday. The emails that Blumenthal produced in response to the committee's request numbered about 120 pages.

Clinton has said that the emails she received were "unsolicited," but the committee believes the new emails show that not to be the case.

Blumenthal met behind closed doors last week with the committee for nearly nine hours about amid revelations he sent Clinton more than two dozen memos that read like intelligence reports. The emails have drawn Republican scrutiny because Blumenthal sent them while advising businesses interests in Libya and working with the Clinton Foundation, although Blumenthal said his work for the Clinton Foundation had "nothing whatsoever to do with my emails to my friend."

Democrats complained that the committee has drifted from its mission of investigating the attacks in Benghazi and has become an inquest into Clinton, the frontrunner for the Democratic presidential nomination.

FNC's 'Special Report': Schweizer's Clinton Cash Scandals Cause Hillary to Drop in Polls // Breitbart News – June 25, 2015

On Fox News Channel's "Special Report" on Wednesday, White House correspondent Ed Henry broke down a Fox News poll showing Democratic presidential hopeful Hillary Clinton sliding in the polls after a series of scandals were revealed in Peter Schweizer's book "Clinton Cash."

Henry pointed to the latest Fox News poll showing her underwater in terms honesty and trustyworthiness.

"Amid the drip, drip of revelations about her family's foundation, Hillary Clinton's image continues to take a hit," Henry explained. "A new Fox poll found when asked if she's honest and trustworthy — 45 percent say yes, 52 percent say so. Republican pollsters believe she's missing a key ingredient that allowed former President Bill Clinton to survive one scandal after another.

Henry continued by going into detail about one controversy in particular involving the Russian government and its efforts to bolster its position in the international uranium market.

"Controversies like the sale of uranium to the Russian government during her time as secretary of state may not have helped," he said. "In an interview with WMUR in New Hampshire, Clinton denied that a $500,000 speaking fee to her husband by a Kremlin bank and millions in contributions to the Clinton Foundation were tied to Russian President Vladimir Putin, getting a corner on the uranium market."

"The former secretary telling WMUR quote, 'I was not personally involved because that wasn't something the secretary of state did,'" Henry said. "'Clinton Cash' author, Peter Schweizer scoffed declaring in an op-ed quote, 'The transfer of 20 percent of U.S. uranium, the stuff used to build nuclear weapons to Vladimir Putin did not rise to the level of secretary of state Hillary Clinton's time and attention?'"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bernie Sanders closes on Hillary Clinton in New Hampshire Democrats poll // The Guardian // Ben Jacobs – June 25, 2015

Bernie Sanders is catching up to Hillary Clinton in New Hampshire.

A CNN/WMUR poll released on Thursday had the independent Vermont senator just eight points behind the former secretary of state in the Granite State's Democratic primary.

The poll has Sanders receiving the support of 35% of likely Democratic voters while Clinton is at 43%. Vice-president Joe Biden, who has not indicated that he will mount a presidential bid, is at 8% and the former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley is at 2%.

The poll has Clinton with a far slimmer lead than she possessed at this time eight years ago. In June 2007 a CNN/WMUR poll gave Clinton a 36%-22% lead over Barack Obama in New Hampshire. Obama won the Democratic nomination.

Sanders has been drawing massive crowds on the campaign trail. Most recently, when he and Clinton appeared with two days of each other in Des Moines, Iowa, the Vermonter drew a significantly bigger crowd. This was despite the fact that Sanders has repeatedly held public events in Iowa while it was Clinton's first public rally in the Hawkeye State since announcing her candidacy.

Clinton's weakness in New Hampshire is a significant red flag for her campaign. New Hampshire has long been a stronghold for both Hillary and Bill Clinton. A strong performance in the state's primary made Bill Clinton "the Comeback Kid" in 1992 and a surprise win in the 2008 primary kept Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign alive after her loss in Iowa.

Sanders is scheduled to hold six events across New Hampshire this weekend. In contrast, while several members of Congress are appearing on Clinton's behalf in the Granite State.

Hillary wraps up New York fundraising swing with private shopping trip to ultra-expensive Bergdorf Goodman one day after boasting about her plans to help 'poor people, people of color, and the elderly' // The Daily Mail – June 25, 2015

Hillary Clinton's rhetoric may skew toward supporting the downtrodden, but her shopping tastes are strictly LIfestyles of the Rich and Famous.

The Democratic presidential front-runner was phoographed Wednesday morning in wind-swept New York City emerging from the ultra-high-end Bergdorf Goodman department store and getting into her armored black 'Scooby' van with chief of staff Huma Abedin and a contingent of Secret Service agents.

'Bergdorf's,' as New Yorkers with gobs of disposable income call it, is Manhattan's ground zero for expensive brands like Gucci, Valentino, Prada and Louboutin, whose signature red-soled shoes can go for $1,000 or more per pair.

Hillary is also known to get her roots touched up or her hair cut by renowned - and pricey - stylist John Barrett at his salon on the 9th floor at Bergdorf's. But with the wind whipping her hair around, it's hard to say if she stopped by for a $600, yes, $600 cut and blow dry.

The landmark store is also renowned for its personal-shopper service, which pairs the wealthy with valet service to help choose, try and tailor outfits.

Clinton spoke Tuesday at a black church a stone's throw from race-riot-scarred Ferguson, Missouri, boasting of her pledge to combat 'systematic efforts to disempower and disenfranchise young people, poor people, people of color, and the elderly.'

She then jetted to New York City on a private plane waiting at the St. Louis airport.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bergdorf Goodman shoppers who are in the know don't come and go through the main entrance on posh Fifth Avenue, but via a less public door around the corner on West 58th Street.

That's where Clinton and her entourage emerged on Wednesday.

Bergdorf's privileged customers who work with personal shoppers also typically don't walk out with armloads of bags, but can opt for delivery service after garments are tailored for a perfect fit.

The former secretary of state was in Manhattan for a one-night-only fundraiser at the legendary Plaza Hotel, where Lady Gaga and Tony Bennett were both on the program.

An invitation to the event described it as an 'intimate performance in support of Hillary for America.'

The fundraiser, where the minimum buy-in was $1,000 – or $2,700 for a VIP seat – is part of a mad scramble to collect as much campaign case as possible before the end of the month, when the fundraising quarter ends and prying eyes can see Federal Election Commission reports showing how successful she's been.

Guests on Wednesday night could sign up as 'event hosts' if they brought a total of $50,000 in campaign contributions. That magic number opened the door to a private receptioin with Clinton and an after-party with Bennett and Gaga.

Clinton visited Bergdorf's last year in February, fueling speculation that a trip to stock up on pantsuits was a sign that she planned to run for the White House.

The store, which is known for guarding its high-end clientele's secrets, did not respond to a request for comment.

Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill also did not respond.

Hillary will be in Northern Virginia on Friday to speak at an annual Democratic Party dinner commemorating Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson, whose history as prominent slave-owners has come under fire this week.

Hillary Clinton's lead over N.H. Democrats dwindling, poll finds // CNN // Jennifer Agiesta – June 25, 2015

Hillary Clinton's sizable lead among Democrats in New Hampshire has been trimmed to single digits as Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders makes a strong push in a state that narrowly broke Clinton's way in 2008 to keep her campaign alive.

According to a new CNN/WMUR New Hampshire Primary poll, Clinton holds an 8-point edge over Sanders, with 43% behind Clinton and 35% backing Sanders. Vice President Joe Biden clocks in at 8%, with 2% or less supporting Martin O'Malley, Jim Webb and Lincoln Chafee.

The poll marks a significant tightening of the contest since the May Granite State Poll, which included Elizabeth Warren on its list of candidates. In that poll, Clinton stood at 51%, with Warren at 20% and Sanders at 13%.

Several shifts in the poll seem to explain much of Sanders' gain. Looking at the demographic breakdown in primary preferences, men, younger voters and liberals appear to have moved broadly toward Sanders in the last month. Among men, 52% backed Clinton in the May survey, that fell to 32% in the new poll, while 47% now support Sanders. Likewise, among liberals, a 51% to 16% Clinton advantage is now a 48% to 41% Sanders edge. And among voters under age 50, Clinton has fallen from majority support to a near even split in the new poll, 37% back Clinton while 39% favor Sanders.

And likely Democratic primary voters are now more apt to see Sanders as the candidate who "best represents the values of Democrats like yourself."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sanders trounces Clinton, with 41% of Democratic primary voters saying Sanders does, to 30% who chose Clinton. In the May poll, 38% said Clinton was tops on this question, with 22% choosing Warren and just 13% picking Sanders.

Sanders has also gained dramatically in favorability ratings among Democrats since May. In the new poll, 66% say they have a favorable view of the Vermont senator, while just 11% hold an unfavorable view. In May, 45% had a favorable view and 11% held an unfavorable one.

And the Vermont Senator also holds a big edge over Clinton as the most empathetic candidate in the field; 45% say he's the one who cares the most about people like you, compared with 24% who pick Clinton on that score.

Clinton's advantages are apparent in voters' preferences on the issues, however. She is more trusted to handle two of the top domestic issues in the race: The economy (37%, compared with 28% who prefer Sanders' approach) and health care (43% Clinton to 27% Sanders).

And the former secretary of state's advantages are larger on matters of foreign affairs. She holds a wide lead as the more trusted candidate to handle both international trade policy (55% say they trust Clinton compared with Sanders' 14%; Biden is at 11% on that one) and terrorism (45% Clinton to 12% Biden and 11% Sanders).

But when it comes to dealing with "big banks and corporations," things are much tighter: 36% trust Sanders compared to 31% who favor Clinton.

More see Clinton as presidential than Sanders, with 38% saying she has the personal characteristics and qualities a president should have, compared with 27% who think Sanders is best representative of those qualities. Further, 56% of Democratic voters say she is the strongest leader in the field. On that question, just 13% say Sanders has the edge.

Still, 28% describe Clinton as the "least honest" candidate in the field. No other candidate is named by more than 5% of likely Democratic primary voters.

Clinton's favorability ratings remain strong and have generally held steady: 74% have a positive impression, 19% a negative one, about the same as in May.

O'Malley makes a small gain here, with his favorable rating climbing from 10% in May to 16% now. The former Maryland governor remains largely unknown, however, with 72% unable to offer an opinion.

One interesting contrast between the two parties in New Hampshire: while 75% of Republicans say they're still trying to make up their minds about who to support, that figure stands at 54% among Democrats, suggesting Democratic support is solidifying more quickly than Republican support.

The CNN/WMUR New Hampshire Primary Poll was conducted by telephone by the University of New Hampshire Survey Center from June 18-24 among 1,010 adult residents of New Hampshire. Of those, 360 said they plan to vote in the Democratic presidential primary. Results among likely Democratic primary voters have a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 5.2 percentage points.

In Hillary Clinton's journey, a history of Jewish kinship // J Weekly // Ron Kampeas – June 25, 2015

From the man who married her grandmother to the man who married her daughter, from working a room full of bar mitzvah guests on behalf of her husband's political career to headlining major pro-Israel events during her own, Hillary Rodham Clinton's journey has been suffused with Jewish connections.

That's been a natural consequence of her East Coast education, her trajectory in the party favored by a substantial majority of Jewish Americans, and her embrace of the Jewish narrative of triumphing over adversity and bigotry, longtime friends of the 2016 presidential candidate say.

Sara Ehrman, whose friendship with the Democratic front-runner dates back more than four decades, noted that the Clintons, upon arriving in Arkansas in the mid-1970s, quickly established ties with leaders of the state's tiny Jewish community.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“They were a smart, educated young couple … who had come down to this wonderful little city,” said Ehrman, now 96, referring to Little Rock. “The Jews gravitated to them. Among her best and most fervent supporters were Jews.”

The Clintons would attend seders at the homes of Jewish friends during their Little Rock years, and in 1988 Bill Clinton as governor co-officiated with Rabbi Zeke Palnick of Arkansas’ capital city at the Jewish wedding of Richard and Sheila Bronfman.

The Clintons are “both very spiritual and they tend to like to experience different cultures around them,” said Sheila Bronfman, who traveled the country to campaign for Bill Clinton in 1992 and 1996, and for Hillary Clinton in 2008.

In her first autobiography, “Living History,” Hillary Clinton recalls being 10 years old and noticing numbers tattooed on the arm of an acquaintance of her father’s. Hugh Rodham explained that Nazis had tattooed Jews, whom they murdered en masse.

“I knew that my grandmother Della’s [second] husband, Max Rosenberg, was Jewish, and I was horrified that someone like him could have been murdered just because of his religion,” Clinton wrote in 2003.

By the time Bill Clinton was running for president in 1992, the youthful governor and his wife had become favorites among Jewish Democrats. Ehrman described a presidential campaign headquarters buzzing with Jewish activists. “The Jews loved the Clintons so much, they were coming from around the country,” she said. “If they couldn’t come, they would send food. The whole staff would end up in the Jewish room because there were bagels from New York, Danish pastries, Goldenberg’s peanut chews.” (The “Jewish room” she describes refers to the area where Jewish activists would congregate.)

The Jewish sensibility permeated the Clinton White House, where the first couple inaugurated what is now an annual Hanukkah party in 1993, in part because of the abundance of Jewish staffers: there was communications chief Ann Lewis; senior adviser Rahm Emanuel; Jack Lew, special assistant to President Clinton who would go on to become Treasury secretary under President Barack Obama; and Ron Klain, now Obama’s Ebola czar.

Hillary Clinton’s eight years in the Senate representing New York strengthened the couple’s ties to national Jewish groups. Her pro-Israel advocacy included exposing incitement in Palestinian media and helping to win full membership for Magen David Adom in the International Committee of the Red Cross. She blamed the Palestinians, and not the Israelis, for the collapse of the 2000 Camp David peace talks and the subsequent second intifada.

After winning the Senate seat in 2000, Clinton repeatedly secured the Tuesday-morning slot at national conferences for AIPAC and the Jewish Federations of North America, among others — a slot reserved for the most respected pro-Israel figure in Congress. Clinton chose the annual AIPAC conference in 2008 to concede the primaries to Obama.

For her 2016 bid, Clinton has lined up pro-Israel funding powerhouses who helped fuel her 2008 bid, including entertainment mogul Haim Saban, and has added some of Obama’s most prominent Jewish bundlers, notably movie executive Jeffrey Katzenberg. Lewis, the former White House communications chief, leads her Jewish outreach.

There were other alliances, less noticeable back in the 1990s, that would be personally consequential.

The 1992 election swept 51 Jewish lawmakers into Congress, the largest class ever. Among them was Rep. Marjorie Margolies, the Democrat from Pennsylvania who served a single term before being ousted in the Republican takeover of the House in ’94. Her opponents raised the issue of Margolies’ tie-breaking vote in 1993 passing Bill Clinton’s unpopular tax bill.

The Clintons, known for their loyalty to those who fall on their sword for them, campaigned for Margolies in her unsuccessful 2014 congressional bid. Margolies’ son, Marc Mezvinsky, met the Clintons’ daughter, Chelsea, when they were children at a political retreat, and fell in love when they met again at Stanford University. Co-officiating at their wedding was Rabbi James Ponet, the head rabbi at Yale.

After meetying up again with Hillary Clinton at a recent memorial for philanthropist Edgar Bronfman, Ponet said Clinton spoke with sensitivity about Bronfman’s efforts to make Swiss banks accountable for Holocaust-era Jewish assets. “There’s a sense of foundational connection to the Jewish people,” he said of her, “and a sense of the responsibility to the Jewish people in the world.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton is not honest and trustworthy, voters say, but is still the Dem frontrunner // Washington Times // David Sherfinski – June 25, 2015

A majority of voters say former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton is not honest and trustworthy and that her claim to be a fighter for the middle class is just a campaign slogan, but she is still retaining a tight lock on the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination contest and leads all but one of her Republican rivals.

Fifty-two percent of voters said Mrs. Clinton is not honest and trustworthy while 45 percent said she is, a new Fox News poll said.

Forty-four percent said Mrs. Clinton really would be a fighter for the middle class if elected president, while 51 percent said it was just a campaign slogan.

Still, she was the choice of 61 percent of likely Democratic primary voters in the poll, followed by Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont at 15 percent and Vice President Joseph R. Biden Jr. at 11 percent.

She also led a number of potential Republican rivals in head-to-head match-ups, though she was tied with former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush at 43 percent and she led Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida by 1 point, 45 percent to 44 percent.

She led businessman Donald Trump by 17 points, 51 percent to 34 percent, and held 6-point leads against Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas (48 percent to 42 percent), Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (47 percent to 41 percent) and former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina (45 percent to 39 percent).

She also led retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson by 5 points, 46 percent to 41 percent, and Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky by 4 points, 46 percent to 42 percent.

Some Republicans have been working to strike a generational contrast with Mrs. Clinton, with Mr. Rubio calling her a “leader from yesterday” in his April announcement speech.

But seven in 10 voters said they would see a Clinton presidency more as her first term, compared to 21 percent who said they would see it more as bringing back her husband, former President Bill Clinton, for another term.

Fifty-four percent also said they would see her presidency more as a fresh start for her, compared to 38 percent who said they would see it more as a continuation of the policies of President Obama.

The survey of 1,005 registered voters was taken June 21-23 and has a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points, with a margin of error of plus or minus 5 percentage points for the Democratic subgroup.

Hillary Clinton's Newest Consultant Was A Major Keystone Lobbyist // HuffPo // Sam Stein – June 25, 2015

The newest hire for Hillary Clinton’s presidential campaign is a longtime strategist who played a key role in her 2008 primary defeat while working for then-Sen. Barack Obama.

He’s also a Washington lobbyist who lobbied the State Department -- led, at the time, by Secretary of State Hillary Clinton -- on behalf of the company seeking to build the controversial Keystone XL pipeline.

Clinton's new consultant, Jeff Berman, has followed, in many respects, a well-worn path for those in Washington D.C. He spent a large chunk of his career in the public sector before a stint on K Street, and now he's back again. When Clinton hired Berman for his current role, it was seen as something of a coup, because he's known as a master of the mechanics of the primary process. Buzzfeed, which broke the news of Berman's hiring on Wednesday, described him as “a bit of a living legend in the small world that can speak fluently" about the strategic minutiae involved in winning an election.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Certainly anyone who was paying attention during the 2008 election knows what a better grasp the Obama campaign had on the process than the Clinton camp -- which was due in large part to Berman's expertise.

But his hiring doesn't come baggage-free. After Berman left the Obama campaign, he joined the firm Bryan Cave, where he lobbied on behalf of several big-name clients. The most controversial of those clients was TransCanada, the multibillion-dollar company seeking a permit to complete the Keystone XL pipeline, which would transport Alberta's oil sands to refineries in Texas.

According to public records, Berman lobbied for TransCanada from the second quarter of 2009 through the second quarter of 2011. Several other officials from Bryan Cave joined him on the account. For that work, the firm was paid $980,000.

According to the filings, Berman and others lobbied to help obtain "approval for Keystone Pipeline path through Missouri tracts" and later to "monitor climate change legislation and [push for a] presidential permit process for TransCanada Keystone Pipeline." (Other lobbying objectives were listed, but they largely mirrored these two).

Berman lobbied the House, the Senate and multiple federal agencies. In the second and fourth quarters of 2010 and the first quarter of 2011, the State Department was among the agencies that he lobbied. Clinton was running the department at the time.

Now, well into the seventh year of the Obama administration, Keystone remains in political limbo. The administration has not yet issued a decision, though agency comments on the pipeline were due in February.

Environmentalists have deep concerns about the pipeline because it would carry a type of oil that produces higher greenhouse emissions than conventional crude oil, and because of the threat of spills in America's heartland. TransCanada has said it intends to move the oil one way or another, and that it's safer to do it through a pipeline than, say, by rail. The official State Department assessment basically makes the same argument -- that the oil will be burned with or without KXL.

There is also concern about Clinton's position on the matter. Because the pipeline would cross an international border, the State Department is charged with deciding whether it would be in the national interest to grant a permit to the project. While secretary of state in 2010, Clinton said the department was "inclined" to sign off on the pipeline. On the campaign trail, however, Clinton has declined to comment on Keystone one way or the other. And since then, there have been accusations that she's been the object of influence peddling. Two Canadian banks "tightly connected" to promoting the pipeline have paid her $1.6 million for just eight speeches.

A Clinton campaign aide told The Huffington Post that Berman's job will be to work on strategy, helping to count delegates as the team charts out the primary, and that he will not be playing a policy adviser role.

Hillary Clinton Has Hired a Former Keystone Pipeline Lobbyist // The New Republic // Rebecca Leber – June 21, 2015

Hillary Clinton has hired a former lobbyist for the company behind the Keystone XL pipeline, further upsetting environmentalists who have long been wary of her commitment to fighting climate change.

BuzzFeed's Ben Smith reported on Wednesday that the Clinton campaign has hired Jeffrey Berman as a campaign consultant. Berman, who began working for the campaign earlier this month, once lobbied on behalf of TransCanada, the company that hopes to build a pipeline carrying tar sands oil from Canada to the southern coast of the U.S.

R.L. Miller of Climate Hawks Vote said Berman's hiring "is a disappointment—especially as Martin O'Malley is taking flight based on the best climate plan I've seen from a candidate, and Bernie Sanders continues to soar."

"For us it's a signal that she continues to be willing to work with oil and gas interests and take money from folks who are commited to have a pathway to fossil fuels," said Ben Schreiber, Friends of the Earth's climate and energy program director.

In 2008, political operatives described Berman as an "unsung hero" of Obama's upset win over Clinton, due to a strategy that won Obama more delegates in key primaries when Clinton was still ahead in the popular vote. After Obama's win, Berman joined the lobbying firm Bryan Cave LLC, which retained TransCanada as a client until 2013.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Federal disclosures show that TransCanada paid Bryan Cave $120,000 to lobby the State Department—to "monitor climate change legislation and presidential permit process for TransCanada Keystone Pipeline," per the disclosure form—while Clinton was secretary. Berman is listed as the lobbyist on this issue.

In 2010, Clinton said she was "inclined" to approve a permit for the pipeline. She's refused to take a position ever since. "I have steadily made clear that I'm not going to express an opinion" she said in January, which also happened to be the same week the Senate considered a bill to fast-track the six-year-long delay to a permit. Clinton's extended network has other connections to TransCanada, like her 2008 national deputy campaign manager Paul Elliot, now an in-house lobbyist for TransCanada. And the Wall Street Journal reported in February that between Clinton's tenure at the State Department and campaign for president, the Clinton Foundation received millions of dollars in donations from ExxonMobil and nearly half a million dollars from Canada's Foreign Affairs, Trade and Management agency, which supports the pipeline.

Even though Clinton has made early promises to take an aggressive stand on climate change, ennvironmental groups remain wary. Friends of the Earth has requested public records from the State Department on Bryan Cave's lobbying during Clinton's tenure. Still, the bulk of the environmental campaign community is reluctant to criticize the likely Democratic nominee outright. It's unclear whether these donations and distant connections ever represented a conflict of interest for Clinton, and Democratic donor and climate activist Tom Steyer continues to hold fundraisers for Clinton regardless of the criticism.

Clinton's opponents still sense an opportunity to outdo the frontrunner on climate change. Former Maryland Governor Martin O'Malley received positive reviews from Steyer and other activists last week for proposing that the U.S. adopt 100 percent clean energy by 2050. And Vermont's Bernie Sanders already is a favorite among green activists for championing climate legislation in the Senate.

What does Clinton need to do to convince environmentalists she's on their side? Her critics argue she needs to come out with an aggressive and detailed plan to cut greenhouse gas emissions in the next 35 years.

"Hiring as a high-ranking campaign official someone who spent years on TransCanada's payroll lobbying for Keystone is a big step in precisely the wrong direction," a spokesperson for 350 Action said. "We need bold ideas and leadership from our candidates—like a plan to decarbonize the United States by 2050, not a campaign that says nice things about renewable energy while letting Big Oil's lobbyists and cronies drive the bus."

"The best thing Clinton could do for her campaign to bolster her climate credentials," said Climate Hawks Vote's Miller, "is an honest and lengthy interview on the subject of Keystone XL, in which she describes all the steps taken at the State Department that appeared to nudge it forward while maintaining a semblance of neutrality, and the reason she's now deciding to say no to one of the dirtiest and notorious projects of the decade."

Hillary celebrates ruling: 'Yes!' // The Hill // David McCabe – June 25, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton on Thursday celebrated the Supreme Court's decision to uphold subsidies crucial to ObamaCare.

She followed up the tweet with a message imploring her followers to add "your name if you agree: Affordable health care is a basic human right," accompanied by a link to her campaign website. The tweet included a photo of her hugging President Obama in the White House Situation Room after the law passed Congress in 2010.

The court decided in a 6-3 ruling Thursday to uphold the subsidies to 6.4 million people across roughly 34 states. Many on the left feared the the challenge, if it were successful, could take down the president's signature healthcare law.

The ruling is likely to roil the Republican side of the presidential election as well, as conservative candidates look to stake out their opposition to the healthcare law.

Clinton later released a statement urging Republicans to end their attacks on the law.

"Now that the Supreme Court has once again re-affirmed the ACA as the law of the land, it's time for the Republican attacks to end," Clinton said in a statement. "It's time to move on."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Election 2016: 'Chelsea's Mom' Is Hillary Clinton's Fan Love Song // International Business Times // Ginger Gibson – June 25, 2015

The 2016 election has its first fan song. Hillary Clinton is the recipient of a love song, of sorts, from the New York City-based group Well-Strung. It's a reworking of the 2003 hit "Stacy's Mom."

In the original Fountains of Wayne song, the singers lusted after their classmate's mother. The Well-Strung version instead sings a song of praise for "Chelsea's Mom" -- a reference to Clinton's daughter -- and features the members dancing around a life-size cutout of of the candidate. Well-Strung is an all-male string quartet that covers pop music and includes vocals.

The group's manager, Mark Cortale, explained Well-Strung is always trying to stay contemporary. "Since this election is so important and relevant, Well-Strung wanted to put their own spin on a classic pop song to show their support of Hillary Clinton in the 2016 race," he told International Business Times. "The guys recorded this song as an unabashed love letter to Hillary, with no expectations or agenda. That said, they would certainly love the opportunity to perform for her."

The video features images of Clinton tossing her hair and smiling at the camera. "Chelsea's mom has got it going on, she's all we want and we've waited for so long, from sea to shining sea, she'll fight for liberty," the lyrics say. "She's sexy and she's strong, I'm going to vote for Chelsea's mom. Chelsea's mom has got it going on."

One verse even jabs at Republicans. "Why should we put up with zealots like Ted Cruz," the group sings. "Anyone but Clinton will give us the blues. We get a lot of drama from the GOP. And sure we loved Obama, but your mom's the one for me."

It seems the campaign had nothing to do with making the video. The group does display a considerable amount of stickers feature the H logo designed by the campaign and several "Vote for Hillary" signs.

Having fans pen a song that can go viral is one of those unplanned occurrences that a campaign can only hope for. In 2012, Republican Rick Santorum became the beneficiary of a viral fan song called "Game On." His campaign then showered attention on the two young Oklahoma women who recorded it. In 2008, Barack Obama was the beneficiary when a young woman known as "Obama Girl" released a song called "Crush on Obama" that went viral.

Hillary Clinton Wears Epic '90s Outfit in TBT Pic Congratulating Supreme Court's Obamacare Decision // E! // Brett Malec – June 25, 2015

Hillary Clinton is trading in her signature pantsuit style in her last throwback Thursday pic!

The 67-year-old presidential hopeful took to Instagram today to congratulate the Supreme Court's decision to uphold Obamacare with an epic flashback photo of from the '90s.

"I had cared about this issue for a long time, well before Bill and I got into politics, and I believed that access to quality affordable health care was a right American citizens should be guaranteed."–Hillary on her decades-long fight for affordable health care in America #tbt," the pic is captioned. The snapshot shows Hillary meeting with a young boy who appears to be in physical therapy for issues walking. Hillary cheers him on as the boy flashes a smile.

In addition to her do-gooder work when it comes to healthcare, we couldn't help but notice Hillary's epic '90s dress. It's outfits like these that make TBT pics so funny and nostalgic.

Earlier this month, the politico shared a moving video clip that looks back at her early years in politics in honor of flashback Friday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"What is a fighter? To me a fighter is someone who won't give up," a voice said as photos of younger Clinton flash across the screen. The politico is shown at work and meeting with different people throughout her impressive career.

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE

DECLARED

O'MALLEY

Here's what climate hawk Martin O'Malley would do as president // Grist // Ben Adler – June 25, 2015

Say what you will about Martin O'Malley, the former Maryland governor and current Democratic presidential candidate, but the man is a wonk. He may lack for narrative, but he will give you plenty of commonsense solutions. And he has a demonstrated commitment to combatting climate change.

So perhaps it should come as no surprise that despite his lagging far behind Hillary Clinton and even lefty Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) in the polls, he is the first candidate to produce anything resembling a detailed climate policy. It's only a work in progress, and it isn't even available yet on the campaign website. But O'Malley's team shared with Grist a white paper outlining some significant climate change policy proposals. Collectively, they would go further than President Obama has — or than Hillary Clinton has called for thus far.

O'Malley's plans go on for two full pages. The first lists things he would do through executive authority. Here are some of the highlights, in the white paper's own words:

Direct the Environmental Protection Agency to take aggressive action to limit greenhouse gases, expanding rules to other large sources of emissions beyond power plants.

Direct the Environmental Protection Agency to adopt a zero-tolerance policy for methane leaks from current oil and gas production.

Reject projects like Keystone XL that exacerbate climate change and extend our reliance on fossil fuels.

Deny new permits for drilling in Alaska, Antarctica, and off our coasts.

Increase royalties and emissions fees for fossil fuel companies currently drilling on federal lands.

And here are some of the most important policies that O'Malley says he would fight for in Congress:

Set a national, cross-sector Renewable Electricity Standard so our nation is powered by 100% clean energy by 2050.

Fight for federal legislation for a cap on carbon emissions from all sources, with proceeds from permits returned to lower-and middle-class families and invested in job transition assistance and the Clean Energy Corps.

Set a national goal of doubling our energy productivity within 15 years.

End all subsidies for fossil fuels, while extending production and investment tax credits for renewable energy for the long term.

Some of these goals overlap with Obama's and Clinton's. Obama's EPA has already proposed carbon emissions regulations for power plants, and it can't propose opening new avenues until those rules are in place, which won't happen until after Obama leaves office. But it's worth noting that O'Malley explicitly promises to expand carbon regulation to other major sources. O'Malley is presumably referring to other stationary sources of greenhouse gases such as industrial and agricultural activity, which respectively account for 21 and 9 percent of U.S. emissions. EPA has already raised fuel efficiency standards, and therefore reduced emissions, for mobile sources such as cars and trucks. Transportation is responsible for 27 percent of U.S. emissions and electricity generation represents 31 percent. In other words, there is potentially as much to be gained from going after industry and agriculture as power plants.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When Clinton addressed the League of Conservation Voters last year, she said, regarding the Clean Power Rule, "The unprecedented action that President Obama has taken must be protected at all cost." That's hugely important, because congressional Republicans are certain to keep attacking it. But promising to also tackle other major sources is even better.

On methane leaks, a growing source of greenhouse gas emissions thanks to the fracking boom, O'Malley promises to go considerably farther than Obama. In January, the Obama administration laid out a plan to reduce methane leakage, but climate hawks were underwhelmed. As I explained at the time, the Obama administration intends only to regulate new and modified wells, even though existing wells will continue to operate and leak. According to an Environmental Defense Fund study, wells in operation since 2011 will account for up to 90 percent of methane emissions from oil and gas in 2018. O'Malley's promise to regulate methane leaks from current wells would address that.

Another key difference between O'Malley and Obama is that O'Malley doesn't subscribe to Obama's "all of the above" energy policy. While Obama tries to boost domestic production of oil and gas along with renewables, O'Malley is focused solely on the latter. So O'Malley promises to reject the Keystone XL pipeline, which Obama hasn't taken a stance on yet, and to block other proposals to invest in fossil fuel infrastructure. O'Malley also would reject proposals to drill off American coasts, whereas Obama plans to open areas of the Atlantic and Arctic Oceans to oil and gas leasing.

On all of these issues, it's impossible to know where exactly Hillary Clinton stands in relation to Obama and O'Malley. As Obama's secretary of state, Clinton could not publicly contradict Obama's policies. Like Obama, she hasn't taken a stance on Keystone. As a senator, Clinton supported offshore drilling, and as secretary of state she promoted fracking abroad.

One point of agreement among the Democrats that is long overdue: O'Malley and Clinton both say they would charge more for fossil fuel leases on federal land, something the Obama administration is finally just beginning to work on.

O'Malley's plans to call for various actions from Congress are less important, since he is unlikely to get them passed. Republican control of the House of Representatives is unlikely to change before 2023 because of partisan gerrymandering.

But a lot can change in politics in just a few years. In 2008, Republican presidential nominee John McCain proposed cap-and-trade legislation. A year later he wouldn't support the exact same sort of bill. Maybe Republicans will come around to saving the planet.

If they do, O'Malley's proposals would look a lot like Obama's: setting a carbon cap and selling permits and investing in renewables and eliminating fossil fuel subsidies. O'Malley would set even more ambitious goals than Obama. The president came into office aiming for 10 percent renewable sources of electricity by 2012, and 25 percent by 2025. Right now, we're at 13 percent. O'Malley wants 100 percent renewable electricity by 2050, and doubling our energy productivity by 2030. (Energy productivity measures the dollars of economic output produced from a given amount of energy consumption. It overlaps significantly with energy efficiency, but is a different way of measuring progress.)

In the months ahead, according to his campaign, O'Malley will emphasize the importance of climate change and release further, more detailed proposals.

Last Thursday, when Pope Francis issued his encyclical calling for action to address climate change, O'Malley, a Catholic, published an op-ed in USA Today proposing to eliminate fossil fuel energy by 2050. A few paragraphs in particular stand out:

Clean energy represents the biggest business and job creation opportunity we've seen in a hundred years. And reliance on local, renewable energy sources means a more secure nation and a more stable world.

Given the grave threat that climate change poses to human life on our planet, we have not only a business imperative but a moral obligation to future generations to act immediately and aggressively.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This is why protecting the United States from the devastating impact of climate change — while capitalizing on the job creation opportunity of clean energy — is at the center of my campaign for president.

Like Sanders, who is a prominent climate hawk, O'Malley is promising to treat climate change — an issue that is often marginalized even by pro-environment candidates — as the hugely important challenge that it is. And O'Malley, like Sanders, is unafraid to set himself apart from Obama and the centrist, corporatist wing of his party that embraces fossil fuel development. "We cannot meet the climate challenge with an all-of-the-above energy strategy, or by drilling off our coasts, or by building pipelines that bring oil from tar sands in Canada," O'Malley writes in USA Today. "Instead, we must be intentional and committed to one over-arching goal as a people: a full, complete transition to renewable energy — and an end to our reliance on fossil fuels." Environmental leaders such as NextGen Climate founder Tom Steyer and Sierra Club executive director Michael Brune praised O'Malley's op-ed for its boldness.

When Sanders issues climate change policy proposals, they will surely be strong — although it remains to be seen whether he will match O'Malley in committing to clamping down on fossil fuel production. But the really big question looming over the Democratic primary is whether Clinton will offer ambitious new proposals like O'Malley's — or just more of the same half-measures as Obama.

SANDERS

A pro-O'Malley super PAC goes after Sanders on guns // WaPo // John Wagner – June 25, 2015

A super PAC supporting Democratic presidential hopeful Martin O'Malley is attacking Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) for his record on guns in new Web ads targeting Iowa voters.

The ads by the Generation Forward PAC assert that "Bernie Sanders is no progressive when it comes to guns" and highlight several votes the senator has taken over the years, including one in 1993 against the landmark Brady Bill, which mandated federal background checks on firearms purchasers.

Sanders, who has emerged as the chief Democratic challenger to Hillary Rodham Clinton, represents a state where hunting is a way of life and anyone can carry a concealed weapon without a permit. His record on gun control is mixed and also includes a 2005 vote to shield manufacturers from lawsuits brought by victims of gun violence.

Though O'Malley is barred by law from coordinating with the super PAC, the 15-second ads suggest that his supporters think he can make some headway against Sanders on the issue in the wake of last week's church massacre in Charleston, S.C. A separate ad purchased by the PAC highlights O'Malley's record as governor of Maryland, including a 2013 law that banned 45 types of assault rifles and required new fingerprinting requirements for handgun purchases.

In recent days, as he's been asked about his record on guns, Sanders has pointed out that he has a D- grade from the National Rifle Association and has supported a ban on assault weapons and background checks in the past.

At a news conference on another issue on Capitol Hill on Thursday, Sanders declined to directly address the ad, but said that "if you look at my record, you will find that we do have a strong record" on guns.

In an interview, Jeff Weaver, Sanders's campaign manager, said: "If Martin O'Malley wants to engage in negative campaigning before he introduces himself to the country, that's up to him."

Weaver said that Sanders is open to a discussion about guns, but he said "that discussion has to entail how we bridge the gap between rural and urban areas. Guns mean different things to different parts of the country."

Ron Boehmer, a spokesman for the pro-O'Malley PAC, said the size of the ad buy is in the "five digits" and would be disclosed later Thursday.

A pair of new polls released by Bloomberg Politics shows Sanders as the strongest challenger to Clinton in both Iowa and New Hampshire, the first two nominating states. In Iowa, Clinton draws the support of 50 percent of likely caucus-goers, while Sanders draws 24 percent. O'Malley is at 2 percent. In

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

New Hampshire, Clinton attracts the support of 56 percent of likely primary voters, compared to 24 percent for Sanders and 2 percent for O'Malley.

Claire McCaskill, a major Clinton ally, unloads on Bernie Sanders // Politico // Daniel Strauss – June 25, 2015

Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.) unloaded on her Senate colleague Bernie Sanders on Thursday, saying the Vermont independent is far too liberal to make it to the White House.

"I think that the media is giving Bernie a pass right now," McCaskill said in an interview on MSNBC's "Morning Joe." "I very rarely read in any coverage of Bernie that he's a socialist. I think everybody wants a fight and I think they are not really giving the same scrutiny to Bernie Sanders that they're giving to, certainly, Hillary Clinton and the other candidates."

McCaskill endorsed Clinton's 2016 bid almost exactly two years ago, in June 2013, making her one of the former secretary of state's earliest major Democratic backers. In the 2008 cycle, she endorsed then-Sen. Barack Obama over Clinton.

But this time, she's all in for Hillary.

"So she's going to win this, and as soon as I think they begin treating [Sanders] like a serious candidate instead of, 'Oh my gosh, it's so great we've got a fight in the Democratic Party', I think it'll be very clear," McCaskill said.

"Any other candidate that had the numbers that Hillary Clinton had right now would be talked about as absolutely untouchable," she said. "I think Bernie is too liberal to gather enough votes in this country to become president, and I think Hillary Clinton is going to become a fantastic president."

same day that a pair of new polls showed Sanders gaining momentum in Iowa and New Hampshire. Both those polls, from Bloomberg Politics, found Clinton with a substantial lead.

Meanwhile, the super PAC aligned with former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, another candidate running in the Democratic primary, released an ad Thursday, attacking Sanders on gun control.

"Bernie Sanders is no progressive when it comes to guns," the voice-over said.

Sanders said McCaskill's comments were a first for him.

"This is the first time I've had a colleague attack me," Sanders said in an interview with New Hampshire's WADR radio station later on Thursday. "You'll have to ask Senator McCaskill why."

Bernie Sanders Calls For 65% Top Estate Tax Rate // Forbes // Ashley Ebeling – June 25, 2015

U.S. Presidential hopeful Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) called today for lowering the amount individuals can shield from the federal estate tax, and hiking estate tax rates across the board, as he introduced the Responsible Estate Tax Act. "This is a piece of legislation that addresses what I consider to be the most significant moral issue of our time," he said at a press conference in Washington, D.C., citing growing economic inequality.

"Inequality is a crisis that threatens our country," echoed Rep. Jan Schakowsky (D-Ill.), who is sponsoring a companion bill in the House of Representatives.

Sen. Sanders' supporters listening in on Periscope tweeted: "We are the 99%." "Got to get this guy elected!" A few skeptics chimed in too: "Well, it's their money..why can't they keep it?" "I understand the Walmart family, but if I die with $2 million, am I taxed twice?"

The guy worth $2 million doesn't have to worry. The Sanders bill, a rewrite of a bill he introduced in 2010—the year the estate tax lapsed under the Bush tax cuts — would exempt the first $3.5 million on an individual's estate from estate tax. (A married couple could shelter $7 million.) That's a huge drop from current law, a “permanent” $5 million exemption, indexed for inflation, brokered effective Jan. 1, 2011. For 2015, the individual exemption is $5.43 million ($10.86 million for a married couple). Still just 3 out of every 1,000 people who die would be subject to estate tax under the Sanders bill, compared to 2 out of 1,000 now. The higher the exemption, the more people don’t pay estate tax.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For those who owe estate taxes, the tax rate is a flat 40% under current law. Under Sen. Sanders’ legislation, the tax rate would be 45% for estates valued between $3.5 million and $10 million. The rate on estates worth more than $10 million and below $50 million would be 50%, and the rate on estates worth more than $50 million would be 55%. An additional surtax of another 10%–for a 65% rate—would be assessed on billionaires.

The legislation also would close estate tax loopholes used by the rich, ending tax breaks for dynasty trusts, GRATs, and “sharply” limiting the annual exclusion from the gift tax—now set at $14,000 (you can now give $14,000 to as many individuals as you want each year without worrying about federal estate or gift tax)–down to $10,000, further limited if given in trust.

Estate tax foes beat Sen. Sanders with a bill to repeal the estate tax earlier this year. In April, the House of Representatives voted to kill the federal estate tax 240-179, with 7 Democrats joining. Anti-death tax advocates say it sets the stage for possible repeal in 2017. The repeal bill, H.R. 1105, was introduced by Kevin Brady (R-TX). Sen. John Thune (R-SD) sponsored a companion bill, S. 860.

Meanwhile Republican Senator Marco Rubio (R-FL) became the first declared Presidential candidate of the 2016 election season to sign the Family Business Coalition’s Death Tax Repeal Pledge: “I Hereby Pledge to Support Repeal of the Federal Estate Tax.”

Note, there are still 19 states plus the District of Columbia that impose their own state versions of death taxes (estate and/or inheritance taxes). Vermont is one; it has an exemption of $2.75 million per person and has a top 16% tax rate.

“So few have so much, so many have so little; there’s disenchantment,” Sen. Sanders said. “People want change.”

For first time, O'Malley-linked group goes after Sanders // CNN // Dan Merica – June 25, 2015

A pro-Martin O'Malley super PAC knocked Bernie Sanders over guns in a short video posted on Thursday, the first time a group associated with the former Maryland governor attacked his foremost progressive opponent in the bid to emerge as Hillary Clinton's main competition.

The ad by Generation Forward PAC, titled "Time for a Debate," may be tacit acknowledgment by the O'Malley camp that the former Maryland governor's poll numbers are stagnating while the senator's are rising.

After noting that Sanders voted against the Brady Bill and voted to give gun manufacturers protections against lawsuits, the ad bluntly says, "Bernie Sanders is no progressive when it comes to guns."

At a press conference on Capitol Hill Thursday, Sanders declined to directly address the ad, stating instead that "if you look at my record, you will find that we do have a strong record" on guns.

The latest chapter in the gun control debate was sparked after a white man walked into a historically black church in Charleston, South Carolina, last week and killed nine African-Americans in a racially-motivated attack.

In the eyes of gun control activists, Sanders has a mixed and moderate background on the issue, something that contrasts with his more liberal persona. For much of his career, Sanders has followed the lead of his Vermont constituents -- who mostly back gun rights for hunters -- by keeping a generally states' rights view of gun laws.

But Sanders has voted to tighten gun laws in the past. He approved the 1994 assault weapons ban, and after the shootings in Newtown, Connecticut in 2012, Sanders backed Obama's failed push for more background checks and another assault weapons ban.

Last week, Sanders took a cautious approach when CNN questioned him about his position on gun laws, stating that he thinks "we need to have a conversation about" laws, but that rural and urban America need to understand how each other feel before laws move forward.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

After a follow-up question, Sanders shied away from the debate. "I will talk about guns at some length, but not right now," he said, a comment that contrasted with his usual blunt, brash and proudly liberal persona.

Unlike Sanders, O'Malley has consistently backed tighter gun control laws. His team regularly claims that he passed the "most comprehensive gun control law in the country" in 2013, a law that banned new assault weapons, lowered magazine capacity, required fingerprints for firearm purchase and increased regulations on gun dealers.

After the shooting in Charleston, O'Malley told his supporters via email that he was "pissed" about the nation's unwillingness to pass gun control.

Recent polling has shown O'Malley is falling behind while Sanders is surging. Both declared their presidential bids earlier this year, running to be the liberal alternative to Clinton, the race's frontrunner.

A Fox News poll out Wednesday found that O'Malley gets 1% of national Democratic support, compared to Sanders who enjoyed 15%. Clinton is way out in front, however, with 61% support.

O'Malley is equally behind in early states, according to a Bloomberg Politics poll. The former Maryland governor has 2% support, according to the poll, in both Iowa and New Hampshire. Sanders has 24% in both early voting states.

Pro-Martin O'Malley Super PAC Targets Bernie Sanders // TIME // Sam Frizell – June 25, 2015

A super PAC supporting Democratic presidential candidate Martin O'Malley released a video Thursday attacking liberal rival Bernie Sanders' gun control record, marking the first critical advertisement of the 2016 primary for the Democratic nomination.

In the 15-second ad released on YouTube Thursday morning, the pro-O'Malley super PAC Generation Forward points to Sanders' 1993 vote against the Brady Bill, which required background checks for gun purchases and his later vote to protect gun manufacturers from victim lawsuits.

The ad also points out that the National Rifle Association paid for ads attacking a Sanders opponent in a 1990 congressional race.

"Bernie Sanders is no progressive when it comes to guns," intones a voice in the ad.

It's a small, yet significant move in the Democratic primary race. Until now, none of the candidates or their proxies have put forward ads attacking their Democratic competitors' records. O'Malley has implicitly criticized Clinton, but generally refrained from direct attacks.

After the ad was posted on YouTube, Sanders tweeted a response from his personal account.

A spokesperson for O'Malley's campaign said the former governor was not aware of the ad before it was released and that he doesn't currently fundraise for Generation Forward.

O'Malley's super PAC is a scrappy operation without the fundraising firepower of the pro-Hillary Clinton Priorities USA or Jeb Bush's Right to Rise operations. The governor's long shot chance in winning the primary and his anti-Wall Street rhetoric don't help attract donors, and many donors that do contribute to his nascent campaign will do so directly, not to outside groups.

Damian O'Doherty, who runs Generation Forward, recognizes as much.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We have to do the things that the Ewoks taught us in Return of the Jedi," said O'Doherty, referring to the furry, technologically backward animal species that helps defeat the powerful Galactic Empire in the third Star Wars movie. "If I think I'm running some slick TV effort—no way."

Instead, O'Doherty says the strategy is to run a ground-based grassroots operation in the early states and targeting voters through digital efforts. Generation Forward is hiring staff and has already rented out office space in Des Moines. "It's knocking on doors," he said. "It's old-time and online."

Part of the strategy involves testing ad models on voters in Iowa to test messaging, and finding areas in which O'Malley differs from Clinton and Sanders.

"We're going to constantly encourage debate, and that's what this ad is intended to do," said O'Doherty about his group's ad criticizing Sanders' gun positions.

Sanders—a staunchly left progressive who supports single-payer healthcare and sweeping tax reforms—has a moderate record on gun rights. While he supports basic gun control including an assault weapons ban and background checks, he has expressed skepticism about the effects of gun control.

"Obviously, we need strong sensible gun control, and I will support it," Sanders said in an interview with NPR. "But some people think it's going to solve all of our problems, and it's not."

O'Malley, by contrast, enacted as Maryland governor some of the toughest gun laws in the country, banning high-capacity magazines and assault rifles and tightening background checks.

MARTIN O'MALLEY AD HITS NOT HILLARY CLINTON — BUT BERNIE SANDERS? // First Look // Lee Fang – June 25, 2015

Let's say you're running underdog Democratic presidential candidate Martin O'Malley's Super PAC. What's the first order of business?

Could it be: Convincing voters he has a shot? Trying to chip away at the Hillary Clinton colossus?

Well, in the mixed-up world of presidential politics, where it's sometimes not entirely clear whether candidates are running for president or jockeying for the vice presidential nod, O'Malley's Super PAC on Thursday released an ad slamming not Hillary Clinton — but fellow underdog Bernie Sanders.

The ad, released by O'Malley's Super PAC, Generation Forward, is one of the first ads released on behalf of O'Malley's campaign. It labels Sanders "no progressive when it comes to guns." The commercial flashes headlines from online news articles calling Sanders a "gun nut." In a message about the anti-Sanders ad, the pro-O'Malley PAC explained on Facebook, "You can't claim to soak the fat boys and exempt the profiteers in the gun industry."

As the Boston Globe recently reported, Sanders "has amassed a mixed record" on gun issues, voting against the landmark Brady gun control bill but voting in support of a ban on assault weapons in the aftermath of the Sandy Hook school shooting. As the Globe noted, activists have found that Sanders has shown little interest in gun-related legislation.

Watch the commercial here.

The O'Malley attack on Bernie appeared online only shortly after Sen. Claire McCaskill, D-Mo., a close ally of the Hillary Clinton campaign, appeared on MSNBC this morning to bash Sanders. "I very rarely read in any coverage of Bernie that he's a socialist," McCaskill said on MSNBC.

The Generation Forward Super PAC is led by two O'Malley supporters, Damian O'Doherty and Ron Boehmer. Federal Communications Commission records reveal that Generation Forward contracts with Fortune Media, a Democratic ad-buying firm that has previously worked on behalf of Emily's List.

During the 2008 presidential election, O'Malley co-chaired the business-friendly Democratic Leadership Council, authoring an opinion column with Harold Ford to persuade his party not to drift too far to the left. He also served as a surrogate for Hillary Clinton's campaign against Barack Obama for the Democratic nomination.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Though he kicked off his campaign with a pledge to take on Wall Street, the Maryland politician rarely embraced economic populism during his time as mayor of Baltimore or as governor.

The ad today left observers perplexed about what O'Malley is really trying to accomplish.

Josh Kraushaar, politics editor at National Journal, noted that the new ad today shows that O'Malley is "hitting Bernie Sanders more than Hillary Clinton."

Bernie Sanders Gains on Hillary Clinton in Bloomberg Early-State Polling // Bloomberg News // John McCormick – June 25, 2015

Bernie Sanders is gaining on Hillary Clinton in Iowa and New Hampshire, with an appeal as an issue-oriented protest vehicle potentially capable of slowing any coronation of the popular front-runner.

In simultaneous surveys, the U.S. senator from Vermont received nearly a quarter of support from likely Democratic caucus and primary voters in the states that host the first presidential nomination balloting early next year, cutting sharply into Clinton's still-huge lead.

The polls suggest substantive and symbolic support for the socialist, as well as a craving among some Democrats for a Clinton rival to rise.

"I want to try to get him along as far as I can," said Democratic poll participant John Murphy, 74, a retired railroad worker in West Des Moines, Iowa. "He's going to bring up some issues that she may not want to talk about."

The surveys were commissioned to test sources of strength for Sanders, who has seen audiences at his campaign events swell in recent weeks. The polls were conducted June 19-22 by West Des Moines-based Selzer & Co. in Iowa and Washington-area Purple Strategies in New Hampshire, the latter done in cooperation with Saint Anselm College. The margin of error on the full samples—401 in Iowa, 400 in New Hampshire—is plus or minus 4.9 percentage points.

In Iowa, Clinton leads Sanders 50 percent to 24 percent, and in New Hampshire, 56 percent to 24 percent. That's a six- to eight-point increase in his support since those states were polled by Bloomberg Politics and partners in May.

With nearly identical support in Iowa and New Hampshire, the polls suggest Sanders' rise isn't just because he enjoys New England neighbor-state status. In both states, he gets higher marks than Clinton on authenticity and willingness to take on Wall Street and financial elites.

Along the campaign trail, Sanders appears to be changing some minds: His unfavorable rating in Iowa is just 4 percent, down 8 percentage points since May. At the same time, 57 percent now view him positively, up 10 points from the last poll.

"You can make the case that a certain amount of Bernie Sanders's support is a protest vote, but there's more to it than that," said J. Ann Selzer, president of Selzer & Co. "People like him. They like what he stands for. They like showing up at his events and hearing him say things they believe in."

Clinton's support has dropped by 7 points in Iowa and 6 points in New Hampshire. Among likely Democratic voters, she's viewed favorably by 88 percent in Iowa and 86 percent in New Hampshire. That's up two points since May in Iowa and unchanged in New Hampshire, and comparable to the popularity of her husband, former President Bill Clinton.

Yet Sanders' team points to mounting evidence that the white-haired, sometimes seemingly grumpy senator could offer voters an appealing alternative to Clinton, a former U.S. secretary of state, senator, and first lady viewed as the overwhelming Democratic nomination front-runner.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“It's tremendous progress that he is making with voters in the first two states,” Tad Devine, Sanders' chief political strategist, said of the poll findings. “It's something we felt on the ground.”

While Sanders is indeed enjoying something of a mini-surge in the two states, the polls show he's almost certain to hit a ceiling eventually, said Purple Strategies' Doug Usher.

“Clinton remains enormously well-known and well-liked in New Hampshire, a state she won before,” Usher said. “She benefits from a gender gap in a primary that will be disproportionately female, and even Sanders’ voters admit Clinton is likely the nominee. As long as Democrats like both candidates simultaneously, Sanders will have an uphill climb.”

The New Hampshire survey shows the race not as close there as a poll released last week by Suffolk University , which had Clinton at 41 percent and Sanders at 31 percent. Unlike the Bloomberg Politics/Saint Anselm poll, the Suffolk survey didn’t start with a database of registered voters, instead relying more on the self-reported likelihood of voting in the primary. It also included Vice President Joe Biden, while this one didn’t.

Clinton swamps Sanders on who can beat the Republican nominee in the general election, foreign-policy experience, and knowing how to get things done in Washington. The two find roughly equal support among likely Democratic voters on who will fight for average people and who will care for people like themselves. Depending on the state, Sanders has a 7- to 18-point edge on taking on Wall Street and a 12- to 17-point advantage on authenticity.

“His priorities are right and he’s not going to just crumble under the status quo,” said Anne Welch, 59, a caregiver who lives in Penacook, New Hampshire. “He won’t compromise.”

Welch, who once lived in Vermont and met Sanders, said she supported Clinton in 2008. “I kind of feel like I’m betraying my gender,” she said.

Clinton's team has worked to dampen expectations, noting that it's rare for a Democratic candidate who isn't an incumbent president to win more than 50 percent in Iowa's caucuses. The goal is to try to avoid having her seen as a wounded front-runner should she fail to dominate the first contest. In 2008, she finished third in Iowa and her aura of inevitability was badly damaged by an insurgent Barack Obama.

That sense of inevitability is strong again in Iowa and New Hampshire, with four-fifths of likely Democratic voters in both states saying they think Clinton is destined to be the nominee. Even among supporters of Sanders, 69 percent of those in Iowa say she'll be the party's eventual nominee. Clinton’s own Iowa supporters are even more confident, with 93 percent saying she'll be the standard-bearer. Her campaign declined to comment on these polls.

Among independents likely to participate in the Iowa caucuses—about a fifth of the probable electorate—Sanders leads Clinton, 35 percent to 29 percent. In May, she led with that group by 19 points. (The margin of error is higher in subgroups like these.)

Women in Iowa are much more likely to back Clinton than men are, 59 percent to 39 percent. Among women, she leads Sanders 59 percent to 19 percent, while it’s much narrower advantage among men, 39 percent to 30 percent.

While some Democrats and independents are welcoming Sanders to the race with their support, it doesn't mean they're rejecting Clinton.

Almost nine in 10 who are supporting Sanders in New Hampshire, and 83 percent in Iowa, say they're backing him because of what he stands for. Just 13 percent in Iowa and 9 percent in New Hampshire say their decision is because they don't want Clinton to get the nomination, or because they want to send her a message.

Matthew Cook, 27, who just completed a physics degree and lives in Waterloo, Iowa, said Sanders has been “a really consistent politician, which is hard to find.” He plans to vote for Sanders if for no reason other than to push Clinton on the issues he cares most about, including gay marriage, climate change, and fair trade.

“She needs to come out and firmly state where her opinions are,” he said. “There can’t be any ambiguity.”

Bernie Sanders Responds to Claire McCaskill Attack: This Is a First // Bloomberg News // Arit John – June 25, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democratic presidential candidate Bernie Sanders on Thursday responded to criticism from his Senate colleague, Claire McCaskill of Missouri, that he is too liberal to credibly challenge Hillary Clinton.

“To the best of my knowledge, this is the first time that a colleague has attacked me,” said Sanders, a Vermont socialist who joined the presidential race about two months ago, in an interview with Bloomberg Politics' Mark Halperin and John Heilemann. “You'll have to ask Senator McCaskill why.”

McCaskill, who supported President Obama during the 2008 election, was quick to back Clinton this cycle, and said on MSNBC's Morning Joe Thursday that Sanders “is too liberal to gather enough votes in this country to become president.” Her comments came on the heels of Bloomberg Politics polling in Iowa and New Hampshire that showed Sanders gaining ground on Clinton, though the former secretary of state still holds a formidable lead.

“To the best of my knowledge, this is the first time that a colleague has attacked me.”

Senator Bernie Sanders

“Do I believe, in opposition to Senator McCaskill, that we need trade policies that are fair to the American worker, and not just benefit CEOs and large corporations?” Sanders said. “I plead guilty.”

Sanders said he “absolutely” believes in a single-payer health care system and opposes the Trans-Pacific Partnership.

McCaskill said the media has given Sanders a pass, especially when it comes to pointing out his political leanings.

“I find it surprising that she says that the media doesn't refer to me as a socialist,” Sanders said. “There's no article that I've seen that doesn't refer to me as a democratic socialist. I am.”

Sanders often laments negative advertising and character attacks in modern politics. A super-PAC supporting another Democratic presidential candidate, former Maryland Governor Martin O'Malley, unveiled Web advertising in Iowa on Thursday going after Sanders on gun issues. The candidate tweeted Thursday afternoon:

Sanders In 1985: Sandinista Leader “Impressive,” Castro “Totally Transformed” Cuba // Buzzfeed // Megan Apper – June 25, 2015

Sen. Bernie Sanders, the socialist from Vermont who is now challenging Hillary Clinton for the 2016 Democratic nomination, praised the Castro regime and Nicaragua’s Sandinista government upon returning from a trip to South America in 1985.

In an interview that aired on Channel 17/Town Meeting Television, Sanders called Nicaraguan President Daniel Ortega, “an impressive guy,” and said that while Fidel Castro wasn’t “perfect,” Americans shouldn’t forget that “just because Ronald Reagan dislikes these people, doesn’t mean that people in their own nations feel the same way.”

According to his book, Outsider in the House, Sanders traveled to Nicaragua on the invitation of the Sandinista government, to witness the celebration of the “Seventh Anniversary of the Revolution.” By his own account, he was the “highest ranking American official present” at the event.

Upon his return, Sanders said that he was “impressed” with the “intelligence and sincerity” of Sandinista leaders, arguing that they were not the “political hacks” some had portrayed them to be.

“You do not fight, and lose your family, and get tortured, to go to jail for years to be a hack,” said Sanders, adding that the Sandinistas had “very deep convictions.”

Sanders also said he was “impressed” by Father d’Escoto — at the time, Nicaragua’s Minister of Foreign Affairs — who he described as “very gentle” and a “loving man.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Acknowledging that his favorable assessment of the Sandinistas could lead to his being “attacked by every editorial writer in the free press for being a ‘dumb dupe,’” Sanders countered that such a reaction was due in part to the fact that the Reagan White House had “trained and well paid people who are professional manipulators of the media,” and who possessed a “sophistication” that Ortega and the Sandinistas lacked.

The Sandinistas, Sanders explained, had to “improve their ability to communicate with the average American.”

Sanders also commented on Fidel Castro, pointing to the lack of resistance to Castro as proof that Americans would be “very, very mistaken” to expect a popular uprising against the Sandinistas in Nicaragua.

“In 1959 […] everybody was totally convinced that Castro was the worst guy in the world and all of the Cuban people were going to rise up in rebellion against Fidel Castro,” said Sanders. “They forgot that he educated their kids, gave their kids healthcare, totally transformed the society.”

“So they expected this tremendous uprising in Cuba,” Sanders continued, but “it never came. And if they are expecting a tremendous uprising in Nicaragua, they are very, very, very mistaken.”

Sanders insisted that he did not mean to suggest “that Fidel Castro and Cuba are perfect; they certainly are not.”

But “just because Ronald Reagan dislikes these people,” he argued, “doesn’t mean that people in their own nations feel the same way.”

in the coming days, the former secretary of state is not scheduled to appear.

Sanders: My Views Resonating With Women as Campaign Keeps Rising // Bloomberg News // Alexa Papadopoulos – June 25, 2015

“I think people who think we have reached our ceiling are making a mistake,” Sen. Bernie Sanders says in interview to air on Bloomberg Television’s “With All Due Respect.”

Sanders says his proposals aimed at women, working families will boost his bid, increasing competitiveness with Democratic presidential frontrunner Hillary Clinton

“We are about to unveil a childcare proposal for universal Pre-K, which I think will make working families all around the country extremely excited”

Sanders, an independent from Vt. seeking the Democratic nomination, says plan includes paid vacation time, paid sick live.

Sanders says views on taxes, boosting public infrastructure spending, raising minimum wage, equal pay for women, making public college tuition free also will resonate with voters

Says wants to be a part of a “political revolution” to make changes in Washington with millions of American at his side.

This new anti–Bernie Sanders video shows Martin O'Malley is getting desperate // VOX // Andrew Prokap – June 25, 2015

Hillary Clinton remains in a dominant position in the Democratic presidential primary, but it's looking increasingly like Bernie Sanders is emerging as her main challenger — which means that Martin O'Malley isn't. Indeed, the former Maryland governor is barely topping 1 percent of the vote in national and early state polls.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As a result, the people behind the main pro-O'Malley Super PAC , Generation Forward, seem to be getting restless — so they've released a new web video attacking Sanders's record on guns, along with one praising O'Malley's.

But just hours later, Sanders gave what looked like an indirect response to the new video, on Twitter:

It's a rather remarkable testament to Sanders's success so far that what may be the first explicit attack video of the Democratic contest targets him — it makes it even clearer that Sanders has emerged as the clear second-place contender (though he's still well behind Hillary Clinton).

It is accurate that Sanders is pretty far from being a staunch liberal on the gun issue — likely reflecting the views of his rural Vermont constituents. However, in 2013, Sanders voted for the Democrats' post-Newtown gun control bill, which didn't become law, but would have expanded background checks and restored the assault weapons ban. He said then that there was "a growing consensus" that "we have got to do as much as we can to end the cold-blooded mass murders of innocent people."

Overall, though, the bigger problem for O'Malley is that activists on the left are excited about Sanders's candidacy in a way they just aren't about his own. And it doesn't seem likely that attack ads will solve that problem for him.

Bernie Sanders joins push for DC statehood // The Hill // Tim Devaney – June 25, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Bernie Sanders and a group of more than a dozen senators are calling for Washington, D.C., to become the 51st state in the nation.

In their proposal, the federal government would still maintain control over portions of the nation’s capital that surround the White House, Congress, Supreme Court and National Mall.

The rest of the nation’s capital would be renamed New Columbia and given full representation in Congress under the legislation introduced by Sen. Tom Carper (D-Del.).

Sen. Sanders (I-Vt.), one of 16 co-sponsors of the New Columbia Admission Act, said it is "morally wrong" to block District residents from federal representation.

“Washington D.C. is currently home to more people than the state of Vermont, yet its residents lack voting representation in Congress," Sanders told The Hill in a statement. "I think it is morally wrong for American citizens who pay federal taxes, fight in our wars, and live in our country to be denied the basic right to full congressional representation.”

The sentiment was echoed by Carper.

“The District of Columbia is not just a collection of government offices, monuments and museums,” Carper said in a statement. "It is home to more than 600,000 people who build lives, families, and careers here. These Americans serve in our military, die defending our country, serve on our juries, and pay federal taxes. Yet, despite their civic contributions, they are not afforded a vote in either chamber of Congress."

UNDECLARED

WEBB

Jim Webb Criticized for Comments on Confederate Flag // NYT // Alan Rappeport – June 25, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Former Senator Jim Webb, the Democrat from Virginia, has struggled to generate much excitement over his potential presidential campaign, but on Wednesday he managed to attract some attention with some curious comments about the Confederate battle flag.

In a statement on Facebook, Mr. Webb said that any discussion of the flag needed to be tempered with respect for the "complicated history of the Civil War."

He went on to explain that while the flag had been used as a symbol of racism in recent decades, that was not always the case.

"We should also remember that honorable Americans fought on both sides in the Civil War, including slave holders in the Union Army from states such as Missouri, Kentucky, Maryland and Delaware, and that many nonslave holders fought for the South," Mr. Webb wrote.

The Confederate flag has been denounced by Democrats and Republicans alike in the last week since the killing of nine churchgoers in Charleston, S.C. Mr. Webb's sentiment was rebutted by even his most loyal backers on Wednesday.

"As one of your most enthusiastic supporters, I have to disagree with you on this issue," David Dickerson wrote in a comment on Mr. Webb's post. "As a fellow Southerner, I prefer to take Robert E. Lee's path and disassociate from that flag and what it stands for."

Others, such as Jordan Genso, expressed disappointment.

"I don't need to agree with you on every issue in order to support you, but this should be low-hanging fruit for you to be on the right side of," Mr. Genso wrote. "And there's no reason not to state that the Confederate battle flag represents a quasi-nation whose short existence was spent trying to fight for an immoral cause."

Mr. Webb has a history of defending the confederacy. In a 1990 speech at the Confederate Memorial in Arlington, Va., he said, "I am not here to apologize for why they fought, although modern historians might contemplate that there truly were different perceptions in the North and South about those reasons, and that most Southern soldiers viewed the driving issue to be sovereignty rather than slavery."

In 2008, Politico reported that Mr. Webb's book "Born Fighting" seemed to sympathize with the Confederate cause, potentially giving pause to then Senator Barack Obama as he was vetting potential running mates. In Mr. Webb's book, Born Fighting, he wrote about acquiring a Confederate headstone through the Veterans Administration for a great-great-grandfather.

A Vietnam War veteran who has been considered a potential presidential candidate over the years, Mr. Webb announced last year that he was forming a presidential exploratory committee. This year, he said the Democratic Party could do a better job appealing to white working-class voters.

On Wednesday, Mr. Webb recalled that the Confederate Memorial at Arlington National Cemetery was meant to recognize the character of soldiers who fought on both sides of the Civil War.

"This is a time for us to come together," he said, "and to recognize once more that our complex multicultural society is founded on the principle of mutual respect."

Bernie Sanders Attacked For Not Being Liberal Enough // The Weekly Standard // Michael Warren – June 25, 2015

Vermont senator Bernie Sanders is being attacked in a new ad for not being liberal enough on guns.

"Bernie Sanders is no progressive when it comes to guns," says a voiceover in the 15-second spot, which criticizes the socialist senator's votes against two gun-control bills. The ad also notes the National Rifle Association's support for Sanders. Watch the video below:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The sponsor of the ad is Generation Forward, a super PAC supporting former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley. O'Malley is challenging Sanders for the Democratic nomination for president.

Sanders has been closing the gap with the leading Democratic candidate, Hillary Clinton, in polls of voters in the early primary states of Iowa and New Hampshire. O'Malley, meanwhile, has been stuck in the single digits in most polls.

OTHER

Terry McAuliffe's other job // Politico // Gabriel Debenedetti – June 26, 2015

The Virginia governor doesn't have any official responsibilities for Hillary Clinton's campaign. But he's carving out a significant behind-the-scenes role.

Terry McAuliffe tells political associates that he's focused on his day job as Virginia governor, so he won't have any formal responsibilities in his friend Hillary's campaign.

But the Clinton loyalist, fundraiser and 2008 campaign chairman is already shaping a significant role for himself — and it will be front and center Friday evening when he introduces Hillary Clinton at the Virginia Democrats' fundraising event in Fairfax.

It's the most public sign yet that McAuliffe, a former Democratic National Committee chairman and a consummate political animal, just can't keep his fingers away from the flame. Despite the daily demands of running the state he was elected to lead in 2013, he's emerging as Hillary's informal liaison to governors and the party's biggest donors, while also keeping a finger on the pulse of the camp's central operations in Brooklyn.

It's a different vantage point than he's accustomed to. As Clinton pursues the White House for a second time, McAuliffe is in the cosseted confines of Virginia's governor's mansion, obliged to watch the action unfold from Richmond, far from the New York and Washington nerve centers where he operated in 2008.

McAuliffe insists to friends that the best thing he can do for the Clinton campaign is build Virginia's state Democratic infrastructure ahead of its 2015 state senate elections, thereby strengthening Democrats' position in a state that Barack Obama won twice. But, according to people close to him and the Clinton fundraising operation, he's also likely to start calling donors on behalf of the pro-Clinton super PAC and has taken on the role of reaching out to other Democratic governors to lock down their political cooperation.

"He's going to be all-in, it's just a question of how public-facing it's going to be," explained one Clinton '08 alum who worked closely with McAuliffe.

As the 2008 Clinton campaign's top official, McAuliffe played a highly visible role that frequently involved putting a positive spin on an operation that had no shortage of internal troubles. His allies in both Richmond and Brooklyn — more than half a dozen of his former staffers, including campaign manager Robby Mook, now work for Clinton — are relieved that he won't cut such a high-profile this time, and has no plan to show up on Sunday shows every week. They recognize that McAuliffe is a less-than-ideal spokesman for Clinton at the moment, in part because he can't afford the perception that his attention is wandering from his responsibilities as governor but also because his ebullient money-chasing and insider credentials could prove problematic for her.

In public, McAuliffe is all-Virginia-all-the-time — including when he represented the pro-Clinton perspective at April's South Carolina Democratic Party convention and on Meet The Press that month — but he remains in close contact with the now-Brooklyn-based Mook, who manages Clinton's operation.

The posture is the result of a long consideration of McAuliffe's role before the campaign began as he weighed how to maximize his political usefulness. He is a close friend of both Clintons — he guaranteed the mortgage on their first post-White House home and chaired presidential campaigns for both of them.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The conclusion was that Hillary would need strong and well-oiled Democratic machinery in Virginia come November 2016, and that it made little sense to divert his attention from Richmond with state senate races and a redistricting battle looming — especially with swirling rumors in Virginia that McAuliffe has said he'd like to be Treasury secretary in a Clinton administration after leaving his current office.

"He's focused on his day job. He's focused on governing," said Mo Elleithee, a veteran of national and Virginia Democratic politics who worked on Clinton's 2008 campaign and who now directs Georgetown's Institute of Politics and Public Service. "He's made it pretty clear that he's a supporter of hers, but that he's focused on his day job."

McAuliffe's gubernatorial office didn't respond to multiple requests for comment for this story.

The governor's attempt to build a more durable political infrastructure in Virginia — where Democrats in 2015 have a coordinated campaign committee for the first time ever in a year without a statewide election — is a response to longstanding worries of both Bill and Hillary Clinton that crucial swing states have weak Democratic infrastructures.

Before deciding to run again, Hillary asked about the state of Democratic leadership in Ohio, Florida, and Pennsylvania and since she's been a candidate Mook has been on a swing-state tour: he met with operatives in Cleveland earlier this month, and he is due to raise money in Florida next week.

In Virginia, where state parties are known for being exceptionally dependent on sitting governors, a tight alliance with Richmond has proven useful to presidential candidates, including both George W. Bush, who was friendly with Jim Gilmore in 2000, and Obama, who was close with Tim Kaine in 2008.

"It's a huge difference having an incumbent governor, because your state party organization is stronger, it's better funded," explained former Pennsylvania Gov. Ed Rendell, a close Clinton ally. "It makes a huge difference."

McAuliffe has also looked beyond his own borders and reached out to Democratic governors in pivotal states to discuss how to utilize their own political infrastructures — among them, Colorado Gov. John Hickenlooper. Hillary Clinton has told campaign donors and fundraisers that she is closely monitoring state-level leadership in a handful of toss-up states, according to two of them.

McAuliffe is also likely to jump back into the world of presidential fundraising before long. Alums of Bill and Hillary Clinton's three presidential campaigns recall McAuliffe making hundreds of donor calls when he was formally employed by them — and in some cases, jumping on multiple flights to reach as many as five cities in a single day to rake in campaign cash. While no one expects the governor to reprise this role in 2016, he will likely hand his own donor list to the Clinton camp and be called in to woo a handful of billionaires, according to multiple people briefed on the campaign and PAC fundraising strategies.

"My guess is they'll give Terry 20-to-25 calls for Priorities, to the big hitters he has a relationship with," explained Rendell. "He'll be asked, like I've been asked, to help out with $2,700 or $5,400 campaigns. But you can't expect a sitting governor to sit around making too many phone calls."

Still, a handful of Clinton fundraisers told POLITICO they doubted McAuliffe could restrain himself from jumping into the campaign money game wholeheartedly when he finds the time.

"He was just a machine [in 2008]," said a former Hillary aide. "To the extent that this job enables him time-wise to do it, he'll do whatever he can. There's no doubt he'll be super-duper intensely invested in this. … I have no doubt he's going to be raising a shit-ton of money for them."

"On the fundraising side, you'll see the [expletive] crazy machine he was," the former aide said.

The topic of his affection for the Clintons — and their affection for him — is never far from any Macker discussion, even if he is concentrating on this fall's Virginia's state senate races.

"He occupies his own territory. He is a Clinton. He's like Chelsea," said a close family ally. "He doesn't need a title or a place in the campaign."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rendell explains Hillary Clinton's Friday visit to Virginia this way.

"They are extremely loyal people who are loyal to people who are loyal to them. I'm not sure Hillary gets much out of the [Virginia fundraiser] except maybe a little help for next fall," he said. "She's doing this as a favor to Terry."

Democratic civil war ends, for now, as House approves final trade measures // WaPo // Paul Kane – June 25, 2015

The sweeping bipartisan House vote Thursday to approve the final pieces of President Obama's trade agenda ended, for now, a feud that left Democratic leaders shaken and fearful of long-term damage should the dispute reignite.

The divide pitted Democrats who supported Obama's trade policies against those backed by labor unions and liberal activists whose tactics included politically threatening the president's allies. But the debate also exposed a key difference between the Democratic presidential front-runner, Hillary Rodham Clinton, and her rivals, particularly Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), who repeatedly criticized the former secretary of state's reluctance to take a strong position on a trade deal that she once predicted would be the "gold standard" for such pacts.

The family fight began two months ago when Obama and Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.), considered a rising star among liberal activists, fired salvos at each other. It continued this week as members of the Congressional Black Caucus questioned Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi's tone ahead of Thursday's key vote on the measure, which passed on a 286-to-138 roll call that masked the tension in the Democratic caucus.

Party leaders are now just happy to try to regroup and find another issue to focus on.

"Oh, relieved. You know, we hate to see our ranks split, particularly on a very emotional issue, where our own people are split and so are those who support us," said Sen. Richard J. Durbin (Ill.), the No. 2 Democratic leader, who rebuffed pleas from Obama for support. "So the quicker we can move to something where we're back together again, the better."

Beyond those deep concerns in the trade fight was the fear that the party still has not pivoted toward an economic agenda that appeals to middle-class voters after last fall's rout in the midterm elections.

"Our party needs a better agenda than trying to kill trade deals. Even if we had succeeded, it's no substitute for an agenda," said Rep. Peter Welch (D-Vt.), a liberal who opposed the trade legislation. "Let's oppose fast track, but let's not pretend that's an agenda."

Some Democrats stressed that on a wide array of economic issues, including the minimum wage as well as a revamped tax code in which the wealthy pay more, there is unity. Even so, Sen. Ron Wyden (Ore.), the ranking Democrat on the Finance Committee who helped negotiate the trade package, said the past two months laid bare the chasm over Obama's push to win a 12-nation trade deal across the Pacific Ocean.

"The trade issue is, for many Democrats, the most difficult economic issue," Wyden said.

The matter is likely to return to Congress later this year or early next year, if Obama is able to finalize the Trans-Pacific Partnership, the pending trade deal that represents about 40 percent of the global economy. The legislation approved this week sets the framework for how Congress would handle TPP, giving timelines for the House and the Senate and requiring simple up-or-down votes without amendments.

"It's not over. It's not over," said Rep. Rosa L. DeLauro (Conn.), who led the Democratic rebellion that temporarily froze Obama's agenda. "So we fight on."

After five years of watching Republicans wage their internecine battles with tea party activists, Democrats said they devolved into their own version of that dispute this spring. Liberals and labor unions allege that trade deals have disproportionately benefited corporations at the expense of domestic workers, while Obama said it was a progressive trade deal that would allow the United States to set the rules for commerce in a pivotal part of the world.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The pitched battle included personal attacks that were reminiscent of Republican fights, right down to outside groups threatening primary challenges to Democrats if they didn't oppose Obama.

"What we watched on this effort was an arrogance. We were shut out. Quite frankly, disrespectful, of members and their input," DeLauro said of Obama and his advisers. At a news conference DeLauro arranged outside the Capitol in early June, Rep. Brad Sherman (D-Calif.) said Obama shared "the same values but not the same lifestyle" as House Democrats because he lived "in a cloister" where only chief executives got to visit.

In early May, Obama and Warren set the tone. He repeatedly singled out the senator's critique of the trade bills, at one point calling her "a politician like everybody else." She returned fire by accusing him of trying to "grease the skids" on a "secret" trade deal that benefited only corporations.

After a few unsteady moments in May, the Senate finally secured 62 votes — 48 Republicans and 14 Democrats — and sent the bill to the House, where Pelosi (D-Calif.) was visibly uncomfortable in trying to navigate the fight between Obama and some of her closest friends in the House.

Two weeks ago, after Obama made a plea for their support in the Capitol, a raucous group of House Democrats led cheers to take down that day's vote by opposing funding for a worker program that they otherwise support. Pelosi joined the revolt at the last minute, as the trade initiative stalled because both portions needed to win a majority in separate votes for the entire package to advance.

In the ensuing days, Clinton was dragged into the debate while campaigning in Iowa. She sounded as though she was supporting Pelosi, but on the actual vote at hand, she declined to take a position, and Sanders pounced.

How did Clinton comport herself? "Not well," said Rep. Marcy Kaptur (D-Ohio), a fierce opponent of trade. Kaptur attended a Monday meeting of northern Ohio party activists. "I was never asked about her once," she said of Clinton. "You know who people asked me about? Bernie Sanders."

By last week, Obama was working closely with Republican leaders to pass the bills separately.

The final act was Thursday's House vote on the revamped package that included the worker training funds and the popular African Growth and Opportunity Act (AGOA), which promotes African trade.

At a Wednesday morning meeting of House Democrats, Pelosi's position again was unclear to lawmakers, according to five Democrats in attendance. At one point, she suggested that members might vote yes because AGOA was critical to the Congressional Black Caucus (CBC).

Reps. Charles B. Rangel and Gregory W. Meeks, both New York Democrats and senior CBC members, challenged Pelosi, telling her that it was an issue that all Democrats should support.

"It was sounding as though we should only pass [the worker program] because it was connected to AGOA and out of deference to the CBC," Meeks said.

After the meeting, Pelosi said she would support the plan, ending any suspense over the final votes of the two-month war among Democrats on trade.

At her weekly news conference, she acknowledged that it would be good to focus on some other issues but warned that once Obama brings the Pacific trade deal to Congress, the fight will resume.

"We welcome that opportunity with lowered heat to go forward with it," she said, "but with increased intensity and scrutiny and bright light shining on what is in this TPP."

Democratic Field Champions Health Care as Human Right // Real Clear Politics // Andrew Desiderio – June 25, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democratic presidential candidates praised Thursday's Supreme Court ruling preserving a key provision of the Affordable Care Act, which they say vindicates President Obama's signature legislative achievement. The White House hopefuls also made clear a political goal if elected president in 2016 – providing universal coverage – and how they would sell it to Americans – by portraying it as a human right.

In King v. Burwell, the second major legal challenge to the law, the justices ruled 6-3 to authorize tax subsidies intended to help low-income and middle-class Americans afford health insurance, regardless of whether their coverage is obtained through a state exchange or a federal one. Conservative justices John Roberts – who wrote the majority opinion – and Anthony Kennedy joined with the liberals on the bench in upholding the subsidies.

"Yes!" Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton tweeted after the ruling was handed down. "SCOTUS affirms what we know is true in our hearts & under the law: Health insurance should be affordable & available to all."

Clinton's reaction was emblematic of a larger political goal for Democrats: to expand health care coverage to every American. In anticipation of another monumental Supreme Court ruling expected soon on gay marriage, Clinton's campaign released a video in which she describes same-sex marriage as a human right. Clinton and her fellow Democrats sounded a familiar tune Thursday, arguing that health care also qualifies as a human right.

While acknowledging the law is not perfect, the former secretary of state and architect of the failed "HillaryCare" initiative during her husband's presidency attacked congressional Republicans for their efforts to undo the Affordable Care Act. She repeated commonly cited accolades for the law, including the ability to stay on one's parents' insurance plans until age 26, and the guarantee that coverage can't be denied to those with pre-existing conditions.

"Republicans should stop trying to tear down the law and start working across party lines to build on these successes," Clinton said in a statement.

Martin O'Malley, the former Maryland governor who lags far behind Clinton in national polls, reacted with a similar message promoting universal health care. "Now that this ideological attempt to stop #ACA failed, we must redouble our efforts to bring health care to every person in this nation," he tweeted.

"With the national goal of universal coverage now affirmed, we must reduce costs by improving wellness," O'Malley continued in a statement. "Innovations for better coordinated care, personalized medicine, and the alignment of profit incentives to promote wellness make all of this possible."

Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, the self-proclaimed democratic socialist, said the court acted within its power to guarantee health care subsidies to Americans regardless of where they live. "It would have been an outrage to throw 6.4 million people off health insurance," he said in a statement.

Sanders called health care a "right of citizenship," adding that his overall goal is to establish a "Medicare-for-all, single-payer system."

Lincoln Chafee, the former Rhode Island governor who has largely been running a single-issue campaign based on the Iraq War, lauded the court's ruling and touted his state's ACA rollout as "one of the nation's best."

Chafee, a former Republican, did not call for universal coverage or depict health care as a human right, instead saying, "More insurance means more healthy Americans."

Speaking in the White House Rose Garden after the ruling was handed down, a relieved but unsurprised President Obama echoed Clinton, O'Malley, and Sanders, proclaiming, "The Affordable Care Act is here to stay."

If a Democrat is elected to succeed Obama, it might simply be a foundation for more reforms.

GOP

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

DECLARED

BUSH

Jeb swipes at Obama over Iran deal // Politico // Adam Lerner – June 25, 2015

Jeb Bush renewed his attack on President Barack Obama's negotiations with Iran Thursday, citing a recent letter from five former White House advisers cautioning against the emerging deal.

"Even former top Obama officials think emerging deal will 'not prevent Iran from having a nuclear weapons capability'," the former Florida governor tweeted Thursday, including a link to a New York Times article about the letter.

On Wednesday, 18 foreign policy experts published a letter on the website of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy saying "most of us would have preferred a stronger agreement," since the emerging deal "will not prevent Iran from having a nuclear weapons capability."

The letter outlined five additions to the agreement that would be necessary "to maximize [the deal's] potential," including additional inspection powers, slowed sanctions relief and harsher limits on advanced centrifuges.

Also included were recommendations for further measures the U.S. can take in the region to bolster the security of our allies and prevent Iranian hegemony.

Former CIA Director David Petraeus, former Sen. Joseph Lieberman (I-Conn.), former Obama adviser Dennis Ross, and former State Department arms proliferation expert Robert Einhorn, in addition to a number of Bush administration alums, all signed the letter. Gary Samore, a former top adviser to Obama on nuclear issues, was also a signatory.

The deadline for a final agreement is set for June 30, though an outline of the emerging agreement was released by the State Department at the beginning of April. The deadline could also slip.

Jeb Bush cast as 'villain' in GOP fight for recognition // CNN // Ashley Killough – June 25, 2015

Bobby Jindal took some veiled swipes at his Republican presidential rivals Wednesday night, but in a rare move for an announcement speech, the Louisiana governor singled out one opponent by name: Jeb Bush.

"You've heard Jeb Bush say we need to be willing to lose the primary in order to win the general election. We're going to help him do that," he said, referring to a statement Bush made last year.

"Let me translate that political speak into plain English," Jindal continued. "What Jeb Bush is saying is that we need to hide our conservative ideas, but the truth is if we go down that road again, we will lose again."

Jindal's jab adds to the list of punches thrown at Bush from Republican candidates in recent weeks, a trend that's growing in intensity and frequency as the GOP field becomes more crowded.

As someone who's consistently stayed in the top tier of national polls, Bush is a natural target for lower-tier candidates in need of more publicity and name recognition, Republican strategists say. For Jindal, the strategy worked and generated a lot of headlines.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"When you're a candidate out the gate and not that many people know you and you're trying to craft a narrative of your campaign, you need a hero -- which is the candidate -- and a villain, which in this case was Bush," said Republican strategist Ford O'Connell.

Bush hasn't always been a villain for Jindal, though. In Jindal's first term nearly eight years ago, the governor started a monthly speaker series for his Cabinet secretaries and staff and invited Bush to be the first guest speaker, The Associated Press reported.

But the two have been on a collision course ever since Jindal became one of the most vocal governors against Common Core, despite first supporting it, while Bush has been a strong advocate of the standards.

Others have also piled onto the former Florida governor recently. Like Jindal, Donald Trump named Bush in his kickoff last week, attacking the former governor repeatedly, as well as other candidates by name. He later regretted being hard on Bush, only to attack him again a few days later.

A pro-Rand Paul super PAC released a web video earlier this week of a faux-infomercial selling "Bailout Bush" dolls, a satire on Bush expressing support for the 2009 financial services bailout and on his ties to Wall Street. (Bush in 2012 said the the bailout "right thing to do" in the short term but did not approve of what he called "massive" regulations that ensued.)

Matt Mackowiak, another GOP strategist, argued that attacking someone who's considered to be the overall frontrunner is a well-worn strategy, and he expects to see Bush continue to take more hits in the coming months as the contest becomes more competitive.

"Any shot you take, you always swing up, you never swing down," Mackowiak said.

Along with boosting a candidate's own publicity, attacking someone like Bush also lends credibility to those who want to be perceived as anti-establishment insurgents willing to buck the party line.

"If you want to be an outsider or be an underdog, the Bushes are as establishment as you can get," Mackowiak argued.

Other candidates have long been delivering more subtle blows. Ohio Gov. John Kasich essentially argued earlier this month that he may run for president because Bush is underperforming. "Frankly, I thought that Jeb was going to just suck all the air out of the room and it just hasn't happened," he said, though stressed that he was just being "honest" and wasn't trying to attack Bush.

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker regularly notes that he didn't come from "fame or fortune," while Florida Sen. Marco Rubio earlier this month blasted "outdated leaders," a reference that was designed to draw a contrast with older, more established candidates like Hillary Clinton or Bush.

In his announcement speech, Bush seemed to acknowledge concerns that he's often viewed as a frontrunner simply because of his connections and tried to set the scene for a competitive primary season.

"Not a one of us deserves the job by right of resume, party, seniority, family, or family narrative," he said. "It's nobody's turn. It's everybody's test, and it's wide open -- exactly as a contest for president should be."

Allie Brandenburger, a spokeswoman for Bush, said people around the country are now getting to know the governor and his record, arguing that "the more they know, the more they want to see his leadership in the White House."

Bush has largely resisted responding to the attacks directly, trying to maintain his stated goal of being a "joyful" candidate instead. But he also knows he has to prove to voters that he has enough fire in the belly.

"You got to pop 'em," he said last month in New Hampshire, slamming his fist into his hand. He was responding to a question from a voter who asked Bush to explain how he'll defend himself in the brutal process of a presidential campaign. "You got to push back, and then get back to the message that matters."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Florida Voter Purge Fiasco May Complicate Jeb Bush's Appeal To Minorities // HuffPo // Scott Conroy – June 25, 2015

Something was noticeably different about the crowd packed inside a gymnasium at Miami Dade College's Kendall campus last week to welcome Jeb Bush into the ranks of the announced 2016 Republican presidential candidates.

In a vivid departure from the nearly all-white audiences that typically turn out to greet GOP White House contenders, Bush's racially and ethnically diverse supporters mirrored the demographics of this multicultural city.

The scene was meant to emphasize a core Bush strength, if not send a message to fellow Republicans, that an inclusive and aspirational brand of politics offers the GOP an opportunity to re-engage with minority voters, including African-Americans, who long ago abandoned the party of Lincoln en masse.

Even some Democratic operatives acknowledge privately that Bush -- a fluent Spanish speaker with a Mexican-born wife -- has a biography and demeanor that could chip away at the coalition that twice propelled Barack Obama to the White House.

Bush's critics in Florida, however, scoff.

As the 2016 campaign heats up, an episode from his tenure as Florida governor reveals why Bush's image as a "uniter, not a divider," as his older brother used to put it, may not stand up. The state's deeply flawed purge of felons from its voting rolls in advance of the 2000 presidential election remains a scar that still has not healed for many in the state.

"I'll never the forget people that came up to me and said, 'You let them steal our votes,'" Rep. Corrine Brown (D-Fla.), who became state's first African-American elected to Congress since Reconstruction when she won her seat in 1992, told The Huffington Post. "So many people were just wiped off the rolls -- people who'd been voting for years and years. You had the obligation to prove that you weren't a felon."

The felon purge wrongfully denied thousands of legitimate voters the ability to participate in a presidential election pitting Republican George W. Bush against Democrat Al Gore. Ultimately, a few hundred Florida ballots would determine the presidency, and with it, the nation's path for the next eight years and, really, well beyond.

Though it received little notice outside of Florida in the election's immediate aftermath, as hanging chads and butterfly ballots took center stage during the recount, the purge remains for many the most egregious example of voter disenfranchisement that took place during the 2000 presidential election, which was ultimately decided by a Supreme Court ruling.

"The purge was right out of one of these playbooks in how you diminish minority turnout -- there was absolutely no justification for it," said Dan Gelber, a former Democratic state legislator and a longtime Bush nemesis. "It was almost a purposeful crashing of a car. They knew it was irresponsible and about something incredibly important, and they went forward knowing that the only mistakes were going to benefit them."

Florida has banned convicted felons from participating in elections since 1868. But it wasn't until 1998 -- the year before Bush took office -- that state legislators passed a law intended to clean up the voter rolls after a Miami mayoral election was overturned amid widespread cases of absentee ballot fraud.

The secretary of state's office subsequently awarded Database Technologies Inc., or DBT, a $4 million contract to carry out the effort to ensure that felons, deceased voters, and non-residents would be blocked from participating in the 2000 election.

It would not be an easy task.

Since Florida did not track its voters by Social Security number, the company was instructed to engage in a subjective process that attempted to match felon names and dates of birth with voter records, allowing for " near matches" that were close, but not exact.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

After Jeb Bush took office in 1999, this process continued. In the months leading up to the 2000 presidential election, local election supervisors began receiving lists from state officials of people DBT had identified as convicted felons and thus needed to be eliminated from the voting rolls.

It became immediately clear that the effort was generating a slew of false positives. Voters in good standing, who happened to share names with convicted felons, but had never been in trouble with the law, were being taken off the voting rolls.

But election officials in Tallahassee -- led by Secretary of State Katherine Harris, who would later gain infamy over her controversial handling of the election recount -- declined to make the process more transparent and uniform.

Charges that the purge was politically motivated grew louder when it was revealed that the man responsible for determining the parameters for voter removal was Emmett “Bucky” Mitchell IV -- a Division of Election attorney who went on to become general counsel for the Florida Republican Party.

In early 1999, DBT product manager Marlene Thorogood warned Mitchell of false positives generated by the guidelines that he had set. But in an email Mitchell sent in March of that year, he instructed Thorogood not to concern herself with wrongly eliminating non-felons from the voter rolls. It was better to purge too many people than too few, in Mitchell’s estimation.

"Obviously, we want to capture more names that possibly aren't matches and let the [county elections] supervisors make a final determination rather than exclude certain matches altogether," Mitchell wrote.

This decree from Tallahassee having been made clear, county-level election officials began receiving lists of voters they were told to remove from their rolls in the months leading up to an Election Day that would prove to be among the most memorable in American history. The local officials’ responses to this instruction varied. Some tossed out the lists altogether. Others used their discretion to try to correct them. Some used the lists with full knowledge that they were defective.

Many county officials decided to mail certified letters notifying people on the lists that the Department of Law Enforcement had identified them as felons and that they would need to provide evidence to challenge that conclusion or face permanent removal from the voter rolls. In short, voters who had been swept up in the net had to prove their innocence.

Some Floridians who learned that they had been wrongfully removed from the voting rolls attempted to bring the matter directly to the governor.

In a message sent on Aug. 28, 2000, to jeb@myflorida.com -- one of the governor's official email addresses -- a man named Gene Gay noted that he had recently received a letter indicating that he had lost his right to vote.

“I have search all weekend for a site to access that type of records with no success,” Gay wrote. “Where do U go online to get that sort of information without paying these scalpers prices … This is a lot of stuff, for a person whom knows, he has NOT been convicted of any felony. This is very important to me please respond asap.”

In another email to an official gubernatorial account (flagov@myflorida.com), sent on the Wednesday before Election Day, a man named John Browne expressed intense frustration to Bush in a 760-word note about a brother, who Browne said had stolen his identity repeatedly over the previous decade. This traumatic experience, Browne explained, had led to an erroneous determination from Martin County that he was a convicted felon.

Browne wrote:

“I have spent an enormous amount of time dealing with the local county Sheriff’s offices, the State Attorney’s Office, the Social Security Administration, private attorneys and the Florida Department of Law Enforcement. Not one person to date has told me what I can do to protect myself or how to file charges against this person or anyone else using my personal information ... Mr. Bush, I have a family to provide for and I have worked very hard to get to where I am today. This continued abuse of my records is seriously impacting on my ability to continue a normal and productive life. I also think the fact that I am being denied the right to vote is a violation of my civil rights. I would hope that you take this situation very seriously and offer some measure of relief.”

It's unclear whether Bush read either email. As governor, he primarily used the email address Jeb@Jeb.org, but also had access to several other state email accounts, including the two in question. A campaign aide told The Huffington Post that these accounts were primarily used by the governor's Office of Citizen Services and that Bush himself did not see most of the incoming messages sent there, unless they were forwarded to his Jeb.org account.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(Coincidentally, on the same day that Gene Gay sent his email to Bush, likely 2016 rival Scott Walker -- then a Wisconsin state legislator -- sent Bush a request via jeb@myflorida.com for information on a new Florida law that prohibited possession of vehicle airbags that lacked identification stickers.)

Estimates vary on just how many non-felons in Florida were wrongly denied the right to vote on Election Day, but the total was at least 1,100, according to a 2001 Palm Beach Post analysis, and may have been much higher.

Following the election recount, in which he officially recused himself, Jeb Bush sought to distance himself from the botched purge, arguing that as governor, he was not charged with administering the election.

A post-election investigation by the U.S. Commission On Civil Rights, however, in which Bush was subpoenaed, was dubious about this reasoning, noting that the actions Bush took immediately after the 2000 election demonstrated that he did, in fact, have the ability to act on voting-related matters.

"Florida's governor insisted that he had no specific role in election operations and pointed to his secretary of state as the responsible official," the commission wrote in its report. "After the election, however, the governor exercised leadership and responsibility in electoral matters in the commendable action of appointing a task force to make recommendations to fix the problems that occurred."

The report found a "strong basis" for determining that violations of the 1965 Voting Rights Act had occurred during the election in Florida. While it did not find that "the highest officials of the state conspired to disenfranchise voters," the report singled out Bush and Harris, saying their "overall lack of leadership in protecting voting rights was largely responsible for the broad array of problems in Florida during the 2000 election."

"The state's highest officials responsible for ensuring efficiency, uniformity, and fairness in the election failed to fulfill their responsibilities and were subsequently unwilling to take responsibility," the report said.

African-Americans were nearly 10 times more likely than white voters to have their ballots discounted in Florida, the report found, and it singled out for criticism the felon voter purge's "sloppy and irresponsible" implementation.

"The governor, the secretary of state, or the director of the Division of Elections should have provided clear instructions to their subordinates on list maintenance strategies that would protect eligible voters from being erroneously purged from the voter registration rolls," the report said.

Aides to Jeb Bush at the time criticized the report by the Commission On Civil Rights, controlled by a Democratic majority, as "biased" and "sloppy" in its own right -- charges that did nothing to quell widespread outrage, particularly among African-Americans, in Florida.

But any lingering bad feelings about Bush were not apparent at his presidential campaign announcement last week, when R.B. Holmes, Jr. -- an African-American minister from Tallahassee -- delivered impassioned praise of the former governor in introducing him on stage.

In an interview with The Huffington Post, Holmes noted that he appreciated Bush's efforts to appoint more African-Americans to judgeships in Florida when he was governor.

"Jeb Bush is a very compassionate person," Holmes said. "I respect his core values. I respect that he married a minority, and he did that back in the day. Think of how unpopular that was for a Bush of his status to go to Mexico and find a bride."

Holmes is far from the only African-American in Florida who retains positive feelings toward Bush.

After famously saying during his failed 1994 gubernatorial run that he would do "probably nothing" to help blacks, Bush changed his tone dramatically when it came to engaging in matters of race and identity during his 1998 campaign. That year, he ended up earning the support of 61 percent of Hispanics and 14 percent of African-Americans -- impressive numbers for a Republican.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Even though he didn't do as well with either group during his successful 2002 re-election bid, Bush's reputation as a bridge-builder who actively concerned himself with lifting up minority communities -- boosted, in part, by his high-profile push for expanded educational opportunities -- remains a central tenet of his political identity.

Mac Stipanovich, a Florida Republican lobbyist who advised Harris throughout the 2000 recount, was blunt in arguing that Bush had not erred in failing to provide any oversight of the botched felon purge.

"Any time you attempt to pare the voting rolls in Florida, regardless of what the reason is, you are anti-democratic with a small-D and probably racist," Stipanovich said by way of discounting those accusations.

But criticism of how Bush and members of his administration handled the purge became even louder four years later, when he and other Florida officials failed to correct the problems that arose during the previous presidential election year and, in fact, may have made it worse.

The 2004 iteration of the felon voter purge -- this time carried out by the Department of Elections itself -- ended with a whimper when a peculiar (some would say "fishy") anomaly was discovered the summer before Bush's brother stood for re-election.

That year's list of 48,000 felons who were to be purged from the voting rolls contained more than 22,000 African-Americans' names, but just 61 Hispanics. (In Florida, Hispanic communities tend to be more Republican-leaning than they are nationally.)

Bush administration officials denied there was any partisan motivation in the discrepancy, calling it "unintentional." But as Democrats scoffed and public pressure mounted, Florida officials ended up scrapping the list entirely.

Some 15 years later, Jeb Bush, now running his own presidential campaign, has treated the Florida voting purge as a foreign object -- an episode that had little if nothing to do with him.

Asked during a press conference during a campaign swing through Iowa last week whether he believes that African-Americans were disproportionately affected by those efforts, he waffled a bit before rephrasing the question in his own manner.

"I don't think so," he said. "I don't think there was any -- no, if you're going to say, 'Did the Florida Department of Law Enforcement target African-Americans?' No."

Meanwhile, Florida remains one of just three states where all convicted felons automatically lose their voting rights and must petition the governor and a clemency board in an arduous process in order to try to get them restored.

In 2007, Gov. Charlie Crist, then a Republican, initiated a change in the clemency policy, which made it so that most convicted felons in Florida would automatically have their voting rights restored after the state ensured that they had paid restitution to victims.

Those new guidelines were then rolled back by Gov. Rick Scott (R) shortly after he took office in 2011.

According to a 2012 study by The Sentencing Project, a nonprofit group advocating for judicial sentencing reform, Florida continues to have the highest rate of African-American disenfranchisement in the country with 23 percent of the adult African-American population in the state barred from voting.

"I think that the purge system brought a real apartheid type of politics that was going on in Florida," said former Democratic state Rep. Tony Hill. "Look at the people who were purged -- they were African-American. They just discounted our votes without any recourse."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

June 25, 2015

A new poll shows former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush sitting atop the 2016 GOP presidential field, with businessman and reality television show host Donald Trump jumping to second place in the wake of his recent campaign kick-off.

Mr. Bush was the choice of 15 percent of likely Republican primary voters in the Fox News poll, followed by Mr. Trump at 11 percent and retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson at 10 percent.

Mr. Bush had been at 12 percent in a Fox poll released in early June, and Mr. Trump had been at 4 percent. The survey was taken June 21-23 — soon after both men officially announced their candidacies.

Still, nearly two-thirds of GOP primary voters said they think of Mr. Trump, the host of NBC's "The Celebrity Apprentice," as a side show, compared to 29 percent who said they consider him a serious candidate. Among all registered voters, 77 percent said they think he's a side show and 18 percent said they think he's a serious candidate.

He took to social media Wednesday evening to tout the results, tweeting: "Just out, the new nationwide @FoxNews poll has me alone in 2nd place, closely behind Jeb Bush-but Bush will NEVER Make America Great Again!"

Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker were at 9 percent apiece, with Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida at 8 percent and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee at 6 percent.

Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas was at 4 percent and former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina and former Sen. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania were at 3 percent apiece.

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, Ohio Gov. John Kasich and former Texas Gov. Rick Perry were at 2 percent apiece. Mr. Jindal announced his candidacy Wednesday.

Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and former New York Gov. George Pataki were at 1 percent apiece.

Of the names included, Mr. Walker, Mr. Christie, and Mr. Kasich have yet to officially announce 2016 bids.

Mr. Bush was also the top second choice, at 11 percent, followed by Mr. Rubio and Mr. Huckabee at 10 percent apiece.

The survey of 1,005 registered voters has a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points, with a margin of error of plus or minus 5 percentage points for the subgroup of Republican primary voters.

Jeb Bush did not appoint a guardian for a rape victim's fetus, but he fought for one // Politifact // Joshua Gillin – June 25, 2015

A political group has highlighted a controversial fight over fetal rights that former Gov. Jeb Bush mounted years ago, but it went too far in its description of what the current presidential candidate did.

Ultraviolet, a women's rights group, posted an image on Facebook on June 15, 2015, with the title "5 things you should know about Jeb Bush." The first item read, "Appointed a guardian for the fetus of a rape survivor."

We checked into all five of the claims listed on the image and found this one was not accurate. (Read our story on the rest here.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In May 2003, a severely mentally handicapped woman identified only as J.D.S. had been raped in a group home at 22 and was six months pregnant. J.D.S., who was abandoned at birth and raised in foster care, suffered from severe mental retardation, cerebral palsy and autism, with the mental capacity of a 4- or 5-year-old.

But Bush actually didn't appoint a guardian, because he didn't have that power. What he did was order state lawyers to ask the Orange County Circuit Court in Orlando to appoint a representative for the fetus.

Though Bush opposes abortion, he said the court case was not about that. "This is a question of protecting an innocent life," Bush told the Miami Herald. "And it will be the policy of our government in the case of a woman who is incapacitated or cannot make decisions for her child, that there should be a guardian."

The Florida Department of Children and Families had already asked the court to appoint a guardian once the baby was born. No parties involved had suggested aborting the fetus.

But Judge Lawrence Kirkwood did not consider the guardian request, saying he had to follow state statute. Appointing a guardian for the fetus would be "a clear error," he wrote.

"A trial judge must follow the law as written," Kirkwood said. "Many had expected this court to blaze new territory and write new law for the facts beyond the Florida statute."

The issue moved forward, even after a healthy girl known as Baby S was born in August 2003. Kirkwood appointed her a guardian at birth. In January 2004, a three-judge panel in a Daytona appeals court ruled against Bush in a 2-1 decision.

Kirkwood had adhered to a 1989 state Supreme Court ruling that said appointing a representative for an unborn fetus would be "clearly improper." A fetus was not a person under state law, and was therefore without the same rights as a person. Judge Emerson Thompson noted in the majority opinion that fetal rights were not mentioned anywhere in state statutes about guardianship.

Bush continued to hold his position after the appeal ruling in Daytona.

"I do think that a child that could be brought to term, as this child was, in the case where a mother has little or no capabilities in representing the child's interest, a legal guardian should be appointed," he said.

Our ruling

Ultraviolet said Bush "appointed a guardian for the fetus of a rape survivor."

Bush asked a judge in 2003 to name someone to act in the interests of the fetus of a mentally disabled woman raped in a group home. But the judge did not, because state law does not give a fetus the same protections as a person. An appeals court upheld the judge's compliance with a 1989 Florida Supreme Court ruling.

To be clear, Bush did not appoint anyone as a representative for the fetus, but he did want one. We rate the statement Mostly False.

Is the poverty rate worse now than it was in the 1970's? // Politifact // Joshua Gillin – June 25, 2015

As the 2016 presidential hopefuls travel the country, they are undoubtedly on a mission to play up their strengths and, for the Republicans, say why they are a better choice than Democrats, who have held the White House for the last two terms.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Former Florida Governor Jeb Bush (R) was recently in North Carolina talking to reporters at the state GOP headquarters. While discussing the death of Freddie Gray, the Baltimore man who died after being arrested, Bush pointed out that the national conversation needs to focus on poverty and what can be done to eliminate it. Bush said this about poverty in the United States:

"There are more poor people today as a percentage of our population than the 1970s."

Our partners at PolitiFact Florida took a look at Bush's claim to see if he had his facts correct. PolitiFact reporter Joshua Gillin says that Bush's claim rates MOSTLY TRUE on the Truth-O-Meter. Gillin said that Bush's wording of his statement is key to the claim.

"We went back and looked at the statistics for the Federal Poverty Level," said Gillin. "In 2013, the last year we have full numbers, the poverty rate was about 14.5 percent of the population, while the rate in the 1970's topped out around 12.5 percent, and remember, we're talking about these percentages as a percentage of the population, which is the language that former Gov. Bush used in his statement."

Gillin notes that another calculation closes that gap between now and then. "If you include government-assisted programs in the mix, the number for the Supplemental Poverty Measure from the 1970's actually creeps up a bit, and that difference between then and now disappears," said Gillin. "However, that's not generally the percentage that is used, and social scientists and experts we talked to said that they usually stick with the straight Federal Poverty Level when comparing different years."

Gillin said that because Bush used the phrase "percentage of our population," his claim is pretty accurate, leading to a MOSTLY TRUE rating from PolitiFact's Truth-O-Meter.

Jeb Bush did say women should 'find a husband' to get off welfare -- in 1994 // Politifact // Joshua Gillin – June 25, 2015

A women's rights group took presidential candidate Jeb Bush to task in a social media post, dredging up a 21-year-old quote that makes him sound behind the times.

In a June 15, 2015, Facebook post, political group Ultraviolet listed "5 things you should know about Jeb Bush." The fourth item: "Said low-income women should 'get their life together and find a husband.' "

We looked at all five items in a separate story (which you can read here) and found a few inaccuracies.

In this case, Bush did say it -- way back in 1994, during his failed first run for governor.

During that campaign, Bush pushed for two-year limits on receiving benefits from a federal welfare program known as Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC), which ended in 1996.

"If people are mentally and physically able to work, they should be able to do so within a two-year period," he said. "They should be able to get their life together and find a husband, find a job, find other alternatives in terms of private charity or a combination of all three. That is the first step, to redefine the role of government. It will be hard. There will be lots of screaming and hollering."

Bush's GOP primary opponents seized on this widely reported quote -- particularly former Florida Attorney General James Smith, who used part of the quote in an attack ad. Bush called the ad unfair, and said Smith took "a fragment of a quote from me on welfare reform totally out of context in an attempt to portray me as a sexist who is insensitive to women."

The Orlando Sentinel quoted Bush as saying marriage "is one of many options, and if people are honest about the welfare system we have today, how you get on welfare is not having a husband in the house."

CNN reported that Bush added, "Let's be honest here. Men are not on welfare, that's the point. That's the point -- men are not on AFDC."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A state official noted that a small percentage of men did get benefits from the program, as did some families with both men and women as heads of the household. Bush lost the 1994 gubernatorial election in a close race with Democratic incumbent Lawton Chiles.

Bush's past statements about shaming single mothers have been in the news quite a bit during this campaign after media outlets began highlighting comments from his 1995 book Profiles in Character.

"One of the reasons more young women are giving birth out of wedlock and more young men are walking away from their paternal obligations is that there is no longer a stigma attached to this behavior, no reason to feel shame," Bush wrote.

"Many of these young women and young men look around and see their friends engaged in the same irresponsible conduct. Their parents and neighbors have become ineffective at attaching some sense of ridicule to this behavior. There was a time when neighbors and communities would frown on out-of-wedlock births and when public condemnation was enough of a stimulus for one to be careful."

The same Ultraviolet Facebook image also referenced the so-called "Scarlet Letter" law that passed while Bush was in office. That 2001 bill included a provision that required unwed mothers who didn't know who fathered their child to publish weekly notices describing dates, places and partners with which the women had had sex prior to putting the child up for adoption. Bush let it pass without his signature, but it was ruled unconstitutional two years later and repealed.

Bush told an attendee at an Iowa event on June 17, 2015, his real goal had been to focus on the responsibility those absent men bore.

"I'm not in favor of shaming women. What I'm in favor of is shaming men who abandon their children," Bush said. "Women who bring up children by themselves do it heroically, they do it against all odds. Men who don't feel responsible for being part of their child's life create real strains on that family."

Our ruling

Ultraviolet claimed Bush "said low-income women should 'get their life together and find a husband.' "

He did say that, back in 1994 during his first gubernatorial run, when the quote also was used against him by opponents. He was talking about putting a limit on a particular welfare program and doubled down on the concept that women would not be on welfare if they were married.

The meme omits context and that the comments are more than 20 years old. But Bush did say that. So we rate the statement Mostly True.

Political group makes five points about Jeb Bush's record // Politifact // Josh Gillin – June 25, 2015

A Facebook meme from a political group made so many simultaneous assertions about former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, we couldn't put them all on the Truth-O-Meter.

That doesn't mean we can't still examine the quintet of claims, however.

Ultraviolet, which describes itself as a community "mobilized to fight sexism and expand women's rights," posted an image labeled "5 things you should know about Jeb Bush" to its Facebook page on June 15, 2015. A few days later, the group added a link to information backing up its claims.

PolitiFact Florida wanted to review this information for ourselves. We found that some were largely factual, but at least two had significant inaccuracies. (One was wrong on Facebook, but has been corrected on the group's website.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Let’s take Ultraviolet’s talking points one by one:

1. Appointed a guardian for the fetus of a rape survivor: In May 2003, Bush ordered state lawyers to ask the Orange County Circuit Court in Orlando to appoint a representative for the fetus of a mentally handicapped woman in state care. The 22-year-old woman, who was severely developmentally disabled, had been raped while living in a group home and was six months pregnant.

Bush did not actually appoint a guardian, but wanted a judge in the case to consider it. No party in the case had suggested aborting the fetus. We rated this statement Mostly False in a separate Truth-O-Meter fact-check.

The judge did not consider the issue, but left the woman in state care. The Florida Department of Children and Families had already asked the court to appoint a guardian once the baby was born, which happened in August 2003.

The request sparked controversy about whether a fetus deserved representation in the womb, something the state Supreme Court ruled "clearly improper" in 1989. The issue went before an appeals court. In January 2004, the three-judge panel ruled against Bush in a 2-1 decision, finding that a fetus was not a person under Florida law and appointing a guardian would be improper.

2. Signed into law a bill requiring single moms to publish their sexual history: First of all, we will note that at some point after June 15, Ultraviolet changed the wording of this statement on its website, restating that Bush said he "refused to veto a bill" that required this. That is more accurate, but the original is still circulating on Facebook with the original wording, and it is partly wrong.

This item refers to a bill often known as the "Scarlet Letter" law, which started as a 2001 reworking of Florida’s adoption regulations. The Legislature that year passed a bill that required single mothers who didn’t know who was the father of their child publish a newspaper notice prior to putting the child up for adoption.

The notice had to run once a week for a month, and had to list a detailed description of all the possible fathers, plus dates and cities where a sexual encounter resulting in conception may have taken place. This was originally designed to alert the child’s potential father the child was up for adoption, but amounted to forcing the mother to publish her sexual history in her hometown newspaper multiple times.

The bill passed the House and Senate by a wide margin. Bush objected to several parts of the bill in a letter to Secretary of State Katherine Harris -- the bill’s own sponsor, Sen. Skip Campbell, D-Tamarac, lamented the final bill -- but instead of using his veto power to kill the legislation, Bush let the bill pass without signing it.

He said he had expected legislators to fix the notice requirement’s wording (Campbell had told him as much, he said). But a court did that for him in 2003 when it ruled the law unconstitutional for being an invasion of privacy. Bush signed the law’s repeal that year.

3. Hired a staffer who publicly called women "sluts": On Feb. 9, 2015, Bush’s Right To Rise PAC announced they had hired Hipster.com co-founder Ethan Czahor as its new chief technology officer. But the Internet found dozens of years-old tweets from his Twitter account disparaging women and homosexuals. Offending tweets were being deleted from the account, but not before Buzzfeed shared them, including several that did refer to women as "sluts." Czahor resigned on Feb. 10.

4. Said low-income women should "get their life together and find a husband": Ultraviolet attributed this quote to a 2003 Washington Post profile of Bush, but CNN put the comment in context earlier this month.

During his first gubernatorial run in 1994, Bush pushed for limits on a federal welfare program known as Aid to Families with Dependent Children, which ended in 1996.

"If people are mentally and physically able to work, they should be able to do so within a two-year period," he said. "They should be able to get their life together and find a husband, find a job, find other alternatives in terms of private charity or a combination of all three."

Bush defended those comments by saying that same year, saying, "How you get on welfare is by not having a husband in the house -- let's be honest here.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Men are not on welfare, that's the point. That's the point -- men are not on AFDC."

A state official had refuted that, by the way, noting that a small percentage of men did get get benefits from the program, as did some families with both men and women as heads of the household. We rated Ultraviolet's statement Mostly True in a separate fact-check.

5. Used taxpayer money to promote anti-abortion groups: The group pointed to a Salon story that highlighted Bush signed into law a 1999 bill allowing the state to be the first in the country to sell "Choose Life" specialty license plates. These plates allowed Floridians to pay a fee to help fund so-called crisis pregnancy centers. Bush's Democratic predecessor Lawton Chiles had vetoed the plates a year earlier.

The centers provide pregnant women with services but do not mention abortion as an option, steering clients to paths to put their unwanted children up for adoption. The centers, usually run by religious organizations, have been criticized by abortion rights groups for giving out false information about reproductive health care and abortions.

In 2005, Bush proposed spending millions on a pregnancy counseling hotline that steered women to these crisis pregnancy centers, which were opposed to abortion. After a $4 million launch, the hotline continued to get $2 million budgeted per year for these services for the rest of Bush's tenure.

Jeb Bush Shakes Money Tree in Manhattan Two More Times // The Observer // Ken Kurson – June 25, 2015

Jeb Bush has been Hoovering up campaign cash in the Northeast, surprising some with the strength of his appeal in what should be considered Chris Christie's neighborhood. Yesterday the money train continued, making two New York City stops.

The first was a breakfast at the Sheraton, hosted by a who's who of Republican money bigs. Event co-chairs included Mel Immergut, the super lawyer who is the former Chairman of Milbank, Tweed, Hadley & McCloy; Bob Foresman, who was Jeb's partner at Barclay's and is now CEO of the firm's Russia operation; hedge fund manager John Paulson, who CDS'ed his way to a $4 billion profit betting that the housing market would crash in 2007; and John Catsimatides, the supermarket and oil well mogul who ran unsuccessfully for the GOP nomination for mayor of New York City in 2013.

Also notable were the strong showing of New Jersey co-chairs and attendees, worth mentioning given the long Christie shadow. Woody Johnson, the Jets owner who is one of the national chairs of Jeb's campaign and Joe Kyrillos, the close friend of Gov. Christie who surprised many by supporting Mr. Bush were among the co-chairs. Gail Gordon, a prominent NJ GOP fundraiser who had been on Christie's finance committee, also attended, as did Ira Perlmuter of Triple Five, the private equity fund that owns the Mall of America and other colossuses.

In addition to the Jersey strength, Mr. Bush flexed real muscle among prominent Jewish donors, including George Klein, the developer and former president of the Republican Jewish Coalition and Jay Lefkowitz, the brainy Kirkland and Ellis lawyer who also had the easy-peasy job of being President Bush's Special Envoy for Human Rights in North Korea.

There were even some two-fers—Jews from New Jersey. South Jersey lawyer Hersh Kozlov was there, as was former Cliff Sobel, who squawked like crazy when the Observer identified him as Bush supporter in an earlier story. He's apparently still hoping to thread the needle; he'd clearly like to back the brother of the man who made him ambassador to The Netherlands and then to Brazil without angering his home-state governor too egregiously. To that end, Mr. Sobel declined to appear on the invitation itself—his son Scott Sobel was listed—but the Observer has confirmed that Cliff did indeed attend.

After the well-publicized Sheraton event with dozens of co-chairs, Mr. Bush headed to an equally impressive although quieter—and thus far unreported—event. Mr. Bush's cousin, George Herbert Walker IV, is the chairman and CEO of Neuberger Berman, the largest private, investment management firm. Mr. Walker hosted Jeb for lunch yesterday, again flexing the kind of reach that has made Mr. Bush the clear finance frontrunner among the large GOP field, if not necessarily the political frontrunner.

According to Ms. Gordon and others to whom the Observer spoke, the Sheraton was packed. "I was a co-chair, which means the buy-in was $27,000 by the end of the month," explained Ms. Gordon, referring to the requirement to find 10 "max out donations" of $2700 each. "It was a vigorous, well-attended event and the enthusiasm was so strong we're parlaying it into two more events." Ms. Gordon is referring to a pair of July 23 fundraisers in New Jersey itself, the very existence of which is a shock, given the totality with which Mr. Christie shut down Jersey support for all contenders in 2012 until he decided to endorse Mitt Romney and brought all 21 county chairmen with him.

The July fundraising twilight-doubleheader begins in Monmouth County, where Mr. Kyrillos and Larry Bathgate, a power lawyer who served as the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republican National Committee's finance chairman, are establishing a large committee. According to an email obtained by the Observer, anyone "joining us as an Event Co-Chair with a pledge to raise $10,000″ can be listed on the invitation. According to one source close to the event, expectations are high—"1-2 million is not out of the question—for the event, which will take place at the tony Navesink Country Club, right in the heart of popular State Senator Kyrillos' district.

Larry Wieseneck, a former partner of Jeb Bush at Barclay's, is co-hosting one of two New Jersey fundraisers for Jeb on July 23. Here he's pictured with his wife Gayle in a promo for the posh Newark Academy in Livingston, where Chris Christie is expected to announce his own run for the presidency on Tuesday.

Larry Wieseneck, a former partner of Jeb Bush at Barclay's, is co-hosting one of two New Jersey fundraisers for Jeb on July 23. Here he's pictured with his wife Gayle in a promo for the posh Newark Academy in Livingston, where Chris Christie is expected to announce his own run for the presidency on Tuesday.

Determining which New Jersey Republicans would break ranks with the powerful home state governor has become a parlor game in the Garden State. The Observer was the first to report many of the GOP names supporting Jeb listed in this February story, and also detailed surprising support for Scott Walker. On Monday, the Star-Ledger revealed that Marco Rubio would be coming to Colts Neck in August for a fundraiser at the home of Juan and Marta Gutierrez, Cuban exiles who supported President Bush. The Observer is now the first to reveal that the second event on July 23rd will be hosted by Bill Cohen and Larry Wieseneck in Mr. Cohen's Short Hills home.

While it's long been known that Mr. Bathgate, Ms. Gordon, Mr. Kozlov and Mr. Kyrillos would be supporting Jeb Bush, the names Cohen and Wieseneck are new to Jersey politicos, a further sign of Jeb's ability not just to win over experienced fundraisers but to cultivate new ones. Both men were colleagues of Jeb's at Barclays, where Mr. Cohen is the vice chairman of investment banking and Mr. Wieseneck, who lives in West Orange, used to be the head of structuring. A search of public records (which are imperfect, especially with a relatively common name like Cohen) revealed no federal donations from Short Hills and Larry Wieseneck, who lives in West Orange, was also not previously on any political radar; he gave to no federal candidates in 2014, though he did reliably contribute a couple hundred bucks a month to Barclay's PAC and gave $3500 to Romney and $1000 to Scott Brown in 2012.

With Chris Christie expected to announce his candidacy on Tuesday, there is every chance that the brawler-in-chief will re-exert the discipline that saw him leading a state party that spoke with one voice in 2012. But so far Jeb Bush has proven—and Marco Rubio and Scott Walker are adding their voices—that New York and New Jersey are wide open for political business.

For-Profit Charter Operator In Jeb Bush Video Has A Checkered Past // Buzzfeed // Molly Hensley-Clancy – June 25, 2015

In Jeb Bush's first set of campaign videos, including one released yesterday, there is no place more prominently featured than the classroom. Oft-repeated reels of footage show Bush, known as Florida's "education governor," speaking to rooms full of hand-waving elementary students, leaning over a girl's shoulder as she works on the computer, and sitting down for a discussion with smiling boys in ties.

Many of those students wear the uniforms of Mater Academy of International Studies; others are students at Somerset Academy South Miami, where Jeb Bush's campaign was seen filming earlier this month, according to Politico. Almost all of the classrooms have something in common: they are at schools operated by Academica, the state's largest for-profit charter school management company.

Academica, which has almost 100 schools in Florida and well over $150 million in annual revenue, has a checkered past. Along with an ongoing federal probe into its real estate dealings, past investigations have looked at allegedly corrupt connections with lawmakers. Last year, controversy erupted over its opening of an unaccredited college funded by one of its charter schools.

Of his time as governor of Florida, Bush told Fox News in the wake of his presidential campaign announcement that "what I'm most proud of is reforming our education system."

As suggested by Bush's latest ads, Academica and its high-performing charter schools, which consistently receive high grades from the state, are perhaps the best examples of that legacy at work. The company owes much of its growth in Florida to Bush's policies during his governorship. Bush spurred charter schools to flourish in the state, including those operated by for-profit companies, which found a way to circumvent a 1996 law that forbids the practice. To get around the law, companies set up nonprofit boards to run the schools, which then contract out virtually all of the work to for-profit operators. Bush has been a supporter of for-profit operators. In emails, he suggested that his successor, Rick Scott, sell the massive state-run Florida Virtual School to a for-profit operator, where it could make "more [money]in the private sector."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As governor, Bush visited Academica schools several times, his emails show, including a trip to a campus of a Mater Academy school in 2006. His son, Jeb Bush Jr., was elected to serve as the chair of the nonprofit board another Academica school group, Somerset Academy, though he later withdrew his name.

A spokeswoman for Bush said the former governor "is a longtime advocate for providing more choices for parents and students … Thanks in part to the strongest choice programs in the nation, Florida is one of the only states closing the achievement gap in America today."

A Miami Herald investigation in 2011 found Academica was embroiled in a complex and controversial real estate scheme. Its founder and president, Fernando Zulueta, owns a wide swath of real estate companies — firms that also lease tax-exempt space to many of Academica's schools, acting as their landlords. Academica schools pay tens of thousands of dollars in rent, sometimes over 20% of their revenue, well above the area average, to Zulueta-connected real estate holdings, the Herald found, deals that are meted out by nonprofit governing boards with close ties to Academica.

In 2003, for example, Mater Academy, whose logos dot the polo shirts of students in Bush's campaign ad, signed a $5.8 million construction contract to a company whose contractor also served on the school's board. And Mater Academy High leased its land from a company owned in part by Zulueta's brother, the Herald reported.

Similar real estate setups have landed other charter companies in serious federal trouble. One other major operator, Imagine Schools, was ordered to pay $1 million in January for a "self-dealing" real estate scheme.

Mater Academy was the focus of a federal investigation last year, the Herald reported. Academica's founder and his family, a preliminary report found, had ties that constituted "a potential conflict of interest" to the companies that Mater Academy leased its space from, and to an architect that designed their buildings.

A new controversy arose last year, when the company opened Doral Academy, a junior college within one of its schools in suburban Miami. The school is funded with taxpayer dollars intended for the state's K-12 system. The school is entirely unaccredited, meaning its credits do not transfer to any other schools, which prompted skepticism from officials and outside observers. The college is helmed by Anitere Flores, a state senator and former education adviser to Bush.

Flores has also been involved in education-related legislative efforts in Florida — and was the sponsor of a bill to create virtual charter schools in the state, The Herald reported; when it passed, Academica applied to open 19 such schools.

Other Florida legislators with close ties to Academica, and to Bush, have also been behind legislation that works in favor of the company. State representative Erik Fresen, who is married to an Academica executive who also happens to be the CEO's sister, relaxed zoning restrictions that stood in the way of Academica's expansion.

Working with the company can be lucrative. Miami-Dade prosecutors investigated another former representative, Ralph Arza, after he backed a slew of pro-charter bills while serving as a consultant on the payroll of Academica. He was paid $230,000 for his services, via a company set up in his wife's name. He was later cleared. The Tampa Bay Times said Arza, a Republican, "worked with Bush on many of his education initiatives."

The Jeb Bush campaign and Academica did not immediately respond to requests for comment.

Pro-Jeb Bush Super PAC runs first online ad in New Hampshire, Iowa // Miami Herald // Patricia Mazzei – June 25, 2015

Right to Rise, the deep-pocketed Super PAC former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush raised money for before formally declaring his 2016 Republican presidential candidacy, has its first online ad on the New Hampshire and Iowa airwaves.

The 30-second spot is also targeting voters in Iowa, according to NH1. It features a montage of clips from his campaign announcement last week at Miami Dade College.

Jeb Bush Leads New Hampshire GOP Poll; Donald Trump in 2nd Place // Latinos Post - June 26, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The race for the GOP nomination has drastically changed in recent weeks. While former Florida Governor Jed Bush is still at the top of the ladder, businessman Donald Trump has leapfrogged into second place.

According to Fox News, Bush tops the GOP contenders with 15 percent of the Republican primary voters. Trump, however, now has around 11 percent of the primary voters which is more than double of what he had when he first declared that he would run for president.

However, Trump does have bad news coming his way as only about 29 percent of the Republican primary voters take him seriously. While a whopping 64 percent think he is a side show and does not belong in politics at all. Among all voters, almost 80 percent think that Trump is a side show.

Both candidates have just recently started their campaigns for candidacy, Bush on June 15 and Trump on June 16. So these numbers could be inflated as it is normal to see poll numbers to be larger at first. According to Politico.com, 37 percent of New Hampshire voters had a favorable view on Trump, while 49 percent had a negative view on the businessman. Astonishingly there was a 6 percent of voters who did not even know who Trump was.

Meanwhile, Jed Bush mainly tested favorably with 58 percent of the voters having a favorable view on the former Florida senator while only 28 percent viewed him negatively.

Other GOP contenders include: Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul (9 percent), Florida Sen. Marco Rubio (8 percent) and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee (6 percent), Texas Sen. Ted Cruz receives 4 percent, and businesswoman Carly Fiorina and former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum get 3 percent apiece.

On the other side, former Secretary of State, Hillary Clinton remains the top contender for the Democratic party's candidate for president in 2016. Clinton currently holds 61 percent of the Democratic primary voters, her closest rival is Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders who hold about 15 percent.

The biggest reason for such support for Clinton has been shown to be that 44 percent of all voters think that Clinton would fight hard for the middle class, although 51 percent think that is just a campaign slogan.

The polls also show that Clinton and Trump share similar traits. Unfortunately, they are not all that positive traits as 54 percent of voters think Trump is dishonest while 51 percent think the same for Clinton. This could be stemming from Trump's business deals during the late 1980's and early 90's and from Clinton's recent email debacle.

RUBIO

In N.H., Marco Rubio Is Pressed on Trade and Immigration // NYT // Jeremy Peters – June 25, 2015

Senator Marco Rubio defended his conservative credentials on two issues that are roiling the right – immigration and trade – as he returned to the campaign trail on Thursday.

The Florida Republican, who had taken a breather from campaigning as he crisscrossed the country on a fund-raising tour, had not taken questions from the public since casting a decisive vote on Tuesday that allowed President Obama’s trade bill to advance in the Senate.

Some conservatives, who objected to giving Mr. Obama enhanced negotiating powers to complete a major Pacific trade accord and derided the legislation as “Obamatrade,” blamed Mr. Rubio for providing a crucial 60th vote that assured the legislation could move forward. Others accused Mr. Rubio of not even reading the bill.

In a town-hall-style meeting here on Thursday, Mr. Rubio was asked to explain himself.

“There’s been some controversy on whether or not you actually read the bill,” one woman pressed him. “Why did you vote for it?”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"First of all," he said, "I did read the bill. Second of all, it's not Obamatrade. It's called free trade." To further underscore his point, he invoked a conservative hero: "We voted on fast-track authority, which Ronald Reagan was for."

Whether Mr. Rubio was convincing or not was unclear. The crowd of about 200, which applauded politely on and off during the hour-long event, was not particularly enthusiastic.

He was also asked to clarify his position on overhauling immigration, an issue that still dogs him with many on the right, two years after he dropped his support for a comprehensive Senate bill that would have provided undocumented immigrants with the opportunity to become citizens.

Mr. Rubio was unequivocal. He said he no longer supported one sweeping, omnibus bill, adding, "Anyone who insists on doing it all at once is basically out of touch with reality."

Instead, Congress must first pass a law that provides for greater border security, then prove that illegal immigration is under control. Otherwise, he said, "the votes aren't there — the public won't support it."

Many in the crowd did not seem too familiar with Mr. Rubio, 44, who announced his campaign for president in April and quickly shot to the top of many polls. Several of the questioners seemed interested in testing his conservatism.

Mr. Rubio spoke less than two hours after the Supreme Court upheld a key provision of the Affordable Care Act that allows for the federal health care exchange to provide coverage in states that have not set up their own exchanges. The decision, written by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., an appointee of President George W. Bush, angered many conservatives.

One man in the crowd asked, "What are you going to do differently from the past two Republican presidents, who gave us Souter and Roberts?" (David Souter, a former justice appointed by the first President Bush, often voted with the court's liberal wing.)

Mr. Rubio responded that he would appoint "people that will actually interpret and apply the Constitution, not expand and redefine it." He added that his understanding of the Constitution was fixed. "The Constitution is not a living and breathing document," he said, noting that the next president could appoint as many as three Supreme Court judges.

Marco Rubio is playing to win The Sheldon Adelson Primary // WaPo // James Hohmann & Elise Viebeck – June 25, 2015

Marco Rubio is playing to win The Sheldon Adelson Primary. The Florida senator, who has relentlessly sought the billionaire casino mogul's backing for 2016, co-sponsored a bill yesterday afternoon to ban online gaming. It is not only Adelson's top legislative priority, it could significantly boost his company's bottom line. Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), another presidential hopeful who has assiduously courted Adelson over their shared hawkishness on foreign policy, is the lead Republican author on the legislation for a second year in a row.

An intense courtship: This is just the latest in an aggressive string of moves by Rubio to win over one of the GOP's biggest donors. The two men dined together at Charlie Palmer steak house, adjacent to the Capitol, in March. That was one of at least half a dozen private meetings, which we know about, since the Florida senator took office. Politico reported in April that Rubio calls Adelson every fortnight to provide detailed updated about the campaign. Meanwhile, the newspaper Adelson owns in Israel has trumpeted Rubio on its front page so much so that Israelis joke about it.

Electability matters to Adelson: After spending at least $92 million on the 2012 elections, a good chunk of it for Newt Gingrich, GOP insiders say that Adelson wants to get behind someone who can actually win. That was reportedly a factor in his souring on Ted Cruz. He likes Graham (hosting a fundraiser for him earlier this year and donating to his reelection campaign last year), but he's seemingly more attracted to Rubio's story as the son of Cuban immigrants. He's reportedly told friends that Rubio is the future of the Republican Party. Adelson has telegraphed that he will hold off until at least September to get behind anyone, and he could also invest in multiple contenders. This posture will encourage others to keep kissing his ring.

Marco again risks upsetting conservatives, but Adelson's money would more than make up for any blowback: Rubio's move puts him at odds with movement conservatives (i.e. federalists) who believe that, under the Constitution, states should have the right to decide for themselves whether to legalize online gaming, and that the federal government should not be in the business of boosting one business interest (brick-and-mortar casinos) over another, more innovative one. (This would be akin to Rubio siding with the traditional taxi industry against Uber, the opposite of the approach he's taken.) The senator, for his part, has previously said online gaming hurts people already struggling economically, messaging that sounds like it is meant to resonate with social conservatives.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

House Republicans quietly tucked language into an appropriations bill to protect dark money. The House Appropriations Committee approved a spending bill last week that included little-noticed provisions to hobble executive branch efforts that would mandate more campaign finance disclosures by federal contractors. The restrictions are in a 157-page financial services funding bill. The spending bill would also prohibit the IRS from moving ahead with a rule defining political activity for nonprofits and prohibit the SEC from creating a rule requiring public companies to disclose their political spending.

It is not clear when or if there will be a floor vote on the spending measure but campaign finance reform advocates said they hope an executive order will be in place before the legislation is considered by the full House and Senate, which like other appropriations bills, may not occur until late this year. White House spokesman Eric Schultz declined Wednesday evening to discuss plans for future executive orders, but he criticized the House committee action while confirming ongoing White House concern over "dark money" contributions to politically active non-profit organizations.

Appropriations bills have carried language protecting contractors against executive branch disclosure requirements since 2011, when a draft of an Obama executive order on the topic leaked publicly. The Brennan Center at NYU tallies hundreds of thousands of dollars in contributions collected by committee members from firms doing business with the federal government. Read more trenchant analysis from Tom Hamburger here.

Rubio plans early-state ad blitz // Politico // Alex Isenstadt – June 25, 2015

Marco Rubio is the first 2016 presidential candidate to book significant TV advertising time in early presidential voting states, reserving at least $4.3 million in airtime so far.

On Thursday afternoon, Rubio's campaign began the process of placing buys on TV stations in media markets in the four states slated to vote next February: Iowa, South Carolina, New Hampshire, and Nevada.

The ad flights are set to begin on Nov. 24 in Iowa, and stretch on until late February in South Carolina and Nevada, according to media tracking information.

Ted Cruz was the first candidate on the airwaves this year, but the Texas senator only purchased a small amount of airtime over a limited period.

Reserving the time at a relatively early point in the campaign will ultimately save money for the campaign, his aides believe, since it enables Rubio to acquire ad time at lower rates than competitors who book later. The Florida senator is amassing a sizable war chest but is still likely to trail former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush in fundraising, putting a premium on running a cost-efficient campaign.

A Rubio aide, speaking on the condition of anonymity to discuss internal strategy, said the purchase was only initial and would be expanded later on.

Rubio's TV campaign will be overseen by Todd Harris, a longtime political aide who has experience in Iowa politics. In 2014, he advised Iowa Republican Joni Ernst on her successful Senate bid. In that campaign, Ernst similarly purchased TV advertising time at an early juncture in the political season.

A Canadian idea Rubio likes // Politico // Danny Vinik – June 25, 2015

A lot of politicians say they hate regulations, but how do you actually start cutting them down?

Senator Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) is pushing an idea called a "regulatory budget," a novel approach that would put a dollar cap on the cumulative economic costs that agencies can impose through regulations. It's in his presidential platform, and in the last Congress he introduced a bill that garnered 12 cosponsors, all Republicans.

The regulatory budget is a sweeping solution to what many Americans worry is an overbearing regulatory regime. The idea dates back to Senator Lloyd Bentsen, who first proposed it in 1978, and had drifted out of sight until Rubio revived it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Now it has an unlikely base of support that Rubio may or may not be excited about: the Canadian government.

On Tuesday, the Senate Budget Committee and Senate Homeland Security and Government Affairs Committee pulled together a group of experts to examine the idea of a regulatory budget, and the star witness was basically Canada. Two years ago, Stephen Harper's conservative government implemented a so-called "One for One" policy, requiring Canadian regulators to remove at least one regulation for each new regulation it imposes. In addition, the administrative costs of the new regulation must be offset by the administrative costs of the removed ones. This spring, the House of Commons passed the policy into law.

The Canadians are claiming success: Tony Clement, a senior member of Harper's cabinet who first introduced the bill in January 2014, told the legislators it was saving business's money. "We saw hard evidence that the rule was reducing the administrative burden on businesses," he said in his opening statement. "As of May 20 of this year, in fact, the rule has saved $32 million in administrative burden."

The "One for One" law is a slight variation on the idea of a true regulatory budget. Under a more complete scheme like the one Rubio proposed, agencies have a certain "budget" of administrative costs to "spend" on regulations. Once an agency has used up its budget, it can only implement a new regulation by eliminating old regulations with equal costs. The idea is to force agencies to prioritize which regulations they value most.

There's a good reason why Canada didn't opt for a traditional regulatory budget: Implementing it would have been nearly impossible. Susan Dudley, the former director of both the Office of Management and Budget and the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs under former President George W. Bush, testified at the hearing that calculating the total costs of all existing regulations would be nearly impossible. "And the resulting numbers are probably not very reliable," she said.

The "One of One" policy is not without appeal. It effectively forces government agencies to review past regulations and eliminate ones that are duplicative or unnecessary. Too often, agencies are hesitant to do that themselves.

But the regulatory budget has a shortcoming: it disregards the benefits of regulation altogether, focusing only on costs. A federal agency, for instance, could have to decide between which of two regulations to impose, both of which have net positive benefits for the country. The "budget" ignores that side of the ledger.

The challenge of reckoning gains is already vexing analysts within the government. Many government agencies already require a cost-benefit analysis before new regulations can take effect, and performing those analyses turns out to be exceedingly difficult, since it's impossible to perfectly account for all the costs and benefits from a regulation – or even know when those costs and benefits might come to pass. Regulations can have steep immediate costs, like power plant rules to reduce carbon emissions, and then a long, hard-to-measure benefit, like cleaner air and less damage due to climate change.

"One of the things that we don't look at is any kind of a timeline between the upfront costs for the business and the long-term benefits for society," Senator Mike Enzi (R-Wyo.), the chair of the Senate Budget Committee, told me.

"What we run into is the same problem as a 50 percent off department sale," he said. "There's no way to spend the 50 percent that you save. That's how most of these benefits are. They're savings that can't actually be credited to any particular account. Consequently, they can be pretty nebulous."

It's a fair point. And it suggests that the correct response to sketchy cost-benefit analysis isn't to implement a "regulatory budget" – it's to get better at cost-benefit analysis. And in the case of Enzi's point, you can also figure out ways to offset the costs of regulations with a policy to help businesses hit hard in the short term.

Regulators will never perfect cost-benefit analysis, of course. As Dudley emphasized to lawmakers, there are simply too many unknowns to make accurate estimates. In addition, those estimates inherently involve value judgments, on which Democrats and Republicans will often disagree. Better cost-benefit analysis could help rulemakers with a lot of their problems, but it's highly unlikely to solve that one.

Marco Rubio discusses health care, veterans in NH visit // WMUR 9 // Jennifer Crompton – June 25, 2015

Florida senator and Republican presidential hopeful Marco Rubio sharply criticized the U.S. Supreme Court's decision to uphold key provisions of President Barack Obama's health care overhaul and said the high court's decisions on health care and gay marriage should not mark the final word on either issue.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The court ruled 6-3 in favor of a key piece of the health law that allows millions of Americans to receive tax subsidies, regardless of where they live, to help pay for insurance premiums. Rubio said he disagrees with the judges while campaigning Thursday in New Hampshire, home of the first presidential primary contest.

"What we have now are activist judges," Rubio said. "(We have), it appears, as many as six people on the Supreme Court who think it's their job to try to fix Obamacare."

He said he'll continue to push for a "consumer-centric" approach that allows people to buy health insurance from companies in any state.

The court also will issue a ruling on whether states can ban same-sex marriage and whether states in which it is currently illegal must recognize same-sex marriages performed in other states. Rubio said he thinks state legislatures and voters, not the courts, should decide whether to legalize gay marriage.

He pointed to his home state, where voters chose at the ballot box in 2008 to constitutionally define marriage as between a man and a woman.

"Courts should not be allowed to overturn that," he said. "Other states may reach a different conclusion, and they have a right to do that even if I disagree with them."

Rubio's campaign swing through New Hampshire featured two town hall-style events and a speech at an event focused on ending the Export-Import Bank. Most of his remarks centered on familiar themes, including his background as the son of Cuban immigrants and an emphasis on the need for a more muscular foreign policy.

Rubio, a first-term senator, is among about a dozen Republicans seeking the party's presidential nomination.

Firs t on CNN: Rubio slams Obamacare ruling // CNN // Dana Bash – June 25, 2015

Republican presidential hopeful Sen. Marco Rubio slammed the Supreme Court's decision on Thursday to uphold Obamacare subsidies.

The Supreme Court held that the law authorized federal tax credits for eligible Americans living not only in states with their own exchanges but in the 34 states with federal exchanges, a major win for the Obama administration.

"I disagree with the court's ruling and believe they have once again erred in trying to correct the mistakes made by President Obama and Congress in forcing Obamacare on the American people," Rubio told CNN.

"Despite the court's decision, Obamacare is still a bad law that is having a negative impact on our country and on millions of Americans," Rubio continued. "I remain committed to repealing this bad law and replacing it with my consumer-centered plan that puts patients and families back in control of their health care decisions. We need Consumer Care, not Obamacare."

Thursday's 6-3 ruling is the second time in three years that the court has ruled to uphold Obamacare, Obama's signature domestic achievement.

Chief Justice John Roberts wrote for himself, Justice Anthony Kennedy and the four liberal justices. Justice Antonin Scalia wrote the dissent, joined by Clarence Thomas and Samuel Alito.

"Congress passed the Affordable Care Act to improve health insurance markets, not to destroy them," Roberts wrote in the majority opinion. "If at all possible, we must interpret the Act in a way that is consistent with the former, and avoids the latter."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In a dissent, Scalia said "we should start calling this law SCOTUScare," referring to the two times the Court has saved the law.

The ruling staved off a major political showdown and what would have been a mad scramble in some states to set up their own healthcare exchanges to keep millions from losing healthcare coverage.

Challengers to the law argued that the federal government should not be allowed to continue doling out subsidies to individuals living in states without their own healthcare exchanges and a ruling in their favor would have cut off subsidies to 6.4 million Americans, absent a congressional fix or state action.

Marco Rubio defends courting Koch Brothers in New Hampshire // CNN // Theodore Schleifer – June 25, 2015

Marco Rubio courted New Hampshire voters allied with two powerful organizations at the center of the Koch Brothers' sprawling political network during campaign events on Thursday.

Charles and David Koch, whose donor network has become the most powerful outside player in Republican politics, have pledged to direct about $900 million to help Republicans in 2016. And while the brothers themselves have said they are unlikely to make a single endorsement in the Republican field, many of their donors are. And Rubio, the 44-year-old senator from Florida, has had both public and private auditions in front of their well-heeled crowds.

Rubio spoke before the Concerned Veterans for America, a Koch-funded group aimed at reforming the Department of Veterans Affairs, and Americans for Prosperity, the brothers' flagship organization with an aggressive ground game and paid media operations in key states. As political nonprofit groups, neither is required to disclose their donors.

Rubio, defending his events on Thursday, insisted that big donors wouldn't rule in a Rubio White House.

"People buy into my agenda, I don't buy into theirs," Rubio told reporters in Exeter after appearing at the Concerned Veterans for America event. "My stands are not influenced by my contributors, I hope my stands influences my contributors."

Rubio is expected to be one of the Republican field's top fundraisers, though all are expected to trail Jeb Bush.

As Rubio barnstormed the Granite State, a political nonprofit group set up to support him -- the Conservative Solutions Project -- unveiled a first-week $1 million advertising campaign highlighting Rubio's leadership on Iran.

"Tell your senators to join Marco Rubio. Vote against Obama's deal and stop Iran from getting the bomb," the advertisement said.

Later in the day, Rubio spoke to the New Hampshire chapter of Americans for Prosperity about the Export-Import bank, which the Koch groups fiercely oppose. The bank, which uses federal money to incentivize U.S. companies to manufacture products in the U.S., is up for a re-authorization vote before Congress at the end of the month.

But outside of the Koch events, voters seemed to have a different view of the groups' sway. At a town hall in Salem, a voter asked what he would do to stop corrupting influence of money in politics.

"When I run for office, I tell people what I stand for," Rubio said. "And when you hear what I stand for, if you want to support me and donate to our campaign -- assuming you're not a really, really bad person or something like that -- we accept that."

Marco Rubio Campaign Buys 'Several Million' Dollars' Worth Of Airtime For Ads in Early Primary States // ABC News // Jonathan Karl – June 25, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Get ready for it. The 2016 ad wars are coming soon to a television near you.

ABC News has learned Marco Rubio's presidential campaign has pre-booked "several million" dollars worth of air time for advertisements in early primary and caucus states, becoming the first major ad buy of the 2016 presidential cycle.

A Rubio source tells ABC News the campaign has reserved air time in Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada — all critical early states in the Republican nominating contest.

The ads won't start running for some time, but Rubio, Florida's Republican senator, has locked in the time at lower rates by buying now.

Marco Rubio, Jeb Bus h vow to continue fighting Obamacare after Supreme Court ruling // Palm Beach Post // George Bennett – June 25, 2015

Florida Sen. Marco Rubio and former Gov. Jeb Bush, both Republican candidates for president, said they'll continue to fight the Affordable Care Act after today's Supreme Court decision upholding federal subsidies in states that don't set up health insurance exchanges.

"I remain committed to repealing this bad law and replacing it with my consumer-centered plan that puts patients and families back in control of their health care decisions," Rubio said soon after the court's 6-3 decision was released.

Similarly, Bush said, "this decision is not the end of the fight against Obamacare."

Here are their full statements:

Rubio: "I disagree with the Court's ruling and believe they have once again erred in trying to correct the mistakes made by President Obama and Congress in forcing Obamacare on the American people.

"Despite the Court's decision, Obamacare is still a bad law that is having a negative impact on our country and on millions of Americans. I remain committed to repealing this bad law and replacing it with my consumer-centered plan that puts patients and families back in control of their health care decisions. We need Consumer Care, not Obamacare."

Bush: "I am disappointed by today's Supreme Court ruling in the King v. Burwell case. But this decision is not the end of the fight against Obamacare.

"This fatally-flawed law imposes job-killing mandates, causes spending in Washington to skyrocket by $1.7 trillion, raises taxes by $1 trillion and drives up health care costs. Instead of fixing our health care system, it made the problems worse.

"As President of the United States, I would make fixing our broken health care system one of my top priorities. I will work with Congress to repeal and replace this flawed law with conservative reforms that empower consumers with more choices and control over their health care decisions.

"Here is what I believe: We need to put patients in charge of their own decisions and health care reform should actually lower costs. Entrepreneurs should be freed to lower costs and improve access to care – just like American ingenuity does in other sectors of the economy.

"Americans deserve leadership that can actually fix our broken health care system, and they are certainly not getting it now from Washington, DC."

Marco Rubio gives Obama an 'F' on VA issues // The Washington Times // David Sherfinski – June 25, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida on Thursday gave President Obama a failing grade on issues related to the embattled Department of Veterans Affairs.

"It's an F — I mean, because the system's gotten worse, not better," Mr. Rubio said at a Concerned Veterans for America town hall in New Hampshire, drawing applause. "We've replaced the secretary, we've had press conferences … and you've poured more money into it, and the results — the wait times have gotten longer in some places."

Mr. Rubio, a 2016 GOP presidential candidate, said he thinks when it comes to such issues, "it's either an 'A' or an 'F.' "

"It can't be a 'C' or a 'D' — I mean, it's either an 'A' or an 'F,' " he said.

Mr. Rubio said it's not a "funding issue" or a "want to" issue, "it is the fact that the model itself may no longer work in a 21st century that is dramatically different from what the world looked like 80 to a 100 years ago in terms of access to private providers and centers of excellence that want to take care of veterans and are open for business that can see you right away and produce a result that's good or better."

"Again, the key is it is up to the veteran to choose," he said. "They may be very happy at the VA that they have, they may be very pleased with the services they're being offered and that should be available to them as well. But putting the veteran in charge - [you] don't do that, you're going to continue to have a failing grade no matter who the president is."

Rubio Gives Veterans Cool Grenade Stress Balls at New Hampshire Town Hall // Slate // Jeremy Stahl – June 25, 2015

Concerned Veterans for America hosted a Marco Rubio town hall in New Hampshire on Thursday morning, and the door giveaways at the event were pretty cool:

The "Veterans and Military Town Hall" in Exeter was Rubio's first campaign stop on a day of events throughout New Hampshire that will presumably include less interesting giveaways.

Distributing stress balls to veterans is apparently not unusual for Veterans Affairs facilities and veterans support groups. The green foam grenade "stress balls" have also been used as marketing tools for for-profit college recruiters.

The Concerned Veterans for America grenade stress balls have also apparently been a popular item for them in the past. This online help guide for veterans suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder encourages soldiers experiencing flashbacks to play with a stress ball. It seems unlikely that we'll see much cooler presidential campaign schwag this cycle, although "Rand on a Stick" seems pretty fun.

Rubio: My luxury yacht 'is cleverly disguised as a fishing boat' // The Hill // Ben Kamisar – June 25, 2015

Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) needled recent reports about his "luxury speedboat," joking Thursday that the vessel lacked the amenities of a lavish yacht, such as a bathroom.

"Well the thing about the boat is, too, it is a luxury speedboat, but it is cleverly disguised as a fishing boat," the presidential candidate said during an event in New Hampshire hosted by the CEO of the Concerned Veterans for America, according to CNN.

"But the best answer I got is someone who emailed me or texted me and said, 'Any boat where you have to go to the bathroom off the side of the boat is not a luxury speedboat.'"

A New York Times story from earlier this month detailed the "financial struggles" of the Florida Republican, which included an $80,000 "luxury

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

speedboat," the liquidation of a $68,000 retirement account despite heavy penalties and taxes, taking a loss on a house in Tallahassee and a "strikingly low savings rate."

The campaign later sent Politico the make and model of the craft, which is a family fishing boat that lacks the trappings of luxury.

The story came on the heels of another Times report that highlighted traffic tickets incurred by Rubio in his wife, leading conservatives and Rubio's campaign to call foul.

"The attack from The Times is just the latest in their continued hits against Marco and his family," Alex Conant, Rubio's communications director, told reporters at the time.

"First The New York Times attacked Marco over traffic tickets, and now they think he doesn't have enough money. Of course if he was worth millions, The Times would then attack him for being too rich, like they did to Mitt Romney."

PAUL

Rand Paul slams Obamacare ruling, Warren says too late // The Boston Herald // Joe Dwinell, Zuri Berry, & Chris Cassidy – June 25, 2015

As the president was declaring Obamacare "is here to stay" and Elizabeth Warren knocked the GOP for fighting it, Rand Paul said it's still broken and must be fixed.

The Kentucky U.S. Senator and ophthalmologist slammed the Supreme Court's 6-3 decision today backing health care subsidies — both federal and state subsidies — giving President Obama a big win for his landmark 2010 statute.

"This was our best chance to try to get rid of either Obamacare or some of the worst parts of Obamacare," Paul said today on Boston Herald Radio's "Morning Meeting" show.

"If you don't care about choosing your doctor and don't care about choosing your insurance company ... if you don't believe in personal choice ... or competition. No. Health care is not any less expensive," he said when asked if he agrees with the president that Obamacare is working. "If you pay for your health care, your premiums are still pretty high."

But it didn't take long for Democrats to fire back at the GOP.

"The GOP can keep trying to deny millions access to health care, but our experience in MA shows health reform works — & now it's here to stay," Warren said in a Tweet.

"SCOTUS affirmed what we've known all along: the ACA was passed to provide all Americans access to more affordable, comprehensive insurance," she added in another tweet.

Paul spoke as the president and Vice President Joe Biden addressed the court decision outside the White House.

U.S. Sen. Marco Rubio, stumping in New Hampshire today, took aim at the justices.

"It appears there's at least six people on the Supreme Court who think it's their job to fix Obamacare," he said. "We need Supreme Court justices ... that apply the law, not redefine the law in the way they want."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

House Speaker John Boehner said Republicans will “continue our efforts to repeal the law and replace it with patient-centered solutions that meet the needs of seniors, small business owners, and middle-class families.”

At the court, Chief Justice John Roberts again voted with his liberal colleagues in support of the law. Roberts also was the key vote to uphold it in 2012. Justice Anthony Kennedy, a dissenter in 2012, was part of the majority on Thursday.

“Congress passed the Affordable Care Act to improve health insurance markets, not to destroy them,” Roberts declared in the majority opinion.

Limiting the subsidies only to individuals in states with their own exchanges could well push insurance markets in the other states “into a death spiral,” Roberts wrote.

Justice Antonin Scalia, in a dissent he summarized from the bench, strongly disagreed. “We should start calling this law SCOTUScare,” he said, using an acronym for the Supreme Court and suggesting his colleagues’ ownership by virtue of their twice stepping in to save the law from what he considered worthy challenges.

Rand Paul Said to Take on the IRS, Again // Bloomberg News // Richard Rubin – June 25, 2015

Last week, Rand Paul said he wanted to blow up the tax code. Next week, he could be suing the tax man.

The Kentucky senator is expected to be one of the plaintiffs in a lawsuit against the Internal Revenue Service and the Treasury Department, challenging the government's rules on how Americans abroad are taxed and what foreign banks have to disclose about U.S. citizens who are their customers. Being on the wrong side of the IRS is, of course, a great place for a Republican presidential contender to be.

The focus of the lawsuit is the 2010 Foreign Account Tax Compliance Act—FATCA to the initiated—which has made it much harder for Americans to have foreign bank accounts hidden from the IRS. It's also been a logistical nightmare for the millions of Americans who live outside the country and are still required to file U.S. taxes. The law has also prompted some foreign banks to refuse U.S. customers rather than deal with the hassles.

“The president can only rely upon his authority and he has no authority in the Constitution for this.”

The Washington Times first reported Paul's involvement in the suit on Thursday. Solomon Yue, vice chairman of Republicans Overseas, and James Bopp, the lead lawyer on the suit, both said Paul will be one of the plaintiffs, which will be filed in federal court in southern Ohio. Sergio Gor, a Paul spokesman, wouldn't confirm the Kentucky senator's involvement.

Paul's portion of the suit will question the administration's ability to negotiate agreements with other countries for sharing tax data without going through the formal treaty process that requires Senate approval. To implement FATCA, the Treasury Department has signed cross-border agreements that are easier for governments and banks to use than the strict rules in the law itself.

“The president can only rely upon his authority and he has no authority in the Constitution for this,” Bopp said in an interview on Thursday.

Labeling those intergovernmental agreements as treaties would let Paul block them—something he's not shy about doing. He's already halting a deal with Switzerland that was signed in 2009, and Treasury Department officials have complained that other countries have become less willing to negotiate tax treaties with the U.S. because they have little confidence that the Senate will ever ratify them.

Bopp, a longtime conservative activist, said the other plaintiffs are Americans who live abroad and they'll be challenging other portions of FATCA and related bank-disclosure requirements. It could be a tough case. Courts—remember the Supreme Court's Obamacare ruling in 2012—are typically very deferential to the government's authority to tax. Bopp said the problem is the requirement to disclose confidential information without a warrant.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“We don't think this has to do with taxes,” Bopp said. “This has to do with disclosing private, personal information. The existence of a bank account in a foreign country has nothing to do with what taxes are imposed.”

VAT Chance: Rand Paul, Ben Cardin Push to Change Tax Code // Bloomberg News // Richard Rubin – June 25, 2015

Ben Cardin and Rand Paul don't have much in common.

The Maryland Democrat is a reliable vote for President Barack Obama's agenda. The Kentucky Republican, who is seeking his party's 2016 presidential nomination, is anything but.

Yet both have come to the same conclusion on tax policy: The answer, they say, is a VAT.

“We don't want people to confuse this with a European-style VAT.”

Yes, a value-added tax, the money machine that fuels governments in Europe and gets proponents booted out of office around the world. The U.S. is the only major industrialized nation without a VAT, and that's exactly the way most lawmakers like it.

Campaign pledge

Paul made the VAT a centerpiece of the tax plan his presidential campaign released last week. That makes him the latest convert to a cause Cardin has been pushing for years.

Back in 2010, Cardin was on the losing side of an 85-13 Senate vote that declared the VAT "a massive tax increase that will cripple families on fixed income." Just four of the other 12 who voted with Cardin are still in office, though that had more to do with age than the VAT.

The VAT starts with a very broad base—consumption—and imposes taxes at each stage of production. Each business pays based on what it sells minus what it buys, and the burden gets baked into wages and prices. Those features mean VATs can raise a ton of money—and they impose a heavier burden on the poor, who consume a greater share of their income than the rich do.

Cardin has been persistent, proposing the most thoroughly thought-out VAT plan and advocating it despite little chance of success. Paul is a new convert.

Cardin says he welcomes the new addition to the VAT chat—even though he knows they won't agree at all on the details.

"You talk to conservative Republicans and as long as your tape's not on, they'll say yes," Cardin said in an interview this week. "They will. I mean, I've talked to them. And if you talk to progressive Democrats, they'll say yes."

Cardin's plan and Paul's campaign proposal are going nowhere fast. A member of the Senate minority plus one of a gaggle of presidential candidates don't quite add up to the clout to transform the tax system.

VAT? What VAT?

In a sign of the idea's political toxicity, neither uses the VAT label. Cardin goes with "progressive consumption tax." Paul prefers "business-activity tax."

So at this point, there's no need for a deep dive on border adjustability and the credit-invoice system. But there's an important lesson here about the appeal of the VAT as a simple, efficient way to raise revenue.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"If you take a look, any objective—and I mean objective—analysis of our tax code on competitiveness, you will come to the conclusion that the only way you can reform our tax code is to bring in consumption tax revenues at the national level and reduce the income tax revenues at the national level," Cardin said.

Cardin and Paul were each well aware of a leading argument against a VAT—its regressive nature—and their plans propose remedies. However, the way each senator uses the VAT shows just how far apart the parties are on taxes.

For Paul, the 14.5 percent VAT is a way to cut other taxes.

He would eliminate the corporate income tax, the payroll tax, the estate tax, the gift tax and all tariffs. The result would cut $3 trillion over 10 years from federal revenues, according to the Tax Foundation, and Paul's plan to balance the budget would only work if his tax plan sparks economic growth and he can persuade Congress to cut spending drastically.

The payroll tax repeal and rules that would prevent families of four making $50,000 from paying any income taxes are Paul's attempts to address regressivity. He wants to cut the top individual tax rate to 14.5 percent, so high-income households would pay a lot less, too.

To borrow a phrase from the health-care debate, Paul's plan is to repeal and replace.

"We don't want people to confuse this with a European-style VAT," said Stephen Moore of the Heritage Foundation, who helped design Paul's plan. "It's not an add-on. It's a complete and entire replacement."

Cardin's approach

Cardin takes the opposite approach. He starts from the reality that the the U.S. is a low-tax country with relatively high marginal tax rates. His working theory is that we just have too few taxes. If you spread the burden across multiple tax bases, you can keep rates lower and reduce the economic distortions that each tax causes.

So Cardin uses the revenue from his 10 percent VAT to reduce—but not eliminate—other taxes. The corporate income tax rate would hit 17 percent, down from 35. The top income tax rate would be 28 percent, down from 39.6.

To deal with the money machine fears, Cardin includes what he calls a circuit-breaker—automatic rebates if VAT revenues exceed 10 percent of the economy.

To address regressivity, Cardin takes Paul's $50,000 figure and doubles it, so no married couple making under $100,000 would pay income taxes. Plus, he would offer rebates based on family size.

So Cardin and Paul are close. On everything except the details.

Don't tear up your 1040s just yet.

Rand Paul and AAPS Want to Bring You Liberty.... From Safe Healthcare // HuffPo // Dr. Jason Johnson – June 25, 2015

Rand Paul has been a lot of things over the last 5 years: a Senator, a Tea Party scion, and now a candidate for the Republican nomination for president.

But throughout all of these things Paul, has always fallen back to his years as an Opthamologist and highlighting the training the dedication, even the volunteer service he's done have all been a part of his political message making. But what if Paul wanted to bring his same level of libertarian politics to doctors? What if his same brand of no government, no-oversight-free-market-politics made its way into your day to day healthcare needs? Apparently, Paul has been privately pushing for that all along under the guise of the Association of American Physicians and Surgeons (AAPS).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The name sounds innocuous enough. But the AAPS has a radical political agenda that would likely gut even the most basic protections Americans hold dear in the realm of healthcare. The group has published numerous troubling articles drawing a connection between vaccinations and autism, abortions and breast cancer, and even connecting the rise in American leprosy cases to illegal immigration. While these are all fringe beliefs based on nothing more than junk science, they actually don't constitute the most dangerous policy goals of the organization. Recently, they've set their sights on medical certification boards.

For those who may be unclear on the role of medical certification boards, these are the organizations that set the standards for certification that all doctors have to be a specialist in that area of medicine. When a doctor says they're Board Certified, it's because they've gone through this process.

"The medical recertification industry is a monopoly whose net keeps widening" and "opponents of MOC [Maintenance of Certification] urge physicians to 'stand up to the tyranny' of the American Board of Medical Specialties and the MOC requirements of the specialty boards. 'I call it 'civil disobedience' and regard myself as part of an incipient mass-noncompliance movement," says Dr. Weiss, who has decided not to recertify.

AAPS has decided that the idea of doctors having to periodically retrain and update their skills in the medical profession is a horrible imposition of government authority and, thus, must be stopped. They argue that unlike cops, or teachers or even truck drivers, doctors should somehow be exempt from maintaining their skill set. The consequences of this change in legislation would be disastrous -- and not just for patients, but for doctors themselves.

The vast majority of Americans don't see a medical provider every year, and when they do, it is likely for emergencies, because their children are sick, or they visit their local pharmacist. If doctors are left to their own whim to determine when and how they update and certify their skills, changes in medication, surgery procedures and patient care will likely be missed or just outright ignored. Not because doctors are lazy or unprofessional, but because re-certification takes time, money and study.

Most doctors feel equipped to handle whatever comes into their offices. However, certification doesn't just affect patients, it protects doctors as well. Proof of certification and updated medical knowledge inoculates doctors against lawsuits and challenges about their competence. If an urologist is sued for malpractice two weeks after being re-certified they have a much stronger defense than if the last time they proved their ability was medical school in the 90's.

Senator Rand Paul was a part of the AAPS until 2010 when he was elected to the Senate, like most politicians he chose to quietly separate himself from organizations that might harm his future political goals (like the Palin's and the Alaska Independence Party). But it doesn't mean he still doesn't share these beliefs and, in fact, given Paul's recent statements about autism and vaccination there is every reason to believe that he is still an ideological member of the AAPS even if he's no longer officially carrying water for them.

Rand Paul may be many things -- a crusader, a protector of privacy and a conservative, but one thing he certainly isn't is informed on the value of and importance of oversight in American healthcare. Medical review boards are a necessity for a safe and transparent healthcare system in the United States. The AAPS and organizations like it, are attempting to scuttle the ways in which the consumer is protected in favor of empowering doctors who, regardless of intentions, are still capable to of making life threatening mistakes. Libertarian politics may work great if you're running for president, but it doesn't take an eye doctor to see it won't work well for the healthcare needs of Americans.

Rand Paul's Courtship With Evangelicals: Will It Be Enough to Win the GOP Primary // The Christian Post // Shane Vander Hart – June 25, 2015

In 2012 57 percent of Iowa's Republican caucus-goers identified themselves as evangelical or born-again Christians. Needless to say a candidate who wants to do well in the upcoming Iowa Caucuses in February will have to court evangelicals. It's simple math.

U.S. Senator Rand Paul (R-KY) has a greater ability to reach evangelicals than his father former Congressman Ron Paul (R-TX) did in 2012, and he is reaching out.

In March at a small prayer breakfast with pastors in Washington, DC Paul said that America needs a spiritual revival.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The First Amendment says keep government out of religion. It doesn't say keep religion out of government," Paul told the group of 50 pastors. "We're the most disconnected city on the planet from the people so don't have a lot of faith in what's going on up here."

"We need a revival in the country. We need another Great Awakening with tent revivals of thousands of people saying reform or see what's going to happen if we don't reform," he added.

At the same meeting he told the pastors that our nation's financial woes stem from the country's spiritual brokenness. "It's a spiritual problem as much as it is any other problem. All the other problems kind of stem from a brokenness that is out there," Paul stated.

Paul has also said that government can't fix the moral crisis our country is facing during that same meeting. "Don't always look to Washington to solve anything," Paul said. "In fact, the moral crisis we have in our country, there is a role for us trying to figure out things like marriage, there's also a moral crisis that allows people to think that there would be some sort of other marriage. And so, really there's a role outside and inside government but the exhortation to sort of change people's thoughts has to come through the countryside, from outside of Washington."

In response to the Charleston shooting Paul told the audience assembled for the Faith & Freedom Coalition event in Washington, DC said there is a sickness in the country that can't be solved by more laws.

"What kind of person goes into church and shoots nine people? There's a sickness in our country. There's something terribly wrong. But it isn't going to be fixed by your government. It's people straying away, it's people not understanding where salvation comes from. I think if we understand that, we'll have better expectations of what to expect from government," Paul asserted.

Yet he has to do a balancing act between evangelical's social conservatism on one hand, and libertarians on the other. His campaign's focus has been to discuss privacy and personal liberty matters where there could be some overlap between the groups, as well as, with younger voters.

The issue of marriage, especially in light of the Supreme Court's decision to be released at any time could strain that coalition. Libertarians, by and large, do not want government interference in marriage. Paul is on the record saying that he would prefer it be left to the states, and that he doesn't want to register his marriage with the government.

Evangelical social conservatives on the other hand see the Supreme Court's decision should they rule in favor of same-sex marriage as expected as federal interference with state laws and constitutional amendments, and yet another example of a runaway judiciary. They're looking for answers and Paul has been silent.

Paul has spoken out on the topic of religious liberty however. Last week at the Faith & Freedom Coalition, but he didn't just talk about what was going on domestically. "There is a war on Christianity, not just from liberal elites here at home, but worldwide. And your government, or more correctly, you, the taxpayer, are funding it," Paul said. "You are being taxed to send money to countries that are not only intolerant of Christians but openly hostile. Christians are imprisoned and threatened with death for their beliefs."

Recently, however, Paul was criticized for his initial silence on the controversy over Indiana's Religious Freedom Restoration Act which the Indiana Legislature and Governor Mike Pence later gutted after pressure from the corporate world.

He later defended the law in an interview with Sean Hannity on Fox News. "I think what's amazing to me is that it's (RFRA) necessary. This was the debate when our founding started. Our Founding Fathers didn't even want a Bill of Rights. They thought it would be so understood that you had the right to express your religious liberty that no one would ever question it, and some thought that if you listed a bill of rights that some would believe that is all of your rights. I think our Founders would be aghast that anyone would think that they could tell you to do something, to perform a ceremony or be part of a ceremony, that's against your religious beliefs. That being said, though, I think the law ought to be neutral, and I don't think we ought to treat people unfairly," he stated.

"I don't think you can have coercion in a free society very well. I mean, they–seem to be antagonistic. So, I would think that we ought to try freedom in most of these things. And then, also, people ought to understand that people's opinions change through persuasion…so, if people want to convince people that other forms of marriage are fine, they need to do it through persuasion," Paul added.

Some evangelicals have expressed concerns about his commitment to Israel and his non-interventionist foreign policy as it relates to fighting terrorism.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Paul recently changed course on Israel visiting the country for the 1st time in 2013. He recently submitted the Stand with Israel Act that would have defunded the Palestinian Authority. While Paul has criticized military action in Iraq and Afghanistan he also advocated for the United States to declare war on ISIS.

Also there are questions why Paul has avoided certain venues. He skipped Congressman Steve King's Freedom Summit in January that had over 1000 grassroots activists present. He did speak at the Iowa Faith & Freedom event in April, but is skipping The FAMiLY Leadership Summit for the second year in a row. His campaign told Caffeinated Thoughts that there was a scheduling conflict on July 18, but did not elaborate on what he is opting to do on that Saturday.

His absence from what promises to be the largest gathering of evangelicals in the state, especially in light of the Iowa Straw Poll's cancellation, is mind-boggling to some political observers.

"In my opinion this ends any remote chances he still had to make any inroads to the evangelical vote in Iowa, which is going to be about two-thirds of the electorate next February. Apparently his plan is to see if 7-10% wins next year. I don't understand that strategy," nationally syndicated talk show host Steve Deace said on his Facebook page.

Not all disagree with his approach. Mark Doland, who is minister at Park Avenue Church of Christ in Oskaloosa, IA, has been a vocal supporter of Paul's and recently said that if Paul won 10 to 15% of the evangelical vote Paul would be doing well, especially in light of his efforts to expand the Republican base among younger voters and minorities.

In an op/ed published on Monday by The Des Moines Register Doland also said that he used to buy into all of the cliches and that if a candidate expressed support for life and marriage he could be won over easily. Not anymore, Doland states he's looking for more substance.

He was impressed with Paul's call to reform the criminal justice system.

"Rand Paul is committed to reforming our broken criminal justice system. We are feeling the shock waves through our culture because it wasn't addressed sooner. I strongly believe that the punishment should fit the crime.

When I was 13 years old I met my biological father for the first time. I developed a relationship and bonded with him. It was something I had dreamed about. Two years later, my father was arrested for conspiracy charges on drug trafficking. As a young man in an impressionable stage, it caused a crisis in my life. My dream was annihilated.

My father was sentenced to 13 years in prison. While I do not dispute that my father committed a crime and should have been incarcerated, I don't believe that the penalty for his crime was appropriate. My little brother has followed that path and I believe that it has been directly related to the fatherlessness he experienced as a teenager.

Upon completion of his sentence I am happy to report that my father has reformed and is now a Christian. Rand Paul understands the unintended consequences of this type of justice system and is committed to reforming it."

Doland also said he also appreciated how Paul has gone on the offense with the life issue.

The courtship continues, albeit, it is not a traditional one Iowa evangelicals are used to seeing from candidates. Paul has the ability to draw some evangelicals provided he can maintain the delicate balance he has with the libertarians in the party.

Rand Paul: The Supreme Court 'Missed An Opportunity Here' // The Daily Caller // Al Weaver – June 25, 2015

Soon after the Supreme Court upheld Obamacare subsidies Thursday morning, Sen. Rand Paul said that the Supreme Court "missed an opportunity here" to change the law.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The 2016 candidate also lamented to CNN's Wolf Biltzer that the decision takes "leverage" away from the GOP's efforts to repeal or fix the law in any way.

RAND PAUL: As a physician, the Supreme Court missed an opportunity here. Obamacare is making all insurance more expensive. I think we made a mistake. If they would have ruled and adhered to the literal nature of the law, maybe Congress would have had a chance to take up Obamacare again and try to make it less bad or fix the parts of it that are causing so many problems in our society. I really think Obamacare is making all insurance more expensive and taking away choice. So I am disappointed that we've missed an opportunity here.

WOLF BLITZER: But for all practical purposes, senator, at least for now, any changes, significant changes, in Obamacare, changes you as a physician, as a Republican, as a senator, as a presidential candidate would like — those changes are going away at least for now until — if there is a Republican president that could change, but at least for now you're resigned to the fact Obamacare stays as is.

PAUL: I would still like to reform it and change it and give patients back more choices on whether they can choose which doctor or which insurance plan, legalize competition and legalize inexpensive insurance again, but it makes it hard because we don't have the leverage. If we had the leverage where the president had to revisit this because part of it had been struck down, then we would have the leverage to force the president to revisit it. We have majorities and so we can bring it up and we can pass legislation, but getting the president to actually do something about it and actually have the leverage to get him to perhaps sign something that would change Obamacare, I think we've lost that leverage.

BLITZER: But just to wrap this up, senator, even if you do — the Republican majorities in the House and Senate pass legislation, the president presumably will veto that legislation and you don't have two-thirds majorities to override a presidential veto, right?

PAUL: I agree, and that's why, without this court case, I think we've lost the leverage to actually have the president negotiate with us.

CRUZ

Ted Cruz Speaks to the Right, Shuns Party Leaders // WSJ // Janet Hook – June 25, 2015

At a time when many other Republicans are trying to expand their party's appeal, Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas is aggressively building his 2016 presidential campaign with a different approach: Making an undiluted pitch to his party's most conservative, anti-establishment wing.

Just within the last week, Mr. Cruz abruptly dropped his support for a trade bill bitterly opposed by many conservatives; launched fresh attacks on his own party's establishment leaders; and declined to take sides in the South Carolina Confederate flag debate even after other GOP candidates joined the call for it to be taken down from the Statehouse grounds.

No one ever expected Mr. Cruz to tack to the center in his bid for the 2016 GOP nomination. But as he looks for solid footing in the crowded field, he is doubling down on positions that fire up his base on the right and sometimes rankle other Republicans.

That is just fine by him. In a speech at the Heritage Foundation Wednesday, he took it as a badge of honor that he has fought as much with his own party leaders as with Democrats, attacking the bipartisan "Washington cartel" of lobbyists, lawmakers and powerbrokers.

"You can say a lot of things about me but 'beloved by my colleagues in Washington' is not one of them," he said.

He infuriated many Republicans this week when he flipped positions on trade legislation that he, as a vocal advocate for free trade, had supported in the past.

His earlier vote for the trade bill — "fast track" legislation to expedite international trade agreements — had put him at odds with many tea-party activists, talk-radio hosts and other conservatives who said it gave too much power to President Barack Obama.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Some critics saw his reversal this week as an act of political opportunism to make amends with conservative supporters. He called it a response to changing circumstances: He believed that party leaders, in rounding up votes for the trade bill, cut a deal to keep alive the Export Import Bank, a bete noire for conservatives. That charge was denied by GOP leaders.

In the debate over the Confederate flag in South Carolina after the Charleston church massacre, Mr. Cruz was almost alone among the major presidential candidates in not endorsing South Carolina Gov. Nikki Haley‘s call for taking the flag down from the state Capitol grounds.

Like many Republican presidential candidates, Mr. Cruz initially reacted to the controversy cautiously, deferring to people in the state to decide. Over the weekend, he said he understood “both sides” of the debate but “I think that’s a question for South Carolina.”

After Ms. Haley and a bipartisan group of state leaders Monday called for legislation to remove the flag, other major GOP candidates — including Jeb Bush, Marco Rubio, Scott Walker and Rand Paul — chimed in to endorse that decision.

But Mr. Cruz has still not picked a side. To join in the take-it-down chorus, he would have to cross some of his most important political supporters in South Carolina. Two of his three campaign co-chairs are state legislators who are leading opponents of removing the flag — state Sen. Lee Bright and state Rep. Bill Chumley.

Campaign spokesman Rick Tyler said Mr. Cruz believed that with the issue still before the state legislature, it remained one for the state to decide for itself. “South Carolina doesn’t need outsiders chiming in and dictating their outcome,” he said.

That puts Mr. Cruz in a familiar place: At odds with Republican Party leaders.

One of the prominent “outsiders” chiming in on the debate is Republican National Committee chairman Reince Priebus, who has been trying to expand the GOP’s support among minority voters in the wake of its 2012 presidential loss.

Mr. Priebus appeared on the stage with Ms. Haley as she called for the flag’s removal, and released a statement in support: “While some say it represents different things to different people, there is no denying that it also represents serious divisions that must be mended in our society.”

Ted Cruz Calls Supreme Court Justices 'Robed Houdinis' Over Obamacare Decision // The National Journal // Marina Koren – June 25, 2015

President Obama's signature health care law saw a big victory on Thursday. And the lawmaker who shut down the government over it is outraged.

Ted Cruz gave an impassioned speech on the Senate floor Thursday afternoon, a few hours after the Supreme Court ruled 6-3 to uphold the Affordable Care Act's subsidies nationwide. The senator from Texas, who is also running for president, called the decision "judicial activism, plain and simple."

"Today, these robed Houdinis have transmogrified a federal exchange into an exchange, quote, 'established by the State,' " he said. "This is lawless. As Justice [Antonin] Scalia rightfully put it, without objection, words no longer have meaning."

Cruz was referring to the challenge in King v. Burwell of a provision of the Affordable Care Act that calls for health care subsidies to come from "an exchange established by the State." Opponents of the law said that this language meant that subsidies cannot be made available to people who live in states that rely on the federal government to run their exchanges (there are 34 of them). Roberts wrote that this reading was too narrow, and said that section of the law could refer to both individual state exchanges and government-run exchanges.

Scalia wrote a blistering dissent, saying that "words no longer have meaning" if the majority considers the word "state" to also mean "federal government." Like Cruz, Scalia accused his fellow justices of siding with the president for reasons outside of the Constitution.

"Politics intervened," Cruz said. "For nakedly political reasons, the Supreme Court willfully ignored the words that Congress wrote and instead read into the law their preferred policy outcome. These judges have joined with President Obama in harming millions of Americans. Unelected judges have once again become legislators, and bad ones at that."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Nearly two years ago, just before the launch of Healthcare.gov, Cruz convinced party leaders to tie funding legislation to a bill that would defund Obamacare. The resulting legislative fight led to the first government shutdown in 17 years. Cruz solidified his role as one of the most vocally anti-Obamacare Republicans on the Hill, and is now vying for the White House as the most anti-Obamacare presidential candidate. On Thursday, Cruz looked ahead to 2016, saying the election "will be a national referendum on repealing Obamacare."

"I remain fully committed to repealing every single word of Obamacare," Cruz said. "And mark my words, following the election in 2016, the referendum that we will have in 2017, this chamber will return and we will repeal every word of Obamacare."

For the GOP, Thursday's decision is bittersweet. The ruling saves congressional Republicans and Republican governors from having to scramble for a plan to immediately protect the 6 million people who would have lost their coverage had the Court ruled the other way. But the long-term GOP plan to gut Obamacare depended on a judicial win, one that Republicans thought would force the president to cave on some parts of his law, like the individual mandate, which the Court upheld in 2012.

Now, some Republicans are eyeing a legislative maneuver known as budget reconciliation, which would allow the Senate to skip the 60-vote threshold required to complete action on a bill, keeping the minority party—in this case, Democrats—from blocking it. House Speaker John Boehner would not say Thursday whether leaders will use reconciliation. But even if lawmakers set the process in motion, they face a steep uphill climb, with Obama's veto waiting for them at the top.

While the next legislative steps in the battle against Obamacare remain unclear, Republicans running for president know what to do: promise the fight isn't over. "I think you're going to see virtually every candidate from Jeb Bush all the way to John Kasich calling for repeal and replacement, absolutely," predicted GOP Rep. Matt Salmon of Arizona after the ruling came down.

That includes Cruz, who has the advantage of bringing his campaign to the Senate floor.

Ted Cruz on Obamacare Subsidies Decision: "Supreme Court's Judicial Activism Violating Their Oaths Of Office" // Real Clear Politics // Ian Schwartz – June 25, 2015

SEN. TED CRUZ (R-TX): You, the teenage immigrant washing dishes are paying illegal taxes right now today, because of President Obama's deception, because of the IRS's lawlessness and because of the Supreme Court's judicial activism violating their oaths of office.

I remain fully committed to repealing every single word of Obamacare. And mark my words, following the election in 2016, the referendum that we will have, in 2017 this chamber will return and we will repeal every word of Obamacare. We'll bring back economic growth. We'll bring back opportunity. And then we'll pass commonsense health care reform that makes health insurance personal and portable and affordable, that keeps government from getting between us and our doctors.

We will recognize that this horrible experiment has failed. And when millions of Americans lose their jobs, are forced into part-time work, lose their health care, lose their doctors, when millions of Americans see their premiums skyrocket, it's incumbent on members of this body, it's incumbent on the federal government to fix the wreckage they caused, to fix the wreckage that the Supreme Court has now embraced lawlessly.

Ted Cruz, angered by Obamacare ruling, tells 'rogue justices' to resign and run for Congress // The Washington Times // Seth McLaughlin – June 25, 2015

Sen. Ted Cruz delivered a full-throated critique Thursday of the Supreme Court, saying that it is clear that the "rogue justices" that ruled in favor of Obamacare subsidies are "lawless" political foot soldiers that have joined forces with the Obama administration.

Speaking on the Senate floor, the Texas Republican and 2016 GOP presidential candidate said that if the "justices want to become legislators, I invite them to resign and run for office."

The remarks came shortly after the Supreme Court ruled 6-3 that the Obama administration is lawfully doling out Obamacare's subsidies in dozens of states despite contested language in the law that sparked a legal battle with major politi*cal and economic ramifications.*

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“The Supreme Court willfully ignored the words that Congress wrote, and instead read into the law their preferred policy outcome,” Mr. Cruz said. “These judges have joined with President Obama in harming millions of Americans.”

He continued, “Those justices are not behaving as umpires calling balls and strikes. They have joined a team, and it is a team that is hurting Americans across this country.”

Mr. Cruz said the 2016 election will be a referendum on Obamacare, which he said is hurting millions of Americans.

Ted Cruz is bashing John Roberts after years of praising him // Business Insider // Colin Campbell – June 25, 2015

Presidential candidate and Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) apparently used to have a very different opinion about Chief Justice John Roberts than he expressed on Thursday.

According to a 2005 Sun-Sentinel report, Cruz once praised Roberts as "one of the best constitutional minds in the country."

Cruz reportedly made that comment while explaining why, as a domestic policy adviser for George W. Bush's 2000 presidential campaign, he brought Roberts to Florida to assist with his team's legal battle over the controversial post-election recount.

And as the Texas Tribune reported three years ago, when Bush nominated Roberts to the Supreme Court in 2005, Cruz "was an outspoken advocate for his confirmation, calling him 'brilliant' and a 'lawyer's lawyer.'"

"As an individual, John Roberts is undoubtedly a principled conservative, as is the president who appointed him," Cruz wrote at the time in the National Review. "But, as a jurist, Judge Roberts's approach will be that of his entire career: carefully, faithfully applying the Constitution and legal precedent."

Cruz, now running a fiercely conservative campaign for president, seemed to have a much different take on Roberts on Thursday when the Supreme Court issued its second major ruling protecting the Affordable Care Act, also known as Obamacare

In a passionate statement, Cruz tore into the court's "robed Houdinis" who "transmogrified" the law to defend President Barack Obama's signature healthcare law. Roberts wrote both of the rulings Cruz criticized.

"Today's decision in King v. Burwell is judicial activism, plain and simple. For the second time in just a few years, a handful of unelected judges has rewritten the text of Obamacare in order to impose this failed law on millions of Americans," the senator said.

Cruz's lengthy statement argued that the Supreme Court justices clearly screwed up and that they would have ruled against the Affordable Care Act if politics had not intervened. Cruz once clerked for then-Chief Justice William Rehnquist and, as Texas' solicitor general, argued a number of cases before the Supreme Court.

"For nakedly political reasons, the Supreme Court willfully ignored the words that Congress wrote, and instead read into the law their preferred policy outcome. These judges have joined with President Obama in harming millions of Americans," he continued. "Unelected judges have once again become legislators, and bad ones at that. They are lawless, and they hide their prevarication in legalese. Our government was designed to be one of laws, not of men, and this transparent distortion is disgraceful."

Cruz's campaign did not respond to requests for comment from Business Insider on Thursday asking about the 2005 Sun-Sentinel report and whether his opinion of Roberts has changed.

If his opinion about Roberts has indeed shifted, Cruz wouldn't be the only one. Roberts was nominated for his position by Bush, a Republican, and many conservatives criticized him for siding with the court's liberal wing in the Obamacare ruling.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Similarly, as a senator, President Obama criticized and voted against Roberts' confirmation in 2005. Obama likely has a very different opinion of the chief justice today.

GRAHAM

Graham Blas ts Hillary's 'Sleazy' Associates, State Department Management // Free Beacon // Alana Goodman – June 25, 2015

South Carolina senator and presidential candidate Lindsey Graham slammed Hillary Clinton's management of the State Department on Wednesday, saying that other Americans could be sent to jail for running organizations in a similar fashion.

"I don't know how in the world she can avoid being held accountable for the way she ran the State Department," said Graham, during a meeting with Washington Free Beacon reporters on Wednesday morning. "The sleazy nature of these relationships, and her AWOL when it came to taking care of the people under her charge—being AWOL regarding Benghazi."

Graham said he had concerns about Clinton's continued relationship with long-time confidante Sidney Blumenthal, who passed on faulty intelligence from his private intelligence network to the Secretary of State.

"I have zero respect for the man," said Graham, noting that Blumenthal was accused of spreading false rumors to discredit Monica Lewinsky in the 1990s. "There's a reason the State Department wouldn't hire him. For her to continue to associate with this guy says a lot about her."

Graham said he also found it troubling that Clinton's chief of staff Cheryl Mills was simultaneously serving on the board of New York University's UAE-funded Abu Dhabi campus, earning $198,000 as NYU's general counsel and working for Clinton at the State Department. The Free Beacon first reported on Mills' overlapping positions on Wednesday.

"What kind of vetting system do you have over there?" said Graham. "Somebody had to sign off on this. Either [Clinton's] okay with this, or completely in the dark."

The Republican candidate also blasted Clinton for her use of a private email server, saying that if she had been in the Bush administration there would be much more serious consequences.

"If Dick Cheney had done any of this. If Dick Cheney had set up a server in his house," said Graham. "If Dick Cheney's lawyers had gone through the process and said 'No, we cleansed the thing, trust us, we did it right,' there'd be all hell to pay."

The senator said Clinton's handling of the attack on the U.S. consulate in Benghazi was the biggest black mark on her State Department record.

He criticized the former secretary of state for failing to address security concerns at the Benghazi compound in the months leading up to the attack, despite requests from staff and the late Ambassador Chris Stevens.

"What do you have to do as an ambassador in her State Department to get help? Do you have to take an ad out in the Washington Post?" said Graham. "They did everything they could do to request additional help, and every request, for the most part, was denied."

"I think she's carrying more bags than anybody should be able to carry for President of the United States," he added.

In addition to Clinton, Graham said he also thought fellow Republican senator and presidential candidate Rand Paul would have significant baggage on national security issues going into the race.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He said Paul's recent filibuster to protest NSA surveillance hurt his standing with senate colleagues, and described it as an "unseemly" fundraising ploy.

"The worst thing that can happen to you in the Senate is people think you don't know what you're doing," said Graham. "Rand, I think, exhibited a detachment from the reality that exists in terms of the [national security] threats."

"People thought he did it for political reasons," Graham added. "He's out there on the floor doing a filibuster and raising money. And I think that was unseemly. I think he tremendously hurt himself in terms of being seen as a colleague who is serious and knowledgeable."

Lindsey Graham Criticizes Hillary Clinton on Equal Pay // Free Beacon // Joe Schoffstall – June 25, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Sen. Lindsey Graham (R., S.C.) criticized Hillary Clinton's support for equal pay laws as little more than a handout to the trial lawyer lobby.

Despite having a history of paying the female staffers in her Senate office far less than their male counterparts, Clinton has claimed to be in favor of laws that would mandate equal pay between the sexes.

Graham said in an interview Wednesday that her stated proposal would never work and is purely politics. He also questioned how many people would want the federal government to set salaries throughout the nation.

"Equal pay is about creating lawsuit opportunities, it's not about equality. It's about creating more opportunities for a company to be sued—it is a talking point. It is a concept and it is a shallow concept. It is designed to make people aggrieved with no solution at hand other than more lawsuits," Graham said.

The senator questioned whether such efforts are the proper role of the federal government.

"Is it the government's job to set salaries for people in this country? I would say the construct she's proposing would never work; it's all politics," Graham said. "How many Americans want the federal government to inventory salaries throughout the country. There are already laws on the books where you could sue somebody if you are being paid less because of your gender."

Clinton is "toying" with people by giving them hope when there is none, Graham said.

"The worst thing about this is you're creating—you're giving people hope—when there is none, you're toying with people. Those who feel like, 'I should be paid more,' well the federal government is not going to come in there and give you more money but there is a process for you to sue if you feel you're being aggrieved as an individual. Her solution is just to increase more lawsuits. When she talks about equal play and you flush it out, she's toying with people."

The Washington Free Beacon previously reported that Clinton's current equal pay rhetoric doesn't quite match up to the history of what she paid employees while in the Senate.

While Clinton was a senator, she paid females in her office just 72 cents for each dollar paid to men.

"During those years, the median annual salary for a woman working in Clinton's office was $15,708.38 less than the median salary for a man," the Free Beacon found in its analysis of data compiled from official Senate expenditure reports.

How Lindsey Graham Would Defeat the Islamic State // Free Beacon // Daniel Wiser – June 25, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Sen. Lindsey Graham (S.C.) laid out a detailed plan for defeating the Islamic State terrorist group in an interview Wednesday with the Washington Free Beacon, offering a frank assessment of the necessity for more U.S. troops and a two-front strategy for Iraq and

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Syria.

Concerns continue to be raised about the current U.S. strategy for defeating the Islamic State (IS), which now reportedly controls more than half of Syria and seized the Iraqi city of Ramadi last month. Despite U.S. airstrikes and the presence of about 3,500 troops to train and advise Iraqi forces, the Obama administration's plan to "degrade and destroy" IS does not appear to have slowed the group's momentum.

Graham, one of the leading GOP voices on foreign policy and a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said "Gen. Obama and [Vice President Joe] Biden have been very lousy generals" in the fight against IS. He added that the withdrawal of all U.S. troops from Iraq in 2011 only emboldened neighboring Iran, which has expanded its influence in Iraq by backing Shiite militias.

"Nothing you see today was unpredictable," he said. "It was the natural, logical consequence of a poor decision by the president."

Graham said he agrees with retired Gen. Jack Keane, one of the architects of the surge strategy in the Iraq War, on the need to deploy about 10,000 U.S. troops to Iraq. This would include aviation battalions and special operations forces that could call in airstrikes and better assist Iraqi forces on the front lines. The raid last month by U.S. commandos that killed a senior IS official in Syria should be replicated, he said.

"If I were president we'd be doing that every night in Syria and Iraq," he said. "They would never get a minute's sleep."

More U.S. advisers on the ground would also expedite the training of Iraqi forces and Sunni Muslim tribal fighters from the western Anbar province, who remain distrustful of the Shiite-dominated government in Baghdad and its ties to Iran, he said.

Frederick Kagan, director of the Critical Threats Project at the American Enterprise Institute, articulated a similar strategy in congressional testimony on Wednesday. About 20,000 U.S. troops would be required to help call in airstrikes, embed with Iraqi units to improve their effectiveness, conduct raids on IS leaders, and obtain better intelligence, Kagan said.

In a February poll conducted by CNN, 57 percent of Americans said they did not approve of Obama's efforts to defeat IS. However, a slim majority of respondents said they still opposed sending ground troops back to the Middle East.

As president, Graham said he would tell Americans, "if we don't deal with the threats over there, they're coming here."

"I've never seen so many terrorist organizations with so many safe havens, so much money, so many men, equipment, and material to hit the homeland as I do today," he said.

IS has also demonstrated an ability to expand its so-called caliphate and global influence, making inroads in Afghanistan, Libya, and Yemen, and inspiring attacks in Paris and Texas.

"This is not a regional conflict," he said. "This is a worldwide struggle of good versus evil, religious Nazis against the rest of us."

Turning to Syria, he said the chaotic civil war there "makes Iraq look like a cakewalk." The Pentagon is attempting to train and equip more moderate Syrian rebels to battle IS, but fewer than 200 fighters have begun the program so far due to vetting issues and the difficulty of exiting the country's war zone. Graham said the train-and-equip plan would "have to be 150 years old before this thing has any chance of working," noting that IS could have as many as 40,000 fighters in Syria, its original base of operations.

"There are more foreign fighters coming into [IS] ranks than we're training Free Syrian rebels," he said.

The U.S.-trained rebels also do not have explicit approval to target Syrian dictator Bashar al-Assad, a situation that Graham said has undermined regional support for the effort and must change. He said he would assemble a regional force composed of troops from Egypt, Turkey, and Saudi Arabia to topple Assad and eradicate IS and other terrorist groups in Syria. Yet he added that "big Arab armies haven't really fought much," meaning that more U.S. commandos will be required to give them a logistical edge and act as forward air controllers to improve the accuracy of airstrikes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Once IS has been decimated from Iraq and Syria, U.S. allies must hold the territory and begin a process of reconciliation between Sunnis and Shiites, he said. A political settlement could begin to heal a post-Assad Syria, while neutralizing the influence of Iran in Iraq would create more stability in that country and the region. Graham added that he "would walk away" from the current nuclear negotiations between the United States and Iran and ramp up pressure on Tehran with additional sanctions.

Americans must be prepared for the long-term challenge in the region of rooting out IS and rolling back Iran's influence, he said, dismissing quick solutions such as the partition of Iraq and Syria.

"This mess has got many tentacles to it," he said. "As you pull up the caliphate by its roots, you've got to explain to the American people—this is going to be a long struggle to hold this ground, rebuild Syria and Iraq."

SANTORUM

Santorum returns focus to culture wars in Iowa speech // The Des Moines Register // William Petroski - June 25, 2015

Former U.S. Sen. Rick Santorum, who has struggled for recognition in a crowded Republican presidential field, focused heavily on his role as a culture warrior here Thursday night and received enthusiastic support.

Santorum carried 11 states — including the Iowa caucuses — with a low-budget, grassroots campaign in 2012 that appealed strongly to Christian conservatives. He began the 2016 election cycle talking about helping blue-collar workers, but he spent much of his campaign speech here making clear his opposition to same-sex marriage and abortion and the need to bolster two-parent American families.

Santorum said he was disappointed with Thursday's U.S. Supreme Court ruling that favored the implementation of President Barack Obama's Affordable Care Act. He added he is now concerned the high court will soon follow with a decision endorsing same-sex marriage.

But if the court sides in support of gay marriage, Santorum made it clear he won't consider the battle over. He warned such a court decision could have profound effects on the nation's churches and religious schools and hospitals, resulting in their loss of tax-exempt status if they don't comply.

"You will find out what candidates are made out of," Santorum said. "The key is, 'Are they willing to fight?' "

He told a packed crowd of Iowa and Nebraska residents — including some Catholic priests, religious sisters and seminarians — that Americans who value their faith are battling "a religion of the secular left."

"It is based on power and sheer will. It will be tough to stand against it, but we must," said Santorum, who was repeatedly interrupted with applause and received a standing ovation afterward.

Santorum touted his credentials as a former Senate member who was willing to fight abortion even when his Republican colleagues were reluctant to broach the subject. He said he has been debating Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton for a long time, noting that he wrote 2005 book "It Takes a Family" in response to the former First Lady's 1996 book, "It Takes a Village."

He accused President Barack Obama of dividing Americans racially and on being more interested in "class warfare" than helping people rise in society. But he added that Republicans need a presidential candidate who sounds more like a neighbor to American voters than their boss.

He suggested that as president, he could use the White House as a bully pulpit in support of two-parent American families who favor work and education, saying it would help young people succeed economically, regardless of the color of their skin.

State Rep. Walt Rogers, R-Cedar Falls, Santorum's Iowa campaign chairman, said Thursday night the former senator is close to having a full state campaign staff and should make a strong effort in the 2016 Iowa caucuses. Most Iowa Republicans "are still kicking the tires" on prospective presidential candidates, he said, adding he believes "solid conservatives will line up with Rick Santorum."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

AT THE EVENT

SETTING: Belle Terre, a vineyard and reception hall, in rolling green fields outside Glenwood in southwest Iowa.

CROWD: About 250 people who packed the facility.

REACTION: He received enthusiastic applause throughout his speech and a standing ovation when he finished.

WHAT'S NEXT: This was the first day of a two-day campaign trip to Iowa, but Santorum's plans earlier on Thursday to visit Atlantic, Elk Horn and Kimballton were canceled because weather interfered with his flight plans. Santorum concludes his Iowa visit with a faith and freedom roundtable discussion at 9:30 a.m. Friday at St. Anne's Catholic Parish in Logan.

Rick Santorum: "European Socialist" Obama Believes In Revolutionary Model That Led To Reign Of Terror // Buzzfeed // Christopher Massie – June 25, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Rick Santorum said in May 2014 that calling President Barack Obama a "European Socialist" means he "believes in the model of the French Revolution," which "led to the Reign of Terror."

The former U.S. Senator from Pennsylvania offered a comparative history of the American and French revolutions while being interviewed by radio host Hugh Hewitt at an event sponsored by the Reagan Foundation.

Where the American Revolution was "about 'paternity': God-given rights," Santorum said, the French Revolution was predicated on "'fraternity': brotherhood, people giving rights." This, Santorum further argued, helps explain why the latter insurrection "led to the Reign of Terror" and why contemporary Europe is "a dying culture."

"And it was explicitly a secular revolution," he said. "Anti-clerical, secular revolution that said that the government is in charge. It led to the Reign of Terror, the execution, the guillotine, Bonaparte. And now Europe, which is a descendant of the French Revolution, is a godless, secular continent, as the European Union is. And it's a dying culture."

Santorum contrasted this outcome with that of the American Revolution, which, he said, "spawned this hopeful, optimistic country because we believe in the dignity of every human life and the human potential. And society was ordered to maximize that. And America flourished and changed the world."

Santorum was discussing how, today, there is "a group of people in America who believe that that moment has passed" and that "in fact Europe has the better ideas," when he transitioned into his critique of Obama.

"You say, 'Well, Barack Obama's a European socialist,'" Santorum said. "Understand what that means. He believes in the model of the French Revolution, he believes in a secular, government-run society. Freedom is top-down, not bottom-up."

HUCKABEE

Huckabee calls court's health-care ruling an 'act of judicial tyranny' // WaPo // Philip Rucker – June 25, 2015

Mike Huckabee, a former Arkansas governor and current Republican presidential candidate, called the Supreme Court's decision Thursday to protect the Affordable Care Act "an out-of-control act of judicial tyranny."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Our Founding Fathers didn't create a 'do-over' provision in our Constitution that allows unelected Supreme Court justices the power to circumvent Congress and rewrite bad laws," Huckabee said in a statement provided to The Washington Post.

"The Supreme Court cannot legislate from the bench, ignore the Constitution, and pass a multi-trillion dollar 'fix' to ObamaCare simply because Congress misread what the states would actually do," his statement continued. "The architects and authors of ObamaCare were intentional in the way they wrote the law. The courts have no constitutional authority to rescue Congress from creating bad law. The solution is for Congress to admit they screwed up, repeal the 'nightmare of Obamacare,' and let states road-test real health care reforms."

Huckabee, who is campaigning throughout rural south-central Iowa all day Thursday, pulled over at a gas station to review the court's King v. Burwell ruling.

Huckabee said in his statement that the Affordable Care Act has been a "Washington disaster" that's resulted in families "getting punched in the gut with outrageous insurance premiums and infuriating hospital bills."

"As President, I will protect Medicare, repeal ObamaCare, and pass real reform that will actually lower costs, while focusing on cures and prevention rather than intervention," Huckabee said. "The status quo is unfair, unaffordable, unsustainable and completely un-American."

Mike Huckabee: 'Donor Class' Pushed Senate Republicans To Approve Obama's Fast-Track Trade Authority // HuffPo // Samantha-Jo Roth – June 25, 2015

Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee (R) on Thursday criticized Senate Republicans for voting to approve fast-track trade authority for President Barack Obama, blaming the influence of the "donor class."

“I expect better of the people that we send" to Congress, Huckabee, a 2016 presidential candidate, said during a campaign stop in Corydon, Iowa. "I understand the donor class has pushed them and pushed them to vote for this bill.”

The Senate on Wednesday cleared a bill to give Obama fast-track approval of international trade deals. Fast-track authority would allow the president to submit trade agreements to Congress for an accelerated vote without amendments.

"74 percent of Republicans in America thought it was a bad idea, and most of the Republicans that voted for it, admitted they haven’t read that bill either,” Huckabee told Iowans at a pizzeria.

Huckabee, who traveled to 37 states last year to campaign for Senate Republicans, said it’s time to take a stand against power, money and influence.

“We went out and helped Republicans win in the last election cycle, we sent them to Congress to curtail the executive overreach of this president on issues like immigration and Obamacare,” Huckabee said. “What did our Republicans do this week -- they gave this president more power.”

Huckabee said if he's elected president, he wouldn't seek fast-track authority, pointing out recent trade agreements that have led to the loss of U.S. jobs.

“We have allowed our trade partners to manipulate their currency to dump products into our market place,” he said. “The result is some of your friends, neighbors and family members who have lost jobs in this country, have lost it because we didn’t enforce the trade bills we have, yet we are going to enter into a new one.”

Four Republican Presidential candidates serving in the U.S. Senate participated in the fast-track vote. Sens. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) and Ted Cruz (R-Texas) voted against giving the president fast-track authority, while Sens. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) and Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) approved it.

Mike Huckabee: The Supreme Court just issued 'an out-of-control act of judicial tyranny' // Business Insider // Colin Campbell – June 25, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republican presidential candidate and former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee slammed the Supreme Court on Thursday after it delivered a huge victory for the White House by saving a crucial component of Obamacare in a 6-to-3 vote.

In a fierce statement, Huckabee said the decision was "an out-of-control act of judicial tyranny."

The US' highest court ruled that President Barack Obama's signature healthcare law could provide subsidies to millions of people who were insured through federal exchanges. The dissenting justices argued that the language of the Affordable Care Act indicated that only people insured through state-based exchanges should be eligible for the subsidies.

Huckabee clearly agreed with the dissent.

"Our Founding Fathers didn't create a 'do-over' provision in our Constitution that allows unelected, Supreme Court justices the power to circumvent Congress and rewrite bad laws," his statement continued. "The Supreme Court cannot legislate from the bench, ignore the Constitution, and pass a multitrillion-dollar 'fix' to Obamacare simply because Congress misread what the states would actually do."

He added: "The architects and authors of Obamacare were intentional in the way they wrote the law. The courts have no constitutional authority to rescue Congress from creating bad law."

Huckabee has long been critical of what he describes as the Supreme Court's overreaching its legal authority. When discussing the court potentially ruling in favor of same-sex marriage, for example, he has argued "the court cannot change what God has created."

Mike Huckabee: Get government out of veterans' health care business // The Washington Times // David Sherfinski – June 25, 2015

Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee wants the U.S. to get out of the business of veterans' health and medical care.

The Veterans Health Administration, the part of the embattled Department of Veterans Affairs handling medical care, should be "put out of its misery and most importantly, put it out of the government's" reach, Mr. Huckabee said Wednesday at a stop in Osceola, Iowa, the Des Moines Register reported.

Veterans should instead be given a health care card that provides them with medical services at whatever facility or provider they go to, said Mr. Huckabee, a 2016 GOP presidential candidate and winner of the 2008 caucuses in Iowa.

"You say 'that might be expensive.' It might be," he said. "If we have to take down every monument in Washington, D.C., cut them up in pieces and sell them as souvenirs to pay for it, so be it."

CARSON

Ben Carson: The Supreme Court Overstepped on Obamacare // TIME // Dr. Ben Carson – June 25, 2015

The Supreme Court decided Thursday to uphold the Affordable Care Act. I, like millions of Americans, am alarmed with the court's new power to fill in the blanks and connect the dots on the laws Congress enacts. It seems that a new Justice John Roberts era of "never mind what the law says, we know what it means" has begun. But as a brain surgeon, I was taught not to waste critical time. So I will not.

The Affordable Care Act was the product of an inept process from the start. Twisted legislative maneuvering compounded by a running clock gave us this mess. No Republican voted for this nightmare. Some Democrats didn't bother to even read it, prompting then House Speaker Nancy Pelosi to famously warn, “We have to pass the bill to find out what’s in it.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

What’s in it is the problem, and the implementation has been just as shameful. More than $2 billion was spent on a website that didn’t work, and networks of community organizers combed neighborhoods to sign up people, many of whom thought they had been offered something for free. Now we have hospital emergency rooms filled with new policyholders who were never told that up to $5,000 of the first costs are on them.

In the third quarter of 2008, when President George W. Bush was leaving office, 14.4% of the adult population of this country was uninsured. Today, with the full implementation of Obamacare, that number has dropped to 11.9%. To accomplish these results, many of us have been forced to find new doctors, and many Americans are paying considerably more.

A drop in the uninsured adult population of 2.5% is rather paltry when you measure it against the more than $2 billion spent to implement the program and the 10-year Congressional Budget Office estimation of more $1 trillion more. Doing the math will only lead to heartburn, and as a doctor, I don’t recommend it.

Instead of wasting our time and energy resenting the power grab of the court, the GOP presidential candidates should all agree to re-double our efforts to rid our country of this poorly drafted, ineptly implemented, massively costly and shamefully enacted piece of government intervention into our lives.

I spent my life as a caregiver to young children. The number of fights I have had with insurance companies is only surpassed by the amount of money I paid in malpractice premiums. I am no defender of the “good ole days.”

I believe we need to replace Obamacare with a system that empowers consumers with knowledge and choice to drive down costs. The more power we put in the hands of consumers, the lower the costs will fall. If consumers were picking up the costs for $20 bandages at the Emergency Room, how long would it be before the prices were the same as the bandages at Walgreens. If a patient knew he or she could get the same test at CVS for 90% less than it cost at the hospital, then CVS would need bigger parking lots. More government is always a poor excuse for a solution. Consumer empowerment with health saving accounts coupled with catastrophic coverage is the way to drive costs down.

The GOP nominees this cycle must have a plan to repeal and replace, the determination to articulate that plan, and the fortitude and willingness to work with Congress to actually cause change.

Carson says GOP must offer ‘really appealing’ ObamaCare alternative; Congressman King reacts to ruling // Radio Iowa // O. Kay Henderson – June 25, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Ben Carson said this morning he’s “deeply disappointed” in the U.S. Supreme Court’s decision that “ObamaCare” subsidies are legal. But Carson is urging ObamaCare opponents not to “waste time and energy mourning” the decision, but instead “redouble” the effort to get congress to repeal the law.

“We have to come out with something that is really appealing,” Carson told reporters in Sioux Center. “…That’s going to require some legislative changes, which means we’ve got to get brave people in there in leadership positions.”

Carson said it’s important to “get rid of things” in ObamaCare that are “killing the economy” and that means ending the “employer mandate” which requires businesses with 50 or more full-time employees to provide health insurance or pay a fine.

“It used to be as your company was growing, you were really happy. You got 40 and then you got 50 and then you got 100 employees. That doesn’t happen anymore. Now you get to 40 and you start backing off,” Carson said. “That antithetical to growth in our society.”

Carson made his comments after speaking to a big crowd this morning at the Fruited Plain Cafe in Sioux Center.

Iowa Congressman Steve King, a leading critic of ObamaCare, issued a video statement late this morning on the ruling.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"This is a frustrating day when you're in the business of writing laws and watching the Supreme Court amend them at their will," King said, "by using their own judgment on what public policy should be in the United States."

King said when it comes to the Affordable Care Act, the court has decided to "make it up" as it goes along.

"And they have ruled, essentially, that the law doesn't mean what it says," King said.

This decision on "ObamaCare" was the first of two big rulings expected from the court before it recesses for the summer.

"I'm really concerned about what can happen with the decision on marriage," King said. "They'll likely conclude that the Constitution doesn't mean what it says either."

Senator Chuck Grassley, the senior member of Iowa's congressional delegation, issued a written statement late this morning. Grassley said he respect the court, but Grassley said ObamaCare "remains a terrible law" and he is "committed to repealing and replacing it with effective reforms driven by the marketplace, not the heavy hand of government."

Congressman Dave Loebsack, the only Democrat in Iowa's congressional delegation, called today's decision "a big relief for the thousands of Iowa families who would have faced large, unforeseen, out of pocket increases in their health care costs." Loebsakc said in his written statement that it's time to "move forward and work to strengthen this law, not continue to try and dismantle it."

Congressman David Young of Van Meter, one of Iowa's two rookie Republicans in the U.S. House, issued a statement this afternoon saying there are "real problems with the Affordable Care Act" and it "needs to be repealed and replaced with a common sense patient-centered solution."

Senator Joni Ernst was the first member of Iowa's congressional delegation to react today. Read her statement here, along with analysis from a University of Iowa law professor. Freshman Congressman Rod Blum, a Republican from Dubuque, has not released a statement on today's ruling.

Two other GOP presidential candidates are campaigning in the state today. Former Arkansas Governor Mike Huckabee called the ruling "an act of judicial tyranny" and he says congress should "admit they screwed up" and repeal the law. Rick Santorum will be in Glenwood this evening. The former Pennsylvania senator calls the ruling a "reminder" that in order to get rid of ObamaCare, the nation must elect a "conservative president."

Ben Carson In 2014: Communists Have "Infiltrated Our Society" // Buzzfeed // Christopher Massie – June 25, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Dr. Ben Carson said in an interview last year that Communists are "in our society" and are "organized" in their effort to "bring America down."

The retired neurosurgeon was talking to Baltimore News Radio's Bryan Nehman in May of 2014 about social divisions in the US, when he started explaining his understanding of "neo-Marxist" literature and how it reflected contemporary American society.

He recommended that people read Saul Alinksy's Rules for Radicals to "put a lot of stuff that you're seeing going on into perspective," noting that the book was "dedicated to Lucifer, the original radical who gained his own kingdom."

"This is what we're up against," he said.

"Go back and read what the neo-Marxists said about America and about our incredible strength and how it would be necessary to bring America down to do two essential things," the retired neurosurgeon said. "We have to destroy the American family—basically change the concept of what the family is. And the other thing they said is you've got to kick to the curb their Judeo-Christian beliefs because it provides way too much strength. The only thing that's amazing is how quickly that's occurring. There's a book called the Naked Communist by Cleon Skousen, the same guy who wrote the Five Thousand Year Leap, published in 1958. I encourage people to go and read that book."

The host asked Carson, "Who are the communists that are doing that? I mean, the Soviet Union is no longer there." Carson responded that, "They're in our society," but that people should read about it themselves because he didn't want to "feed into what people say is paranoia."

"They're in our society," he said. "They infiltrated our society. And rather than, you know, feed into what people say is paranoia, I tell people, 'Go read this stuff yourselves.'"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"They are extremely well organized," he argued. "And when you start reading these things that were written 50 and 60 years ago you will recognize them immediately as things that are going on today. Vladimir Lenin, it was kind of funny, the way he put it, 'There are a lot of people, they will not recognize what we're doing. They'll play right into our hands.' And he calls them 'useful idiots.'"

TRUMP

Univision Severs Ties With Donald Trump and Beauty Pageants // NYT // Alan Rappeport – June 25, 2015

Donald J. Trump's business empire was dealt its first casualty Thursday as a result of his decision to run for president.

Univision said that it was ending its relationship with the Trump Organization, that it will not air the Miss USA pageant on its network next month, and that it is severing ties with the Miss Universe Organization. Mr. Trump is a part owner of the Miss Universe Organization, the umbrella group for both the United States and world beauty pageants.

Univision said the decision was because of Mr. Trump's recent remarks about Mexican immigrants. During his presidential announcement last week, Mr. Trump proposed building a wall along the border to keep criminals and "rapists" from sneaking into the United States.

"At Univision, we see firsthand the work ethic, love for family, strong religious values and the important role Mexican immigrants and Mexican-Americans have had and will continue to have in building the future of our country," the company said in a statement.

Mr. Trump said in a statement that Univision was breaking a contract because of pressure from the Mexican government. He also vowed not to be silenced on the subject, arguing that the United States was being damaged by costly trade deals with Mexico and an influx of illegal immigrants who are taking American jobs.

"I have great respect for Mexico and love the Mexican people, but my loyalty is to the United States and making our country great again," Mr. Trump said.

In a subsequent interview with Politico, Mr. Trump suggested that former Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida would have apologized for angering the Mexican government with such blunt remarks.

"Anyone else would be subservient to that," Mr. Trump said. "Bush would say, I'm sorry, keep ripping us off."

The jab at Mr. Bush comes as a poll this week showed Mr. Trump trailing him by a small margin in New Hampshire, the first primary state.

Are Donald Trump's poll numbers too good to be true? // Politico // Daniel Strauss – June 25, 2015

Real estate tycoon Donald Trump has been gleefully calling attention to a Suffolk University poll showing him in second place among the large 2016 Republican primary field, and whispers of a Trump surge are making the rounds.

It might be wise to take a deep breath.

The poll, released Tuesday, showed former Florida Governor Jeb Bush in the lead in New Hampshire, with 14 percent, followed by Trump with 11 percent. The Trump victory dance, or tweet, quickly followed: "The highly respected Suffolk University poll just announced that I am alone in 2nd place in New Hampshire, with Jeb Bust (Bush) in first."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It's true that Trump did indeed take second place in that poll. But it's also true that nationally Trump's polling has been on the decline, and that his favorability numbers aren't hot in New Hampshire. The poll also comes far in advance of the New Hampshire GOP primary, to be held early in 2016.

Pollsters and GOP consultants in the state chalked up Trump's bump to a mixture of his recent candidacy announcement and the high name recognition that comes from his notoriously flamboyant personality, not to mention his reality-show fame.

"Everybody should calm down," Andy Smith, the director of the University of New Hampshire's Survey Center, said. "What you're seeing is real in the sense that people who are paying any attention to this in the last week or so have seen Donald Trump on TV. That doesn't mean they're going to vote for him."

Right now, the early polls don't reflect how many hands have been shaken by a candidate or how much money has been spent on advertising or how many staffers are on the ground there.

"When you're asking people about who they're going to vote for in the New Hampshire primary, what you're asking is, 'All right, it's months from the primary now: Who have you seen in the newspaper lately?' And that would be Donald Trump," Smith added.

A deeper look at the Suffolk poll results also cast doubt that this really is some kind of Trump surge. On favorability, the poll found Trump underwater among New Hampshire Republican primary voters, with 37 percent saying they had a favorable view of him, while 49 percent have an unfavorable view. A much smaller 13 percent said they were undecided on him, and just 6 percent said they hadn't heard of him.

By comparison, the Suffolk poll found that 58 percent said they had a favorable view of Bush, while 26 percent said they held an unfavorable view of him. Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, who came in third in the poll, also had better favorability numbers than Trump — 53 percent said they had a favorable view of him, while 16 percent said they had an unfavorable view.

"I think there's more bad news for him than good news," New Hampshire Republican operative Tom Rath said, pointing to Trump's favorability numbers. "I'm not saying the poll is invalid or that it's faulty as a poll. The timing of it is dubious in that it's right at the moment of the maximum publicity announcement and that there was a lot of media coverage of it, and so there's probably a lot of oomph."

The favorability number might actually show Trump's ceiling, Patrick Murray, the director of the Monmouth University Polling Institute, said. In May, the RealClearPolitics average of national polls on the GOP field put Trump at 4.5 percent. But as of late June, Trump is at 3.2 percent.

"At the end of the day, it's quite possible that Donald Trump will get 11 percent in New Hampshire, but that might be his cap," Murray said.

The other big tell, former New Hampshire Republican Party chairman Fergus Cullen said, is that there's no visible grass-roots movement for Trump in the state.

"Do I think it's a substantive measure of his real support? No way. But do I think it recognizes that he has some name recognition that other candidates don't have?" Cullen said of the poll. "What I have observed of coverage of those events is that they seem to be made-for-TV events where there's no authentic interactions with the candidate and voters."

Cullen stressed that this isn't a matter of the Suffolk poll's accuracy, just name recognition.

"If the Suffolk poll had included David Ortiz too, Ortiz might have been first or second," Cullen said.

Donald Trump Leads All But Bush in New Hampshire // TIME // Phillip Elliott – June 25, 2015

Apparently, Donald Trump for President is a thing in New Hampshire.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A second public poll released this week shows the real estate mogul-turned-reality show star ahead of all other Republican presidential hopefuls except former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush. Earlier this week, when a Suffolk University poll showed Trump in the No. 2 spot in New Hampshire, some dismissed it as a fluke. Then on Thursday, a CNN and New Hampshire's WMUR-TV showed the same. It is part of a one-two win for Trump this week, yet it also comes as Trump's former business partners are moving away from the tough-talking bully and his incendiary comments about China, Mexico and immigrants.

While Trump is nipping at Bush's heels, the polling also shows potential problems, including that few voters believe he has a chance at the White House. Trump is a recent addition to the race and none of his rivals have yet to treat him like a viable candidate. A trove of negative research is at the ready for his foes, Republicans and Democrats alike, to use against him. His record in business is certain to be a liability, much the way former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney spent most of his 2012 campaign on the defense against charges his work in private equity hurt workers and communities.

And as Trump's advisers were touting the new polls, they were also going to battle with Univision, Trump's broadcast partner for the Miss Universe and Miss USA pageants. Trump's lawyers said they were preparing to sue Univision for breaking its $13.5 million contract with the Miss Universe Organization, which Trump co-owns.

When Trump began his White House bid on Wednesday with a rambling speech, he said Mexicans coming to the U.S. were rapists and criminal. ("Some, I assume, are good people," he added as an aside, as though that fixed everything.) Trump also said he would build a great, great wall on the U.S.-Mexican border. He later blamed the media for distorting his words.

Univision, a Spanish-language channel popular with Latinos, said it would not be broadcasting the Miss USA pageant on July 12. No matter, Trump said with typical bravado. He was still a star.

Voters in New Hampshire, at least for the moment, seem to share that view of the brash and blunt New Yorker. Jobs and the economy remain the top focus for New Hampshire Republicans, and Trump leads when voters asked who they best trust to address that subject. He also leads all others when voters were asked which candidate is least likely to act like a politician and who could handle international trade policy. He spent much of his kick-off speech railing against China, a key U.S. trading partner.

He also leads in another field: the candidate the most New Hampshire voters say they most definitely would not vote for. A full 23% of those surveyed said Trump is a non-starter. Trump is in negative territory when voters were asked their general opinion of him: 48% of New Hampshire voters see him unfavorably, while 38% look at him favorably.

At the same time, only 7% of those surveyed see Trump as having the best chance among Republicans to win the general election in November 2016. The clear frontrunner on that question is Bush: 37% see him as the best shot for the GOP to return to the White House for the first time since another Bush moved out. Jeb Bush's brother, George W. Bush, ended his Presidency on Jan. 20, 2009.

The CNN/ WMUR New Hampshire Primary Poll was conducted between June 18 and June 24. The poll, considered one of the most reliable in New Hampshire, interviewed 402 like Republican primary voters and carries a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 5 percentage points. That could mean the number of New Hampshire voters who say they wouldn't support Trump could be as high as 28%.

Donald Trump says 'hypocrite' Neil Young asked him for money // FOX News – June 25, 2015

Donald Trump is saying Neil Young is a hypocrite for complaining about his presidential campaign's use of Young's song "Rockin' in the Free World," while at the same time hitting The Donald up for cash.

Trump tweeted Wednesday that Young recently came to his office seeking funds for his high-end audio player Pono.

Trump even provided a photo to prove it.

"A picture of me with this candidate was also circulated in conjunction with this announcement [for president] but It was a photograph taken during a meeting when I was trying to raise funds for Pono, my online high resolution music service," he explained.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Young blasted the Republican candidate following his announcement, claiming Trump didn't have permission to use his tune.

"Donald Trump was not authorized to use 'Rockin' In The Free World' in his presidential candidacy announcement," Young's team said in a statement. "Neil Young, a Canadian citizen, is a supporter of Bernie Sanders for President of the United States of America."

However, when FOX411 reached Trump's campaign manager for comment, he sang a very different tune.

"Through a licensing agreement with ASCAP, Mr. Trump's campaign paid for and obtained the legal right to use Neil Young's recording of 'Rockin' In The Free World,'" Trump's Campaign Manager Corey Lewandowski told us. "Nevertheless, there are plenty of other songs to choose from. Despite Neil's differing political views, Mr. Trump likes him very much."

It's not the first time -- or even the first time this year -- a candidate has been chastised by a musician for use of a tune. When Marco Rubio played the electronic hit "Something New" at a rally, the duo behind the song spoke out almost immediately, declaring Rubio hadn't obtained permission to use the song and they "don't want to be affiliated with a particular party during the upcoming presidential race."

Plus, there can be a big cost associated with using a hit song to promote a campaign.

John McCain said in 2008, though he was a huge ABBA fan, he gave up on using one of their tunes at his campaign events.

"It's more difficult to play 'Let's Take A Chance On Me' than I thought," McCain said at the time, according to Reuters. "It gets expensive in a big hurry, and if you're not careful, you can alienate some Swedes."

UNDECLARED

WALKER

Scott Walker to announce 2016 intentions next month // CBS News // Stephanie Condon – June 25, 2015

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker will make his presidential intentions known the week of July 13, he said on Fox News Thursday night.

In a crowded field of more than a dozen Republican candidates, Walker's standing in the 2016 polls is relatively decent, so far. In a recent Fox pollof likely Republican voters, Walker tied for fourth place. A recent NBC/ Wall Street Journal pollput him in second place.

The two-term governor has gained a reputation as a staunch conservative after successfully taking on unions in his state and pushing an often polarizing conservative agenda. Walker told Fox's Greta Van Susteren that he would bring that same moxie to Washington, should he decide to run.

Thursday's Supreme Court decision upholding a key portion of Obamacare makes the 2016 race all the more important, he said, promising to replace the health care law with conservative reforms.

"We don't just need to to talk about it, we need someone who can fight and win," he said.

Corruption Charges Against Walker Are Baseless, Supporters Say // The Daily Beast // Peter Fricke – June 25, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker is being accused of mismanagement and corruption related to an economic development agency he helped create, but defenders say the charges are bogus.

Shortly after taking office in 2011, Walker spearheaded the creation of the Wisconsin Economic Development Corporation (WEDC) to replace the state's Department of Commerce. The WEDC provides incentives for businesses to relocate to or expand operations in Wisconsin, and Walker has made the semi-public agency a centerpiece of his efforts to create 250,000 new jobs.

Since then, however, only about 147,000 jobs have been created, and reports from the state's Legislative Audit Bureau (LAB) have revealed insufficient oversight of certain notable deals, according to The Daily Beast.

A May 2013 LAB report, for example, found that WEDC had disbursed $124.4 million without conducting formal staff reviews between 2011 and 2013. Although staff reviews were not required at the time, it apparently prevented the agency from noticing problems with the applications of some business that later proved unable to live up to the promises they had made when requesting the aid.

Defenders of Walker and the WEDC counter that such criticisms are a stretch, considering they are based on findings from more than two years ago, and say the agency has made massive improvements in response to past failings.

Laurel Patrick, a spokeswoman for the governor's office, told The Daily Beast WEDC's loan delinquency rate had fallen from 2.7 percent to just 0.2 percent during the intervening years, and the agency now requires staff reviews for every award it hands out.

"The improvements did not go unnoticed," Patrick said. "In April 2014, WEDC received the Certificate of Achievement for Excellence in Financial Reporting from the Government Finance Officers Association of the United States and Canada, the highest form of recognition in governmental financial reporting."

She also asserted that, "All companies that receive awards from WEDC are contractually required to meet certain objectives, which typically include job creation, job retention and/or capital investment." When those targets are not met, she added, the state can impose penalties such as clawbacks or denial of tax credit claims.

Not everyone is appeased by that explanation, however, particularly after the Wisconsin State Journal reported on a $500,000 loan awarded to Building Committee Inc. (BCI), a construction company whose owner had donated $10,000 to Walker's gubernatorial campaign. The company eventually filed for bankruptcy, defaulting on the loan without having created any jobs.

Describing the BCI deal as "Walker's pet project," the liberal news outlet PoliticsUSA says the incident is indicative of the "corruption and cronyism" of Walker's administration.

The article claims that as chairman of the WEDC at the time, Walker had sole oversight of the $124 million awarded by the agency without staff review between 2011 and 2013, and used that discretion to "[hand] out … Wisconsin taxpayers' money to his corporate donors."

Walker's supporters dismiss the corruption charge as absurd, pointing out that campaign contributions do not disqualify a company from receiving state benefits and denying that politics has any influence on the decision to award subsidies to a particular company.

"Political contributions are in no way tied to awards provided by the WEDC," Patrick told TheDCNF. "Decisions related to investments or awards are contractually required to meet certain objectives and are made according to metrics approved by WEDC's bipartisan Board of Directors."

Any attempt to impute otherwise, she added, "is clearly political gamesmanship by legislative Democrats and others more interested in playing politics than on helping improve economic development in Wisconsin."

Patrick also explained that, "WEDC initially approved the BCI project because it was expected to result in the creation of 155 new jobs and nearly $4 million in capital investment," and said the agency took immediate action once it became aware of BCI's perilous financial condition, imposing a 12 percent penalty interest rate and initiating legal action against the company.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Scott Walker says Barack Obama told Coast Guard global warming is top threat to military and world // Politifact // Tom Kertscher – June 25, 2015

As he pursues a bid for the White House in 2016, Gov. Scott Walker has made it a point to call for more action against "radical Islamic terrorism."

He did so again while speaking June 20, 2015, in Washington, D.C., at a conference of the Faith & Freedom Coalition, a group led by conservative political strategist Ralph Reed.

Toward the end of his remarks, Walker turned to national security -- or what he prefers to call "safety." He criticized President Barack Obama and Obama's former secretary of state, Hillary Clinton, the Democratic frontrunner for president. And then he made a claim about Obama, national security and global warming.

"You know, I think about how mixed up this Obama-Clinton doctrine is when it comes to foreign policy," Walker said. "We've got a president who, earlier this year -- at the graduation ceremony for the Coast Guard Academy -- stood up and actually told the graduates that the number one threat to the military and the world today is global warming.

"Well, I've got a message for you, Mr. President: The number one threat to the military, the number one threat to America, the number one threat to the world, is radical Islamic terrorism and it's about time we do something about it."

Extended applause followed. But Walker made a far-reaching claim.

Did Obama tell graduates from a branch of the military that global warming is the number one threat to the military and the world?

What was said

Walker's claim pertains to the commencement speech the president gave May 20, 2015, at the academy, which is located in New London, Conn.

The official text shows Obama devoted the bulk of his speech to climate change (he used that term, not global warming), describing it as a serious threat to America's national security and to global security.

He did not go so far as to call it the top threat to the military or the world.

Here's a key portion of what Obama said:

And this brings me to the challenge I want to focus on today -- one where our Coast Guardsmen are already on the front lines, and that, perhaps more than any other, will shape your entire careers -- and that's the urgent need to combat and adapt to climate change. As a nation, we face many challenges, including the grave threat of terrorism. And as Americans, we will always do everything in our power to protect our country. Yet even as we meet threats like terrorism, we cannot, and we must not, ignore a peril that can affect generations ….

Here at the Academy, climate change -- understanding the science and the consequences -- is part of the curriculum, and rightly so, because it will affect everything that you do in your careers ….As America's Maritime Guardian, you've pledged to remain always ready -- Semper Paratus -- ready for all threats. And climate change is one of those most severe threats.

And this is not just a problem for countries on the coasts, or for certain regions of the world. Climate change will impact every country on the planet. No nation is immune. So I'm here today to say that climate change constitutes a serious threat to global security, an immediate risk to our national security. And make no mistake, it will impact how our military defends our country. And so we need to act -- and we need to act now.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So, Walker suggests Obama puts climate change ahead of terrorism as a threat, but in his speech, the president notes that the U.S. needs to confront both.

We also checked five news accounts of the speech -- from the Washington Post, the Wall Street Journal, the Associated Press, TIME and Fox News. They all emphasized that Obama described climate change as a threat or serious threat to national security.

Other speeches

Prior to the Coast Guard speech, Obama -- in a general context -- suggested climate change is the world's number one threat.

For instance, in his State of the Union speech in January 2015, Obama said: "No challenge poses a greater threat to future generations than climate change." And in April 2015, a few days before Earth Day, he said: "Today, there's no greater threat to our planet than climate change."

So, after having identified climate change as perhaps the world's greatest threat overall, Obama did devote a speech, given to members of the military, to the threat climate change poses to national and global security. But he didn't go as far as Walker claims.

Our rating

Walker said Obama told the Coast Guard Academy "that the number one threat to the military and the world today is global warming."

Obama on various occasions, and in a general context, has said there is no greater threat to the world than climate change. But in the speech Walker cited, the president told Coast Guard graduates that climate change was a serious threat, not the number one threat to the military or the world.

For a statement that contains an element of truth but ignores critical facts that would give a different impression, we give Walker a Mostly False.

Scott Walker's Jobs Program Didn't Work // The Daily Beast // Betsy Woodruff – June 25, 2015

Scott Walker, Wisconsin's conservative governor, is reputed to be one of the most divisive politicians in America. But in one complicated situation, he's brought people together: Wisconsinites of every political stripe agree that his cumbersomely named Wisconsin Economic Development Corporation, or WEDC, is a big mess.

Here's the thing, though: WEDC has a complex history, and its short saga is a helpful example of the challenges governors face when looking to distill their records for non-wonky national audiences.

First, some quick background. In 2011, newly elected Governor Walker replaced the Wisconsin Department of Commerce with a public-private partnership called (you guessed it!) the Wisconsin Economic Development Corporation, or WEDC. Walker had won the gubernatorial race a few months prior by campaigning on a promise to create 250,000 jobs in the state over the course of his first term. WEDC (commonly pronounced "weed-ick") was supposed to help the state reach that goal and to trim some of the bureaucratic fat that existed in the commerce department.

But Wisconsin only got about 147,000 of those 250,000 promised jobs. And WEDC had serious growing pains, to say the least. A May 2013 audit from the Legislative Audit Bureau had troublesome findings, including that between 2011 and 2013, WEDC gave out $124.4 million in awards without formal staff reviews.

WEDC didn't mandate staff reviews at the time, and the awards were all approved by the agency's bipartisan board. Still, some of those awards went to companies that didn't exactly handle them responsibly. For example, the Wisconsin State Journal reported that Building Committee Inc. got a $500,000 loan after falsely saying it hadn't been sued for five years. It later defaulted on that loan and dissolved. And, as it turned out, the company's owner had given $10,000 to Walker's first gubernatorial campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

These charges of corporate welfare-mongering could be particularly politically troublesome for Walker, given that the Koch Brothers have made opposition to cronyism a key requirement for any candidates they consider supporting.

“According to WEDC, the 27 awards were tied to the creation of 6,165 jobs, but so far only 2,106 have materialized,” the State Journal said. “Many of the awards are tax credits contingent on certain job-creation goals being met.” (The biggest beneficiary of those awards was none other than Walker’s beloved Kohl’s Department Stores, which got a $62.5 million tax credit.)

Critics argue that WEDC over-promised and under-delivered, and they emphasize that some of the companies that benefited from those awards (like Building Committee Inc.) are, as the Chicago Tribune reported, affiliated with or owned by Walker donors.

So Democrats are crying foul. State Representataive Pete Barca, who is a member of WEDC’s board, called on the Department of Justice to investigate the agency because “they have the ability to probe more deeply into whether or not criminal activity went on.” (The DOJ’s press office told The Daily Beast that they don’t confirm or deny the existence of investigations.)

Democratic State Senator Dave Hansen went even further, calling for the agency—which he said is an “unmitigated disaster”—to be shut down. And on June 24, Barca and his fellow Democratic member of the board, State Senator Julie Lassa, said WEDC’s secretary and CEO Reed Hall should resign.

Walker’s defenders, meanwhile, say that WEDC’s critics don’t have much to go on. Dale Knapp, of the Wisconsin Taxpayers Alliance, said he didn’t think it was unusual that so many companies affiliated with Walker donors benefited from WEDC awards.

“These kind of companies often give to both parties, but they tend to support whoever’s in power,” he told the Beast. “The Republicans are completely in power right now, so it’s not surprising that you would see those kinds of numbers.”

Meanwhile, Mark Maley, WEDC’s public information manager, said that campaign contributions don’t impact award disbursement.

“Regarding the recipients of WEDC awards, there is no way to make this any clearer: Political affiliation and campaign contributions absolutely play no role in determining which companies receive awards from WEDC,” he told the Beast.

And it’s important to remember that the biggest problems Democrats highlight happened between 2011 and 2013. Laurel Patrick, a spokeswoman for the governor, noted that WEDC responded to bad report cards by making dozens of policy changes, including replacing outdated software, hiring a vice president of credit and risk, and implementing employee ethics policies (among a host of other changes). Maley said that since the implementation of these changes, WEDC has given out more than 760 awards, all of which were first reviewed by staff.

And Walker’s team argues that these changes paid off. Patrick noted via email that WEDC’s loan delinquency rate dropped dramatically between 2013 and 2014, from 2.7 percent to 0.2 percent.

“The improvements did not go unnoticed,” Patrick continued. “In April 2014, WEDC received the Certificate of Achievement for Excellence in Financial Reporting from the Government Finance Officers Association of the United States and Canada, the highest form of recognition in governmental financial reporting.”

But another audit last month unearthed yet more room for improvement. In response, Walker called for WEDC to stop loaning cash to businesses, and instead to bankroll tax incentives with those funds. And Patrick emailed that additional changes are on the way.

But, regardless of what reforms are made, WEDC also has its fair share of conservative critics who object to the agency’s very existence. “[I] suspect Gov. Walker is starting to realize just how big a liability WEDC could be on the presidential campaign trail and is attempting to tie up loose ends ahead of his announcement this summer,” wrote Collin Roth of Right Wisconsin, a conservative website, in response to Walker’s latest round of changes to the agency.

“[P]hilosophically, if we believe in free markets and limited government, how important is a state agency that essentially tries to create jobs?” he added.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And Brett Healy, the president of the right-leaning MacIver Institute (which typically defends Walker's policy moves), shared Roth's opposition to government entities giving monetary incentives to individual businesses.

"The simple truth is that government should not play a role in direct economic development," he told the Beast. "Corporate welfare is still welfare."

"Any time the government gets involved in this type of corporate welfare—picking winners and losers—all kinds of problems seem to crop up," he continued. "Government should instead get out of the way and let the free market function the way it is intended."

These charges of corporate welfare-mongering could be particularly politically troublesome for Walker, given that the Koch Brothers have made opposition to cronyism a key requirement for any candidates they consider supporting.

So Walker hasn't gotten much cover from conservatives on the WEDC question. And, naturally, his progressive foes have been even more pointed in their criticism.

"The bottom line is that Scott Walker said when he came into office, this is my blueprint for making good on my promise to create 250,000 jobs," said Scot Ross, who helms the progressive group One Wisconsin Now. "And there were a lot of voices out there at the time—mostly on the Democratic or liberal side—saying, this is going to be transparent, and it's just going to be a slush fund for Walker's donors. Not only has been that, but it hasn't created jobs either."

"It's an ATM machine if you're a Walker donor," he added.

Walker and his team have stood firmly behind WEDC. This month, the governor traveled to Canada with WEDC officials to pitch industry leaders on doing more business with Wisconsin. Maley, the agency's spokesman, provided The Daily Beast with a list of its current initiatives, including a $300,000 grant for veteran-owned tech startups; $200,000 each to the African-American, Hmong, Native American, and Hispanic Chambers of Commerce; and community grants of up to $1 million to revitalize abandoned industrial sites. And, most importantly, Walker's team argues that WEDC is a major improvement over the state's now-defunct Department of Commerce.

But WEDC still might be the trickiest thing for Walker to explain on the campaign trail. Walker discusses "big, bold reforms" whenever he talks with Republican primary voters, but incremental changes—like the kind that WEDC has brought about—are tougher to sell and easier to get in trouble over, especially when your ideological allies object to them.

CHRISTIE

Chris Christie to Announce Decision on 2016 Campaign // NYT // Nick Corasaniti – June 25, 2015

Gov. Chris Christie will announce Tuesday in Livingston, N.J., whether he will run for president in 2016, a source close to his campaign confirmed.

Mr. Christie has been traveling the country under the banner of his political organization, Leadership Matters for America, delivering policy heavy speeches on entitlement reform and education, along with holding town hall meetings as part of a "Tell It Like It Is" tour.

Mr. Christie will make his announcement at Livingston High School, his alma mater.

A spokesman for the New Jersey governor declined to comment.

Once considered a Republican front-runner, Mr. Christie has since seen his national standing decline, as he has struggled to overcome the George Washington Bridge scandal and low approval ratings in his home state.

The news of his announcement was first reported by WNYC.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Chris Christie to announce 2016 bid as early as next week // Politico // Alex Isenstadt – June 25, 2015

Chris Christie is in the final stages of preparing his 2016 presidential bid, with a formal announcement possible as soon as next week, according to several sources familiar with the discussions.

The New Jersey governor's planning has intensified in recent days. On Monday, his campaign-in-waiting announced that he'd hired two additional staffers in New Hampshire, a state seen as critical to his White House hopes. Earlier this month, Maria Comella, a longtime Christie aide, departed the governor's official office to take a senior position at his political action committee.

A Christie spokeswoman, Samantha Smith, declined to comment. The governor's aides have previously said that he isn't likely to launch his presidential campaign until the New Jersey legislature finalizes the state budget — expected to be around the end of June.

The announcement will mark the latest chapter in a tumultuous political career. After defeating a Democratic incumbent in 2009, Christie established himself as the GOP's foremost rising star — a swaggering, tell-it-like-it-is pol who seemed to be the antidote for a party that was struggling to win over voters in blue states. In the years since, however, Christie's national prospects have been damaged — especially by the revelations that his top aides concocted a plan to close lanes on the George Washington Bridge in an act of political retribution against a local mayor who refused to endorse the governor's 2013 reelection bid.

Christie's once-stratospheric poll numbers — both nationally and in his home state — have since plummeted. A Fairleigh Dickinson University poll released on Tuesday showed Christie with just a 30 percent approval rating in New Jersey, while a Suffolk University poll showed him winning the support of only 5 percent of likely voters in New Hampshire.

But Christie's aides insist there's room for him in the 2016 field. With former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush struggling to distance himself from the rest of the pack, they say, the lane for an establishment candidate remains open. Aides to Ohio Gov. John Kasich, who is also contemplating a run, have put forward a similar argument for his potential candidacy.

The hope, Christie's team says, is that his authentic political brand will shine through, both on the debate stage — Republicans are preparing to hold their first primary debate in August — and in New Hampshire. The state has a history of breaking for moderate, independent-minded Republican candidates, and Christie has been a frequent visitor there. Those familiar with his early planning for a 2016 bid say he's prepared to make it the cornerstone of his electoral strategy.

In anticipation of his announcement, Christie has been hopscotching the country in recent weeks, attending Republican cattle calls in Oklahoma City, Utah and Washington, D.C., where he delivered fiery speeches castigating a Republican rival, Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul, over national security.

"If you want to know how little [senators] know, watch what Rand Paul's done the last two weeks," Christie told Republican donors at a conference in Deer Valley, Utah, hosted by Mitt Romney, referring to Paul's opposition to the PATRIOT Act. "Because, I will tell you, he's made America weaker and more vulnerable, and he's done it for his own personal and political gain, and he's done it to raise money."

Christie has also delivered speeches in early primary states in which he's detailed his policy proposals on issues like entitlements, taxes and electronic surveillance.

In addition to building a campaign apparatus, Christie has also hired for a super PAC, America Leads, that will be supporting his candidacy. The group recently announced that it had brought on Gene Ulm, a veteran Republican pollster, and Mike Leavitt, a mail consultant.

While Christie won't be nearly as heavily funded as Bush — whose super PAC is believed to have brought in around $100 million so far — the New Jersey governor has a team of donors that includes Home Depot CEO Ken Langone and hedge fund manager Stanley Druckenmiller. Both are expected to write big checks. ("I am going to work my ass off to make sure that Chris Christie never needs money," Langone told POLITICO in January.)

Earlier this month, Christie dropped another hint that he was nearing a run. While campaigning in New Hampshire, the governor said that his family — one of the last major hurdles to his entering the race — was on board.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"This is about me now," he said.

JINDAL

Bobby Jindal's identity causes a Twitter storm in India // WaPo // Rama Lakshmi – June 25, 2015

A day after Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal announced that he will run for U.S. president in 2016, the way he chooses to identify himself has become the subject of a trending hashtag in India.

It's called #bobbyjindalissowhite.

Jindal's meteoric rise in the Republican Party as a conservative of color has won him many supporters in the United States. But here in India, Jindal is seen "as a man who has spent a lifetime distancing himself from his Indian roots."

"I'm sick and tired of people dividing Americans," Jindal said on Wednesday. "And I am done with all this talk about hyphenated Americans. We are not Indian-Americans, Irish-Americans, African-Americans, rich Americans or poor Americans. We are all Americans."

His remarks fueled a firestorm of jokes on Twitter that he is trying to pass as white despite his Indian roots. Here's just a sample:

Indians on social media mock Bobby Jindal candidacy // LA Times // Shashank Bengali – June 25, 2015

As a rising power, India is obsessed with its image in the world, so the announcement of the first U.S. presidential candidate with Indian roots figured to create a stir.

It probably wasn't the kind Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal wanted.

Indians on Thursday roundly mocked Jindal's campaign kickoff announcement, particularly for the 44-year-old Republican's line that he was "tanned, rested and ready" to run. It was widely seen as an attempt to play down his skin color to appeal to conservative voters, and fit with what Jindal's critics say is a longstanding effort to disassociate himself from his Indian heritage.

The Twitter hashtag #BobbyJindalIsSoWhite trended in India for several hours.

Some of India's leading newspapers ran front-page mentions of Jindal's announcement, although the coverage was less than effusive. Lalit K. Jha, longtime Washington correspondent for the Press Trust of India, wrote in a news report that Jindal's announcement "has failed to generate much enthusiasm among the Indian-Americans because of his recent statements in which he sought to distance himself from being an Indian-American."

Jindal was born in Louisiana in 1971 to Indian immigrants from the northern state of Punjab. As a child he changed his birth name, Piyush, to Bobby after the character from "The Brady Bunch." Raised by devout Hindus, he converted to Catholicism as a teenager and says his faith inspires his conservative principles, including a staunch opposition to same-sex marriage.

Jindal invoked his parents at the start of his kickoff speech Wednesday but used the word India only once: in his oft-repeated accusation that Democrats were dividing the country along ethnic, gender and class lines."We are not Indian Americans, Irish Americans, African Americans, rich Americans or poor Americans," he said. "We are all Americans."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jindal enters the Republican presidential race near the bottom of the pack and has failed to inspire much support from U.S. voters of Indian origin, most of whom lean Democratic.

"Bobby has never supported a single Indian issue, he refused to join the India Caucus when he was a congressman [on] Capitol Hill and is conspicuously absent from any event with a visiting Indian leader," Shashi Tharoor, an Indian politician and author, wrote in a recent book, "India Shastra."

"It is as if he wants to forget he is Indian, and would like voters to forget it too."

Jindal is an object of fascination for a rising Indian middle class that assiduously tracks their country's stature in the world. When Prime Minister Narendra Modi led scores of countries in marking the first International Day of Yoga last weekend, many Indians beamed with pride.

But they are less charitable when it comes to Indians abroad who are seen to betray their heritage. Preet Bharara, the U.S. attorney in Manhattan, has received less than favorable press coverage for the perception that he has targeted Wall Street executives with South Asian roots, such as Sri Lankan-born hedge fund billionaire Raj Rajaratnam, for prosecution of financial crimes.

Young Indians flooded social media sites with sarcastic comments when Jindal unveiled his official governor's portrait earlier this year because his skin looked shockingly white. A photo his office tweeted this week of his family playing Monopoly inspired mockery because his young children had their shoes on inside the house, a cultural no-no here.

Mihir Sharma, a columnist for the Business Standard newspaper, accused Indian Americans of a "tendency to turn viciously on those they see as less Indian." But even he balanced his words with a critique of the candidate.

"Typical: smug Indians trying to shame Bobby Jindal for his choices on identity, and not his awful politics," Sharma tweeted.

Bobby Jindal's fateful choice // WaPo // Jennifer Rubin – June 25, 2015

Louisiana Governor Bobby Jindal, barely registering in the polls, announced his presidential run on Wednesday. The once wonky conservative is now clinging to the Duck Dynasty star Willie Robertson in hopes of convincing the right-wing base he is one of them. It seems there is not a far-right position or slogan he does not embrace. How times change.

The Post reports:

Just eight years ago, Jindal's future looked far brighter than it does now.

The former Rhodes Scholar and McKinsey consultant was elected governor at age 36, the first Indian American ever to govern a state. "The question is not whether he'll be president," Republican strategist Steve Schmidt said in 2008, "but when he'll be president."

Jindal seemed to offer a new vision of what a Republican could be: an Ivy League-educated son of immigrants, who had a relentless focus on making government run faster, smarter and cleaner.

"We've laughed at our politicians and the ones that have gone to jail and made the funny jokes," Jindal said in 2007, after he was elected governor on the second try. "But it's not funny anymore."

But, as Jindal pondered higher office, he seemed to fall into a strange and vicious negative-feedback loop.

Like Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Tex.), Jindal felt the pull of the far right and became determined not to be passed by any more conservative contender. The problems for Jindal now are two-fold. First, his state has budget issues — he slashed taxes and now has a severe revenue shortfall — and his own popularity is in the low 30's. Second, by going far right all he did was enter a crowded field of equally right-wing promoters. He thereby lost whatever advantages he would have had running as a conservative, reforming governor. He's going to have to share the part of the base that thrills to extreme anti-gay marriage rhetoric, wallows in anti-Washington invective and falls prey to anti-immigration reform hysteria with a long list of contenders including Cruz, Dr. Ben Carson, former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee, Donald Trump and Rick Santorum. His dilemma is now the same as that of each of these players: How does he distinguish himself and get more than a few percentage points?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Imagine if instead, Jindal had not, for example, flip-flopped on Common Core or tried to slash the state budget or turned up the volume on his opposition to gay marriage. Imagine if he had run as the ideal reformer — a congressman, a policy wonk, and a governor — but more conservative than Bush or Ohio Gov. John Kasich, brandishing healthcare expertise and a compelling immigrant story. He might then be competing not with small fry candidates but with more serious contenders like Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker. Former Texas governor Rick Perry — a friend of Jindal, who endorsed Perry in 2012 — seems to have figured out that one can be a conservative governor, but also reasonable and appealing to a wider audience. (Then again Perry has his remarkable record in Texas, while Jindal is floundering back home.)

The one candidate watching with delight as Trump, Jindal, Cruz, Carson, Huckabee and Santorum scrounge for votes is Jeb Bush. Each new entry grabs at least temporarily some support from the previous entrants and from Walker and Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) It's Bush's ideal scenario — he claims the centrists and everyone else scrambles for the fringe. More mainstream candidates like Walker and Rubio have to fight for oxygen while rivals like Kasich or New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie (in 11th place in the last Fox News national poll) may not get into the top 10 for the first debate in August. It is not Bush, but Walker and Rubio who would love to get Trump, Jindal, Cruz, et. al, out of the race so they can consolidate support.

Jindal suffers from awkward over-eagerness as he tries to out-conservative the conservatives, reminding me of Mitt Romney in 2008 — the moderate Massachusetts governor reborn as a social conservative, anti-immigration reform firebrand. The danger for Jindal, as it was for Romney, is that a lack of authenticity, now compounds his challenge.

The lesson here for the candidates trying to keep pace with Bush (i.e. Rubio and Walker) is to stay out of the scrum of candidates in single digits. Instead they need to compete as not-Bush alternatives with an eye to the wider GOP primary electorate. If they try endearing themselves to the same audience Jindal and Trump seek on issues like gay marriage, the Confederate flag, trade, tax policy or other issues they will find themselves dragged down into the "also running" category. If they are constantly looking over their shoulder, afraid to dismay talk radio hosts, they will take themselves out of contention as consensus candidates. Unfortunately for Jindal, he already made that choice and as a result is unlikely to do well.

Jindal's Facebook showing matches his lagging poll numbers // McClatchy // David Lightman – June 25, 2015

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal's showing on Facebook was about the same as his showing in most polls. Unspectacular.

In the 24 hour period between 12:01 a.m. ET June 24 and 12:01 a.m. ET today 25, 316,000 people generated 542,000 interactions, which include likes, posts, comments and shares. Jindal announced his candidacy first in a tweet Wednesday afternoon and later at a Louisiana rally.

The conservative governor, who's making a big pitch for the evangelical vote, didn't come close to what businessman Donald Trump sparked earlier this month. Trump's announcement generated 3.4 million "unique people" and 6.4 million interactions. Sen. Ted Cruz, R-Texas, also generated numbers in the millions.

Here are some other Republican announcement showings:

Jeb Bush

493,000 unique people

849,000 interactions

Rick Perry

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

422,000 unique people

763,000 interactions

Lindsey Graham

84,000 unique people

142,000 interactions

George Pataki

59,000 unique people

81,000 interactions

Rick Santorum

169,000 unique people

266,000 interactions

Mike Huckabee

458,000 unique people

814,000 interactions

Carly Fiorina

304,000 unique people

515,000 interactions

Ben Carson

847,000 unique people

1.5 million interactions

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Marco Rubio

695,000 unique people

1.3 million interactions

Rand Paul

865,000 unique people

1.9 million interactions

Bobby Jindal presidential bid sparks Twitter mockery // BBC – June 25, 2015

Mr Jindal launched his campaign with a call for a uniform US identity, saying he disliked Americans being identified by origin, ethnicity or wealth.

The hashtag #BobbyJindalisSoWhite began trending on Twitter after the launch.

The tweets poked fun at Mr Jindal's speech and alleged attempts to distance himself from his Indian heritage.

"We are not Indian-Americans, African-Americans, Irish-Americans, rich Americans, or poor Americans. We are all Americans," he told supporters.

Also a subject of ridicule was the fact that Mr Jindal railed against allowing "people to immigrate to this country so that they can use our freedoms to undermine our freedoms".

He added it was incumbent on migrants entering the United States to be "ready and willing to embrace our values, learn English, and roll up your sleeves and get to work".

The presidential hopeful had begun his speech with the words: "Forty-four years ago, a young couple who had never been on an airplane before left their home on the other side of the world to come to a place called America."

Indians online were not amused by his remarks.

The original hashtag #bobbyjindalissowhite was started by Indian-American comedian Hari Kondabolu, with a series of tweets. Following the success of the tag he said it was the most "satisfying thing" he had ever done.

Others chimed in, like Aasif Mandvi from the Daily Show.

The hashtag was also picked up in India, where it was among the country's top trends for much of the day.

Gopinath Gopalam, a healthcare professional from Baton Rouge, travelled to New Orleans to watch Bobby Jindal make his presidential announcement on Wednesday. Although Gopalam hails from India, he says the governor's Indian ancestry is of little importance to him. What matters, he says, is what his success says about the US.

"It's an open economy, open community," he says. "Anybody can come here and have the skill and ability they can rise to the top."

The focus on Mr Jindal's ethnicity in recent media coverage has angered many conservatives. In particular, they point to a Washington Post article that featured a quote from a Louisiana University professor who said "there's not much Indian left in Bobby Jindal".

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"For years, liberals have attacked Governor Jindal for not being brown or Indian enough for their liking," Mr Jindal's office said in a statement. "Governor Jindal is proud of his heritage. He believes we need to stop fixating on race and hyphenated Americans."

Mr Jindal, who was born Piyush, told CBS news that he changed his name to Bobby after a character in US sitcom The Brady Bunch.

He also converted to Catholicism from Hinduism while he was at school.

A report in the Washington Post said many Indian-Americans who were among his first supporters are now disillusioned with what they see as efforts by Mr Jindal to distance himself from his roots.

"So what if he's Republican? So what if he's Christian? I don't care about those things, But you can't forget about your heritage. You can't forget about your roots," one of his first donors Suresh C. Gupta was quoted as saying.

KASICH

John Kasich Appeals to Iowa as He Ponders White House Bid // NYT // Trip Gabriel – June 25, 2015

“Does anybody remember me?’’ John Kasich asked Iowans on his first visit to the state since an inglorious presidential bid in 1999, when he barely made an impression before dropping out.

Throughout Wednesday, as he hopscotched through events, Mr. Kasich, the two-term Ohio governor, sought to disarm skeptics of his late-to-the-party exploration of a second White House run.

“I was giant television star. Do you remember that?’’ he asked a roomful of under-40 professionals from the Bull Moose Club. There were many blank looks. “I was only at Fox News for 10 years,’’ he said, breaking into a grin.

In an interview with The Des Moines Register that ran Wednesday morning, Mr. Kasich even tutored Iowans on how to say his name. “It rhymes with basic,” he said.

But with blunt talk about his policy departures from conservative orthodoxy, Mr. Kasich appeared to make new friends in Iowa.

“I was taken aback by how straight a shooter he was,’’ said Tyler De Hahn, chairman of the Dallas County Republican Party, who heard him at the Bull Moose luncheon. “He’s kind of like a Christie lite.’’

A moment earlier, Mr. Kasich had been pushed about why Ohio was not a right-to-work state. “Because we don’t have a reason to be one,’’ he said.

Like all candidates who come to Iowa, Mr. Kasich, 63, recounted well-rehearsed chapters of his biography and trumpeted his successes:

* Working with President Clinton while a member of the House to craft “the first balanced budget since man walked on the moon.’’

* His decade in the private sector. “I just loved it,’’ he said, skipping over the role his employer, Lehman Brothers, played in contributing to the financial crisis.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

* His election as Ohio governor “at exactly the right time,” in 2010, when “things couldn’t have been much worse.’’

“I took a lot of the lessons I had learned in Washington to Ohio,’’ Mr. Kasic said, a line no other Republican candidate is likely to utter this cycle.

Mr. Kasich, who said he was still weighing whether to enter the race, is barely registering in Iowa polls. His formidable hurdles in the state include a lack of time visiting it, and a list of center-right policies he has supported that conservative caucusgoers are likely to reject, from expanding Medicaid under the Affordable Care Act to voting for an assault weapons ban while in Congress.

“The hurdle he’d have to get over is the strong religious right,’’ said James Gilson, a retired stockbroker who heard Mr. Kasich address the Greater Des Moines Partnership, a business and civic group.

But balancing out those negatives is the potential appeal of the straight-shooting, even gnarly, Kasich persona. Despite the state’s reputation for Iowa Nice, its voters welcome a candidate who can cut through the political catchphrases.

“He tells it like it is, and I think that’s going to be huge,” said Mike McInerney, the Bull Moose president. “Iowans really respect that.’’

OTHER

OP nightmare: Big Labor courts George Soros, Tom Steyer // Politico // Kenneth P. Vogel and Brian Mahoney – June 26, 2016

Big labor, which once relied almost exclusively on member dues to fund its political activity, is now hoping to raise huge checks for its 2016 efforts from billionaires like George Soros and Tom Steyer, according to confidential documents.

The documents, obtained by POLITICO from a source outside the labor movement, show labor leaders have invested considerable time and union cash to secure preferential treatment from the preeminent club of major liberal funders, the Democracy Alliance, or DA. They also offer a rare glimpse into labor’s efforts to identify rich donors who could pump money into union-linked non-profits that can legally accept unlimited donations and do not have to disclose their contributors.

One briefing document shows that a leading labor non-profit called Working America — which works to organize non-union workers to seek higher pay and better working conditions, and to elect sympathetic candidates — is focusing on donors it considers “true progressives (who) care about labor.” It offers detailed profiles with information seemingly intended to cultivate wealthy donors. Ian Simmons, the silent funding partner of the small-dollar juggernaut ActBlue, is described as “an up and comer at the DA,” while healthcare software pioneer Paul Egerman, an Elizabeth Warren confidant, is listed as “important in Democratic Party fundraising circles.”

And there are signs that Working America is trying to reach donors whose animating issues haven’t always figured prominently into labor’s playbook, like climate change. Steyer, a San Francisco hedge fund billionaire who in 2014 donated $67 million to a super PAC pressing for climate change action, is described as “an advocate of promoting economic development” who is engaged in “ongoing discussions with AFL-CIO and Working America about possible points of agreement and collaboration.”

Steyer’s political adviser Chris Lehane declined to say whether Steyer or his foundation has donated to Working America or the AFL-CIO. “Tom is working closely with our allies, including labor, to build a coalition that will talk to voters about the three justices – economic justice, climate justice and educational justice,” Lehane said.

Labor’s increasing forays into big-money politics come at a pivotal time for unions and the Democratic Party.

The longtime traditional allies appeared to be closely synched heading into 2016 until a simmering feud boiled over this week. Congressional Democrats sided with Republicans to pass trade legislation bitterly opposed by labor but backed by President Barack Obama and promoted by Hillary Clinton when she was secretary of state. Unions and their allies are promising to turn up the heat on Democrats who don’t take labor’s side on trade. Yet unions are relying on Democrats to help beat back well-funded conservative attacks on bargaining power, and many Democratic candidates, including presidential favorite Clinton, are embracing labor's causes, such as raising the minimum wage and requiring paid sick leave.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In interviews, labor leaders confirmed that they hope to expand the reach — and revenues — of outfits outside traditional unions, which have seen their ranks and budgets slashed by Republican efforts to limit organizing rights. Labor unions have enthusiastically embraced super PACs, which focus on election spending and were an outgrowth of the Supreme Court's 2010 Citizens United decision. So-called "alt-labor" groups like Working America, which seek to organize non-unionized employees, such as fast-food workers, have been billed as the the labor movement's future.

In April, four labor-linked non-profits won coveted spots among the Democracy Alliance's portfolio of 34 groups recommended for funding. Insiders expect that to translate into serious 2016 cash for the labor groups added to the portfolio — Working America, the Working Families Party/ Organization, the Economic Policy Institute and the National Employment Law Project.

The DA's member donors ("partners," in club parlance) must donate anywhere from $200,000 to $1 million to endorsed groups. And the club's members intend to steer a total of $100 million or more to recommended groups during the 2016 election.

The list of DA partners now includes six prominent unions, with four (the American Federation of Teachers, the Communications Workers of America, the Service Employees International Union and the United Food and Commercial Workers International Union) joining in the last two years, according to a list and other club documents obtained by POLITICO.

The partnerships require the unions to pay annual dues of $60,000. But they give the unions' leaders access to the deep-pocketed donors and foundations who constitute the majority of the partners at the DA, which is a kind of nerve center and bank for the progressive movement, serving a similar — if less well-financed — role as the Koch brothers' conservative funding network.

The finances of Working America illustrate labor's efforts to diversify its funding.

The group was started in 2003 by the AFL-CIO, which originally provided 93 percent of its funding.

But by 2013 – the most recent year for which records were available – the AFL-CIO and other unions contributed only 40 percent of the $25 million raised by Working America and Working America Education Fund. The two arms are registered under sections of the tax code — 501(c)5 and 501(c)3, respectively — that do not require them to disclose their donors. But a significant portion of their budgets now comes from members who pay small voluntary dues, and deep-pocketed liberal foundations and donors who write five- and six-figure checks.

Labor non-profits like Working America in recent years have seen their fundraising spike, with non-union sources playing a major role, according to a POLITICO analysis of filings with the Department of Labor and the Internal Revenue Service using data aggregated by the conservative Center for Union Facts. The analysis found that 18 leading labor non-profits (including Working America and the three others added to the DA portfolio this year) raised $52 million in 2013 — 15 percent more than in 2012, despite the presidential election that year — with 13 percent of the haul coming from liberal foundations (which are required to disclose their grants in their tax filings).

"There's a huge upsurge in this type of activity," said Larry Cohen, the outgoing president of the Communications Workers of America, who sits on Working America's board and helped start a handful of labor non-profits that have received funding from the CWA and have delivered presentations to Democracy Alliance donors.

Democracy Alliance president Gara LaMarche said unions are becoming more involved in the DA partly because "they recognize that the groups they have backed need to have a broader base of support. Any healthy organization shouldn't be dependent on one main source of revenue."

Since assuming the club's leadership last year, LaMarche has worked to build bridges between labor and rich liberals who sometimes hold sharply different views on trade pacts and school reform – even the role of unions in public life.

"One of the good things about bringing labor and capital together in the DA is that they can have discussions about the issues on which they have been at loggerheads," he said. He noted that the group last year for the first time elected a labor leader, National Education Association executive director John Stocks, as board chairman.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The emerging synergy is both ironic and worrisome to conservatives who track liberal money, to whom there are no greater threats than “Big Labor” and the Democracy Alliance.

“They’re constantly complaining about the horrors of our campaign finance system and yet this is a savvy way for them to make use of all the available political finance avenues to fight their battles,” said Scott Walter, executive vice president Capital Research Center, which studies liberal funding networks.

For its part, Working America says it’s more focused on courting moderate working-class members than liberal billionaire donors.

“We were delighted to be put among the groups within the Democracy Alliance and have some support, but it’s just not mostly who we are,” said the group’s executive director Karen Nussbaum.

Working America has demonstrated an ability to effect legislative and campaign fights in recent years, from city halls to Capitol Hill. It helped temporarily derail Obama’s trade deal and played a major role in lifting its preferred candidate to victory in Philadelphia’s Democratic mayoral primary. Plus, it was a leading player in pushing through minimum wage increases in more than 15 states.

It’s planning an aggressive door-to-door campaign ahead of 2016, said Nussbaum, who declined to discuss funding sources for the effort. She said Working America sees Democracy Alliance primarily as a place to forge collaborations with like-minded groups, not as a funding source.

Yet the donor profiles produced for her group suggest the efforts to build collaborations and high-dollar fundraising relationships are not mutually exclusive.

The profiles — like those prepared by development staffs across Washington ahead of prospecting meetings — include donors’ contribution histories, pet causes, hometowns, spouses’ names, etc.

Investor Sandor Straus and his wife Faye Straus are described as “genuine progressives (who) have given $10k to (Working America) through the DA for past two years” – donations that previously have not been disclosed. They did not respond to requests for comment.

At the DA’s spring meeting in April in San Francisco, they co-hosted a panel to discuss “how aligned donor, labor, and foundation investments” in regional secret-money non-profits were “making progressive wins possible at the state and local levels,” according to an agenda obtained by POLITICO.

Likewise, the Working America briefing describes Ken Zimmerman, a top official for Open Society Foundations, the philanthropic network founded by the billionaire investor Soros, as “central to meeting with the AFL-CIO about possible collaborations.” An Open Society spokeswoman said Zimmerman “has no formal relationship or involvement with the AFL-CIO,” but added that foundation officials “meet with people all the time to talk about areas of overlapping interest.”

Indeed, a pair of foundations in Open Society’s network have donated more than $10 million to various alt-labor groups since 2001, with $600,000 going to an arm of Working America in 2012, according to foundation tax filings.

Sources familiar with Soros’s relationship with Working America say he donated $150,000 from his own pocket to the group in 2006 and $400,000 in 2008, when it organized a massive canvassing campaign supporting Obama and other Democrats.

But Steve Early, a former CWA official and the author of Save our Unions called labor’s courtship of foundation donors “troubling” at times because “these philanthropic institutions are not fundamentally on the same side as any real working class movement.” He said alt-labor groups “need to develop a dues paying membership base” to become permanent sustainable organizations.

GOP insiders expect no harm from Confederate flag controversy // Politico // Kyle Cheney – June 26, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republican insiders overwhelmingly say the GOP presidential candidates gave an adequate – or even strong — response on the issue of the Confederate flag this week, after its presence over the South Carolina state capitol became a symbol of America's racial divide in the aftermath of last week's shootings in Charleston.

That's the assessment of this week's POLITICO Caucus, our weekly bipartisan survey of the top operatives, activists and political hands in Iowa and New Hampshire.

Despite a week's worth of unfavorable headlines over the issue, the GOP insiders said the 2016 field struck the right notes after South Carolina GOP Gov. Nikki Haley and 2012 presidential nominee Mitt Romney called for removing the flag from the capitol grounds.

"Governor Romney opened the gate last weekend for Republicans to do the right thing on the flag, and to their credit, the majority of the candidates followed his lead," said one New Hampshire Republican. "The Republicans like to talk a lot about expanding the party and reaching out to minority communities. This week, we took action on those words."

Sixty-one percent of the Republican insiders surveyed called the collective message on the flag "adequate," and another 21 percent called it "strong." Democratic insiders had an opposite view: roughly two-thirds rated the GOP candidate responses as "weak" or "disastrous."

"What a bunch of babies," said a New Hampshire Democrat. "They couldn't do the right thing until Haley gave them cover."

Beneath the Republican insiders' overall assessment, however, was some pointed criticism toward the uneven and belated responses of some of the individual candidates before they ultimately called for the flag's removal.

"Finally they all got in line," said another New Hampshire Republican. "Trying to work into their response a weak state rights argument completely missed the point."

Less clear was which candidate handled the matter best. Some suggested Bush's decision to highlight his own effort as governor to remove the Confederate flag from Tallahassee's capitol portrayed him as a man of action. Others noted that Sen. Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican, came across as the most statesmanlike. One common thread: the moment was a missed opportunity for Sen. Rand Paul, who's staked his campaign on a push to mobilize young and minority voters he says have been left behind by Republicans.

"Rand Paul continues to be one or two beats off the mark," said one Iowa GOP insider. "He's building an outreach, big tent brand and would have helped himself with an immediate, unequivocal call to banish the Confederate symbol once and for all." Other Republicans fingered New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, who is expected to announce his candidacy next week, as the most significant flop.

"Mr. Tell-It-Like-It-Is was a ghost," said one New Hampshire GOPer.

Here are three other takeaways from this week's POLITICO Caucus:

Bernie Sanders is gaining traction

It's just an iota, a speck, a lonely molecule of hope for Clinton's progressive critics — but a handful of Iowa and New Hampshire Democratic insiders say Bernie Sanders could compete with, and perhaps even defeat, overwhelming frontrunner Hillary Clinton if the vote in their states were held today.

"Bernie Sanders is picking up steam and he has met with key groups throughout Iowa in the last 30 days," noted one Iowa Democratic insider, who said Sanders is leading. "He is scheduled to be in town for most of next week, traveling to both northwest and southwest Iowa which are the most conservative areas of the state He looks serious and his campaign staff is targeting the most difficult areas of Iowa first. That is good strategy."

While the majority believes Clinton would still win, there's a palpable sense of a momentum swing in Bernie's direction.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Bernie is getting hot, and though the Clinton support seems broad, I wonder what would actually happen if someone said you vote next Tuesday,” offered a New Hampshire Democrat.

Chris Christie still has a shot in New Hampshire

Christie was left for dead after the Bridgegate scandal seemed to torpedo his presidential prospects, but he’s begun a slow climb back to viability. Though he’s still considered a longshot, two-thirds of New Hampshire insiders agree that he’s got a chance to win their state – a prospect that would vault him back into the top tier.

“Chris Christie has made New Hampshire his Waterloo and he will commit as many resources as possible here as he can,” said one New Hampshire Republican. “While the likelihood of a Christie win in the Granite State is still small, by flooding the zone, similar to John McCain in 2000 and 2008, Christie has an opportunity.”

Another put it more bluntly: “Live in NH or die.”

But even those who see signs of life for Christie in New Hampshire question whether Christie missed his moment.

“After being MIA for months, he’s been doing everything he’s meant to do since April in NH and he’s doing very well on the stump,” said one Republican. “But he still has zero - zero - publicly committed supporters. Time for some early TV ads? Not sure he’ll even end up filing for the primary come November.”

Iowa is a different story: few insiders think he has a prayer of winning. Two-thirds of Iowa respondents say his path there ends in a cliff. Iowa Republicans largely see him as too late and too moderate to compete in the Hawkeye State.

“He is so disliked I don’t know how he’s got a path to the nomination unless there’s a simultaneous implosion of Walker, Bush, Rubio and Kasich,” said one Iowa Republican. “The Establishment wing has more than enough choices. The Christie Casserole in the Republican buffet line will go untouched.”

Moving past gay marriage

With the possibility of a Supreme Court ruling in favor of same-sex marriage, a majority of Republican insiders say their presidential nominee should recognize the court decision, reiterate their support for traditional marriage, and say it’s time to move on.

“In New Hampshire the vast majority of Republican voters are [past]this issue, so it’s time for the party to get [past] it too,” said one New Hampshire Republican. “Candidates need to pivot to a more positive policy agenda: strengthening the many versions of the American family.”

“Gay marriage is already the law of the land in New Hampshire. It’s been on the books for several years, and the sky hasn’t fallen,” said another Granite State Republican. “If the Court rules in favor, Republicans should see it as an opportunity to clear the decks of an issue that they’re on the wrong side of in terms of public opinion and re-focus on better issues.”

An Iowa Republican said much the same: “Republicans need to moderate on this issue because public opinion is changing rapidly on this issue in favor of gay marriage.”

About a quarter of Republican respondents argued that Republicans can pivot from the ruling to a fight about religious liberty — a theme that several candidates struck at a cattle call last week hosted by the Faith & Freedom Coalition.

“The marriage debate is over. Religious liberty actually still has broad support in this country, unlike a federal marriage amendment,” argued one Iowa Republican.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The logical extension of a SCOTUS decision upholding [same-sex marriage] will be for the proponents … to begin to FORCE churches to perform the marriages," argued another Iowa Republican. "[A]dvocates will never be satisfied until every church has to perform their weddings and every vendor has to serve their cakes."

Republicans Cite Health Care Ruling in Pushing Candidacies // NYT // Alan Rappeport – June 25, 2015

Republican presidential candidates were quick to pivot off the Supreme Court's ruling to uphold Affordable Care Act subsidies, arguing that the decision shows the need to replace President Obama with a member of their party.

Former Gov. Rick Perry of Texas said that it should not be left to the Supreme Court to "save us from Obamacare."

"We need leadership in the White House that recognizes the folly of having to pass a bill to know what's in it," Mr. Perry said. "We need leadership that understands a heavy-handed, one-size-fits-all policy does nothing to help health outcomes for Americans."

Senator Marco Rubio of Florida said the court erred in trying to correct Mr. Obama's mistakes. The decision was another reason that he should be elected president, Mr. Rubio said.

Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin said the decision should be more motivation for Congress to overturn the law.

"Today's Supreme Court ruling upholding the administration's implementation of Obamacare means Republicans in the House and Senate must redouble their efforts to repeal and replace this destructive and costly law," he said.

Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky said he was the man to lead the overturn of the law.

"This decision turns both the rule of law and common sense on its head," Mr. Paul said in a statement. " As president, I would make it my mission to repeal it, and propose real solutions for our health care system."

Former Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida said that if he becomes president, he will make fixing the health system through the private sector a top priority.

"We need to put patients in charge of their own decisions, and health care reform should actually lower costs," Mr. Bush said. "Entrepreneurs should be freed to lower costs and improve access to care – just like American ingenuity does in other sectors of the economy. "

The Republican National Committee decided to focus its statement not on Mr. Obama, but on Hillary Rodham Clinton and the 2016 election.

"Today's ruling makes it clear that if we want to fix our broken health care system, then we will need to elect a Republican president with proven ideas and real solutions that will help American families," said Chairman Reince Priebus. "Hillary Clinton supports big government mandates and expanding the government's reach into our health care system, maneuvers that have made our health care system worse off."

The statement made no direct reference to Mr. Obama.

GOP lawmakers: Time to move on from Obamacare repeal // Politico // Manu Raju & Burgess Everett – June 25, 2015

Republicans have tried to kill the health care law twice at the Supreme Court, only to be rebuffed. They've held more than 50 repeal votes, virtually all of which have died in the Senate. They tried to defund the law through the spending process, but the government shut down instead.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As Republicans process Thursday's sharp rebuke at the hands of the Supreme Court, they're struggling with what to do next — beset by internal divisions and procedural roadblocks that severely limit their options.

The reaction to the ruling ranged from defiance to resignation.

Many, like Rep. Robert Aderholt (R-Ala.), concede the law is here to stay until at least 2017, when they hope a GOP president will finally kill it. But conservatives like Texas Sen. Ted Cruz insist Congress should use "every single tool at our disposal" now to stop the law, including holding spending bills hostage to force President Barack Obama to acquiesce.

Bad idea, say other GOP lawmakers. "We've tried that before, and it didn't work very well," said Cruz's fellow Texan, Sen. John Cornyn.

Still others, such as Rep. Ed Whitfield (R-Ky.), say it's time to focus on fixing aspects of the existing law, rather than continuing a fruitless repeal effort.

"No, no," responds Rep. Joe Wilson (R-S.C.). "It needs to be repealed and replaced."

The dissension has left some GOP lawmakers resigned and ready to move on.

"We're going to have to go back to the drawing board, figure out if there is an alternative at this point," Sen. Dean Heller (R-Nev.) said Thursday. "Perhaps it's time to move on from this particular topic."

The latest round of soul-searching came in the immediate aftermath of Thursday's decision in King v. Burwell. In a 6-3 ruling, the high court upheld subsidies for 6.4 million people who receive health care coverage through the federal exchange. Had the Obama administration lost the case, Republicans planned to use the ruling as leverage to push through a range of legislative options to further erode key elements of the sweeping law.

With the law intact and the president's veto pen in the way of any conservative attempts to weaken Obamacare, the GOP has few viable alternatives. They could try to use annual spending bills again to try to gut elements of the law, but that would risk a government shutdown. And Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell has disavowed a strategy that could lead to a repeat of the 2013 closure, by virtually all accounts a debacle for the party.

The most obvious vehicle to gut all or part of the law now is through the so-called budget reconciliation process. But budget rules are likely to prevent Republicans from doing a full-scale repeal through reconciliation legislation, given that they are required to include policy provisions that will decrease the deficit, rather than increase it.

"There are very strict rules," warned Sen. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa), a senior member of the Senate Budget Committee.

Even though reconciliation bills cannot be filibustered and can pass with just 51 votes in the GOP-led Senate, Obama could still veto any measure that emerges from Congress.

Adding to the complication is a growing debate internally within the GOP over whether to use reconciliation to attack Obamacare. Some Republicans say they should channel their energy instead on hard-to-pass legislation — like changes to entitlements or tax laws — that Obama may ultimately agree to sign.

Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.), an ally of Speaker John Boehner's, said the party should focus on reforms "you might be able to talk the president into," such as changing how Medicare benefits and Social Security cost-of-living adjustments are doled out.

"To me it doesn't make much of it point," Cole said of using reconciliation to repeal the law.

But Rep. Lynn Westmoreland (R-Ga.) responded: "I think we've got to use it for Obamacare. We've just got to do it."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Thursday, senior Republicans said the House and Senate will still hold repeal votes, even if they're essentially for show. "In some ways, this just gets us back to our old game plan," Cornyn said of the court ruling.

Some Republicans argue more repeal votes will keep the issue front-and-center in the 2016 congressional and presidential elections, making next November a referendum on the law.

"It means that the most significant domestic issue in 2016, at every House race, in every Senate race and for president will be centered around whether or not the country wants to keep Obamacare," said Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), who is seeking his party's nomination for the White House.

And if Hillary Clinton wins, Graham said: "It means that Obamacare becomes Hillarycare."

"At the end of the day, there is not going to be any complete repeal of the law until there is a new administration," Aderholt said. "But we can't sit back as a party who stood against it, and pretend that it is what it is and we aren't going to do anything."

Republicans will have a very hard time changing the law even if they sweep the 2016 elections. The Senate will likely be narrowly divided, and the vast majority of the Affordable Care Act will already be in place and relied upon by tens of millions of people.

Only a handful of provisions would still be waiting to take effect in 2017, such as the so-called Cadillac tax on high-cost insurance plans, which faces some bipartisan opposition, and the Independent Payment Advisory Board, a controversial panel tasked with reducing Medicare spending growth. So far, health costs haven't risen at a rate that would trigger the board to act.

Beginning in 2017, states will be able to get a waiver to essentially opt out of some of the ACA's structural rules — and some Republicans see the waivers as a chance to escape some of the most onerous aspects of the law. But states will receive a waiver only if they agree to cover the same number of people and to the same extent that Obamacare would have, meaning it would be difficult to venture too far outside the confines of the ACA.

Ohio Rep. Steve Stivers said fellow GOP lawmakers should continue to press their case to keep the issue at the top tier in 2016. But he said Republicans should work now with Democrats on reforms that can win support from both parties.

"What I hope we'll do is stay focused on the big bipartisan issues like repealing the medical device tax right now," Stivers said.

Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska), who is up for reelection in 2016 but could be vulnerable in a primary, said in an interview that she believes the priority should be to make piecemeal fixes to the law such as tweaking the 40-hour workweek requirement and boosting competition across state lines.

"We can go ahead and we can vote once again to repeal it, and I will vote to repeal it," Murkowski said. "But I'm also very pragmatic that this repeal is not going to go anywhere with this president."

But Cruz, who is running for president, railed against unnamed GOP colleagues whom he contended are "quietly celebrating" that the law was upheld. In an interview after making a speech on the Senate floor railing against the law, he pointedly refused to rule out using spending bills to try to defund the law again — a tactic that led to the government shutdown two years ago.

Cruz also lashed out at the Supreme Court, including Chief Justice John Roberts.

"I am disappointed in every justice who today violated their judicial oath of office and rewrote the law in a way that is contrary to the constitutional separation of powers," Cruz said.

The Supreme Court Just Did Republicans a Big Favor // The New Yorker // John Cassidy – June 25, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In public, at least, the reaction among Republicans to the decision the Supreme Court issued on Thursday to let the Affordable Care Act subsidies stand was uniform and predictable: outrage. “#ObamaCare ruling is judicial tyranny,” Mike Huckabee, the former governor of Arkansas, commented on Twitter. Not to be outdone, Ted Cruz, one of Huckabee’s rivals in the upcoming G.O.P. primary, tweeted, “Any candidate not willing to make 2016 a referendum on Repealing Obamacare should step aside.”

The language from the three leading Republican candidates was a bit more measured, but their basic sentiments were pretty much the same. “This decision is not the end of the fight against Obamacare,” Jeb Bush wrote in a statement on his campaign Web site. “As President of the United States … I will work with Congress to repeal and replace this flawed law with conservative reforms that empower consumers with more choices and control over their health care decisions.”

“I disagree with the Court’s ruling and believe they have once again erred in trying to correct the mistakes made by President Obama,” Bush’s fellow Floridian, Senator Marco Rubio, said on Twitter, adding, in two more tweets, “I remain committed to repealing this bad law and replacing it… with my consumer-centered plan that puts patients and families back in control of their health care decisions.”

Governor Scott Walker, of Wisconsin, tweeted: “Today’s #SCOTUScare ruling means Republicans must redouble their efforts to repeal and replace this destructive & costly law.”

Elsewhere, Republicans tore into Chief Justice John Roberts, who voted with the six-to-three majority and wrote the opinion justifying the court’s decision. Some of his critics suggested that he could no longer be termed a conservative. ”I don’t know that you can label the guy in any way, shape or form right now,” Matt Salmon, a Republican congressman from Arizona, said, according to the Wall Street Journal. Senator Cruz and Indiana Governor Mike Pence both said that Roberts and his colleagues had committed the heinous crime of “judicial activism.” (My colleagues Amy Davidson and Jeffrey Toobin have more on the particulars of the decision.)

But despite all this rhetoric, I’d be willing to wager that many Republican strategists were privately relieved at the court’s ruling. The Burwell v. King lawsuit provided a rallying point for conservative Republicans, but had it prevailed in the high court it would have blown up in the faces of the Party’s elected representatives. Not only would they have been held responsible for wrecking the federal health-care marketplace and making health insurance unaffordable for millions of Americans, they would have had to say what precisely they intended to put in its place. Despite the claims of Bush, Rubio, and others, this is a task that the Party wasn’t prepared to take on.

To be sure, over the past few months, various Republicans have put forward various suggestions for replacing all or parts of Obamacare. But these plans are all over the place. Some would maintain the generous federal subsidies as they are now; others would cut them. Some would leave the state exchanges alone; others would dismantle them. At least one proposal would jettison the requirement that insurers cover people with preëxisting conditions. And practically all of them would end the individual mandate, which would skew the risk pool toward sick people and drive up premiums. In a recent article in which she described how each of the plans would work, Vox’s Sarah Kliff wrote, “The result would likely be a world that looks much more like America before Obamacare—where fewer people are enrolled in coverage and are paying higher premiums.”

Going into an election year, that is hardly something that the G.O.P.’s 2016 candidates would want to advertise. Now that the Supreme Court has ruled against the plaintiffs in King v. Burwell, Republicans can go back to what they do best: railing against the evils of Obamacare and promising to repeal it, without committing to much in the way of specifics about its putative replacement.

To their credit, some commentators pointed out some of this before Thursday’s judgment came down. The New Republic’s Brian Beutler wrote that a court ruling in favor of the King v. Burwell plaintiffs would be “an administrative and political nightmare” for a newly elected Republican President. At Talking Points Memo, Josh Marshall wrote a post headlined “Did Republicans Swallow Their Own Grenade?” Greg Sargent, of the Washington Post, published figures showing the numbers of people in key swing states who stood to lose their health coverage if the Supreme Court voted to gut the federal exchanges. “In Florida we’re talking about 1.3 million people,” Sargent wrote. “In North Carolina it’s over 450,000; and in Virginia it’s nearly 300,000—suggesting the political stakes are high indeed.”

The people running G.O.P. Presidential campaigns were surely aware of these figures, and the dangers they implied. But such is the level of opposition to the Affordable Care Act among Republican activists that it made no sense for any of the candidates to do anything but toe the party line. Even Bush and Carly Fiorina, who are supposedly positioning themselves as moderates, went along with it—and they continue to do so. “It is outrageous that the Supreme Court once again rewrote ObamaCare to save this deeply flawed law,” Fiorina wrote on Facebook on Thursday, before adding the obligatory, “We need to repeal ObamaCare.”

During the upcoming G.O.P. debates, we will hear much more of this kind of rhetoric, although how much it will help the Party in the general election is unclear. Taken together, the opinion polls suggest that a plurality of Americans still oppose the Affordable Care Act. But there is some suggestion that opinion is shifting. This year, the numbers favoring Obamacare have been creeping upward, and in the most recent CBS News/New York Times poll, forty-seven per cent of respondents said that they approved of the reform, compared to forty-four per cent who opposed it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It seems unlikely that Obamacare will decide the 2016 election, but it will continue to provide Republicans with something to rail against. For that, and more, the G.O.P. has John Roberts and Anthony Kennedy to thank. The two justices, both of them Republican-appointed, just saved the Party from itself.

Republicans to fight Obamacare through election campaign despite ruling // Reuters // Susan Cornwell – June 25, 2015

Republicans will keep attacking Obamacare in the U.S. Congress and on the presidential election campaign trail to energize right-wing voters and raise money, but analysts said there was little chance of the healthcare law being rolled back before 2017 now that the Supreme Court has again validated it.

On Thursday, the high court upheld a central part of the Affordable Care Act, as it is formally known. It was the second time the court confirmed the legality of President Barack Obama's biggest domestic achievement.

That greatly reduces the chances of any substantive legislative or legal challenge to the law by Republicans until a new president takes office in January 2017 after Democrat Obama leaves office.

By then, the law will have been on the books for seven years and millions of Americans will have a stake in it, making it even more difficult to dismantle.

"It is entrenched. There certainly will be no legislation (signed into law) that will change anything for the next year and a half," said Joseph Antos, an expert in health policy at the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative think tank.

View galleryRepublican presidential candidate Senator Marco Rubio …

Republican presidential candidate Senator Marco Rubio (R-FL) addresses a legislative luncheon held a …

"This administration is done with health policy. Everybody's done," Antos said.

Obamacare survived a major legal test when the Supreme Court upheld tax subsidies at the heart of the law that help millions of Americans afford premiums they pay for health insurance.

Enacted in 2010, the law was meant to provide health insurance coverage for millions of Americans who neither had insurance through an employer nor could afford an individual plan. Republicans opposed the law from the start, calling it unnecessary government interference and "socialized medicine."

More than 10 million people now have insurance purchased through state and federal marketplaces set up under the law. About 8.7 million of them get subsidies, the government says.

Following Thursday's 6-3 court ruling, Republicans quickly vowed to make the 2016 election campaign a referendum on Obamacare, expressing disappointment with the court's decision.

Democrats cheered it, however. On the presidential campaign trail, Democratic Party front runner Hillary Clinton expressed delight via Twitter. "Yes! SCOTUS affirms what we know is true in our hearts & under the law: Health insurance should be affordable & available to all," she said.

Republican House Speaker John Boehner said, "We will continue our efforts to repeal the law and replace it."

But it was unclear what Republicans could do to make good on that pledge. Republican lawmakers had worked on action plans for a high court ruling against the subsidies, but there seemed to be no clear Republican strategy for the ruling that was handed down, a resounding victory for Obama.

The Republican party is divided, said Robert Blendon, a health policy and politics analyst at Harvard University.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

One wing "wants to go back to 2009" before Obamacare existed. Others have proposed alternatives. Senate Finance Committee Chairman Orrin Hatch, for instance, is urging the approval of tax credits to help people buy insurance.

Some Republicans "feel they dodged a bullet" with the court's decision, which means they won't have to anger their base by preserving the subsidies, even temporarily, said John Ullyot, a Republican strategist and former longtime Senate aide.

Most of the dozen or so Republican candidates running for their party's nomination vowed to repeal Obamacare if elected.

Former Florida Governor Jeb Bush's campaign issued a fundraising appeal for "emergency" contributions to ensure the law is rolled back. "I will work with Congress to repeal and replace this flawed law," Bush said in a statement.

Senator Marco Rubio, another Republican contender, said: “I remain committed to repealing this bad law."

Brookings Institution analyst Stuart Butler said the law may be modified, but it is now hard to imagine it being totally repealed, even after a new president takes office in 2017.

"The longer it is on the books the harder it will be to dislodge," he said. "Not harder - impossible."

After Charleston shootings, poll highlights race dilemma for Republicans // Reuters // John Whitesides – June 25, 2015

Republican presidential contenders face a dilemma when talking about racial issues after last week's racially motivated murders at a South Carolina church, as a new poll shows many Republican primary voters are less likely to see the topic as important.

While more than three-quarters of Americans believe race relations must be addressed in the United States, a smaller majority of only about 65 percent of likely Republican primary voters agree, a new Reuters/Ipsos poll found. (Graphic: link.reuters.com/dun94w)

One-third of likely Republican primary voters see race relations as unimportant to some degree, compared to only 9 percent of likely Democratic voters who feel that way.

"There is a tension Republicans are trying to navigate, and they are really stuck between a rock and a hard place," said Ipsos pollster Chris Jackson.

"You have the majority of the public on one side, but the people who are actually going to vote for them in the primaries are less interested in this particular issue and may have different takes or alternate priorities altogether," he said.

The poll, carried out after the murder by a white gunman of nine black members of a Bible study group at a Charleston church, also found Democrats were more trusted to deal with race relations by more than a 2-to-1 margin.

The findings illustrate the Republican Party's challenge in trying to expand its appeal among minorities - crucial if the party is to win the presidency - and could help explain the largely muted response to the Charleston shootings by the party's 2016 presidential contenders.

Around a dozen hopefuls, who must court the white, conservative voters who dominate the party's primaries, largely steered clear of calls to action or policy prescriptions after the shootings, focusing instead on messages of condolence.

Several Republican presidential contenders and other party leaders did join South Carolina state officials earlier this week in calling for removal of the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Confederate battle flag from in front of the State House, seat of the legislature, labeling it an act of healing and unity.

Republican National Committee spokesman Orlando Watson noted that call was led by Indian-American Governor Nikki Haley and a prominent black Republican, U.S. Senator Tim Scott of South Carolina.

"Republican leaders have stepped up and are working hard to address all voter concerns, including those involving race," he said.

After losing the 2012 presidential election, Republicans had vowed to expand their appeal beyond their shrinking base of white males and reach out to court new supporters among blacks, Hispanics, Asians and the young.

But blacks have for decades been the most loyal Democratic voting bloc, a trend only reinforced by the election of President Barack Obama, the first black in the White House.

When Obama won re-election in 2012, Mitt Romney received 6 percent of the black vote. No Republican presidential contender has won more than 12 percent of black votes since President Gerald Ford's 15 percent in 1976.

The poll found Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton was considered the presidential contender who was best suited to handle the issue of race relations, with 17 percent of all adults and 32 percent of blacks viewing her that way.

The top-ranked Republican was retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson, the only black Republican in the race. He was seen as best suited by 7 percent of all adults and 6 percent of blacks. Former Florida Governor Jeb Bush was next, with 6 percent of all adults and 1 percent of blacks viewing him as best suited.

Carson and Bush are among 13 candidates who have formally jumped into the race for the Republican presidential nomination in the November 2016 election.

Some respondents to the poll said the issue of race relations simply took a backseat to more heavily debated topics such as unemployment, crime, education and trade.

"I don't know if it's really an election issue, it's a people issue. Our political leaders can't change it," said Alex Jackson, a white Republican who is a student at West Georgia College in Carrolton, Georgia. She rated race relations as "somewhat unimportant."

Mary Wickham, a white Republican in Naperville, Illinois, who also said race relations were "somewhat unimportant", said she did not see it as an issue in her diverse community and she was much more interested in a candidate's views on immigration.

"It's just not a problem here," she said of racial issues. "We pray together, we stay together."

The online poll of 1,402 Americans was taken between June 18 and 22, and has a credibility interval, a measure of accuracy, of 3 percent for all Americans and 6.4 percent for Republican primary voters.

GOP presidential hopefuls in Colorado for conservative summit - and a marijuana policy grade // The Washington Times // Jennifer Harper – June 25, 2015

Here's another one of those bodacious weekend events, and this begins Friday: The Western Conservative Summit, staged in Denver by Colorado Christian University. "There's a rebirth going on in America. Be part of it. After decades of slipping to the left, citizen patriots have re-engaged in the public arena, and our political discourse has been enriched by their voices," the organizers advise the 4,000 incoming delegates.

The two-day event has also drawn seven presidential hopefuls and a spate of heavyweights ranging from radio host Hugh Hewitt and Family Research

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Council president Tony Perkins to CNBC anchor Larry Kudlow, security maven Frank Gaffney and Ronald Lauder, president of the World Jewish Congress. A “Rally on the Right” is also planned. Find it all here: WesternConservativeSummit.com

Along with all the serious policy talk and presidential posturing, the GOP hopefuls have something else to consider. Or maybe not. The Marijuana Policy Project, a research group, will release a report card on the 2016 presidential hopefuls, detailing their positions on marijuana policy. The group has organized a press conference only blocks from the summit to reveal their ratings.

“Candidate grades are based on actions they have taken and statements they have made that indicate their levels of support for ending marijuana prohibition, allowing legal access to medical marijuana, and defending states’ rights to adopt their own marijuana policies without interference from the federal government,” says Mason Tvert, the organization’s spokesman, who adds that a mammoth report card will be hoisted aloft for all the public to see.

GOP lawmaker: Blumenthal Benghazi deposition should be released // The Hill // Martin Matishak – June 25, 2015

A Republican member of the House Select Committee on Benghazi says the panel should make public the deposition of Hillary Clinton adviser and confidant Sidney Blumenthal.

“I think it needs to be released,” Rep. Lynn Westmoreland (R-Ga.) told The Hill on Thursday.

He also argued that Democratic demands for the release are “an excuse” for the panel’s seven Republicans to do so.

If Westmoreland joined with Democrats on the special panel to vote for the deposition’s release, they’d be within one vote of forcing the matter.

Committee Chairman Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.) has resisted publishing the deposition, arguing that the select committee hasn’t released a transcript of any of its previous interviews.

Democrats contend that the panel has already released nearly 60 emails to and from Clinton that Blumenthal himself turned over earlier this month.

They also believe the transcript will show the questions centered around political matters and not the 2012 attacks in Benghazi, Libya, that killed four Americans, including the ambassador.

Westmoreland said that Gowdy is concerned that if the transcript is published, “it would discourage, maybe, some other people from coming in voluntarily,” such as longtime Clinton aide Huma Abedin.

“But this is the only person we had to subpoena to come in,” Westmoreland noted.

Blumenthal appeared before the committee last week.

THE LID: Glass Half Full for GOP After Obamacare Decision // NBC News // Carrie Dann & Andrew Rafferty – June 25, 2015

Republican presidential candidates have released a barrage of statements slamming the Supreme Court over today's decision to uphold Obamacare subsidies. But we have a sneaky suspicion that the court's decision isn't all bad news for GOP candidates with their eyes on the White House. For one, it allows them to keep up the drumbeat for a full repeal of the law, which will energize the base (In the latest NBC/WSJ poll, a majority of GOP primary voters - 55 percent - said that the law should be "totally eliminated," and an additional 36 percent said it needs a "major overhaul.") And they can make a big-picture argument that a Republican-held White House really is the only way to ensure the end of Obamacare, which remains relatively unpopular with independents, too. (A combined 56 percent of indies say that the law should be gutted or dramatically changed, and just eight percent of ALL Americans say they think it's working well as it is.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The other advantage is they can continue to lambast the law without the immediate need to craft a legislative replacement, or at least figure out what to do about 6.4 million Americans who would have been effectively kicked off their health insurance plans. The candidates who are talking about repealing and replacing Obamacare are going to be under pressure to present a tangible alternative. But at least now they can avoid getting hit with ads featuring Americans who can no longer afford care after losing their subsidies.

Supreme Court Lets GOP Candidates Off the Hook on Obamacare // The Daily Beast // Betsy Woodruff – June 25, 2015

Jeb Bush didn't waste any time not fundraising off the King v. Burwell decision.

The former Florida governor, who is currently polling at the top of the Republican pack, blasted out a statement to reporters that landed in The Daily Beast's inbox at 11:26 a.m. And a fundraising email to supporters pegged to the decision came our way five minutes earlier.

"Friend, you know in your heart that we cannot afford four more years of the same policies, which will be the case under a Clinton White House," the fundraising email read. "But the only way to prevent that is to make the most generous contribution you can afford right now to stop her. [that last sentence hyperlinked to a donation page]."

In his official press statement, Bush said the loss in court doesn't mean the GOP will stop pushing for repeal. He didn't add any specifics about what he would do as president, beyond saying that he would push for "conservative reforms that empower consumers with more choices and control over their health care decisions."

Republican presidential candidates like Bush must have a lot of feelings about Obama's big win at the Supreme Court today. On the one hand, they're univocally opposed to the Affordable Care Act, and they seem to share a deep disappointment that SCOTUS ruled to keep it unchanged.

On the other hand, though, this really gets them out of the hot seat. Proposing policy fixes for the millions of people who received government subsidies to offset the costs of health insurance they bought through the federal exchange would have been, from a political standpoint, extraordinarily dicey.

Former Texas governor Rick Perry promptly blasted out a statement decrying the justices' move and calling for new leadership in the White House (hint hint!).

"While I disagree with the ruling, it was never up to the Supreme Court to save us from Obamacare," he said in the statement. "We need leadership in the White House that recognizes the folly of having to pass a bill to know what's in it."

Senator Ted Cruz, meanwhile, compared the justices to the 20th century's most celebrated illusionist.

"Today, these robed Houdinis transmogrified a 'federal exchange' into an exchange 'established by the State,'" he wrote.

"These judges have joined with President Obama in harming millions of Americans," he continued. "Unelected judges have once again become legislators, and bad ones at that. They are lawless, and they hide their prevarication in legalese. Our government was designed to be one of laws, not of men, and this transparent distortion is disgraceful."

Proposing policy fixes for the millions of people who received government subsidies to offset the costs of health insurance they bought through the federal exchange would have been, from a political standpoint, extraordinarily dicey.

And Scott Walker, the Republican governor of Wisconsin who's expected to announce a presidential bid next month, immediately looked to Republicans in Congress for answers.

"Today's Supreme Court ruling upholding the administration's implementation of ObamaCare means Republicans in the House and Senate must redouble their efforts to repeal and replace this destructive and costly law," he said in a statement.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Now, instead of just finger-pointing from the president for why his law is failing, we need real leadership in Washington, and Congress needs to repeal and replace ObamaCare," he continued.

And Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal also came out swinging.

"Republicans must outline a clear and coherent vision for health care to win the trust of the American people to repeal Obamacare," he said. "And right now, I am the only candidate to put forward a comprehensive plan."

Philip Klein at the Washington Examiner summarized Jindal's healthcare plan as an approach that would "wipe out Obamacare completely, return tax and spending levels to where they would have been if the law had never passed, and build a free market alternative from scratch."

And former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina took to Facebook to call the court's decision "outrageous."

"We need to do the one thing we've never tried in our healthcare system—real competition," she continued.

"And competition doesn't mean eliminating care for those with preexisting conditions," she added. "States should administer high-risk pools for those who have real needs. We've seen this in action—New Hampshire was able to administer high-risk pools effectively before Obamacare."

Fiorina's response is about as detailed as the Republicans got. The Burwell decision has taken them off the hook. And if others follow Bush's lead, it might get them a windfall.

GOP chairman: Only way to fix healthcare is to elect Republicans // The Hill // Ben Kamisar – June 25, 2015

The Supreme Court's decision to uphold ObamaCare shows that the only way to fix the healthcare system is to elect Republicans, the party's national chairman wrote Thursday.

Republican National Committee Chairman Reince Priebus joins scores of GOP lawmakers bashing the court's opinion with an op-ed published hours after the ruling.

"The Supreme Court's decision today doesn't change the facts: Obamacare was so poorly written, so sloppily created, that all these years later it is still creating confusion and frustration for Americans," he writes.

"The country is ready for a new direction, and today's ruling makes it clear that if we want to fix our broken health-care system, we will need to elect Republican leaders with proven ideas and real solutions that will help American families."

Priebus laments the costs of the healthcare law, attributing it to "slow job growth, rising insurance premiums and even shuttered small businesses.

He also bashes President Obama for promising that everyone would be able to keep their plans and doctors and pushes back at the assertion that the GOP doesn't have its own health care plan.

"Democrats continue to suggest that Republicans don't have other plans. That's because they want people to think there's no choice but to put up with Obamacare," he writes.

"There are Republican alternatives, proposed by members of both the House and the Senate. All Republican plans are better than what Democrats, President Obama, and Hillary Clinton have forced on us — and would continue to force on the country. All are better than the mess we're in."

His rival, Democratic National Committee Chairwoman Debbie Wasserman Schultz (Fla.), critiqued similar arguments in comments Thursday on CNN's "Wolf."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“This is a case of sour grapes and a case where Republicans are entitled to their opinions but not their own facts,” she said.

“The facts are that healthcare insurance rates are increasing at their slowest rate in 50 years. We have 16 million people who have health insurance coverage who didn’t have it before.”

Priebus's piece adds that the party is in agreement on providing access to those with preexisting conditions, keeping young adults on their parents’ plans until they turn 26, a patient-centered approach instead of a government-centered approach, insurance competition across state lines and lawsuit reforms.

GOP Field Renews "Repeal Obamacare" Battle Cry // Real Clear Politics // Caitlin Huey-Burns – June 25, 2015

The U.S. Supreme Court moved Thursday to uphold a law that Republicans, particularly those running for president, intensely dislike.

But the court’s decision to leave the Affordable Care Act intact may have a silver lining for the GOP field: It allows them to renew a once potent rallying cry -- anti-Obamacare rhetoric -- that had become somewhat dormant on the campaign trail as the justices mulled whether subsidies for health coverage purchased on the federal insurance exchange were lawful.

Almost immediately after Thursday’s 6-3 ruling, Republican White House hopefuls lined up behind a revamped cause: to repeal and replace the law entirely.

“This decision is not the end of the fight against Obamacare,” former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush said. “As president of the United States … I will work with Congress to repeal and replace this flawed law with conservative reforms that empower consumers with more choices and control over their health care decisions.”

In announcing his candidacy last week in Miami, Bush notably left off the “repeal” mantra from his speech. And several candidates running for president had been markedly quiet about the ACA ahead of the court’s ruling, tending to mention it only as one in a litany of complaints about what they consider big-government overreach.

As the subsidies for 6.4 million Americans hung in the balance, Republicans were faced with a politically sticky challenge of wanting the court to unravel the law while also worrying about how to address the needs of millions of Americans who would lose their coverage. Republicans were divided on how best to proceed if the court struck down this integral part of the law, with some wanting to temporarily extend the subsidies while others preferred holding to principle and letting them expire.

The matter would have been particularly challenging for candidates in swing states with high numbers of voters receiving the federal aid. Florida, for example, the home state of Bush and fellow candidate Sen. Marco Rubio, has the largest contingent of people (1.3 million) getting subsidies. (Florida is one of 34 states that uses the federal exchange instead of a state-run marketplace.)

Now, Republicans can privately breathe a sigh of relief about avoiding a divisive and politically complicated scenario on the policy and constituent-relations front.

“I think that in some ways this actually could help our presidential candidate because there won’t be the folks out there without subsidies screaming out,” Arizona Republican Rep. Matt Salmon told RCP. “I think that most Americans that have really been hurt [by Obamacare changes] over the last couple years will be the loudest voices now and I’m not sure that won’t help our candidate.”

Rubio, who was hosting a veterans event in New Hampshire when the ruling came down, said he was committed to repealing the law and replacing it with his own proposal of a “consumer-centered” plan that he says would give patients and families more control over their health care decisions, something for which most of the GOP contenders have advocated.

While Republicans will push more loudly on the campaign trail for gutting the law, the replacement part could become tricky. There are various proposals from members of Congress and outlines suggested by presidential candidates. But the party is not united around an alternative plan. Still, the Oval Office aspirants will argue that a replacement can only come with a Republican in the White House.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Today's decision only reinforces why we need a president who will bring about real reform that repeals Obamacare and replaces it with a plan that expands consumer choice, increases coverage, delivers better value for the dollar, and gives states more control, without stifling job creation," said Sen. Lindsey Graham, a GOP presidential contender who voted against the law in 2010.

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, who is expected to announce his candidacy next month, echoed those sentiments, and added that the ruling "means Republicans in the House and Senate must redouble their efforts to repeal and replace this destructive and costly law."

Most of the Republican candidates released similar statements.

Ohio's John Kasich, one of the few Republican governors to accept the expansion of Medicaid coverage in his state offered under the Affordable Care Act, called for replacing Obamacare with a more market-driven solution administered by the states. "We will continue to pursue innovative ways for Ohio to best meet the unique needs of our residents, in line with our priorities, and reduce the negative consequences of this flawed law," the governor's spokesman, Rob Nichols, said.

Though the Supreme Court removed doubts about pieces of the law, enabling Republicans to run fully against it -- as occurred in 2012 and during the 2010 and 2014 midterms – the GOP may find the issue to be less of a driving issue for voters. Recent polls show a slight majority of Americans oppose the law.

Democrats, on the other hand, are poised to run by fully embracing it—literally. After Thursday's court decision, Hillary Clinton tweeted a picture of her and President Obama embracing. Democrats will likely frame Republicans as working to take away insurance from people who now have it under the health care act.

Republicans, however, wasted no time in focusing on the general election opposition. "Hillary Clinton supports big government mandates and expanding the government's reach into our healthcare system, maneuvers that have made our healthcare system worse off," said Republican National Committee Chairman Reince Priebus.

Republican Presidential Candidates Blast Supreme Court Ruling // The Daily Caller // Alex Pappas – June 25, 2015

The Republicans running for president in 2016 expressed disappointment — and in one case accused the high court of "judicial tyranny" — after the Supreme Court on Thursday upheld federal subsidies under President Obama's health care law.

"Today's King v. Burwell decision, which protects and expands Obamacare, is an out-of-control act of judicial tyranny," said former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee. "Our founding fathers didn't create a 'do-over' provision in our Constitution that allows unelected, Supreme Court justices the power to circumvent Congress and rewrite bad laws."

"This decision turns both the rule of law and common sense on its head," Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul said. "Obamacare raises taxes, harms patients and doctors, and is the wrong fix for America's health care system."

"It is outrageous that the Supreme Court once again rewrote ObamaCare to save this deeply flawed law despite the plain text and in the face of overwhelming evidence that the law is not working for the majority of Americans," said former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina.

"I disagree with the court's ruling and believe they have once again erred in trying to correct the mistakes made by President Obama and Congress in forcing Obamacare on the American people," said Florida Sen. Marco Rubio.

"I am disappointed by today's Supreme Court ruling in the King v. Burwell case," former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush said. "But this decision is not the end of the fight against Obamacare."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“While I disagree with the ruling, it was never up to the Supreme Court to save us from Obamacare,” former Texas Gov. Rick Perry said. “We need leadership in the White House that recognizes the folly of having to pass a bill to know what’s in it.”

“Now that the Supreme Court has ruled, the debate will grow,” Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal said. “Conservatives must be fearless in demanding that our leaders in Washington repeal and replace Obamacare with a plan that will lower health care costs and restore freedom.”

“Today’s Supreme Court ruling upholding the administration’s implementation of Obamacare means Republicans in the House and Senate must redouble their efforts to repeal and replace this destructive and costly law,” Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, who’s exploring a run, said Thursday.

Conservatives Unleash Fury at One-Time Hero John Roberts // Bloomberg News // Sahil Kapur – June 25, 2015

After the Supreme Court ruled 6-3 to reject an existential challenge to Obamacare on Thursday, conservatives took direct aim at the author of the decision: their one-time hero Chief Justice John Roberts.

Their sentiments were channeled by several Republican presidential candidates, who lashed out at the Roberts Court for its purportedly activist pro-Obamacare ruling.

“Roberts told everybody he was just going to be an umpire and call strikes and balls, but now as justice he’s got two results-oriented decisions that go far beyond that role,” said Club For Growth President David McIntosh, suggesting his group will seek to avoid future nominations like Roberts. “What the Club does, in picking candidates, is look at their record, and look at not just what they have stood for on economic issues but what they’ll do in the future. What the Club will want candidates to ask their potential nominees is: Will they be faithful to the Constitution?”

"Today the Supreme Court allowed itself to be intimidated."

Michael F. Cannon of the libertarian Cato Institute

Shortly after the decision, Competitive Enterprise Institute general counsel Sam Kazman told reporters that Roberts’s rationale seemed to abandon the logic of “what words mean” in favor of executive power.

“We were very surprised by his reasoning in the NFIB case [in 2012 about Obamacare's individual mandate], and we’re even more surprised by his reasoning here,” said Kazman, who largely coordinated the plaintiffs’ case. “Frankly, since the entire purpose of the Constitution was to impose restrictions on government, we see his ruling as a weakening of that.”

Elsewhere on the right, Roberts’s decision was being interpreted as a failure of Republicans to properly vet nominees–or worse. Phil Kerpen, whose group American Commitment had popularized videos of Obama administration consultant Jonathan Gruber appearing to make the plaintiffs’ case in King, directed followers to a 2005 column that decried Roberts as a “political” appointee who would not rely strictly on the Constitution. The author of that column, Ben Shapiro, took a sort of Twitter victory lap.

“Republicans should be asked: knowing then what you know now, would you have voted to confirm Chief Justice John Roberts?” Shapiro wrote.

Conservatives had plenty of help from their presidential contenders, who didn't explicitly name Roberts but launched a series of arrows at his ruling and his court.

Senator Ted Cruz of Texas, a former lawyer who has argued cases before the Supreme Court, came out swinging against the ruling as "judicial activism, plain and simple," and swiped the majority as "robed Houdinis" who made a "nakedly political" move.

"These judges have joined with President Obama in harming millions of Americans," he said. "Unelected judges have once again become legislators, and bad ones at that. They are lawless, and they hide their prevarication in legalese. Our government was designed to be one of laws, not of men, and this transparent distortion is disgraceful."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Former Arkansas Governor Mike Huckabee was no less fired up.

"Today's King v. Burwell decision, which protects and expands Obamacare, is an out-of-control act of judicial tyranny," he said. "Our Founding Fathers didn't create a 'do-over' provision in our Constitution that allows unelected, Supreme Court justices the power to circumvent Congress and rewrite bad laws."

Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker, a likely candidate, adopted the attack with a string of tweets quoting Justice Antonin Scalia's dissent that the law should now be called "SCOTUScare." Senator Marco Rubio subtly accused the justices of taking policy in their own hands, saying they "erred in trying to correct the mistakes made by President Obama and Congress in forcing ObamaCare on the American people." Other Republican candidates took aim at Obamacare but not the Supreme Court.

A blog post by Michael F. Cannon of the libertarian Cato Institute, an architect of the King v. Burwell lawsuit, blared "Supreme Court Validates Obama's Power Grab."

"Today the Supreme Court allowed itself to be intimidated," he wrote, warning that the ruling "establishes a precedent that could let any president modify, amend, or suspend any enacted law at his or her whim."

The anger at Roberts spanned generations, uniting all manner of conservatives in a distrust at the Republican establishment. David Limbaugh, the author and brother of radio host Limbaugh, asked why Republicans "end up with so many Trojan Horse Supreme Court appointments." Sean Davis, a senior editor at the conservative web site The Federalist wrote bitterly that "every fancy conservative legal foundation said Roberts was the most amazing nomination ever."

On the more conspiracy-minded end of the spectrum, libertarian author Wayne Root wondered in the website The Blaze: "Has Supreme Court Justice John Roberts been blackmailed or intimidated? I would put nothing by the Obama administration that lives and rules by the Chicago thug playbook."

Republicans Go On Obamacare Offensive: 'A Reckless Law' // The Weekly Standard // Daniel Halper – June 25, 2015

In anticipation of the Supreme Court's forthcoming ruling on the Obamacare case, the Republican National Committee is going on the offensive. In a new 66-second web video, which is set to be released later today, Republicans are blaiming the law on Democrats who "pushed through Obamacare." Not a single Republican voted for Obamacare's passage.

Watch here:

The ad features some of the loudest (and most unpopular) voices on Obamacare.

"You know, call it the stupidity of the American voter or whatever," Obamacare architect Jonathan Gruber is quoted as saying in the ad.

"We have to pass the bill so that you can find out what's in it," Nancy Pelosi, the former speaker of the House, says in the ad.

"Lack of transparency is a huge political advantage," Gruber is heard saying.

Then news reports are played describing that the Affordable Care Act, Obamacare, is not working as intended and that it isn't affordable as promised.

An on screen graphic says that Obamacare is "hurting the American people."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Finally, the ad ends with Hillary Clinton, who advocated Hillarycare in the 1990s and who is seeking the Democratic nomination.

"Obama & the Democrats rush to pass Obamacare," reads the finaly on screen graphic. "Americans are paying the price. Help us stop Hillary. StopHillary.gop."

The web ad is titled, "A Reckless Law."

OTHER 2016 NEWS

Obamacare ruling: Six takeaways for 2016 // Politico // Glenn Thrush & Kyle Cheney – June 25, 2015

Today was the rarest of days in American political history — the legacies of both a sitting president and a Supreme Court chief justice were defined in an instant.

While the jockeying swarm of 2016 aspirants aren't posing for posterity, they are angling for power — and the court's 6-to-3 decision upholding Obamacare subsidies alters their calculations. It's nothing compared to the unpinned hand grenade that would have been chucked into the field if the Affordable Care Act had been toppled as many analysts (and Republicans) conjectured, but it's forcing a rethinking nevertheless.

President Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton hailed the decision as an unalloyed and historic victory, even if one cynical Democrat interviewed by POLITICO thought a loss would have galvanized Clinton's sleepy base like "nothing else could have."

The ruling's real political import lies on the Republican side, which is united in opposition to Obamacare but deeply divided on how to get rid of it — and even over the tone to use when saying nasty things about it.

The consensus: It was a constitutional abomination and an electoral godsend. "The 'repeal Obamacare' idea was good politically, but in practice, to peel back that whole program, was more complicated and less realistic," said Jason Roe, a California-based Republican consultant. "I don't think there is any [Republican] who can point to something and say, 'this is the consensus replacement,' and that was part of our struggle. What's next? Republicans don't need to answer that now."

"In general, I'd say this was decent day for the Republican Party," said a top staffer for a Republican 2016 candidate. "It's cleared off the table… And we don't have to spend the next 18 months trying to create a replacement for all the people who would lose coverage."

With the case off the table, here are six takeaways on the decision and its impact on a very rattled 2016 GOP field:

1. The pitchforks are coming for you, Jeb and Marco

Rage-against-the-machine anger has fueled the Republican resurgence since 2010 – actually since CNBC's Rick Santelli coined the "Tea Party" moniker during a rant against a proposed mortgage bailout in February 2009. Six-plus years later, the tension between the party's conservative base and more moderate/establishment/big-money candidates remains a serious issue, which explains why the second-tier candidates wasted little time in adopting the language of grievance demanded by the party's base.

With the ultimate fate of the health care law seemingly decided for good, there are really only two moves left for a GOP field seeking to derive political capital from Obamacare: move on, with a promise to repeal it later, or point fingers and demand Republican traitors get the tar-and-feather treatment.

The top tier candidates as defined by establishment support and cash — namely Jeb Bush and Marco Rubio –were more muted in their responses than lower-down-the-pole candidates like Mike Huckabee and Ben Carson, who has likened Obamacare to slavery.

Bush's statement was bloodless, trust me-I'm-angry boilerplate: "I am disappointed by today's Supreme Court ruling in the King v. Burwell case. But this decision is not the end of the fight against Obamacare." Bush also vowed to go the repeal-and-replace route, even though he hasn't backed a specific plan.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Marco Rubio, who also favors repeal and replacement, touted his "consumer-centered plan that puts patients and families back in control of their health care decisions," employing the measured language of a man with one eye on a general election audience.

Contrast that with Huckabee's fight-to-the-gates-of-hell rhetoric. A press release/fundraising pitch blasted minutes after the decision came down featured the following subject line "Breaking: Judicial tyranny & Obamacare!"

Carson likened to the decision to a death. "Those of us who pledge to repeal ?#Obamacare must redouble our efforts and not waste time and energy mourning today's ?#SCOTUS ruling," the surgeon-turned-politician tweeted.

These factions are about to collide on a debate stage. If there was any doubt of that, it was dispelled by Ted Cruz's post-decision salvo pointed at many in his own party. "[C]rocodile tears are flooding our nation's capital today over the Supreme Court's decision to illegally rewrite Obamacare, which has been a disaster since its inception. But one day of faux outrage from the Washington Cartel won't fool the millions of courageous conservatives across our country," he wrote in a fundraising email. "They know the Republican leadership in Washington is quietly celebrating the Court's decision. If they believe this issue is now settled so they don't have to address it, they are sorely mistaken."

Then, this: "Every GOP candidate for the Republican nomination should know that this decision makes the 2016 election a referendum on the full repeal of Obamacare."

2. It's Ted Cruz's moment – not

The tea party favorite – who has repeatedly crossed from Senate to House to whip up the anti-ACA faithful against leadership foot-draggers – had his most memorable (and donation-inducing) moments battling Obamacare, including orchestrating the government shutdown strategy that earned him bipartisan scorn but near-deification among conservatives. This could've been the Texas senator's Supreme-Court endorsed moment of triumph, and he could have rightly taken credit for creating many of the arguments that led to the undoing of a law he views as an abomination.

Had the law been toppled, as Cruz and many other GOP candidates anticipated, he would have had a crowning moment of political product differentiation from the 2016 field – he had already said that he would block efforts by fellow conservatives to extend Obamacare subsidies temporarily to deal with the post-Obamacare shock. "I think the best legislative option is to allow states to opt out," Cruz said. "I am cautiously optimistic that the Supreme Court will conclude in King vs. Burwell that the Obama IRS … acted lawlessly."

That didn't happen – robbing Cruz of a chance for another big look-at-me moment in the Capitol and keeping him, for the moment, pinned to the 4 percent national showing he managed in the most recent FOX News poll.

3. Start calling it "Hillarycare," please

Hillary Clinton bashed Barack Obama during the 2008 campaign for refusing to put the individual mandate in his somewhat half-baked campaign health-care proposal. As it turned out, Obama flipped quickly once he took power, and the Hillary-backed mandate was the basis for the King v. Burwell challenge – vindicated by the Roberts Court today.

Clinton has been very complimentary toward her one-time rival but she also wants America to know that the idea was, um, hers. In a five-graph statement applauding the decision Clinton didn't once use the words "Obama" or "Obamacare" – and she concluded with it a not-so-subtle reminder that she was crusading on health care when the president was still an unknown community organizer in Chicago. "I've fought for the promise of quality, affordable health care for every American for decades. And I'm not going to stop now. Anyone seeking to lead our country should stand up and support this decision."

4. Scott Walker is a happy man

That low whoosh is the sound of Wisconsin's Republican governor – and the third member of the presumptive top tier – breathing easier. Walker had jammed 90,000 constituents onto the federal exchange as part of a contorted health care overhaul – meant in part to snub Obamacare's Medicaid expansion. But if the court had ruled against the White House, those 90,000 people – plus another 70,000 who also signed up — might've been left uninsured. Walker was preparing to blame the White House for the crisis, but more than any other GOP governor, he hung his own reform effort on the success of the federal program.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Walker's not the only governor wiping sweat off his brow. Chris Christie vetoed efforts by lawmakers in New Jersey to establish a state-based exchange, forcing his constituents to sign up for the federal version. That left more than 170,000 residents at the mercy of the court, according to the Kaiser Family Foundation. Bobby Jindal never even sniffed in the direction of a state exchange, and another 137,000 residents there could've been in trouble. In Ohio, Gov. John Kasich – often painted as a friend of Obamacare because of his crusade to implement Medicaid expansion – refused to build a state exchange, leaving 160,000 residents on the hook.

Earlier in the week, Walker took to the CNN op-ed page to pre-spin the ruling, declaring that the onus fell on the White House and Congress to quell any crisis created by the court. Post-ruling, he returned to a more comfortable flavor: vanilla. "Today's Supreme Court ruling upholding the administration's implementation of ObamaCare means Republicans in the House and Senate must redouble their efforts to repeal and replace this destructive and costly law," he said.

5. Ca-ching

Cue the pleas for credit card numbers and contact information. Faster than John Roberts' gavel could come down, campaigns stuffed their supporters' in-boxes and Twitter feeds with frantic appeals. Huckabee asked for $10 – or $50 – to help him "lead this fight as President to repeal Obamacare." EMILY's List, a Democratic powerhouse, asked for $3 to "help elect a president who will appoint thoughtful Supreme Court justices and a Senate who will confirm them." And on Twitter, Hillary Clinton asked for supporters to enter their email addresses if they "stand with Hillary for health care."

6. Benedict Roberts

Once hailed by Republicans as the youthful leader of a new conservative jurisprudential era, Roberts is being vilified after penning the two decisions that preserved the signature Democratic policy accomplishment of the last four decades. Cruz, didn't call him out by name, but it's only a matter of time. "For the second time in just a few years, a handful of unelected judges has rewritten the text of Obamacare in order to impose this failed law on millions of Americans," Cruz wrote. "The first time, the Court ignored federal law and magically transformed a statutory 'penalty' into a 'tax.' Today, these robed Houdinis transmogrified a 'federal exchange' into an exchange 'established by the State.'"

GOP, Democrats seek campaign cash from Obamacare ruling // USA Today // Fredreka Schouten – June 25, 2015

Republicans and Democrats alike quickly sought to raise political donations off the Supreme Court's decision Thursday to uphold a key component of President Obama's health-care law.

Former Florida governor Jeb Bush, who says he will repeal the law if elected, asked supporters for an "emergency contribution of $50, $25 or $10″ to ensure that Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton won't be elected.

Bush, who is seeking the Republican presidential nomination, said Obama "forced" the law on the public "in a partisan and toxic way" and "Hillary Clinton will be more of the same."

America Rising, a group dedicated to digging up unflattering information on Clinton and other Democrats, picked up the theme in its plea for cash. "We need to make sure Hillary Clinton — the mother of Obamacare — does NOT become president," the group said in a reference to Clinton's unsuccessful health-care initiative as first lady.

The Senate Majority Fund, a group working for a Democratic takeover of the U.S. Senate, asked supporters to "give every dollar you can spare this second" to prevent Republicans from controlling both the Senate and White House in 2017 and repealing the law.

In an email sent out early Thursday afternoon, Clinton celebrated the high-court victory, but didn't ask for cash — at least not yet. Instead, her missive sought to collect the email addresses of people who agree with her that "access to health care is a basic human right."

Tuesday marks the first major fundraising deadline for most 2016 presidential candidates.

Campaign swag and "Made in America" in the 2016 election // CBS News // Jenna Sakwa – June 25, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The selling of presidential campaign swag is a fundamental part of nearly every major political campaign. It helps bring in money, build donor databases, and swag also makes a statement about the candidate.

One question some campaigns wrestle with is whether every piece of merchandise sold with their names writ large needs to be stamped "Made in America." For many, the answer is, in essence, not necessarily.

Republican candidate Rand Paul is currently selling a shirt on his website that declares "Defeat the Washington Machine, Unleash The American Dream."

Its label reads "Made in Guatemala."

"All of our products are either made in America, or printed in America," a spokesman for the Paul campaign said. "The [campaign] store was built and is run in the heartland of America. Unfortunately, not all products sold in the US are American made, but we are continually looking for products to offer that are."

Bella + Canvas, the company who manufactures the t-shirt says it does, in fact, have a "Made in the USA" collection as part of its full line. However, the shirt sold on Paul's website is not part of it.

Candidates on both sides of the aisle are pledging American-made products this cycle. Democrat Hillary Clinton's store advertises that her campaign's items are both American-made and union-made.

And spokespeople for the campaigns of Republicans Ted Cruz and Marco Rubio tell CBS News all of their merchandise is made in the USA.

In 2012 both Mitt Romney and President Obama's presidential campaigns sold exclusively made-in-America swag.

Romney's former digital director Zac Moffatt, who oversaw the campaign's e-commerce store, explained that sourcing all of a campaign's products in the U.S. can present some challenges.

"You would be surprised how hard that can be," Moffatt said. "We were often running out of inventory."

Meaghan Burdick, who was in charge of marketing and merchandising for Obama's 2008 and 2012 campaigns, said American-made goods can also be more expensive, but the campaign products set the tone.

"You're running for President of the United States, so I think it should be made in the U.S.," Burdick said of the products she ordered. "We felt extremely strongly about it. We tried to have everything union-made, so it was made in the U.S. and union printed."

Many of the Republicans running are more flexible than Democrats on the origins of their candidate bobble-heads or bumper stickers. They largely support trade initiatives, as their congressional votes on trade suggest (Democrats are divided), and they say that the wares on their websites reflect this attitude.

"We live in a global society," explains Sean Spicer, communications director for Republican National Committee. "We are a party that welcomes and believes in free trade."

So, it depends on the message candidates want to send. The lengths to which campaigns will go to ensure every product is made in America, Spicer says, are the decisions of each individual candidate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

TOP NEWS

DOMESTIC

Obamacare Ruling May Have Just Killed State-Based Exchanges // NYT // Margot Sanger-Katz – June 25, 2015

Now that the Supreme Court has ruled that health insurance consumers can receive federal subsidies regardless of their state's role in running their insurance market, fewer states may stay in the game.

When the Affordable Care Act passed in 2010, most people expected that each state would want to run its own health insurance marketplace. That never really happened, as many states opted to let the federal system, HealthCare.gov, do the work for them. Many of those states that did try running their own marketplaces are starting to think twice.

Now, with the Supreme Court ensuring that every state's consumers will have equal access to federal subsidies, it is becoming clear that more of those states will revert to a federal system for enrolling people in health insurance.

"There may be a little bit of buyers' remorse going on in some state capitals right now," said Sabrina Corlette, the director of the Center on Health Insurance Reforms at Georgetown University. She said states underestimated the difficulty and expense of building and maintaining state marketplaces. Now, she said, many officials are asking: "What did we get ourselves into?"

As the law envisioned, state exchanges would provide an opportunity for state insurance regulators to oversee their markets, a role they have long performed. The state exchange system would also allow a greater degree of policy flexibility and control, so state officials could customize the marketplaces for local conditions. What few people grasped was the technical and logistical challenge of building a complex website and customer service operation from scratch.

"Certainly, one of the lessons learned was that it is much more difficult than was expected," said Joel Ario, who ran the office in the Department of Health and Human Services devoted to building the exchanges after the law passed. He is now a managing director at Manatt Health Solutions, a consulting firm that is assisting several states.

In the first year of operation, three state exchanges — Nevada, New Mexico and Oregon — had technology failures so profound that they handed the bulk of their operations to the federal government. Other states managed to rebound from a troublesome first year by rebuilding their systems, but only with substantial effort and expense. Both Massachusetts and Maryland essentially started from scratch in 2015.

As my colleague Abby Goodnough reported this month, state struggles continue. The Hawaii exchange is collapsing, while Vermont's looks shaky. Even some exchanges that have performed relatively well — including Washington and Minnesota — are experiencing substantial information technology problems. And the expense of managing an exchange is also climbing in many places as federal start-up funding diminishes. The Washington Post reported in May that nearly half of the states are suffering from financial difficulties.

"There is no new money now to build new infrastructure, and there are no grants available to fix these systems if they're struggling," said Heather Howard, the director of the State Health Reform Assistance Network at Princeton University, which was set up to advise states on exchange building. "So the only path forward may be to use HealthCare.gov."

Lawrence Miller, chief of health care reform in Vermont, who reports to the governor, said his state was still working hard to try to repair its exchange architecture — and he hopes he succeeds. But he said he also took some solace in the court's decision.

Ms. Howard says the future for many states may be something along the lines of the New Mexico system. That state performs some of the functions envisioned for a state exchange, including selecting the health plans that will be sold on the state's marketplace, and collecting fees from insurers. But it uses the federal government's HealthCare.gov infrastructure to determine people's eligibility for insurance and sign them up for health plans.

The National Association of State Health Policy, an organization closely watched by state officials, recently published a paper describing how states can transition to the New Mexico model. People working closely with state governments say they expect the template to become increasingly popular.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If the court had ruled for the health law's challengers, we would have seen more states adopting the state-based model to preserve subsidies for their residents. Now that the government has won, movement is likely to be in the other direction.

Supreme Court's Obamacare ruling benefits way more people in red counties than blue // WaPo // Philip Bump – June 25, 2015

Whether or not Republican politicians consider Thursday's Supreme Court ruling a negative for them is open to interpretation. The 2016 candidates have railed against it in press releases, but deep down inside, it's hard to believe that they wanted to deal with the fallout of the nuclear detonation that a ruling against Obamacare would have been. They still have their political cudgel, and they don't have to clean up a mess. Win-win.

And for Republican voters, the win is even clearer.

The government releases regular updates on how many people are enrolled in the federal exchange. The Supreme Court decision only dealt with those enrollees, as you probably know; at issue was whether or not the government subsidies for people in the federal exchanges would be continued. Without those subsidies, costs for mandatory health insurance would have spiked. And, according to our analysis of government data, it would have affected a lot more people in Republican counties than Democratic ones.

Here's the distribution of enrollees by county. (This is Enroll America's aggregation of ZIP code-level data provided by the government.) The darker the color, the more enrollees. (Counties in gray didn't have data.)

(Note the heavy enrollment in Jeb Bush's and Marco Rubio's back yard.)

As you'd expect, the numbers are much bigger near cities. But notice that several large states are missing, including California and New York. They've got their own exchanges, and so they're not on the federal exchange. The states that are reliant on the federal exchange are often more Republican -- which is why they're in the exchange. They chose not to set up their own exchanges in large part because it was viewed as enabling the law as a whole.

On a county-by-county basis, you can see that a lot of people in counties that backed Barack Obama or Mitt Romney in 2012 would have been affected.

But when you tally the number of those enrolled through the federal exchange in each county, according to the Enroll America data, with how those counties voted, the difference is staggering.

About 1.8 million people in federal exchanges live in counties that voted for Obama. About 4.5 million live in counties that voted for Mitt Romney.

Not all of these people would have seen big spikes in what they have to pay for insurance if the decision had gone the other way. But nearly nine-in-10 nationally receive some subsidy, meaning millions would have been negatively affected.

And just because a county leans Republican doesn't mean its Obamacare beneficiaries lean Republican -- but it seems much more likely that they do.

Overall, the effects of Obamacare have been pretty widely distributed. Enroll America also has estimates of the change in the number of uninsured between 2013 and 2014. Compare that to the 2012 election results, below.

It's not just Democrats or Democratic areas that have seen a benefit from the law. Which gives prominent Republican politicians another reason to feel relieved. A lot of their voters might have been very angry if the Supreme Court's decision went the other way.

Supreme Court Rules That Disparate Impact Claims Are Allowed Under Fair Housing Act // Buzzfeed // Chris Geidner – June 25, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Supreme Court Thursday ruled that claims of "disparate impact" can be brought under the Fair Housing Act of 1968.

The 5-4 closely divided decision — authored by Justice Anthony Kennedy, joined by the four more liberal justices — was a victory for civil rights advocates, who have been long concerned about how the high court would resolve the issue.

In January, the justices heard arguments in the case — which was brought back in 2008 by the Inclusive Communities Project against the Texas Department of Housing and Community Affairs.

The question that ultimately reached the Supreme Court is a relatively simple one: Whether "disparate impact" claims are able to be brought under the Fair Housing Act of 1968.

"Disparate impact" claims address policies that are not discriminatory on their face but have a "disparate impact" on a particular race, and civil rights advocates have said they are a key tool in addressing housing discrimination.

While the FHA makes no specific mention of whether such claims are covered by the law, every court of appeals to decide the issue and the federal government — through the Department of Housing and Urban Development — agree that such claims are permitted under the act.

"Congress' use of the phrase 'otherwise make unavailable' [in the FHA] refers to the consequences of an action rather than the actor's intent," Kennedy wrote for the court on Thursday. "This results-oriented language counsels in favor of recognizing disparate-impact liability."

The "disparate impact" question is one the court has been trying to review for several years now. Twice previously the justices have accepted a case to address the issue only to have it settle out of court before the justices could rule.

INTERNATIONAL

Putin Breaks Silence With Call to Obama // NYT // Peter Baker – June 25, 2015

WASHINGTON — President Obama spoke with President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia on Thursday in their first direct contact in four months as the United States and Russia try to manage their conflict over Ukraine while still working together on other issues like Syria and Iran's nuclear program.

Mr. Putin initiated the call, the first between the estranged leaders since February, the White House said. He brought up the war against the Islamic State in Syria and the two leaders agreed to have Secretary of State John Kerry meet with Foreign Minister Sergey V. Lavrov to discuss how to counter the spread of radicalism in the Middle East. They also discussed the Iran talks in advance of next week's deadline for an agreement.

But American officials said that Mr. Obama focused on the continuing separatist war in Ukraine fomented by support from Moscow and pushed Mr. Putin to abide by a shaky diplomatic agreement known as the Minsk accord. Violence has flared in recent weeks even as Russia failed to drive a wedge among the members of the European Union who agreed to renew economic sanctions on Russia for another six months.

"President Obama reiterated the need for Russia to fulfill its commitments under the Minsk agreements, including the removal of all Russian troops and equipment from Ukrainian territory," the White House said.

The Kremlin said Mr. Putin agreed to have his deputy foreign minister, Grigory Karasin, talk with Victoria J. Nuland, an assistant secretary of state, about the fulfillment of the Minsk accord.

Mr. Putin's decision to call Mr. Obama and focus on Syria and Iran may reflect a desire to assert his continuing importance on the world stage despite Russia's isolation and failure to break the Western consensus on sanctions.

The United States and Russia have been at odds over Syria. Moscow supports the government of President Bashar al-Assad, and Mr. Obama has called for his resignation. American officials hope Mr. Putin may see the rise of the Islamic State as enough of a threat to now be willing to apply pressure on Mr. Assad, but they also suspected his renewed interest in the issue may be a way of distracting from Ukraine.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

ISIS Attacks Two Towns in Northern Syria // NYT // Ben Hubbard – June 25, 2015

The militants of the Islamic State carried out two new offensives in northern Syria on Thursday, entering a provincial capital and detonating large bombs in the border town of Kobani, where intensive airstrikes by a United States-led coalition helped Kurdish forces rout the jihadists last year.

In southern Syria, rebel groups began a new campaign to push government forces from the city of Dara'a.

The new attacks by the Islamic State came more than a week after its fighters lost the town of Tal Abyad, on the Turkish border, to Kurdish militias and Arab rebels in what was seen as a strategic setback for the group. In striking back, the Islamic State, also known as ISIS or ISIL, appeared to be trying to counter losses in one place with attacks on other sites it considers vulnerable, a tactic it has employed before.

Kurdish activists inside Kobani said Islamic State fighters disguised in the uniforms of Kurdish militiamen had sneaked into the town at dawn, when few people were awake. Then a large truck bomb exploded at the town's border crossing with Turkey, setting off clashes between the Islamic State militants and local Kurdish forces.

"They entered the neighborhoods and started killing civilians on their way," said Baran Mesko, a Kurdish activist in Kobani. In a telephone interview, he said about 100 Islamic State fighters disguised as locals had taken up positions in Kobani, a small, strategic frontier town near the Syrian border with Turkey.

At least one more bombing followed, reportedly a suicide attack by a jihadist on a motorcycle, and Islamic State fighters were said to be blowing themselves up with explosive vests and killing civilians.

Kobani, known as Ain al-Arab in Arabic, gained prominence in the fight against the Islamic State last year, when Kurdish fighters fought for months to keep the group out, eventually succeeding in January with the help of intensive airstrikes by the United States-led coalition that has been bombing the militants in Iraq and Syria.

The black flag of the Islamic State, left, flew over Tal Abyad, Syria, on Tuesday. After Kurdish and rebel fighters took over the town later Tuesday, they hoisted a Kurdish militia flag.ISIS Loses Control of Crucial Syrian Border TownJUNE 16, 2015

President Obama on Wednesday at West Point, where he laid out his foreign policy plan for his final two and a half years in office.Obama's Evolution on ISISJUNE 9, 2015

By Thursday evening the Islamic State militants were holed up in a school that had been converted into a hospital and were holding a number of Kurdish families hostage, Mr. Mesko said.

Salih Muslim, another Kurdish activist in Kobani, said the fighting continued late Thursday, and that Islamic State snipers were preventing crews from removing bodies lying in the streets.

The death toll from the fighting was unclear. The Syrian Observatory for Human Rights, which monitors the conflict from Britain through contacts on the ground, said that 22 Islamic State fighters had been killed in addition to 35 civilians and Kurdish fighters. Activists reported higher numbers of casualties, but said they could not get a more accurate count because of the continuing fighting.

The Syrian state news agency, SANA, also reported the clashes, saying five people were killed by the initial truck bomb.

That battle highlighted Turkey's complicated relationship with the war just over its border: the Turkish Army did not intervene against the Islamic State nor did its soldiers join the international coalition against them. While Turkish leaders have condemned the Islamic State, they have also made it clear that they consider any Kurdish advance near their border a potential threat to national security.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Kurdish militias fighting in Syria are linked to the Kurdistan Workers' Party, or P.K.K., which fought a deadly insurgency against the Turkish state.

Syrian Kurds from Kobani waited Thursday at a border fence to cross into Turkey. Islamic State militants have launched new attacks against Kurdish fighters and government forces. Credit Murad Sezer/Reuters

The distrust is mutual, and some Kurdish activists said Thursday that at least one bomber had entered the town from Turkey, a charge Turkish officials denied.

Speaking to reporters in Ankara on Thursday, a spokesman for the Turkish foreign ministry, Tanju Bilgic, called those claims "baseless lies."

Mr. Bilgic said that 63 people who had been wounded were brought across the border from Syria for treatment in Turkey after the explosions and that two died in the hospital.

Farther east, Islamic State fighters seized southern parts of the city of Hasaka, the regional capital of the oil-rich province of the same name. Control of the city had been split between Kurdish forces and the government of Syrian President Bashar al-Assad, but activists said government forces had withdrawn to the city center.

The Islamic State advance sent civilians streaming out of the area, according to photos and videos posted online.

The news agency SANA also reported the Islamic State incursion in Hasaka, accusing militants of using human shields in fierce clashes with government forces.

In southern Syria, a coalition of rebel fighters began a new offensive to push government forces from the city of Dara'a, widely regarded as the birthplace of the uprising against Mr. Assad that began in 2011 and later devolved into the civil war. The Syrian Observatory reported that more than 18 rebel fighters and at least 20 government soldiers were killed.

The Islamic State has only a small presence in southern Syria and most of the groups involved in the fighting there are nationalists seeking to oust Mr. Assad. Some have received financial and military support from the West through Jordan. Fighters from the Nusra Front, the Syrian affiliate of Al Qaeda, were also involved.

Palestinians press International Criminal Court to charge Israel // WaPo // William Booth – June 25, 2015

The Palestinian Foreign Ministry presented documents on Thursday to the International Criminal Court in The Hague asserting that Israel should be investigated for war crimes in last summer's fighting in the Gaza Strip and for continued construction of Israeli settlements in the occupied West Bank.

The presentation of files to the ICC, written in broad outline with no specific charges against named individuals, is another step in what the Palestinians describe as their new strategy of "internationalizing" the conflict with Israel by seeking ways to embarrass, isolate and pressure it to withdraw from occupied territories and allow them to form a sovereign state.

The Palestinians stress that they are not "referring" cases for prosecution but "supplying information" to the ICC prosecutor for her to make up her own mind about how to proceed.

If the Palestinians were seen as referring cases against Israel, that could trigger congressional ire — and real consequences. Congress could withhold $400 million that the United States annually provides for aid projects in the West Bank.

Israel has also warned the Palestinians that they will pay a price for taking their case to the ICC. After the Palestinian Authority signed documents to join the court, Israel withheld transfers of customs tax money for three months, forcing the authority to pay reduced salaries to civil employees.

The Palestinian Authority officially joined the court in April, although Israel and the Obama administration argue that "Palestine" is not a state and so cannot accede to the court's founding document, the Rome Statute. Palestine is a "non-member observer state" in the United Nations.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The ICC's top prosecutor, Fatou Bensouda of Gambia, launched a preliminary examination into possible crimes committed in last year's Gaza war and other actions in the West Bank. If she deems the alleged crimes "grave" and decides the court has proper jurisdiction, she can go before judges at a pretrial tribunal and ask the court for permission to begin a full-fledged investigation, a much more serious matter.

The Palestinian documents submitted on Thursday were not made public, although Palestinian diplomat Ammar Hijazi discussed the contents with reporters. Hijazi said the documents seek to describe Israel's "settlement regime" in the West Bank — how the government, through laws, land seizures, funding and military orders, aids and abets Jewish settlements in the West Bank and East Jerusalem, and why the Palestinians think this is a violation of international law.

Israel argues that the West Bank is not occupied but disputed territory and that its settlements are legal. The Obama administration describes the settlements as "illegitimate" and not helpful to the peace process between Israel and the Palestinians.

The other half of the Palestinian submission to the ICC focuses on the war in Gaza and describes how Israeli rules of engagement and intense artillery and tank fire led to civilian deaths.

"It presents a grim picture," Hijazi said.The Palestinian presentation of documents follows the release this week of a report commissioned by the U.N. Human Rights Council that found evidence that both the Israeli military and armed Palestinian factions such as Hamas, the Islamist militant movement that controls the Gaza Strip, may have committed war crimes in last year's fighting.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and government ministers have strenuously denied that Israel committed violations of international law in the Gaza war. The prime minister called the U.N. report "flawed and biased" and urged the world to ignore it.

Israel released its own report this month defending its military as cautious and moral. It blamed Hamas for civilian deaths because the group employed "human shields" and cached weapons and fired rockets near hospitals, mosques, schools and churches.

Netanyahu has vowed that he will never allow Israeli soldiers to "be dragged" before the ICC. But the ICC does not concern itself with low-level troops; instead it seeks to indict the highest authority in the chain of command. If Israel were ever prosecuted by the court, the defendant would not a conscript but a top Israeli commander or Netanyahu himself.

Some Palestinians relish this idea. "Our aim is to establish war crimes in order that an investigation by the chief prosecutor's office is carried out and to remove immunity from Israel and its leaders, achieve justice, apply human rights conventions, protect Palestinians and hold criminals accountable for their crimes," Mustafa Barghouthi, head of the Palestine National Initiative, told reporters Wednesday in Ramallah.

The ICC has never handled a case as politically explosive and legally complex as the Israel-Palestinian conflict. Those previously indicted by the court have been African warlords and leaders. Nor does the ICC move with speed. Some of its preliminary examinations have dragged on for years.

"We are not going to the ICC seeking revenge," chief Palestinian peace negotiator Saeb Erekat said, but to hold Israel "accountable."

Responding to Israeli complaints that going to the ICC will not bring the Palestinians any closer to a state, Erekat said, "Those who are wary of courts should stop committing crimes."Erekat suggested that going to the ICC also served to remind his constituents that the Palestinian leadership is doing something. "It is asking our people, 'don't despair, don't go toward violence.' "

The ICC prosecutor in her preliminary examination is not limiting herself to Israeli actions in Gaza and the West Bank but is looking at "all parties," including Hamas and its militia, as well as other armed factions, and presumably the Palestinian Authority itself, which formed a "united government" with Hamas.The recent U.N. report suggested that Hamas and the other militants may have committed war crimes with their rocket fire aimed at Israeli civilian centers and their curbside extrajudicial killings of alleged "collaborators."

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A Bush vs. a Clinton? // WSJ // Daniel Henninger – June 25, 2015

The one story many mumble that they don't want to hear again is the tale of two dynasties—another Bush versus another Clinton. But when opinion polls ask about the dynastic matchup, the answer most people give is it doesn't matter to them if the choice is Jeb versus Hillary. In short, get over it and maybe even, bring it on.

Only a legally actionable revelation about the Clinton Foundation could stop Mrs. Clinton, and with no chance of that from a Justice Department preoccupied with indicting Democrats like Sen. Robert Menendez for talking to Medicare bureaucrats, she is her party's nominee.

Jeb Bush's path to the nomination is less automatic. Unlike Hillary, he has competitors of substance bunched behind him, such as Marco Rubio and Scott Walker. But for all the carping about political rust, Gov. Bush retains the top spot in virtually every new poll. This week's Wall Street Journal/NBC Poll puts Mrs. Clinton's lead over Jeb at eight points, which would probably translate into a dead heat by October 2016.

I'm not promoting a Bush-Clinton race (yet), but dynasties reflect a nation's politics. "Bush" and "Clinton" stand for more than just Jeb or Hillary.

One thing they stand for is the baby boomers' last shot at occupying the U.S. presidency. They're done. The generation born to parents who fought World War II has given us Bill Clinton and George W. Bush, and may produce one more president. After that, the country's presidential politics transfers to the generation of a Rubio or a Walker.

To balance the reality of her own baby-boomer status, Hillary's running mate may be 40-year-old Julián Castro, the former mayor of San Antonio and current HUD secretary, or 46-year-old New Jersey Sen. Cory Booker. That many voters have never heard of Julián Castro testifies to the smothering power of the gerrymandered gerontocracy that rules Democratic politics. Hillary Clinton is the Democratic candidate for about the same reason Edward II followed Edward I as England's king: She, none dare dispute, is next in line.

One reason public offices now seem to become family heirlooms—the Cuomos, the Pauls, the Romneys—is children and spouses witness the lives of officials making political decisions in ways not available to the rest of us. And so why, beyond neurotic ambition, one should want to be president of the United States, with voters believing the stakes so high in 2016, is a question Jeb Bush and Hillary Clinton should be able to answer better than most. Each has been privy to two presidencies. (The fastidious will say it's 1.25 for Hillary; only one person has been "close" to the Obama presidency.)

Conventional wisdom among Republicans holds that Jeb shouldn't get bogged down talking about his brother's and father's presidencies. But he should indeed talk about them. Resistance to "another Bush," an authentic and reasonable American instinct, could suppress voter turnout at the margins. Weak turnout hurt Mitt Romney.

Mr. Bush has a chance to tell a skeptical country that he understands the responsibilities of an American president because he knows how his father and brother succeeded—or stumbled. There is much to admire in both those presidencies, but if an honest appraisal requires criticism of them, so be it. "Own man" has to mean more than a promise.

For Hillary, answering why America needs another Clinton is, well, trickier—if indeed she or her campaign think it is a subject worth bothering with at all. But Mrs. Clinton has now spent 12 years close to a presidency. Surely she has views on what reason there is for holding that office, beyond one's name.

It's a good question how many voters remember what a complicated thing the Clinton presidency was. At the heart of Bill Clinton's problems then were abuses of the presidential office on matters having nothing to do with the Lewinsky mess. How Hillary Clinton has sorted through all that and any recent lessons of the Clinton dynasty is a reflection that will have to await future histories. Indeed the operational theory behind the Clinton stonewall seems to be: Survive the moment and let history figure it out.

Dynasties fall, however, when they fail to see the political ground shifting beneath them. For both Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush, it has shifted.

Hillary is running for president, rather than retiring after eight years as president, because in 2008 the Democratic left defeated the Clinton machine, got Barack Obama elected president and captured the party's policies. Now a Clinton is running as a woman of the left, and the bonfire this week over her violative statement, “all lives matter,” suggests she hasn’t arrived yet in the land of solidarity.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jeb somehow got through the trial-by-ordeal of his official presidential announcement without reigniting right-wing mobs calling for his political head. One wonders how far he’d go if he said that the phrase “Common Core” is to academic standards what the Edsel was to cars.

A 17th-century political pundit described “vaulting ambition, which o’erleaps itself.” If it’s Jeb versus Hillary, only one of them will overleap to dynastic oblivion.

Hillary Clinton has to attack Bernie Sanders // WaPo // Jennifer Rubin – June 25, 2015

Bloomberg reports: “Bernie Sanders is gaining on Hillary Clinton in Iowa and New Hampshire, with an appeal as an issue-oriented protest vehicle potentially capable of slowing any coronation of the popular front-runner. In simultaneous surveys, the U.S. senator from Vermont received nearly a quarter of support from likely Democratic caucus and primary voters in the states that host the first presidential nomination balloting early next year, cutting sharply into Clinton’s still-huge lead.” In Iowa, she leads 50 percent to 24 percent and in New Hampshire she has a 56 percent to 24 percent lead.

On one level, she is in no danger of losing either contest at this point. On another, it is remarkable that the “inevitable” nominee is under 60 percent in both places. Clinton might not know how to charm voters or how to thrill them with innovative policy, but she knows how to attack. Hence:

Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.) unloaded on her Senate colleague Bernie Sanders on Thursday, saying the Vermont independent is far too liberal to make it to the White House.

“I think that the media is giving Bernie a pass right now,” McCaskill said in an interview on MSNBC’s “Morning Joe.” “I very rarely read in any coverage of Bernie that he’s a socialist. I think everybody wants a fight and I think they are not really giving the same scrutiny to Bernie Sanders that they’re giving to, certainly, Hillary Clinton and the other candidates.”

It’s not clear how much sympathy that will drum up for Sanders, but he can now claim she’s threatened by him. His shtick as the underdog candidate works well if his opponent is hiding from the media and sending out surrogates to trash him. In fact, he might invite her to sit next to him on one of the Sunday morning shows so we can hear her complaints about him directly. Well, that is not happening anytime soon.

The danger here for Clinton is three-fold.

First, Sanders might start hitting her hard for her cronyism (The Huffington Post points out: “The newest hire for Hillary Clinton’s presidential campaign is a longtime strategist who played a key role in her 2008 primary defeat while working for then-Sen. Barack Obama. He’s also a Washington lobbyist who lobbied the State Department — led, at the time, by Secretary of State Hillary Clinton — on behalf of the company seeking to build the controversial Keystone XL pipeline.”) That means going after the conflicts of interest, the speeches for hedge funds, the anti-woman regimes who donated to her foundation and more.

There is also the matter of her cronies. Sid Blumenthal found a back door into the State Department while getting paid by the “charitable” foundation. Hillaryland regulars Cheryl Mills and Huma Abedin remained on the government payroll while working outside government (in the case of Mills, her status was not previously disclosed). The operating rules in Clinton’s orbit seem to be: Let the rules be damned, ignore conflicts and take the money and run. Not exactly the model of public service we expect.

It’s not clear he wants to go whole hog, but it might be the only way to roust Democrats from their slumber.

Second, carrying around the empty chair and excoriating her for refusal to engage and enunciate her views is another possible Sanders tactic. Clinton, to the extent she has views, surely does not want to reveal any controversial ones that would make either her nomination or general election candidacy more problematic. The progress Sanders has made in the polls bashing her for taking no definitive stance on trade may encourage him to keep at it.

Third, how much higher can Sanders go before a bigger name (Vice President Joe Biden? Michael Bloomberg?) decides to get into the race? That might come after a primary or two, or it could come this summer. Watching Clinton dodge and weave, leaving the president out to dry on trade must be infuriating to a guy like Biden who has spent seven years loyally serving the president, and in fact goading him into more liberal positions (e.g., gay marriage).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton remains the prohibitive favorite, but to the extent Bernie Sanders of all people can inflict real damage or draw bigger fish into the pond, he remains a danger to Hillaryland. In any event, many of the potential attacks on her — greed, being out of touch, ethical lapses — will be fodder for the GOP in the general election. No wonder she is attacking him.

It's Official -- Bernie Sanders Has Overtaken Hillary Clinton In the Hearts and Minds of Democrats // HuffPo // H.A. Goodman – June 25, 2015

According to PBS, Bernie Sanders is "gaining against Clinton in early polls." Salon's Bill Curry believes "Hillary Clinton is going lose," primarily because millions of voters longing for a truly progressive candidate will nominate Sanders. POLITICO explained recently that Early-state polls hint at a Bernie Sanders surge, a headline that was unthinkable only several months earlier. Yahoo's Meredith Shiner calls Sanders a "progressive social media star and pragmatic legislator" and states that "Sanders also has a much more substantial legislative history" than any GOP challenger. In Iowa, 1,100 people packed a gym to hear Bernie Sanders speak in May.

In contrast, Team Hillary had an intimate business roundtable discussion with five "ordinary" Iowans. The only problem was that according to The Washington Post, "All five were selected to attend her events." In fact, Clinton's "staged roundtables" were attended by a total of 13 Iowans, picked by either the campaign or the host.

Therefore, a paradigm shift has taken place. Many Iowans drove 50 miles to hear Sanders speak in Des Moines, primarily because Bernie Sanders has surpassed Clinton as the ideal choice for Democratic nominee. Regarding electability, Sanders has also surpassed Clinton as the realistic choice for Democratic nominee in the minds of many voters, because as one Salon piece illustrates, Hillary "just doesn't get it."

When it comes to everything from immigration to climate change and economic issues (most Americans side with Democrats, according to Pew research and other data) some writers believe that Democrats "can nominate a ham sandwich and win the presidency." Although once thought of as an impossibility, a closer look at the electoral map shows why Bernie Sanders could realistically defeat any GOP challenger. If voters around the country still care about middle class economics, the federal budget, trade and other hot button issues in 2016, Sanders has a legitimate chance to win. Also, since Sanders isn't tied to Obama fatigue like Hillary Clinton, it's quite possible the Vermont Senator re-energizes an America that just recently decided the Confederate flag doesn't represent its value system.

According to a POLITICO piece titled The 2016 Results We Can Already Predict, "Assuming the lean, likely, and safe Democratic states remain loyal to the party, the nominee need only win 23 of the 85 toss-up electoral votes." Therefore, there's no need to jettison cherished values for the sake of pragmatism; those days are over. Senator Bernie Sanders, known in Washington and throughout the nation as an advocate for middle class Americans, veterans, the environment, and other cherished causes can win crucial electoral votes just as easily as Hillary Clinton.

Finally, we're all asking a question that we've been too frightened to ask, for fear of seeming unrealistic:"Why Not Bernie?"

Not long ago, many Democrats emphasized realism over progressive values. Sure, Hillary voted for Iraq and has close ties to Wall Street, but she'll raise $2.5 billion, so doesn't this represent our best chance to beat the GOP? This mindset, however, ignored the fact that the Associated Press, Vice News, and others are suing the State Department for access to tens of thousands of Clinton's emails. A Bloomberg piece titled Hillary Clinton Monthly E-Mail Releases Must Begin in June Court Rules highlights the reality of eventual email disclosures:

The U.S. must begin to make public 30,000 e-mails belonging to former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton on a monthly basis beginning June 30, a federal judge ruled Wednesday amid competing proposals over their disclosure...

The State Department proposed releasing as many documents as possible at 60-day intervals, ending by Jan. 15. Attorneys for Vice News reporter Jason Leopold, who sued to gain access to the e-mails, proposed releases every two weeks.

Leopold's case is one of several seeking access to all or part of Clinton's State Department e-mail through the federal Freedom of Information Act.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Not long ago, winning meant voting for Hillary, even though someone like Bernie Sanders represented a candidate who spoke to the value system of citizens throughout the country. In reality, though, even billions of dollars in campaign funding won't help if a controversial email is uncovered before Election Day, or debated endlessly like other Clinton scandals.

As for why Bernie Sanders is finally being given the attention he deserves, the Vermont Senator is intimately involved with issues that affect the lives of everyday Americans. While Clinton supporters reference their candidate's experience, many people aren't aware of the various Congressional Committees that Sanders is involved with on a daily basis:

Environment and Public Works

The United States Senate Committee on Environment and Public Works is responsible for dealing with matters related to the environment and infrastructure.

Energy and Natural Resources

The United States Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources has jurisdiction over matters related to energy and nuclear waste policy, territorial policy, native Hawaiian matters, and public lands.

Health, Education, Labor, and Pensions

The United States Senate Committee on Health, Education, Labor, and Pensions (HELP) generally considers matters relating to these issues.

Budget

The United States Senate Committee on Budget... is responsible for drafting Congress's annual budget plan and monitoring action on the budget for the Federal Government. The committee has jurisdiction over the Congressional Budget Office.

Veterans' Affairs

The United States Senate Committee on Veterans' Affairs considers matters relating to the compensation of veterans, life insurance issued on account of service in the Armed Forces, national cemeteries, pensions of all wars, readjustment of servicemen to civil life, and veterans' hospitals and medical care.

Joint Economic Committee

This joint committee of the United States Senate and the United States House of Representatives focuses on promoting maximum employment, production, and purchasing power.

While Hillary voted for Iraq, Sanders knows how the repercussions of this decision continue to affect veterans and their families. As for jobs, the federal budget, healthcare, energy, and the environment, Sanders has far more experience than Clinton, Bush, or any other candidate in 2016.

Finally, perhaps the biggest reason Sanders is surging is because he's a genuine person with real beliefs, while others become chameleons when votes and public image are at stake. It's important to note that Hillary Clinton just recently "evolved" on gay marriage and in 2004, Clinton's speech (forward to 0:22 on the Slate video or read the transcript of her passionate defense of marriage between only a man and woman) highlighted her views on the "sacred bond" of marriage:

Senator Hillary Clinton (D-NY): "I believe marriage is...a sacred bond between a man and a woman....a fundamental bedrock principle that it exists between a man and woman, going back into the midst of history, as one of the founding, foundational institutions of history and humanity and civilization. And that it's primary principle role during those milennia has been the raising and socializing of children for the society into which they are to become adults."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

According to The Atlantic, Clinton's stance remained unchanged for years, and "she also opposed gay marriage as recently as 2013, long after a majority of Americans already held a more gay-friendly position."

In terms of identity, Hillary Clinton might be a liberal according to fivethirtyeight.com , yet their analysis gives her a free pass on war, gay marriage, and other issues liberals had championed before they were popular. Adhering to polls is fine, but the words "poll driven," not "progressive," come to mind for someone with this type of persona. If one's views on war and foreign policy are enough for The New York Times to publish an article titled Are neocons getting ready to ally with Hillary Clinton?, then Bernie Sanders becomes an even better candidate for people opposed to never-ending American counterinsurgency wars. Clinton might say she was duped by faulty intelligence, but Bernie Sanders had enough intelligence and wisdom to vote against the Iraq war back in 2003.

In contrast to Clinton, Sanders has supported the issue of gay marriage since 2000, vehemently opposed the Iraq War, opposes TPP, wants student loan debt reforms, fights for veterans, and isn't afraid to blast "too big to fail" Wall Street firms. As for him being an "avowed Socialist," George Bush's $700 billion bailout of banks was textbook socialism, so Sanders will be able to shrug off the label after one or two televised debates. Bernie Sanders represents a new era in American politics; one where values trump Citizens United cash or cold pragmatism. America needs a human being like Sanders, now more than ever before.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jake Sullivan" <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "Dan Schwerin" <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com>
"John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 7/31/2015 4:00:26 AM
Subject: RE: TWEET | Rubio Hits HRC On Cuba, Russia

Adding Laura and Fallon. John, did you have in mind having HRC hit back, or campaign?

From: Dan Schwerin [mailto:dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com]
Sent: Friday, July 31, 2015 10:57 AM
To: John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com >; Jake Sullivan <jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com >
Subject: Fwd: TWEET | Rubio Hits HRC On Cuba, Russia

Here we go...

---------- Forwarded message ----------
From: Jeremy Massey <jmassey@hillaryclinton.com >
Date: Fri, Jul 31, 2015 at 10:31 AM
Subject: TWEET | Rubio Hits HRC On Cuba, Russia
To: Clips <clips@hillaryclinton.com >

User Actions
Following

Marco RubioVerified account @ marcorubio

After Clinton's failed 'reset' with Putin, now she wants to do a 'reset' with Castro. She is making another mistake.

https://twitter.com/marcorubio/status/627124174495055872

--
Jeremy Massey
Research Department

847 736 9211
JMassey@HillaryClinton.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sara DuBois" <sara@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 7/31/2008 7:39:01 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Town Hall in Racine, WI 07/31/08

Hello All,
Just got off the phone with our tracker, Kelli, on the ground in Racine, WI. Below are the notes from our call.

BIG HIGHLIGHTS:

- Asked where he stands now Viagra vs. birth control question, McCain says it's up to the person who purchases the health care coverage
- Denies that he's flip-flopped on 'no mudslinging,' says he's proud of the ad and that 'we're talking about substance and not style... campaigns are tough.'
- Says government had to intervene for Fannie and Freddie but we shouldn't let them lobby again
- Defends a bill that let Peabody Mines displace Navajos to toxic land (leaving many dead)
- Repeats condemnation of Bush Administration and Congress that everyone in Washington says what they need to et elected
- Repeats attacks against Obama's meaningless words,

Racine, WI: McCain Town Hall 07/31/08
(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

Background Details

- About 850-900 people, mostly white and middle-aged (near-capacity, including balcony)
    - Crowd was exuberant, lots of standing ovations for McCain
- About 20 protesters outside event, including Stamporee (McSame stamp), SEIU protesters, 1 Sierra Club sign [tracker footage available]
- Before event, 2 video screens show McCain commercial and images of middle America
- Huge banner reads "Wisconsin Welcomes John & Cindy McCain"
- WWII Vets placed in the front row
- Local mayor introduces Cindy: she's a teacher; she'll say her biggest accomplishment is raising her 4 children; she heads a company; praises her humanitarian work
- Cindy introduces McCain
    - Rwandan women probably endured the most in the genocide wrought on that country; they are the strongest people I have ever met - they have decided that they are going to put the past behind them and put their country first - very similar to my husband- he put everything behind him and put our country first; he embodies hope, courage, generosity, spirit and heart

Speech Highlights

- Now you know why after years in AZ, they said why isn't she the candidate
- brief personal story - 17 years ago Cindy in Bangladesh in Mother Teresa's orphanage - and now we have an (adopted) 17-year-old daughter Bridget and she has enriched our lives
- TY Debra Bartoshevitz (former Dem - perhaps your reward will be in Heaven rather than here on earth)
- We can give teleprompter speeches, soundbites; but the important thing is to give Town hall mtgs and interact with people together. ICYMI I invited Obama to hold these meetings with me and he hasn't. and ICYMI yesterday he invited me to a duel. I wonder what weapons he had in mind...
- I'm always honored to have the vets - at my hundreds and hundreds of town hall meetings - esp by our Greatest Generation
- questions, comments and occasional insult
- I've been called a maverick, someone who marches to own drum - sometimes compliment, sometimes insult - I understand who I work for, not anyone else but you and the country we love
- I spoke up against administration for surge in Iraq- --- BTW it's very likely that we'll have the lowest casualties in the month of July in any month since the war began - every life is precious, but it's apparent the surge is succeeding --- I'll say again, I'd much rather lose a political campaign than lose a war
- I spoke up against my party and fought against out-of-control spending and corruption in DC today
- I spoke up against Administration and Congress who gave us another Energy Bill

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Politicians, pundits and pollsters warn me that these positions would cost me the Presidency, but I don't answer to them, I answer to you. I will always always do what's right for my country.
- We need to change the way we do almost everything: disaster response, education, ATC, etc. -- all of these were before the rise of the global economy and the end of the Cold War. and to do this we'll need the strength to change Washington.
- Obama is an impressive speaker and we should all applaud his accomplishments. My problem is that on issues big and small, what he says is different from what he does. And he deosn't seem to understand that his proposed solutions will make the problems worst. He says he wants to change Washington, but his solution is to make govt bigger, which we've tried and failed at for years. He's requested equivalent of $1M/ day for every day he's been in office. I have never asked for nor received a single earmark. I will veto every that comes across my desk.
- Obama says he will only favor the rich, but he's favored tax hikes that would affect those making just $32k. Also raise taxes on capital gains, etc, basically any tax he can raise ,he will.
- I am opposed to raising taxes, including SS taxes. And that's a debate we should have openly and in good faith. I hope I can convince OBama not to raise taxes in this bad economy. It's the worse thing you can do. Im going to keep current tax rates low and cut others not bc/c I want to make the rich richer but b/c it keeps jobs here and creates new ones.
- He says he wants energy independence, but he opposes offshore drilling and nuclear power. My friends we have to begin offshore drilling now! He says that the high cost of gas doesn't bother him, only that it rose too quickly. Yesterday he proposed we put air in our tires to save on gas. Let's do that, but do you think that's enough to break our dependence on MidEast oil? I want to include all sources of energy in the solution. Yay for clean coal, yay for nuclear... We can't keep spending $700B, incl. some to terrorists... We got to the moon in a shorter time than predicted. We can do it and those who say we can't, I say you don't know America the way I know America.
- OBama says he wants peace but even today he refuses to acknowledge the success of the surge. Mullen agrees with me that it would be dangerous to bring the troops out now. Obama's plans could have led to a 3rd IRaq War . Our soldiers will leave Iraq.
- Obama's words for all their eloquence and passion, don't mean very much. Bush Admin, Cong, everyone in Washington says what they have to do to get elected. We don't need another politician who puts self-importance and expediency above the country's interests.
- Whenever I faced a choice between my country's interests and mine or party's interests, I always chose my country's. I will always put my country first. etc.
- We're going to start making this govt work for you and not for the ambitions of the powerful.

Question & Answer

- 1Q) I saw the poll results in WI - we got a big problem. I think you can solve it by turning to Green Bay Packers.
    - JM: I did stand 5th from the bottom of my class at the Naval Academy but I'm not so dumb as to jump into that controversy. Except that Bret Favre has provided USA with some of its greatest memories.

- 2Q) [not a question] I just wanted to say to my friends that I just talked to the POTUS.
    - JM: You're what this campaign is all about. I'm not going to hand off to you broken Medicare, SS systems and debt. I'm going to go to DC and get the hard things done.

- 3Q) Do you believe the prophecies of the Bible are inevitable? Will they affect your policy decisions?
    - JM: It's very clear our nation was founded on Judeo-Christian values, I have no doubt whatsoever. And I do beleive we are a special nation in many, many respects, incl. that all of us are created equal... inalienable rights. We haven't always stood by that but we've moved forward one step at a time, not just within our own country, but we've shed blood across the globe for others' freedom as well. I believe that my faith has been important to me in my life, sustained me in times of need.
- FOLLOWUP: Will you address the specific questions?
    - [crowd cheers]
    - JM: I believe we are the captains of our faith. I believe USA determines its destiny in the world.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- [crowd yells, 'Sit down!' McCain: 'It'll be ok]

- 4Q) What do you plan to do specifically to not only lower the gas prices, but to reduce CO2 emissions, and could you describe your cap-and-trade policy, and do you believe in carbon tax?
  - JM: I do not believe in a carbon tax - it hurts the poorest most. 1 of the most terrible things of this energy crisis is it hurts the poorest. ICYMI, Congress is gridlocked and theyre not going to do anything about it. I do believe greenhouse gases are affecting the climate of the Earth. We can debate that, but there's no better way to make it thru energy crisis/dependence on foreign oil and reducing the costs is green technology. I saw GM's the Volt - I want every American to have the opportunity to buy one of these new generation of automobile. I want to give them up to $5k to buy these.
  - On cap and trade - we did it w/ prob of cap-and-trade. Many conservatives think it'll hurt the economy, but I disagree - they will reduce the costs of a gallon a gas! reduce our dependence on foreign oil! create American jobs! I want to build 45 nuclear plants by 2030 and that would create 700k jobs.

- 5Q) You said in a WSJ you would use Title I and Title II. Would you release more money so that every state could have more opportunities for Christian choice schools?
  - JM: I support all choice. Choice in all schools, faith-based and others. I think the civil rights issue of this generation is Education for every American. Poor not getting it. NYC and NOLA exemptions. Choice and competition. We need charter schools, vouchers, home-schooling if need be. Obama opposes charter schools, opposes vouchers - called it nonsense the other day, I believe. It's not per se that charter schools are so much better, but that they provide competition that makes all schools better. I want every American to have opportunities that we had in sending kids to school.

- 6Q) An honor ot meet the greatest hope USA has right now. How will the recent resignation of Olmert affect your policy toward Israel and MidEast
  - JM: It will not. All of us regret when there are signs of scandal - and I don't know much about it. Israel is a functioning democracy, and where there are signs of strife, they take action. Other nations, corruption festers.

- JM: Can we pause for a minute for a 60-second commercial brought to you by ONE campaign? [Lady summarizes ONE's work.] JM: You're all about serving a cause greater than your self-interest.

- 7Q) I want to commend you for your service to our country. Earlier, in April, you had condemned mudslinging. But recently, esp with Obama's trip abroad and then yesterday with the Britney Spears ad. What do you say to people who feel you've flip-flopped on this?
  - JM: there are differences between us. But what we're talking about is substance and not style. Campaigns are tough. He said he wanted a "duel" over taxes. All I can say is we're proud of that commercial. We need to base this campaign on what we can do for Americans and make our country safe and prosperous.

- 8Q) Obama terrifies me, we can't let him get away with a single thing.
  - JM: I respect and admire Obama - we have stark differences: taxes (raise vs. keep low), HC (by govt vs. by familiy), choice in education (you vs. teachers' unions).
  - Also, the other day I said Obama was wrong, and I still can't see how anyone could say the surge didn't work and go to Iraq and still say that.

- 9Q) [old lady] How's your mom? I love her.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- France story - she bought a car

- 10Q) What are you going to do about the high costs of tuition?
  - JM: First, a break on the inflationary aspects associated with education in America. In that way, it's similar to HC. We also need to encourage young Americans to serve their countyr in a variety of ways. We should incentivize them, esp with educational benefits. TFA, Peace Corps, etc. Third, make student loans more available w/ priority for math, science, engineering, etc. so we can help our economy continue - on as generous of terms as possible. So those who go into great specialties like medicine, arent' burdened with debt. My 1st priority is to reform educaiton and 2nd is ot make it affordable to all Americans.

- 11Q) [little girl] How are you going to combat poverty in our economic recession?
  - JM: First, get spending under control. We're promising all these programs but we have no way to pay for them. e.g. Medicare Prescription Drug act - is it a good idea ot pay for mine? (2) Keep taxes low (3) Focus attn on energy independence b/c the price of gas impacts lowest-income Americans (4) offer affordable HC to every American by giving those decisions to American families and not govt. Americans are hurting. GOP and Dem need to sit down together.

- 12Q) We're taking money from our business to get workers training so they can find better jobs. How will you help with worker training to help them find independence?
  - JM: Yesterday I was at a local Caterpillar dealership and they had a partnership with the community college for training workers. I want to go to community colleges and take the $ that's not working with our current displaced worker programs and say design and implement a program that works. I'd be glad to supplement the income of older workers while they're getting retrained. I am committed to going to our educaitonal systems, esp. community colleges, adn get these programs working.

- 13Q) I'm about to enter workworld, I'm worried about H.C. A few weeks ago, you were asked about Viagra vs. birth control. Now you've had some time to think of it; what's your position?
  - JM: That it's up to the person who purchases it. And we will make healthcare more affordable.

- 14Q) Do we continue to let govt interfere in bailout of mortgage crisis or do we let Econ 101 play out and let market figure it out?
  - JM: I believe b/c of the nature of the problem, we had to help Fannie and Freddie out. But we need to make sure it never happens again, that they can't lobby again.

- 15Q) Would you present a tax alternative, e.g. Flat Tax or Alt Tax?
  - JM: Americans are sick and tired, no one understands the tax system. We know true tax reform won't go thru Congress, particularly now. WE should give Americans a choice: (a) stick with current system or (b) a system where you can easily go online and figure out your own taxes. It's an inexcusable system that no one understands.

- [yelling]

- JM: That microphone is brought to you all by the DNC.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- 16Q) I'm not an Obama backer, in fact I don't trust many politicians because govt has been run by lobbyists - the people aren't in control. I'm of Native American descent. A bill that you co-sponsored years ago re Peabody Mines causing Navajos to be put in an area that caused many to die. Do you have any remorse?
    - JM: Thank you for your candor, but that's not the appropriate description. There was a long-standing dispute between Navajo and Hopee, and we worked to try to settle this centuries-old land dispute. I'm proud of my advocacy and work on behalf of Native Americans. I'm honored by their service to this nation and I revere Navajo code-talkers.

- JM: And on DC, Cong approval at 9%. I assure you that the 1 priority that I ahve is to put my country first. A long time ago I had the opportunity to go home from prison camp. But it was a violation of our code of conduct adn there was a Mex-American friend of mine that had been there before me. I chose country. We may disagree- that's what THs are all about. I have learned more today from you than you have from me. If you want an uplifting experience, greet these young ppl who have just come back from Iraq and Afgh- they are the bravest America has ever seen.

--
Sara DuBois
Tracking / Communications Manager
ProgressiveAccountability.org
sara@progressiveaccountability.org
202-609-7681 (office)
410-967-7306 (cell)

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jacob Roberts" <jroberts@progressivemediausa.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 6/16/2008 4:28:55 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Morning 6/16/08

Main Topic: McCain courts the female vote

Summary of Shift: In the face of statewide flooding, Iowa continues to face misery until Monday when waters are predicted to begin recession. This news item took up the overwhelming majority of airtime this morning. Meanwhile McCain coverage remained largely at headline level with brief re-caps of his recent Iraq attack on Obama and current campaign travel plans.

Highlights:
1) McCain's attempts to win over the female vote look like a difficult task
2) Jerry Dell Femina says that, 'At 71 [McCain] is a one-term president, I'm pretty sure' on Fox and Friends segment on 'Power of the Veep' [no clip]
3) On Fox and Friends host runs down the basics on McCain's attempts to court Hillary supporters [no clip]
4) Ambassador John Bolton gets on America's Newsroom to detail possible rogue nuclear threats [no clip]
5) Local Texas news states that McCain cancels an event in an attempt to distance the campaign from controversial remarks Clayton Williams made 18 years ago [no clip]

Clips:

Highlight #1
McCain Has a Tough Road Ahead to Woo Women Voters (MSNBC 06/16/08 9:52am)
MONICA NOVOTNY: Could the race between John McCain and Barack Obama ultimately turn on where Hillary Clinton loyalists throw their support. McCain is aggressively targeting those very voters . . .

[. . .]

NOVOTNY: Former Hewlett-Packard CEO, Carly Fiorina has emerged essentially as McCain's chief messenger for women. She will be actively campaigning in several battleground states talking to female voters. Do you believe there will be Democratic women, Clinton supporters who will be receptive to Carly and thus McCain?

LAURA SCHWARZ: Well I think they'll be very receptive to Carly Fiorina, she's an incredible woman . . . she has great respect in the community and I think she's a terrific asset for John McCain but I think it's an overestimation of this angry woman electorate for Hillary Clinton. Now there's no doubt that white women are very important and I say that because George Bush won because of them in 2000 and 2004. Women make up about 54% of the electorate but since Hillary pulled out of the race, Barack Obama has their support by 61% to 19and as we've seen in the last two weeks he went up from 5 points a head among women to 13 to 19 points ahead you know, with women . . . there's not a choice between Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton anymore it's between Barack Obama and John McCain. Two very different records, two very different choices going into the general.

NOVOTNY: Let's look at where John McCain stands on some key issues. He wants to overturn Roe V. Wade. He skipped a vote on a bill that would make it easier for women to sue for equal pay. Voted against requiring health care plans to cover birth control. Voted to terminate the Federal Family Planning Program that provides breast cancer screenings. How is he planning to sell himself to women on these issues that are so important?

RON THOMAS: . . .what you see with female voters in particular is that they are not single issue voters. If you look at the top three issues that women say are important to them, they are the economy, the war in Iraq and healthcare. And all three of those issues Sen. McCain is very, very strong on. So I think the key for Sen. McCain is to focus on these three issues, to build that thread and build that bridge and listen, I'm a wholistic candidate, I'm just not a one single issue candidate and when he does his stump speeches to incorporate women into these speeches, into his appearances. To draw them more into actually his position and those top three issues are what Sen. McCain is very, very strong on.

NOVOTNY: . . . the Obama camp is not conceding these voters to McCain . . . will this line up all on the issues?

SCHWARZ: I don't think that any of us are single issue voters but I think that there is a high credence to women's privacy, women's right to decide what to do with their own body . . . having a zero percent rating on women's issues is not going to be good for John McCain . . .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

NOVOTNY: The McCain camp has canceled this fundraiser, originally to be hosted by Clayton Williams. Williams in the past had made very insensitive remarks about the crime of rape. Is this a story that will resonate with women? Will they hear this and be concerned that this is someone that McCain has associated with . . . ?

THOMAS: I don't think this is going to be a big issue. I think the big issue here is what women are saying about Sen. Clinton bowing out of the race. Here are Hillary Clinton voters that were saying they would never vote for Obama. . .

--
Jacob Roberts
Media Analyst
PMUSA
(c) 208.420.3470
--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Joel Benenson" <jbenenson@bsgco.com>
To: "Jesse Ferguson" <jesse@jesseferguson.com>
"Jim Margolis" <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com>
"John Anzalone" <john@algpolling.com>
john.podesta@gmail.com
"Mandy Grunwald" <gruncom@aol.com>
Date: 3/15/2015 5:48:23 PM
Subject: RE: Earned Media Update

Who is the right person to raise a simple question of the audacity of members of congress asking others to release their emails when they don't ?
Do we have some D who can squarely at Gowdy and demand he release all his emails for that last two years so people can see for themselves how politically motivated his investigations are?

From: Jesse Ferguson [mailto:jesse@jesseferguson.com]
Sent: Sunday, March 15, 2015 5:13 PM
To: Joel Benenson; Jim Margolis; John Anzalone; john.podesta@gmail.com; Mandy Grunwald
Cc: Robby Mook; Kristina Schake; Jennifer Palmieri
Subject: Earned Media Update

Hello All – Two quick things.

1) As you may have seen, ABC News reporting that Speaker Boehner and Republicans in Congress are pledging more investigation into Secretary Clinton on emails. Below are the key points we're sharing with Hill allies and TV surrogates this afternoon to get ahead of it and frame it as crazy GOP investigations AND GOP hypocrisy. We're trying to push folks to go after them.
2) Everyone asked on our last Comm call for more offense against GOP. While we can't do it perfectly before campaign is launched, we've had some success working with partners getting stories on Jeb and others. Clips attached.

Thanks. We'll try to keep these Earned Media Updates as often as we can.

POINTS

While it was permitted for Secretary Clinton to use one blackberry instead of two, looking back she's said it would have been better for her to use two. At the time, this just didn't seem like an issue. She's asked State Department to publicly release all of roughly the 55,000 printed pages of emails she provided them.

Secretary Clinton was the first and only former Secretary to respond to the Department's request last year, and was the only one to provide her work emails.

Secretary Clinton has asked the Department to make her work related emails publicly available, and just like every other Cabinet Secretary and U.S. government official, she gets to choose to keep her personal emails private.

Charlie Cook wrote that: "This is the classic kind of inside-the-Beltway, process story that politicos and reporters get in a lather over, but that resonates very little with average voters."

This isn't about emails, it's about Trey Gowdy furthering a partisan witch-hunt and Republicans in Congress distracting from their dangerous letter to the Iranian regime. There have been nine different Congressional committees that have held hearings on Benghazi . Secretary Clinton spent more than five hours testifying before the Senate and the House of Representatives and participated in briefings for Members.

Gowdy has been criticized for subpoenaing the State Department for emails already turned over to the Select Committee.

Gowdy and Republican have been caught numerous times trying to use the Benghazi investigation to fire up their base and raise money.

Republican Hypocrisy on Emails. They want to hold former Secretary Clinton to a different standard than they'd hold themselves.

Washington Post : "Jeb Bush used his private e-mail account as Florida governor to discuss security and military issues such as troop deployments to the Middle East and the protection of nuclear plants, according to a review of publicly released records." [Washington Post, 3/15/15]

Wall Street Journal : " But much like with Mrs. Clinton, the decision over which emails should be considered official and which remain private was made by Mr. Bush. It is unclear how many emails Mr. Bush withheld because he deemed them unrelated to state business. "He did exactly what Hillary did," said Barbara Petersen, president of the First Amendment Foundation, a Florida-based government watchdog group. In turning over emails from his private account, she said, Mr. Bush and his staff "went through those emails and decided what were public-record emails and what wasn't. […] The

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Wall Street Journal reports today: “When the Orlando Sentinel filed a public-records request for the emails from the private account about the legislative session, Mr. Rubio’s spokeswoman said they had been deleted.” (WSJ, 3/13/15)

Associated Press , “Several current and former governors who are considering a presidential run have found ways to delay or prevent public scrutiny of their communications while in office. That includes Republicans who have criticized their potential Democratic rival.” [AP, 3/7/15]

Roll Call , “But the legislative branch, which has effectively exempted itself from the Freedom of Information Act, can keep its emails and other correspondence hidden for 20 years or more — and some forever.” [Roll Call, 3/10/15]

Congressman Jason Chaffetz, who chairs the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, was caught by ABC News with a personal email address – a gmail account – on his Congressional business card. [ABC, 3/3/15]

In fact, people have called on Trey Gowdy to release his email if he wants to oversee this investigation. [MSNBC, 3/11/15]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Melissa Cantrell" <mcantrell@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "HRC Rapid" <HRCRapid@hillaryclinton.com>
"Jennifer Palmieri" <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com>
"Julie McClain" <jmcclain@hillaryclinton.com>
"Kristina Schake" <kschake@hillaryclinton.com>
"Meredith Thatcher" <mthatcher@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 6/8/2015 11:53:00 AM
Subject: Daily Media Report 6.8.15

National:

-- Report on Bernie Sanders' performance against HRC; panel with John Nichols and Bob Shrum; Nichols said the Democratic race was starting to get interesting; Nichols noted the Wisconsin straw poll that showed Bernie Sanders in second place;Shrum said Sanders was going to surprise people in Iowa, said odds-on favorite was still HRC. MSNBC's The Ed Show , 6.8.15

-- Report on HRC's voting rights speech; used footage of HRC naming GOP governors during her voting rights speech; used footage of Perry, Walker, Christie, and Kasich pushing back against HRC's voting rights speech; reported that Marc Elias is pushing lawsuits in states with suppressive voting efforts; interviewed Rev. William Barber; shifted into a larger conversation about voting rights. MSNBC's The Ed Show , 6.8.15

-- Report on HRC's announcement on Saturday; Halperin noted this would be HRC's second announcement after the first one was surrounded by questions about HRC's emails; Halperin noted this announcement was also surrounded by bad news – Reich's comments about WJC's paid speeches, HRC's declining favorability numbers, Bernie Sanders almost beating HRC in the Wisconsin straw poll, questions about The Clinton Foundation, and the Special Select Committee on Benghazi; Halperin asked Heilemann whether he was going to take the tram or the subway to HRC's announcement; Heilemann said HRC has headwinds, said HRC had an opportunity to make policy pronouncements that would be popular with most of the Democratic Party as well as the country; Halperin said the best days of HRC's campaign had been when HRC gave policy points; Halperin said HRC was in a stronger position than the Republicans realized. Bloomberg's With All Due Respect , 6.8.15

-- Report on HRC's phone call to the Fight for 15; interviewed Steve Murphy; Murphy said he agreed with HRC; Murphy said business is not hurting and should share the profits; Cavuto asked about the unions, wondered why some unions wanted to be excluded from the $15 minimum wage; Murphy said he didn't agree with unions opting out. Fox News' Your World With Neil Cavuto , 6.8.15

-- Report on Bernie Sanders' second place finish in a Wisconsin straw poll; panel with Eugene Robinson, Kasie Hunt, and Gillian Tett; Robinson compared Sanders' finish in the straw poll to Ron Paul's performance in GOP straw polls – noted that Ron Paul was never the nominee; Hunt said HRC needs to find the unmotivated voters and motivate them; Tett said people were being turned off by the CGI stories. MSNBC's Now With Alex Wagner, 6.8.15

-- Interviewed John Mack; Mack said HRC was one of the best senators New York had ever had; Mack said he thought all of HRC's economic rhetoric was designed to win; Mack said HRC was the most impressive senator he had worked with; Mack said he would support HRC in the 2016 election; Mack said HRC would be more engaged than BHO. Fox Business Network's Cavuto: Coast to Coast , 6.8.15

-- Report that HRC was hosting a rally on Saturday, said that HRC would host series of domestic policy speeches; interviewed Ed Henry; Henry reported that $100,000 from a personal foundation run by the Clintons was donated to a charity run by executives of The New York Times; Henry noted the NYT endorsed HRC in 2008; Henry mentioned the Wisconsin straw poll that showed Bernie Sanders in second place; compared Fiorina and HRC; noted Fiorina released a detailed account of her finances. Fox News' The Real Story With Gretchen

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Carlson, 6.8.15

-- Discussion about Bernie Sanders coming in second in the Wisconsin straw poll; panel with Gloria Borger and Jeff Zeleny; Borger said there was resonance for Sanders among the base of the Democratic Party, noted HRC is moving more to the left of herself every day; Zeleny said Sanders was very unlikely to be the nominee, said people who voted for Sanders in the straw poll wanted to let HRC know they were there; Zeleny said it was still unclear where HRC was going to land on the economy.CNN's Wolf , 6.8.15

-- Report on The Clinton Foundation's donation to a New York Times group; interviewed Ed Henry; Henry said the money came from the Clinton's family giving – not from The Clinton Foundation; Henry said the money went to a NYT charity overseen by NYT executives; Henry noted the NYT endorsed HRC in 2008; Henry reported that Robert Reich said HRC and WJC needed to be more transparent; Henry noted the Democratic pushback that George W. Bush has been giving paid speeches as well; reported Carly Fiorina posted her financial disclosure reports to the FEC; compared and contrasted HRC and Fiorina's financial disclosure. Fox News' Happening Now, 6.8.15

-- Interviewed Molly Ball; Andrea Mitchell said HRC's rollout would be on Saturday; reported there was a lot of concern among Democrats who did not know what the strategy was; Ball said the rally was like the Russian reset; Ball said she'd heard a lot of grumbling in Clintonworld that the listening-tour stage went on too long; Ball said Democrats are hoping HRC makes a forceful argument for her candidacy. MSNBC's Andrea Mitchell Reports, 6.8.15

-- Discussion about HRC launching her campaign on Saturday; reported HRC planned about a dozen domestic policy speeches on issues like college affordability, equal pay for women, and cracking down on Wall Street; reported HRC planned to use BHO's strategy to win instead of WJC's strategy; discussion about HRC not addressing foreign policy; shifted into talk about Robert Reich's comment that WJC should stop giving paid speeches; guest Andy Levy said the Clintons have always gotten away with stuff before, said there was no incentive for the Clintons to change. Fox News' Outnumbered , 6.8.15

-- Report on HRC's first campaign rally on Saturday; shifted into larger discussion about how the media is covering HRC's scandals based on the Politico piece Scandals Only Make the Clintons Stronger; panel with Alan Colmes and Tammy Bruce;Colmes said you can't call everything a scandal and hope something sticks, said HRC is putting out substantive policy positions that the press should be covering; Bruce said Republicans are moving within a margin of error of HRC; showed footage from Marco Rubio's announcement speech where Rubio called HRC a leader from yesterday. Fox News' Happening Now , 6.8.15

-- Report on Chris Christie's statement on CBS's Face the Nation about HRC's early voting speech; panel with Katie Pavlich and Mary Anne Marsh; Pavlich said HRC was targeting black voter turnout, said HRC was hurting for votes; Marsh said voter fraud was an urban myth; conversation shifted to HRC's endorsement of the Fight for $15; Pavlich said HRC would change her position given the winds; Marsh noted even Walmart had raised the minimum wage. Fox News' America's Newsroom with Bill Hemmer and Martha MacCallum , 6.8.15

-- Report on a CNN poll about same-sex marriage; panel with Ron Christie and Marc Lamont Hill; Christie noted WJC signed DOMA, said HRC has been largely silent about what she thinks; Hill said HRC was very clear on thinking DOMA was wrong, said asking HRC about WJC's actions because he was her husband was wrong but was okay with asking because he was a former POTUS; shifted into conversation about Joni Ernst's commentary about HRC from CNN's State of the Union on Sunday; Christie said electing a POTUS isn't about a person's gender or race; mentioned the Politico story about 60 percent of HRC's donors being women; Hill said people are ready to have a female POTUS, said he did not think we should elect a POTUS based on gender or race; Hill said he was not an HRC cheerleader but that her work speaks to the interests of women; Hill noted HRC also went after Ernst during the primary. CNN's CNN Newsroom with Carol Costello , 6.8.15

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

-- Reported that HRC planned about a dozen speeches and announcements in next few months on social and economic policy; reported HRC's aides said topics will include the cost of college, women's pay equity, and Wall Street regulation; reported HRC phoned into the second annual Convention for the Fight for 15; read HRC's quote about wanting to be their champion; noted HRC was hosting the first major rally of her campaign on Saturday; Mika said HRC was speaking her language, said HRC should talk like that at her rally; Willie Geist said HRC said she supports the $15 minimum wage; Mika said she liked that; Halperin clarified the earlier statement that HRC said she supported raising the minimum wage and the efforts of the Fight for 15, noted HRC did not come out for a $15 minimum wage; segment on Frank Bruni's column "Hillary the Tormenter"; Halperin noted Democrats were annoyed with the Clintons for the speeches, the Foundation, and the emails; Julie Pace said HRC can approach her campaign how she's doing it, noted Republicans were trying to hit HRC to show they were most capable of taking her down. MSNBC's Morning Joe , 6.8.15

-- Roundtable with Cindi Leive and Mimi Walters; Mika asked Cindi Leive about whether women's magazines were in the tank for HRC; Leive said that was a misconception, noted Glamour also covered Cathy McMorris Rodgers and Elise Stefanik.MSNBC's Morning Joe , 6.8.15

-- Brief report on Joni Ernst's comment about HRC and women's issues; noted HRC hit Ernst during the 2014 GOP primary.MSNBC's First Look , 6.8.15

-- Brief report that HRC was planning about a dozen speeches and announcements in the coming months; reported HRC's aides said topics would include women's pay and Wall Street regulation; noted HRC phoned into the second annual convention for a Fight for 15; read HRC's quote that she wanted to be their champion. MSNBC's Way Too Early , 6.8.15

States:

South Carolina:

--Report on HRC and her campaign shift: HRC's shift into policy mode. Reporters question whether it will be an overarching idea or quick shots at policy. Reporters claim that the people want an overarching idea that explains her policy. WCSC-CHS (CBS)'s CBS This Morning , Charleston (SC) , 6.8.15

--Report on HRC and her campaign launch: Clinton aimed attacks at some GOP governors, specifically Rick Perry. Rick Perry rebuttals by claiming that the sanctity of the vote is incredibly important. WACH-COL (FOX)'s WACH Fox Good Day , Columbia (SC). 6.8.15

--Report on HRC's campaign shift: HRC's shift into policy mode. Reporters question whether it will be an overarching idea or quick shots at policy. Reporters claim that the people want an overarching idea that explains her policy. WLTX-COL (CBS)'s CBS This Morning , Columbia (SC) . 6.8.15

Iowa:

--Report on HRC and her lessened significance as a woman: Senator Ernst claims that HRC does not necessarily care about women's issues. She claims that Iowans will not fall for HRC being just a woman. KCAU (ABC)'s Good Morning America , Sioux City (IA) . 6.8.15

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

New Hampshire:

--Report on HRC's campaign shift: HRC's shift into policy mode. Reporters question whether it will be an overarching idea or quick shots at policy. Reporters claim that the people want an overarching idea that explains her policy. WBZ-BOS (CBS)'s CBS This Morning, Boston (MA). 6.8.15

Nevada:

-- No HRC coverage today.

Bernie Sanders:

--Report on Bernie Sanders and education costs: Author, Lee Siegel, claims that Sanders stands apart from other 2016 candidates because of his desire to tax certain financial transactions when it comes to education costs for students. CNBC's Squawk Box, 6.8.15

--Report on Bernie Sanders and debates: Reporters claim that it is possible that Sanders will beat HRC in debates. Reporters claim that HRC is out of shape in the political realm, and she will have a tough time facing Sanders. Reporters claim that he is firm, he has a set agenda, and he is mobilizing a large group of people. CNBC's Squawk Box, 6.8.15

--Report on Bernie Sanders in New Hampshire: Reporters claim that Sanders told New Hampshire that he will win that state. MSNBC's First Look, 6.8.15

--Report on Bernie Sanders taking HRC supporters: Reporters claim that Sanders has had very large crowds, attracting many of HRC's supporters. Reporters claim that HRC is in trouble in her own base due to Bernie Sanders. They claim that he is the reason that Sanders is the reason that HRC is not getting money for her Super PAC and having difficulty getting people to her events. Fox News' MediaBuzz, 6.8.15

--Report on Bernie Sanders on tax rates: Reporters claim that he would raise tax rates not seen since the 1950s. Reporters speak about the impact of such a move. Reporters claim that it would push America back and it just creates a wealth redistribution that does not work. Reporters claim that this is the reason that America does not see economic growth. Fox Business Network's Sunday Morning Futures with Maria Bartiromo, 6.8.15

--Report on Bernie Sanders drawing in a strong second after Wisconsin Democratic Party Straw Poll: Bernie Sanders finishes with 41% during the Wisconsin Poll. HRC won with 49%. Reporters say that he is rising, but he still does not have a shot at being the Democratic nominee. HRC should worry that a part of her support is shifting to Sanders' side. Reporters say that this recent poll could cause HRC to shift her issue areas more to the left. CNN's Wolf, 6.8.15

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Martin O'Malley:

--Report on MOM's failures as Governor of Maryland: Reporters claim that MOM cannot run on the idea of taxing the rich. Reporters claim that this taxation policy will result in his defeat. Fox Business Network's Varney & Company, 6.8.15

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Capricia Marshall" <capriciamarshall@gmail.com>
To: "Capricia Penavic Marshall" <capriciamarshall@gmail.com>
Date: 5/25/2014 2:23:55 PM
Subject: With thanks…

Awoke a few moments ago on a plane, crossing the globe to a beautiful place and in a blink, I am on the other side... Of 50! Bam!

In an instant my backside dropped another centimeter, my eyesight blurred, and many other "are you kidding me!" horrors occurred.

In lieu of moaning and groaning thru this moment in life, I have chosen to Raise the Bar!

So, I begin my new journey by raising a glass and toasting
YOU, my friend!

Thank you for listening as I blah, blah on about some seemingly, meaningless point (like people not listening to speakers at events - my latest annoyance - but so important); for persevering thru my strident opinions (kids and drugs, argh!); for understanding that this Gemini is well intentioned wh en
she pushes the limits (napkin folds are imperative for proper table presentation; and first impressions really matter!)
;
and for enduring my techno talents or lack thereof (you have no idea how long it took me to write this email on a darn iPhone - give me back my blackberry!)

I especially want to express my gratitude to three phenomenal women today:

First and definitively foremost - my AMAZING mother who gave me this precious life and so much love!
S imply said, she gave me all, supported me fully
, and loved me unconditionally.

From sitting through ballet, violin & drama recitals to living with us and helping raise our son, she always encouraged me to be me.
Like her mother, my Nonny, s he offers life's advice straight and honest (her recent commentary on a cover shot "hmm…hair color, odd and your expression, not really you, but I guess ok")

.

I so love you mom
.

Ann Jordan - She became a part of my life when I first arrived to our Nation's Capital, offering me tremendous guidance on how to navigate the waters of this political town. She opened her home to me and my famil y

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

. I so adore her. Thank you (and Vernon) for the support and love.

And, my mentor - the Secretary! If you are lucky, a person enters your life, sees in you a glimmer of possibility and dramatically changes your future trajectory. Then,
they consistently guide you to strive for the best you can be
, providing innumerable opportunities. I can never completely express my gratitude to you for encouraging me and for fulfilling so many dreams! Thank you!

And to several special men, (
H old on a bit more
, it has been awhile since this former Chief gave a toast!
) you are the light of my life. Dad, you introduced me to the cultures of others around the world, creating in me a passion that led to an exciting career

. My baby brother, Frank, you are always so supportive during good and hard times. Rob, the love of my life, who has a "heart" so huge, patience so long, and loves judgment free - Happy Anniversary Darling! Cole, my one great blessing who everyday surprises me with his kindness, curiosity and humor
.

As a special birthday request, I ask you to please keep in your thoughts and prayers an extraordinary woman, Rayda Nadal, who worked in the front office of Protocol. She made each day feel like a burst of sunshine and has served her country with honor as a Foreign Service officer. She is hospitalized after sustaining injuries in her Moscow apartment. We await her healthy return.

M any know, I love celebrating birthdays...especially my own!
(
Do not fret Lee - I am not changing my mind!
)

But on THIS wonderful day

- THIS
f abulous year - I want to celebrate YOU! Because without you - this dramatic, often nutty gal - could not be who she is today!

Here's to Raising the Bar!

With love and gratitude -
Capricia

* This message is not intended to be face booked, tweeted, instagrammed or whatever else - just enjoyed - or deleted.

For all of you editors – please ignore the awful grammar and horrific punctuation – it sounds better when spoken.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To:	CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date:	10/17/2014 7:59:54 AM
Subject:	10.17.14 CTR Weekend TPs
Attachments:	FINAL 10.17.14 Weekend Package.docx

Hi all,

Please find Correct The Record's weekend talking points package both below and attached. Have a good one! Enjoy the weather!

10.17.14 Weekend Package

1. Harkin Steak Fry Travel Expenses TPs
2. ICYMI: CTR Response to MSNBC re: Travel Expenses
3. 11 Things to Know About Hillary

TALKING POINTS: HARKIN STEAK FRY TRAVEL EXPENSES

BACKGROUND: The right wing launched another desperate attack, this time about the Clintons' travel expenses to the Harkin Steak Fry in Iowa last month. They forgot to mention that this year's event was a huge success, reportedly netting $100,000 and with the most attendees since the last time Hillary Clinton was there.

TALKING POINTS:

Hillary and Bill Clinton attended the 37th Harkin Steak Fry to honor retiring 5-term Senator Tom Harkin and celebrate his legacy.

This year's event was enormously successful – reportedly netting $100,000 – due to the Clintons' attendance.

In fact, the 2014 Steak Fry had 6,200 people – the most attendees since the last time Hillary Clinton appeared in 2007.

The Harkin Steak Fry raises money for Democratic candidates running in Iowa – including Representative Bruce Braley, who is running for Harkin's seat in the Senate against tea party-backed Joni Ernst – to help move the state, and our country, in the right direction.

Hillary and Bill Clinton are appearing across the country at events for Democratic candidates to energize the party and help get Democrats elected this November.

Republicans are only launching these baseless attacks on the Clintons to divert attention from their abuse of taxpayer funds for excessive travel.

- After all, Republican Governor and potential GOP presidential candidate, Chris Christie, has frequently used state police helicopters for his own personal travel, including the time he used a state police helicopter to get to a baseball game.

- Marco Rubio, another potential Republican presidential contender, charged non-work travel expenses on the state party's credit card and double-billed taxpayers and the state party for multiple plane tickets.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

ICYMI: CTR Response to MSNBC re: Travel Expenses

"The Harkin Streak Fry reportedly netted $100,000 and was enormously successful due to the Clintons' attendance. This right-wing attack is ironic coming from the Party where one potential presidential candidate used a state police helicopter to get to a baseball game while another double-billed taxpayers and the state party for multiple plane tickets," said Correct the Record's Adrienne Elrod, referring to New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie and Florida Sen. Marco Rubio .

ELEVEN THINGS YOU SHOULD KNOW ABOUT HILLARY

Secretary Clinton helped restore America's leadership and standing in the world during a time of global challenges and changes. Secretary Clinton worked tirelessly to revitalize American diplomacy and strengthen alliances by traveling nearly a million miles for hundreds of meetings with foreign leaders in 112 countries. As America's lead diplomat, Secretary Clinton understood the importance of engaging the public and took diplomacy directly to people around the world. Just as she was as a senator, Secretary Clinton was a workhorse, often taking on difficult challenges and addressing them directly around the world.

Secretary Clinton built and maintained a coalition to enact the toughest sanctions in Iran's history. Secretary Clinton helped impose the toughest sanctions in Iran's history by getting Russia and China on board. Even the Wall Street Journal editorial board noted that, "Clinton surely pulled out every stop to get Russia and particularly China…on board." And as Howard Dean recently told CNN , "Hillary Clinton cranked up the sanctions for the first time under President Obama that actually made the Iranians come to the table."

Secretary Clinton played an integral role in the New START Treaty with Russia. Secretary Clinton played an active role in reaching a missile reduction agreement with Russia, working to push it through the Senate and securing more than the necessary two-thirds majority. She entered the treaty into force in Munich with her Russian counterpart. As a result of the treaty's passage, there will be fewer nuclear missile launchers . Simply put, the world is safer.

Secretary Clinton supported the raid that brought Osama bin Laden to justice. As NBC's Brian Williams reported on his website, "Secretary of Defense Robert Gates recommended an air strike with no forces on the ground. CIA Director Panetta supported a raid by Special Forces and so did Secretary of State Clinton."

Secretary Clinton helped avert all-out war in Gaza by negotiating a cease-fire between Israelis and Palestinians. In November 2012, after eight days of violence, Secretary Clinton negotiated a Gaza cease-fire with Egyptian president Mohamed Morsi. In an article titled "Hillary Clinton scores Gaza cease fire success," Politico noted that, "Secretary of State Hillary Clinton got a Gaza cease-fire right at the moment hope seemed dead for a rapid end to the violence…"

Secretary Clinton played a role in bringing one war to an end and planning for the end of another. Working closely with Department of Defense colleagues and as part of the President's national security team, Secretary Clinton played a role in the end of war in Iraq and in beginning a transition in Afghanistan, with all NATO allies having agreed to stand-up a post withdrawal support plan. As President Obama told 60 Minutes , it was "all a consequence of the great work that Hillary did and her team did and the State Department did in conjunction with our national security team."

Secretary Clinton was critical in America's "pivot to Asia" strategy. As Martin Indyk of the Brookings Institute wrote in Foreign Policy, "The 'pivot' to East Asia will probably be Obama's most lasting strategic achievement… [but] it is Clinton's too. She laid the groundwork, built the relationships, and developed the complex architecture of the new strategy — and she turned up at that pivotal moment in Vietnam in July 2010 to declare the U.S. commitment to the region." Secretary Clinton earned praise for her work in opening up Burma, a place that had not been visited by a Secretary of State in 50 years.

Secretary Clinton worked to build the coalition to oust Qadhafi and stop massacres in Libya. As the Washington Post reported upon the end of NATO operations in Libya, "U.S. officials and key allies are offering a detailed new defense of the approach and Clinton's pivotal role – both within a divided Cabinet and a fragile, assembled-on-the-fly international alliance. What emerges from these accounts is a picture of Clinton using her mixture of political pragmatism and tenacity to referee spats among NATO partners, secure crucial backing from Arab countries and tutor rebels on the fine points of message management."

Secretary Clinton engaged in economic statecraft. Secretary Clinton's focus on economic engagement resulted in increased investment through three new free trade agreements (Colombia ,Panama and South Korea) and 15

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Open Skies agreements including with Japan, Brazil, Saudi Arabia and Israel.

Secretary Clinton brought the State Department into the 21st Century. Secretary Clinton helped the State Department adapt to emerging issues such as cyber security by creating the Center for Strategic Counterterrorism Communications to combat Al-Qaeda's growing influence online. She recognized the important role of energy in U.S. foreign policy and helped create the Bureau of Energy Resources to protect our energy infrastructure and influence how nations move to cleaner fuel.

Secretary Clinton elevated the cause of women's rights to new heights. Secretary Clinton recognized women's rights as a major foreign policy issue. It is, according to Newsweek, the area of "hardships faced by women and girls across the world–that her impact has been most profound." Hillary convinced the White House to allow her to create a new position at the State Department: Ambassador-at-Large for Global Women's Issues. Newsweek continued, "Across the world, in diverse and deeply reactionary cultures, Clinton and [Ambassador-at-Large] Verveer have spoken and fought to liberalize attitudes on women's role in the economy, girls' schooling, women's health, domestic violence, issues arising from war and conflict, and myriad other concerns."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
To:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
Date:	6/6/2015 3:01:07 AM
Subject:	H4A News Clips 6.6.15
Attachments:	6.06.2015 H4A Clips.docx

H4A News Clips

June 6, 2015

TODAY'S KEY STORIES..... 4

Hillary Clinton, Voting Rights and the 2016 Election // NYT // Editorial Board – June 5, 2015..... 4

Is Hillary Clinton becoming the candidate of big ideas? // WaPo // Paul Waldman – June 5 2015... 6

Hillary Clinton to Las Vegas Latino community: You can count on me // Politico // Adam Lerner – June 5, 2015 7

SOCIAL MEDIA..... 8

Elise Gould (6/5/2015, 10:20 am) - Jobs moving in the right direction, but the recovery is far from over (see colorful chart, thanks to @alyssaly nn7)..... 8

Tim Hogan (6/5/2015, 12:33 pm) - Pick up a copy of @elmundolv today and check out @HillaryClinton's op-ed on #immigrationreform! #Hillary2016..... 8

Frank Thorp V (6/5/2015, 2:49 pm) - The House #Benghazi Cmte will depose @HillaryClinton ally Sidney Blumenthal behind closed doors on June 16th at 10am..... 8

Alex Leary (6/5/2015, 3:36 pm) - .@JebBush in a new race for cash: http://bit.ly/1JsdQEo..... .. 8

Alex Hanson (6/5/2015, 5:35 pm) – .@BernieSanders returning to Iowa next week. Fri. June 12 in DSM; Sat in Marshalltown, CR; Sun in Waterloo, IA Falls & Indianola. #IAcaucus..... 8

Gabriel Debenedetti (6/5/2015, 5:28 pm) - Martin O'Malley will sit for an interview with @MariaESalinas on Univision on Sunday , shortly after Hillary penned a Spanish op-ed in Vegas..... 8

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 8

Clinton accuses GOP rivals of making it difficult to vote // AP – June 5, 2015..... 8

Why Voting Rights Reforms Aren't a Silver Bullet for Hillary Clinton // WSJ // Linda Killian – June 6, 2015 10

Democrats fret over recent Hillary Clinton polling // Politico //Katie Glueck – June 5 , 2015..... 11

De Blasio ally to hold Clinton fundraiser // Politico // Annie Karni – June 5, 2015..... 13

House Sets Date for Grilling of Hillary Clinton Aide // Bloomberg // Billy House – June 5 , 2015.... 14

Hillary Clinton's Grand Strategy to Beat the GOP: Take Bold Positions Early and Often // The New Republic // Brian Beutler – June 5, 2015..... 14

Hillary Clinton Hits the GOP on Voter Suppression // Slate // Jamelle Bouie – June 5, 2015 16

Clintons to attend Beau Biden's funeral // The Hill // Ben Kamisar – June 5, 2015..... 18

Hillary Clinton Wants To Make It Easy For You To Vote // Refinery 29 // Meredith Clark – June 5, 2015 19

Another Controversy Over Hillary Clinton's Time at the State Department // The Blaze // Fred Lucas – June 5, 2015 20

Hillary Clinton's Top Twitter Fan // The National Journal // Emily Schultheis – June 5 , 2015..... 21

Longtime Clinton Insider Says Hillary Hasn't Given 'Convincing Explanation' For Email, Donation Scandals // The Daily Caller // Chuck Ross – June 5, 2015..... 22

Commentary: Hillary Clinton's Bold Move on Voting Rights // BET // Keith Boykin – June 5, 2015 23

Hillary Clinton Calls the Republican Bluff on Voting Rights // NY Mag // Jonathan Chait – June 5, 2015 25

Hillary Clinton's Campaign Goes Even Gayer // OUT Magazine // James McDonald – June 5, 2015 27

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary goes ugly early with racism claims // Fox News // Chris Stirewalt – June 5, 2015..... 27

House Benghazi committee calls Clinton friend to testify // McClatchy // Anita Kumar – June 5, 2015 28

Sale of Michigan company to China may haunt Clinton // Detroit Free Press // Todd Spangler – June 5, 2015..... 28

On Hillary Clinton's income inequality plan, de Blasio pauses -- and GOPers pounce // NY Daily News // Celeste Katz – June 5, 2015..... 31

Clinton calls for universal, automatic voter registration; GOP not happy // Daily Kos // Kerry Eleveld – June 5, 2015..... 32

Meet the 30-year-old woman running Hillary Clinton's field operations // Fortune // Nina Easton – June 5, 2015..... 33

Hillary Clinton rakes in $200K in Greenwich // CT Post // Neil Vigdor – June 5, 2015..... 35

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 35

O'MALLEY..... 35

O'Malley's efforts on immigration reflect complex political realities // WaPo // John Wagner & Arelis Hernandez – June 5, 2015..... 35

SANDERS..... 38

Sanders wants privacy panel in defense bill // The Hill // Jordain Carney – June 5, 2015..... 38

Hawking shirts, buttons, Sanders opens shop // Burlington Free Press // Adam Silverman – June 5, 2015 39

How Bernie Sanders Will Change Your Mind About The Label 'Socialist' // The Elite Daily // Lani Seelinger – June 5, 2015..... 40

CHAFEE..... 42

Lincoln Chafee May Be Hillary 's Biggest Problem // The Atlantic // Peter Beinart – June 4, 2015 . 42

WEBB..... 44

Former U.S. Senator Jim Webb (D-VA) has a seven-point plan to save American foreign policy . // The National Interest Evan Gottesman – June 5, 2015..... 44

OTHER..... 46

Bankroller of Democratic Voting Rights Cases? George Soros // NYT // Maggie Haberman – June 5, 2015 46

The voting conversation has shifted. That's good news for Dems. //MSNBC // Zachary Roth – June 5, 2015 48

Things are looking up for President Obama // VOX // Jonathan Allen – June 5, 2015..... 49

Pataki, Chafee, and O'Malley: No Chance In Hell // Town Hall // Matt Vespa – June 5, 2015..... 52

In two minds // The Economist – June 5, 2015..... 56

Iowans Always Complain The Caucuses Are Getting Less Important. This Time They Have a Point. // Slate // Josh Voorhees – June 5, 2015..... 58

GOP..... 59

BUSH..... 59

Jeb readies for upcoming road trips // Politico // Eli Stokols – June 5, 2015..... 59

Memo to Jeb Bush: Avoid foreign quagmires // CNN // Stephen Collinson – June 5, 2015..... 60

Jeb Bush's struggle with conservatives // MSNBC // Chuck Todd & Mark Murray – June 5, 2015... 61

Jeb Bush Facing Crucial Two-Week Stretch // Bloomberg News // Michael Bender – June 5, 2015 61

RUBIO..... 64

Rubios on the Road Have Drawn Unwanted Attention // NYT // Alan Rappeport & Steve Eder – June 5, 2015..... 64

Marco Rubio's Iraq quagmire deepens: This is what a foreign policy wonk looks like? // Salon // Simon Maloy – June 5, 2015..... 66

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ted Cruz Labels Walker, Rubio And Jeb As 'Moderate' // The Daily Caller // Alex Pappas – June 5, 2015 67

Same-sex marriage advocates pose 'real and present danger' to Christianity, Sen. Marco Rubio warns // Christian Today // Marvie Basilan – June 5, 2015..... 68

PAUL..... 69

Rand Paul: "We Shouldn't Do Things to Prevent People from Voting" // Bloomberg News // David Wiegel – June 5, 2015 69

WALKER..... 70

Is Gov. Scott Walker putting the Univ ersity of Wisconsin system in jeopardy? // WaPo // Valerie Strauss – June 5, 2015 70

Walker would sign budget with no borrowing for roads // AP // Scott Bauer – June 5, 2015..... 72

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker fires up NC GOP //The News & Observer //Taylor Knopf – June 5, 2015 73

CRUZ..... 75

Ted Cruz Wonders About Jeb Bush's Viability // NYT // Maggie Haberman & Kitty Bennett – June 5, 2015 76

Ted Cruz's problems with Latinos run deeper than his policy positions // Reuters – June 5, 2015. 76

Ted Cruz: Campaign and super PAC have raised more than $40 million // The Washington Times // David Sherfinski – June 5, 2015..... 79

CHRISTIE..... 80

Chris Christie: Hillary Clinton is clueless on voter fraud // CBS News // Jake Miller – June 5, 2015 80

Gov. Christie attacks Hillary Clinton on voter registration // The Record // Salvador Rizzo – June 5, 2015 81

Chris Christie rips Rand Paul, critics of Patriot Act // The Boston Herald // Chris Cassidy – June 5, 2015 81

PERRY..... 82

Rick Perry promises to 'do something' about student debt. But what did he do in Texas? // WaPo // Danielle Douglas-Gabriel..... 82

Rick Perry Borrows Elizabeth Warren's Message, but Does It Fit? // Bloomberg News // David Weigel – June 5, 2015 84

Rick Perry hits back at Hillary Clinton over voter ID // The Washington Times // David Sherfinski – June 5 , 2015 86

Perry Kickoff Generates Buzz, But Not in Key States // Real Clear Politics // Matthew Disler – June 5, 2015 86

Welcome Back, Rick Perry: Will 2016 Be Different Than 2012? // Forbes // Neil Assur – June 5, 2015 87

GRAHAM..... 89

Ronald Perelman Puts Financial Clout Behind Lindsey Graham // NYT // Maggie Haberman – June 5 , 2015 89

Lindsey Graham Offers Straight Talk With a Southern Twang // TIME // Phillip Elliott – June 5 , 2015 90

Why Lindsey Graham matters // The Economist – June 6, 2015..... 91

Iowans question Graham's gun rights history // The Des Moines Register // Linh Ta – June 5 , 2015 93

Presidential candidate compares Hillary to Kim Jong Un // NY Post // Marisa Schultz – June 4, 2015 94

HUCKABEE..... 94

Huckabee: Hack exposes Obama's weakness on China // The Hill // Cory Bennett – June 5, 2015 94

Duggars' Endorsements Go Missing From Mike Huckabee's Website // ABC News // Ben Gittleson – June 5 , 2015 95

KASICH..... 96

John Kasich blasts Clinton on voting 'demagoguery': 'Come on, Hillary, y ou know better than that' // The Washington Times // David Sherfinski – June 5, 2015 96

Kasich Sees Presidential Pathway After Jeb Bush Doesn't Dominate // Bloomberg News // Mark Niquette – June 5, 2015 97

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CARSON..... 99

Ben Carson's Speaking Career Turned Lucrative Fast, Filing Shows // NYT // Trip Gabriel – June 5, 2015 99

Ben Carson's campaign faces turmoil after staff exits and super PAC chaos // WaPo // Robert Costa & Philip Rucker – June 5, 2015..... 100

JINDAL..... 102

Jindal Slams GOP-Led Congress For Waving 'White Flag Of Surrender' On Amnesty, Broken Promises // The Daily Caller // Al Weaver – June 5, 2015..... 102

Bobby Jindal Keeps Heat on '16 Hopefuls - Lincoln Chafee This Time // Newsweek // Melissa Cly ne - June 5, 2015 103

OTHER..... 104

Republican Candidates Assail Hillary Clinton on Voting Rights // NYT // Maggie Haberman – June 5 , 2015 104

GOP says Clinton dividing Americans over voting rights // AP // Ken Thomas – June 5, 2015..... 105

Going Negative // US News // Kenneth Walsh – June 5, 2015..... 107

TOP NEWS..... 108

DOMESTIC..... 109

U.S. Economy Added 280,000 Jobs in May ; Unemployment Rate 5.5% // NYT // Patricia Cohen –June 5, 2015 109

Pressure Rises for Higher Taxes // NYT // John Harwood – June 5, 2015 110

Senate Rejects Extending Veterans Benefits To Married Gay Couples And Their Kids // HuffPo // Jennifer Bendery – June 4, 2015..... 112

INTERNATIONAL..... 113

U.S. Was Warned of System Open to Cyberattacks // NYT // David e. Sanger, Julie Hirschfeld Davis & Nicole Perlroth – June 5, 2015..... 113

U.S. Airstrikes Whack One Thousand Islamic State Fighters a Month, Air Force General Says // Foreign Policy // Paul MCleary – June 5, 2015..... 116

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS..... 117

Jeb Bush and the campaign money fountain // CNN // Errol Louis – June 5, 2015 117

Clinton goes bold on voting rights // MSNBC // Steve Benen – June 5, 2015..... 119

Hillary Sides With Democracy // Bloomberg News // Jonathan Bernstein – June 5, 2015..... 121

Why Hillary Clinton Must Back a LGBT Full Civil Rights Law for Her Own Sake // HuffPo // Michelangelo Signorile – June 5, 2015..... 122

Republicans' revisionist history on Iraq // The Hill // Diana Ohlbaum – June 5 , 2015..... 124

Hillary Clinton's call for easier voting is self-serving, but so what? // LA Times // Michael Mcgough – June 5, 2015 125

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

Hillary Clinton, Voting Rights and the 2016 Election // NYT // Editorial Board – June 5, 2015

A basic fact often gets lost in the propaganda that swirls around voting laws in this country: between one-quarter and one-third of all eligible voters — more than 50 million Americans — are not registered.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That alarming statistic is the backdrop to efforts by Republicans in recent years to pass state laws that restrict ballot access, a recent Democratic campaign to push back against those laws, and a bold set of proposals that Hillary Rodham Clinton laid out Thursday afternoon in a speech at Texas Southern University, a historically black college in Houston.

In addition to pushing needed and long-overdue reforms, the speech highlighted the yawning gulf on voting rights between Mrs. Clinton and the Republican candidates for the White House, many of whom have been cynically committed to making voting harder for the most vulnerable citizens. “What part of democracy are they afraid of?” Mrs. Clinton asked.

Most significantly, Mrs. Clinton called for universal and automatic voter registration, which would register every American citizen at 18. This would be a transformative step toward modernizing the nation’s archaic, error-filled approach to registering voters.

No state currently has such inclusive registration, although Oregon came closest in March when it passed a law automatically registering eligible citizens with a driver’s license — instantly adding 300,000 voters to the rolls. Since then, 14 states have considered similar proposals to put the burden of registration on the government, where it belongs, and not on individuals.

Mrs. Clinton also called for at least 20 days of early voting nationwide, including evenings and weekends. This is a proven way of reducing long lines on Election Day and making voting possible for people whose work or other commitments prevent them from getting to the polls during regular business hours. More than one-third of all votes in the 2012 election were cast early — and yet 14 states still do not offer it, and crucial swing states like Ohio and Florida have actually cut it back.

Finally, Mrs. Clinton pushed to repeal punitive state laws that ban people with criminal records from voting, sometimes for life — a population that approaches six million nationwide.

These are hardly new issues for the country, and the Republican Party as it now is constituted in Congress is not going to enact the laws to expand voter registration. Still, it is very encouraging to see Mrs. Clinton championing this central democratic principle so early in the campaign. President Obama said very little on voting rights until deep into his second term, even after the Supreme Court gutted the Voting Rights Act in 2013, freeing up Republican-dominated state governments to enact dozens of new voting restrictions that previously would have been blocked by federal law.

Voter ID laws have been a particular favorite, even though their backers know full well that impersonation fraud is essentially nonexistent. In her speech Mrs. Clinton rebuked Republican presidential contenders who have signed such laws — including Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin and Rick Perry, former governor of Texas. She called on Republicans “at all levels of government, with all manner of ambition, to stop fear-mongering about a phantom epidemic of election fraud.”

Making voting easier for all eligible voters should be the epitome of a nonpartisan issue. Unfortunately, stopping people from voting has become a key part of the modern Republican playbook.

The 2016 election will be about many important issues, from income inequality to immigration to health care to education, but at its core it will be a test of two ideas of what it means to be a democracy. One is currently embodied by what Mrs. Clinton called “a sweeping effort to disempower and disenfranchise people of color, poor people and young people from one end of our country to the other.”

The other, as Mrs. Clinton put it, is that, “We should do everything we can to make it easier for every citizen to vote.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Is Hillary Clinton becoming the candidate of big ideas? // WaPo // Paul Waldman – June 5 2015

Hillary Clinton has long been known as a cautious politician who leaned more toward methodical plodding than grand gestures. She launched her 2000 campaign for the Senate with a purposely low-key "listening tour." As a senator, she cultivated a reputation as a workhorse who eschewed high-profile media appearances for the mundane work of writing legislation. Throughout, she staked out a place as a familiar kind of Democrat — a little more liberal on social issues, a little more conservative on foreign policy and national security — but nobody's idea of an ideologically transformative figure.

But now that she's making her second run for the White House, is Hillary Clinton becoming the Candidate of Big Ideas?

It's starting to look that way. When yesterday she proposed national automatic voter registration — registering all Americans to vote when they turn 18 unless they opt out — it surprised everyone. While universal registration isn't an idea no one had thought of before, Clinton took a Democratic priority (expanding voting rights and boosting turnout) and advanced it with an ambitious, national plan that went beyond what most prominent Democrats had advocated before.

We saw something similar on immigration, where Clinton didn't just support the Obama administration's position on immigration but went beyond it,proposing that the parents of "DREAMers" be allowed to stay in the country legally. She also called for an end to the "era of mass incarceration," an era her husband had no small part in creating. She has signaled an intention to go bold in the area of campaign finance, floating the idea of a Constitutional amendment to get so-called "dark money" out of politics (though she has not gone so far as to make formal proposal).

This kind of thing is surprising coming from Clinton, given that she's the likely nominee of the incumbent party. Usually, a candidate in that position will propose a program that sounds like, "Let's continue what we've been doing, but a little better." Generally it's the opposition party, which has had eight years to contemplate everything they dislike about current government policy, that's more prone to come up with dramatic ideas for change. Not only that, the candidate pushing Big Ideas is often one struggling in the polls who is looking for a way to distinguish himself from the pack. You might expect some dramatic policy proposals from some of the lower-tiered Republican candidates.

Clinton, on the other hand, could easily ride to the Democratic nomination without putting out a single policy paper. But for now she's taking a very different course. As a media strategy, it's very effective: the less-than-threatening nature of her primary opposition gives her the freedom to put out big ideas and get attention for them; after a temporary drought of campaign activity, she can get plenty of coverage for a speech that includes a significant policy proposal.

To be sure, we shouldn't exaggerate the extent to which the Clinton campaign is focused on big ideas. We're only talking about a few so far, and there are other topics like the Trans-Pacific Partnership on which she's been vague. Part of the explanation for Clinton's previous cautious approach lies in the failure of Bill Clinton's health care overhaul, which she ran during the early days of his presidency — and which would have been a much more radical change than the Affordable Care Act. Supposedly, the lesson she learned from that experience was that people fear change, and when you propose something too sweeping it's difficult to succeed and easy to get burned.

But it's starting to look as if Clinton has decided that being the candidate of big ideas might be a pretty good plan. Particularly when the ideas themselves are likely to be popular.

Hillary Clinton to Las Vegas Latino community: You can count on me // Politico // Adam Lerner – June 5, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton published an op-ed Friday in a small Las Vegas-based Spanish-language newspaper about immigration, reassuring the Spanish-speaking Hispanic community in Nevada that they "can count on [her]."

Beginning with the stories of three young immigrants she met in North Las Vegas, one who started a business, one who wants to become a doctor, and one who wants to go to law school, Hillary articulated her support for comprehensive immigration reform and attacked unnamed Republican candidates for their stances.

"As a mother, grandmother, and American, I don't know how a person can meet these young people that have contributed so much to their communities and represent so much potential for the future, and think of threatening them and their families with deportation," Clinton wrote. "And still that is precisely what almost every Republican candidate would do."

The article goes on to boast of Clinton's senate record on immigration and to express support for a pathway to citizenship for undocumented immigrants as well as deferred action for the families of so-called dreamers.

"Don't deceive yourselves: when they speak of 'legal status,' it's a code for 'second class status'," Clinton wrote of Republican immigration proposals that do not provide a pathway to citizenship.

Though the former secretary of state doesn't speak Spanish, the article begins by saying that it was written by Hillary R. Clinton and translated by her campaign team. "It's the first article of its type written by the ex-secretary of state," the preamble reads.

"I will continue fighting for immigration reform," Clinton said in the headline.

The article was published Friday in El Mundo Las Vegas, a local Spanish-language paper that has not yet posted it online. According to the paper's Twitter, it has existed in the area for 35 years and reported on Hillary Clinton's visit to Rancho High School in Las Vegas on May 5.

SOCIAL MEDIA

Elise Gould (6/5/2015, 10:20 am) - Jobs moving in the right direction, but the recovery is far from over (see colorful chart, thanks to @alyssalynn7)

Tim Hogan (6/5/2015, 12:33 pm) - Pick up a copy of @elmundolv today and check out @HillaryClinton's op-ed on #immigrationreform! #Hillary2016

Frank Thorp V (6/5/2015, 2:49 pm) - The House #Benghazi Cmte will depose @HillaryClinton ally Sidney Blumenthal behind closed doors on June 16th at 10am

Alex Leary (6/5/2015, 3:36 pm) - .@JebBush in a new race for cash: http://bit.ly/1JsdQEo

Alex Hanson (6/5/2015, 5:35 pm) – .@BernieSanders returning to Iowa next week. Fri. June 12 in DSM; Sat in Marshalltown, CR; Sun in Waterloo, IA Falls & Indianola. #IAcaucus

Gabriel Debenedetti (6/5/2015, 5:28 pm) - Martin O'Malley will sit for an interview with @MariaESalinas on Univision on Sunday, shortly after Hillary penned a Spanish op-ed in Vegas.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE

Clinton accuses GOP rivals of making it difficult to vote // AP – June 5, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton accused potential Republican presidential rivals such as Jeb Bush of Florida and Scott Walker of Wisconsin on Thursday of trying to make it more difficult for millions of Americans to vote, laying down an early marker on voting rights in her Democratic presidential campaign.

Clinton, in one of her most partisan speeches as a presidential candidate, directly criticized Walker, Bush and two other Republican presidential hopefuls, New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie and former Texas Gov. Rick Perry.

She described those current or former governors as members of a GOP vanguard that has made it more difficult for students to vote, cut the numbers of days set aside for early voting and demanded voter ID provisions.

"Today Republicans are systematically and deliberately trying to stop millions of American citizens from voting," Clinton said at historically black Texas Southern University. "What part of democracy are they afraid of? I believe every citizen has the right to vote and I believe we should do everything we can to make it easier for every citizen to vote."

The issue is closely watched by black voters, who supported President Barack Obama by sweeping margins in 2008 and 2012 and will be an important constituency for Clinton to mobilize in next year's election. She received an award named after Barbara Jordan, the late Texas congresswoman and civil rights leader, and the event came a little more than a week before Clinton is scheduled to deliver a major speech in New York that aides are billing as a formal campaign kickoff.

Directly challenging Republicans by name, which Clinton has largely avoided, she plunged into a partisan debate over voting rights that has roiled statehouses across the country. Democrats contend restricting voter access and registration purposely aims to suppress turnout among minority and low-income voters. Republicans say the voting changes are crucial to guard against voter fraud.

Under Walker, for example, Wisconsin requires proof of residency except for overseas and military voters. The state shortened the early voting period and increased residency requirements.

In a statement, Walker responded to the criticism leveled by the Democratic candidate: "Hillary Clinton's rejection of efforts to make it easier to vote and harder to cheat not only defies logic, but the will of the majority of Americans. Once again, Hillary Clinton's extreme views are far outside the mainstream."

Clinton said that in New Jersey, Christie had vetoed a bill to extend early voting. She said as Florida's governor, Bush had conducted a "deeply flawed" purge of eligible voters, by having the names of people who were mistakenly thought to be felons removed from voting rolls.

Perry, who announced his presidential campaign earlier Thursday, approved laws in Texas that discriminated against minority voters, Clinton said.

Republicans, Clinton said, should "stop fear-mongering about a phantom epidemic of election fraud and start explaining why they're so scared of letting citizens have their say."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton said the US should take dramatic steps to expand the right to vote, with universal, automatic voter registration for young people, and a new national standard of no fewer than 20 days of early, in-person voting, including weekend and evening voting.

In the home state of President Lyndon Johnson, architect of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, Clinton said the Supreme Court ruling had "eviscerated" the law, making it more likely that minority voters, the elderly and others would face consequences.

Democrats have signaled plans for a large-scale legal fight against new voter ID laws and efforts to curtail voting access. Party attorneys recently filed legal challenges to voting changes made by GOP lawmakers in the presidential battleground states of Ohio and Wisconsin.

One of the attorneys involved in the lawsuits is Marc Elias, a top elections lawyer for Democrats who is also serving as the Clinton campaign's general counsel. The campaign is not officially involved in the lawsuits.

Why Voting Rights Reforms Aren't a Silver Bullet for Hillary Clinton // WSJ // Linda Killian – June 6, 2015

In her speech Thursday on voting rights, Hillary Clinton suggested automatically registering all citizens to vote when they turn 18 as well as expanding early voting and online registration. Measures by Republican-controlled state legislatures to tighten voter ID laws and limit early and weekend voting hurt minority, poor, and young voters the most, she said.

As many have noted, the support of those groups is seen as crucial for Mrs. Clinton to win the White House. But the struggle between Republicans and Democrats over voting administration isn't at the core of what's causing voters to disengage from the political process. There are benefits to making it easier for people to register, but it would take a lot more to energize potential voters who have been sitting out.

A recent New York Times-CBS News poll found that Democrats, Republicans, and independents say, by overwhelming margins, that the wealthy have more influence on elections than most Americans. Eighty-four percent said they believe money has too much influence on political campaigns, and 85% said this country's system for funding campaigns needs fundamental changes or to be completely rebuilt.

Seventy-seven percent of respondents favored limiting the amount individuals can contribute to political campaigns. About the same share (78%) said that spending by outside groups should be limited.

Fifty-four percent said they do not believe that money given to campaigns equals free speech, as the Supreme Court ruled in the 2010 Citizens United case that cleared the way for unlimited political spending.

Who Isn't Running for President -- and Why It Matters

Another Look at That IMF Paper on Debt--and What It Means for the U.S.

The pervasive belief that money controls the political system and the outcome of decisions by lawmakers is almost certainly linked to widespread sentiments, reported by the Times, that the U.S. economic system in inherently unfair.

Republicans and Democrats believe that income inequality is a problem and that the power and voices of the wealthy are drowning out those of most other Americans and that, as a result, government policies skew toward helping the rich get richer at the expense of most Americans.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

These feelings that the political and economic systems are rigged and that our political leaders aren't paying attention to the concerns of most Americans are at the heart of why voter turnout last year was the lowest in a mid-term election since 1942.

These are issues that Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders (D.) has made a focal point of his campaign–and they are unlikely to go away.

News accounts of the millions of dollars that Mrs. Clinton and her husband have earned giving speeches and about the access to the Clintons accorded to wealthy donors to their foundation reinforce the idea that Mrs. Clinton is part of a ruling elite that is out of touch with the problems of most Americans. This is the biggest challenge for her campaign.

Reforms to voting laws are important. But no matter how much easier it is for people to vote, if they don't think their vote matters voter participation won't increase.

Democrats fret over recent Hillary Clinton polling // Politico //Katie Glueck – June 5, 2015

Early-state Democrats are evenly divided over whether Hillary Clinton's campaign should be worried about recent polls showing her highest unfavorability ratings in years.

Exactly 50 percent say there's cause for concern while the other 50 percent saw no reason for alarm.

That's the assessment of this week's survey of the POLITICO Caucus — a bipartisan group of influential activists, operatives and elected officials in Iowa and New Hampshire.

"Twenty-plus Republicans beating her up, Elizabeth Warren talking about the working man issues that terrify her, a couple of candidates like Bernie [Sanders] and Martin [O'Malley] to fill in her policy blanks and a media that feels stiffed by her lack of access, so all we can focus on is emails and the notorious Clinton Foundation and newly acquired wealth that suggests, at a minimum, the appearance of impropriety," one Granite State Democrat said, offering an explanation for her sinking favorability. "Frankly if Hillary could step back at look at herself she would rate herself unfavorably as well."

That remark comes during a week in which two major national polls delivered troubling results, including a CNN/ORC poll released Tuesday that showed Clinton with her highest unfavorability ratings of the past 14 years. A separate poll released Tuesday by The Washington Post and ABC News found that Clinton's favorability was just 45 percent — her lowest in that survey since April 2008, when she was in the middle of a nomination battle with Barack Obama.

Caucus participants largely chalked those numbers up to a spate of unflattering stories about donations made to the Clinton Foundation, as well as scrutiny of Clinton's email practices when she was at the State Department. Some blamed the media — the "drumbeat" of negative headlines was a common explanation for her slide in popularity.

But others argued that she should engage more with the press about those subjects.

"She is not proactively addressing the issues of concern to Americans," said an Iowa Democrat who, like everyone in the POLITICO Caucus, was granted anonymity in order to speak freely. "Her refusal to take questions is taking a toll. These polls indicate that she needs to take a more proactive role. Not that she needs to be completely responsive to the media, but she can't ignore them."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Emails, Clinton Foundation, etc,” one New Hampshire Democrat responded. “She is taking the initial barrage from the punditocracy trying to frame the narrative of the race — which is largely about process and character, not very much about issues — and because she is not taking the bait she’s in a little bit of a roper-doper strategy right now. I think she needs to go on offense.”

But many Democrats also attributed falling poll numbers to the fact that she is now a partisan candidate for political office, rather than secretary of state, and noted that she still outpaces the Republican candidates in polls. And several who responded that the Clinton campaign should be concerned by those surveys said the information should be used only to make minor adjustments.

“Any candidate facing waves of partisan attacks for weeks on end sees the impact in their numbers, but the list of folks capable of sustaining this kind of a barrage and still looking this good is very small,” said a Granite Stater.

Another New Hampshire Democrat, who believes the Clinton campaign should be concerned about the polls, explained, “Hillary Clinton generates extremely strong passions, both positive and negative. She needs to be completely candid and transparent about the [Clinton] Foundation’s dealings and accomplishments and cannot engage in either spin or obfuscation. As long as she is straight, truthful and credible, she will be fine.”

Despite the rising negative ratings and polling suggesting high numbers of voters question her trustworthiness, three-quarters of early-state Democrats say Clinton is generating sufficient excitement about her presidential bid — especially among women.

“Regular people, particularly women of all age groups are beyond excited about this candidacy,” a New Hampshire Democrat said.

“Sufficient is the right choice of words,” said another New Hampshire Democrat. “Hillary is, and remains, solid in the eyes of Democrats.”

Some respondents, however, wondered whether there’s enough energy and enthusiasm for the long haul.

“There is almost “forced” excitement from establishment types trying to sell the Clinton brand as the perfect standard bearer for rank and file Democrats,” said one New Hampshire Democrat. “In New Hampshire, there does not appear to be a barrage of new Clinton supporters; rather, just the usual Clinton supporters.”

An Iowa Democrat cautioned, “Sufficient to win a primary yes, a general election right now — we aren’t there.”

On the Republican side, unsurprisingly, 94 percent of insiders said her campaign should be concerned by the polls, and 91 percent said they’re not seeing much enthusiasm about her candidacy. Several insiders likened Clinton to former Sen. Bob Dole, who won the 1996 GOP nomination but lost to Bill Clinton.

“Hillary Clinton is this cycle’s version of Bob Dole. It’s her turn but holy sh!” one Granite State Republican said.

De Blasio ally to hold Clinton fundraiser // Politico // Annie Karni – June 5, 2015

One of New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio’s most loyal and fiercest supporters is throwing a fundraiser for Hillary Clinton.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton will attend a fundraiser on June 29 in Manhattan hosted by public relations executive Ken Sunshine and his wife, Nancy Hollander. The couple is co-hosting the event with Janet and Marvin Rosen, the former finance chairman for the Democratic National Committee who in 1996 was at the center of a fundraising controversy for helping to arrange sleepovers in the Lincoln Bedroom for wealthy Bill Clinton donors.

Story Continued Below

Sunshine has also been a longtime friend of the Clintons, but his strongest political tie is to de Blasio, who worked under him when he served as chief of staff to former Mayor David Dinkins. The two have remained close ever since.

De Blasio served as Clinton's campaign manager when she ran for Senate, but so far has publicly refused to endorse her, instead using the 2016 election to position himself as a national leader on progressive issues. That has made some longtime supporters of both politicians, like Sunshine, feel awkwardly caught in the middle.

Sunshine, whose firm is Sunshine Sachs, hosted the first fundraiser de Blasio ever held, when he was running for a seat on the New York City Council after managing Clinton's Senate campaign. During the 2013 mayoral race, many of de Blasio's fundraising committee meetings were held in Sunshine's conference room, and as Mayor, de Blasio has on occasion continued to use Sunshine's office when he needs meeting space away from City Hall.

"I love Bill, and if I'm not the first, I'll be among the first to contribute to his reelection campaign," Sunshine said. "That doesn't meant I'm not going to be an early supporter and fundraiser for another friend, whose name happens to be Hillary Clinton. I assume Bill will eventually endorse her, but a lot of his friends like me are going to do it before him."

The Sunshine and Rosen fundraiser could end up being a star-studded affair. Some of Sunshine's longtime clients include Barbra Streisand, Jennifer Lopez, Ben Affleck, Jon Bon Jovi and Leonardo DiCaprio.

House Sets Date for Grilling of Hillary Clinton Aide // Bloomberg // Billy House – June 5, 2015

Sidney Blumenthal to answer questions behind closed doors

Long-time Hillary Clinton adviser Sidney Blumenthal is set to be interviewed on June 16 by the House committee investigating the 2012 attacks in Benghazi, Libya.

The House Select Committee on Benghazi, in announcing Blumenthal's appearance Friday, said his deposition will be conducted in a closed session without media coverage. The move is part of the panel's investigation of the Sept. 11, 2012 attacks on two U.S. compounds in Benghazi, Libya, that led to the death of four Americans, including U.S. Ambassador Christopher Stevens.

Blumenthal has become a focus of the House Select Committee on Benghazi since revelations he had been sending Clinton what she called "unsolicited" memos about Libya, where he was trying to arrange business deal, while she was secretary of state. Those memos included early suggestions that terrorists were responsible for Benghazi attacks. Blumenthal did not work for the State Department but from 2009 to 2013 was employed full-time by the Clinton Foundation, founded by Clinton's husband, former President Bill Clinton. After 2013, Blumenthal became a consultant.

His correspondence with the former secretary of state, who is now running for president, became public as a result of a batch of emails turned over to the committee after revelations that Clinton had been using a private email address and home server to conduct business while she worked for the government.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Congressional Republicans have been trying for more than two years to show that Clinton failed to bolster security before the Benghazi attack and should share blame for the administration's initial, erroneous account that the attacks were not related to terrorism. The Benghazi panel's chairman, Republican Trey Gowdy of South Carolina, has said he plans to issue a final report next year, just months before the presidential election.

Democrats have accused the House Republicans of stringing out its investigation of the Benghazi attacks to undercut Hillary Clinton's campaign.

Hillary Clinton's Grand Strategy to Beat the GOP: Take Bold Positions Early and Often // The New Republic / / Brian Beutler – June 5, 2015

or the better part of 20 years now, Bill Clinton's presidency has been almost synonymous with a hazy political concept called triangulation. Since his advisers made the term famous, it has been used to describe everything from standard-issue compromise to the willingness to confront reactionary elements in one's own party (thinkSister Souljah) to the appropriation of another party's ideas. The latter is as close to a proper definition as there is.

One big concern bedeviling progressives is that Hillary Clinton's candidacy will mark the return of triangulation—the preemptive ceding of ideological turf, at a time when, thanks to partisan polarization, such concessions amount to outright victories for the Republican Party. But the early days of Hillary Clinton's candidacy suggest these fears are overblown—that she is engaged in an entirely different kind of political positioning, one that carries the promise of significant progressive victories or at least of clarifying the terms of key policy debates dividing the parties.

The nature of the strategy involves staking out a variety of progressive issue positions that enjoy broad support, but it's not as straightforward as simply identifying the public sentiment and riding it to victory. The key is to embrace these ideas in a way that makes standard Republican counterspin completely unresponsive, and thus airs out the substantive core of their agenda: Rather than vie for conservative support by inching rightward, Clinton is instead reorienting liberal ideas in a way that makes the Republican agenda come into greater focus.

Most recently, Clinton has endorsed an aggressive position in support of expanded voting rights. "We have a responsibility to say clearly and directly what's really going on in our country," she said in her latest campaign speech Thursday, "because what is happening is a sweeping effort to disempower and disenfranchise people of color, poor people, and young people from one end of our country to the other."

This is standard Democratic boilerplate, but in service of something new. Most Democrats have been engaged for some time now in rearguard actions to protect voters from disenfranchisement efforts, and promote a remedy to the damage the Supreme Court did to the Voting Rights Act. These are important efforts, but easily countered. It isn't unpopular to argue that voters should have to show ID, for instance, and it's easy to gloss over the complex nature of the Voting Rights Act in ways that obscure the real goal of these policies, which is to systemically reduce turnout among disproportionately Democratic constituencies—the poor, the young, and ethnic minorities.

Clinton's plan, by contrast, demands clarity from her opponents. She has proposed that every American, except those who opt out, be automatically registered to vote when they turn 18, and that every state offer at least 20 days' worth of early voting. Republicans can't easily oppose this—and oppose it they must—without being explicit about the fact that they want to keep the voting rolls as trim as possible.

Most Democrats likewise support President Barack Obama's administrative efforts to liberalize immigration enforcement, and want to create a citizenship track for unauthorized immigrants. Republicans oppose both aims, but have been able to muddle that fact using vague procedural language. Generally speaking, it's not the liberalization of immigration law they oppose, but the unilateral nature of Obama's actions. They oppose amnesty, but keep the door to a nebulous "legal status" ajar. Both positions are malleable enough to allow the Republican presidential nominee to tack dramatically left in the general election, and gloss over the hostility the GOP has shown to immigrants since promising to liberalize after Obama's reelection.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For over a year, Democrats humored the GOP's wordplay in order to preserve the possibility of striking a legislative compromise that includes something Republicans could call "legal status." Now that the immigration reform process has collapsed, Clinton has dispensed with the niceties. In promising to preserve Obama's immigration policies, she called out "legal status" as a ruse. "When [Republicans] talk about legal status," she said, '"that is code for second-class status." She has taken the standard Democratic position and weaponized it. Republicans can't pretend there's no daylight between their views and Democrats' views, because Clinton has defined the Republican position for them, by contrast.

Because this kind of obscurantism pervades the GOP's substantive agenda—tax policy, social insurance reforms, workplace regulation—Clinton should be able to deploy the tactic across a wide array of issues. Seizing the first-mover advantage is one of the undiscussed upsides of Clinton's dominance in the Democratic primary field. It doesn't guarantee her victory over a Republican opponent, but it will assure that the debate between the two of them occurs mostly above board.

Hillary Clinton Hits the GOP on Voter Suppression // Slate // Jamelle Bouie – June 5, 2015

On Thursday, Hillary Clinton received the Barbara Jordan Public-Private Leadership Award at the historically black Texas Southern University in Houston. A former member of the House of Representatives, Jordan was the first black congresswoman elected from the South, the first black American to represent Texas in Congress, and a fierce advocate for the Voting Rights Act, fighting to extend its protections to minorities.

It's on that latter point that Clinton, speaking in acceptance of the award, made her remarks. "Forty years after Barbara Jordan fought to extend the Voting Rights Act, its heart has been ripped out," she said. "What is happening is a sweeping effort to disempower and disenfranchise people of color, poor people, and young people from one end of our country to the other." She continued: "Since the Supreme Court eviscerated a key provision of the Voting Rights Act in 2013, many of the states that previously faced special scrutiny because of a history of racial discrimination have proposed and passed new laws that make it harder than ever to vote."

She's not exaggerating. Republicans pitch their voter identification and "ballot integrity" laws as efforts to protect the voting process. But even a quick glance shows them as transparent efforts at voter suppression.

In North Carolina, for example, Republicans drastically reduced early voting, ended same-day voter registration, repealed a mandate for high school voter-registration drives, eliminated flexibility in early-voting hours, reinstated felon disenfranchisement measures, authorized vigilante poll observers, and imposed an ID requirement that excluded municipal government IDs, photo IDs issued by public assistant agencies, and student IDs. At the time, the state itself estimated that as many as 318,000 voters would lack identification to vote on Election Day. Despite this, Gov. Pat McCrory described the measures as "common sense" designed to "ensure the integrity" of the ballot box and "provide greater equality in access to voting to North Carolinians," which would be accurate, if words were meaningless.

On voting rights, Clinton is calm, comfortable with the details, and eager to argue her vision.

Likewise, in Wisconsin, Republicans passed a strict voter-identification law that also slashed early-voting hours, a twin move that would—noted one federal judge—"deter or prevent a substantial number of the 300,000–plus registered voters who lack ID from voting" and would disproportionately harm minority voters. And beyond laws, there are the shenanigans of local officials who implement voting rules with little oversight. "Many of the worst offenses against the right to vote happen below the radar," explained Clinton, "like when authorities shift poll locations and election dates, or scrap language assistance for non-English speaking citizens. Without the pre-clearance provisions of the Voting Rights Act, no one outside the local community is likely to ever hear about these abuses, let alone have a chance to challenge them and end them."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Overall, 21 states have put voting restrictions in place since the 2010 elections, including swing states like Florida, New Hampshire, and Virginia. Next year, in 14 of these states, those laws will be in effect for the first time. And tellingly, the prevalence of those laws has a lot to do with the demographics of the state. "Of the 11 states with the highest African American turnout in 2008, 7 have new restrictions," notes the Brennan Center for Justice. "Of the 12 states with the largest Hispanic population growth between 2000 and 2010, 9 passed laws making it harder to vote."

Clinton didn't shy away from that connection. "It is a cruel irony, but no coincidence, that millennials—the most diverse, tolerant, and inclusive generation in American history—are now facing exclusion," she said, in reference to restrictions on student voting. Likewise, she explained, "Minority voters are more likely than white voters to wait in long lines at polling places. They are also far more likely to vote in polling places with insufficient numbers of voting machines … This kind of disparity doesn't happen by accident."

To solve these problems and make an affirmative push for voting equality, Clinton wants to take two ambitious steps. First, she wants universal and automatic voter registration, with an opt-out for voters who don't want to register. This wouldn't be difficult. As the Center for Voting and Democracy notes, a combination of federal standards and broader registration rules would quickly increase total registration. More importantly, it solves the problems we saw in the 2014 election cycle, when mass registration efforts ran into partisan opposition from state officials. Facilitated by federal, state, and local officials, universal registration would go miles toward improving civic engagement.

For the second step—actual voting—Clinton wants new federal guidelines for early voting, and national opportunities for weekend and evening voting. The goal, again, is to make it as easy as possible to join the process and participate. Indeed, by just announcing her support for these measures, Clinton helps reformers in states where change is possible.

These are good ideas on the merits. They're also great politics. Voting is one of the few issues where the partisan and ideological differences are easy to understand. Democrats want to expand access to the ballot, Republicans want to restrict it. It's an excellent issue for activism—look at the high number of voters who went to the polls in 2012 in defiance of voter-suppression measures—and a sturdy cudgel against your political opponents, who will have to take a stand and risk a mistake or worse.

Voter registration is a weird hurdle that serves no purpose. It's annoying, it takes time, and it might lead to some legitimate voters being unable to vote. What's the benefit? More to that point, Clinton attacked Gov. Scott Walker, Rick Perry, and Jeb Bush by name—blasting each for their voter ID laws—and asked Republicans to "stop fear-mongering" about a "phantom epidemic of election fraud." Condemning Republican voter suppression, Clinton said, "It is just wrong … to try to prevent, undermine, and inhibit Americans' right to vote. And at a time when so many Americans have lost trust in our political system, it's the opposite of what we should be doing in our country."

Invested in voter suppression—Walker touts his ID bill to GOP audiences—Republicans will push back, attacking Clinton's plan for its size and wide federal role. But it's clear she's ready for the fight. With this issue, she's in her element: Calm, comfortable with details, and eager to argue her vision. This, in a sense, was the real beginning of the Clinton campaign, and it was effective.

Clintons to attend Beau Biden's funeral // The Hill // Ben Kamisar – June 5, 2015

Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Clinton and former President Bill Clinton will attend the Saturday

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

funeral mass for Vice President Biden's son, Beau Biden, an aide confirmed to The Hill.

Hillary Clinton and Biden are old friends, having served together in the Senate and briefly battled for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008.

The two often rode Amtrak together during Clinton's Senate tenure, and Biden sometimes ended his phone calls to Clinton by saying "I love you, darling," according to a New York Times profile from 2013.

She briefly addressed Beau's death in a tweet last Saturday night, hours after he succumbed to brain cancer.

"My heart is broken for the family of Beau Biden—a wonderful man who served his country with devotion and lived his life with courage," she said.

President Obama will also attend and give a eulogy for Beau. White House press secretary Josh Earnest told reporters Obama has spent part of Friday working on the eulogy and that he had a "personal relationship" with Beau.

"The president is feeling, in a very personal way, this loss," Earnest told reporters Friday.

"While he is and his family are of course saddened by Beau's death, I know he's also looking forward to spending some time tomorrow celebrating Beau's life — that he was a remarkable individual, a remarkable public servant — and talking in a personal way about his character, about the way that he felt about his family, about the way he felt about his country."

The former Delaware attorney general is survived by his wife, Hallie, and his children, Natalie and Hunter.

Hillary Clinton Wants To Make It Easy For You To Vote // Refinery 29 // Meredith Clark – June 5, 2015

Hillary Clinton laid out the boldest policy plan of her campaign so far — to expand and protect voting rights — and attacked a number of Republicans, by name, for their opposition to it. In a major speech at Texas Southern University on Thursday, Clinton unveiled her ambitious vision, based on a simple idea: Everyone should vote.

"Republicans are systematically and deliberately trying to stop millions of American citizens from voting," Clinton said. "What part of democracy are they afraid of?"

Many states controlled by Republican legislatures have passed restrictions on voting rights since 2010, and young and minority voters — who tend to vote for Democrats — have been disproportionately affected by these new laws. Now that courts have upheld the new regulations, this will be the first presidential election where millions of voters will face stringent new ID requirements, registration requirements, and drastically fewer opportunities to vote early.

Clinton called on Congress to pass legislation that revitalizes the Voting Rights Act, and to implement recommendations from a bipartisan presidential commission to make voting more accessible, recommendations that include expanding absentee and early voting, making registration easier, and reducing wait times.

She also voiced her support for creating a standard for early voting — advocating for an early-voting period of at least 20 days, with times that include evenings and weekends — as well as for automatic registration for all citizens when they turn 18.

Clinton singled out North and South Carolina, Texas, Wisconsin, Florida, and New Jersey for their voting cuts. In

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Texas, a gun permit is an acceptable form of ID at the polls, but student IDs are not. And Hillary's potential campaign rival Scott Walker has slashed weekend and evening voting hours in Wisconsin, and out-of-state students at Wisconsin universities now have to get Wisconsin ID cards in order to be eligible to vote there.

"We have a responsibility to say clearly and directly what's really going on in our country — because what is happening is a sweeping effort to disempower and disenfranchise people of color, poor people, and young people from one end of our country to the other," Clinton said.

While universal registration for 18-year-olds is a bold proposal, Clinton didn't specify how she would achieve it. There are different ways to make it happen, but she'll have to win before any of her proposals stand a chance.

President Obama won both his elections thanks to heavy turnout from young voters, minority voters, and first-time voters from every demographic in the country. With so many hurdles in place for those same people to get to the polls next year, the 2016 election could end up being decided by a much older, whiter, and richer subset of the country.

Another Controversy Over Hillary Clinton's Time at the State Department // The Blaze // Fred Lucas – June 5, 2015

Secretary of State Hillary Clinton did nothing to stop the sale of a Michigan battery company to a Chinese firm, despite making complaints about it on the campaign trail last month, the Detroit Free Press reported.

A123 Systems was sold to Wanxiang in early 2013. During a campaign stop in New Hampshire last month, Clinton raised concerns about the sale during a town hall meeting.

"That does concern me, because a lot of foreign companies, particularly Chinese companies ... are looking to buy American companies," said Clinton, the leading candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination.

Republican National Committee Chairman Reince Priebus told the Free Press that Clinton was just paying "lip service," since the State Department had a "role in signing off on these sales."

"She is not being honest with the American people about her record in this critical area of national security and economic policy," Priebus said.

The RNC filed a Freedom of Information Act request with the State Department asking for all records on the A123 Systems sale to Wanxiang Group.

Wanxiang, the Chinese company, bought A123 for $257 million after A123 went bankrupt when its biggest customer Fisker, an electric car company, had financial troubles. In January 2013, the government approved the sale.

Clinton's campaign told the newspaper she didn't play any role in the review of the sale and referred questions to the State Department. The campaign said that Clinton "wants us to be the clean energy superpower for the 21st century, and that means out-competing countries like China so we can keep those jobs and companies here."

The Free Press reported that a review was never taken, and that when such reviews occur, about half of the sales do not take place, according to the Congressional Research Service. Several members of Michigan's congressional delegation asked for a review.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton's Top Twitter Fan // The National Journal // Emily Schultheis – June 5, 2015

Every time Hillary Clinton tweets, a maelstrom of replies greets her across the Twitterverse. Some commenters answer excitedly with "Hillary for president!" or "you go girl!" Many implore her to visit their states or to follow them back on Twitter. And there's no shortage of vitriol, of course: People call her a liar; they insist she's corrupt; they dismiss her as part of the 1 percent. There are tweets about Benghazi; others ask what she's hiding in her deleted emails; still more bring up foreign donations to the Clinton Foundation.

But the first response to many of Clinton's tweets, her campaign has noticed with amusement, comes from a user with more than 3,600 followers who goes by the Twitter handle "Monique's Mother." The reply to a tweet about Clinton holding "fireside chats" in Mason City, Iowa? "YESSS! SLAY THAT FIRESIDE, QUEEN OF POP!" To one welcoming two new staffers to the Clinton team, Monique's Mother had this to say: "YASSSS QUEENS! Like a Destiny's Child reunion! Queen of pop!" A photo of the Hillary "H" logo a campaign volunteer made out of berries garnered this response: "SLAY US WITH THOSE BERRIES!!! YASSSSS! QUEEN OF POP."

"I can only hope he replies to @Beyonce with PRESIDENT! and a praise hands emoji," says Ian Sams, a Clinton spokesman. "It's only fair."

The mind behind "Monique's Mother" (a reference to the movie The First Wives Club) is Nick Walsh, a 30-year-old social-media manager at an entertainment marketing firm in Los Angeles. His other pastimes include selling mounted Beanie Baby heads and clocks made of old Hardy Boys hardcovers on Etsy. When I talk to him over FaceTime, the New Jersey native tells me that his online pop-star treatment of Clinton is an ironic hobby—something he does because he "likes the absurdity" of treating Clinton the way many online fans treat mega-stars such as Beyoncé or Taylor Swift. He's also a real-life fan of Clinton's, he tells me, and has been since before her 2008 campaign. It's less about the specifics of her record than about what he calls "the female aspect": "I would love to have a female president," he says. "I think that's awesome."

The impetus for Walsh's Twitter campaign was finding out that Clinton, in her own way, really did have something in common with those pop stars: She won a Grammy in 1997 for the audio version of her book It Takes a Village. Walsh tweeted about the Grammy in early May, complete with a photo of Clinton accepting the award, and said he was surprised by the positive response he got.

Since then, Walsh has gone all in on his new hobby, and, despite his distaste for politics more generally, Clinton is now a regular part of his day. He has his phone set to get notifications each time she tweets, and, between the hours of 8 a.m. and 10 p.m. Pacific time, he'll try to reply. He does it when he wakes up in the morning, when he's sitting in a meeting at work, when he's going about his day. (When he's busy, he keeps it to a quick, standard "QUEEN OF POP"; if he has more time on his hands, he'll get more creative, and perhaps even dip into the stock of Clinton photos and gifs he has amassed.) His primary motive seems to be getting noticed—by Clinton's Twitter haters, by her campaign, and by others on the social-media site. "I want them to look forward to my tweets," he says of Clinton's team. "I want them to be like, 'The "Queen of Pop" guy is tweeting again.'" When I ask how long he'll keep it up, he replies: "Until I win a meet and greet with her."

Walsh is hardly the first to find Clinton a figure ripe for ironic idolization (and Internet fun). Most famously, in 2012, the Tumblr blog Texts From Hillary used a now-iconic photo of Clinton wearing sunglasses while gazing down at her Blackberry to create a character who gives stone-cold replies to various celebrities and politicians. And that Hillary—rather than the one in the headband—left an imprint on a new generation of American voters. "Texts From Hillary was a turning point in that it kind of gave people a different way of looking at her," says Laura Olin, who ran social-media strategy for President Obama's 2012 campaign and now works with other Obama alums at the firm Precision Strategies.

That image is one Clinton has been eager to embrace. When she joined Twitter back in 2013, she made the Texts From Hillary photo her avatar. And since she declared her presidential candidacy in April, her campaign has sometimes struck a playfully self-referential tone that's a notable departure from the tenor of 2008: In announcing its online store last week, for example, Clinton's campaign included what it called an "Everyday Pantsuit Tee"—an allusion to Clinton's oft-mocked signature style.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Indeed, you could argue that Walsh's stunt works precisely because it contains a bit of truth: To some extent, the idea of Hillary Clinton—like the idea of, say, Oprah Winfrey—has taken on a life of its own. The Clintons have been in the public eye for so long that, beyond being a person and a politician, "Hillary Clinton" is also a persona, a character with cultural meaning. Or, as Walsh puts it, the Clintons "are almost like America's royal family—aside from the Kardashians."

Longtime Clinton Insider Says Hillary Hasn't Given 'Convincing Explanation' For Email, Donation Scandals
// The Daily Caller // Chuck Ross – June 5, 2015

The former Clinton White House secretary of labor Robert Reich is throwing Hillary under the scooby bus.

Reich says that Hillary Clinton needs to be more transparent and that she has more yet to explain concerning her use of a private email account as secretary of state and the millions of dollars she and Bill have been paid for speeches.

"She hasn't yet given a convincing explanation for why she used a private email account when she was secretary of state, and why she and her husband have made so many speeches for hundreds of thousands of dollars a pop from special interests that presumably want something in return," the former Clinton confidant told ABC News.

"In other words, she needs to be more open and transparent about everything."

Reich, who now teaches at Berkeley, also appeared to back away from his past support of Clinton, whose Democratic challengers include former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley and Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders.

"I've known Hillary Clinton since she was 19, and have a great deal of confidence in her," said Reich, a staunch progressive. "At the same time, I agree with Bernie Sanders on much of what he says."

"As chairman of Common Cause, a nonpartisan national citizen's group dedicated to getting big money out of politics, I don't feel free to endorse either one of them."

Reich has not let his position at Common Cause deter him from endorsing Clinton in the past, however. He was chairman of the organization's national board when he said he would back her in 2013. He joined the organization in 2010.

Commentary: Hillary Clinton's Bold Move on Voting Rights // BET // Keith Boykin – June 5, 2015

Krystal Watson grew up in Louisiana but left after high school to attend Wiley College, a historically Black college in Marshall, Texas. There she registered to vote and signed up to help other people vote as well. But when Krystal showed up at her local polling place with a Wiley College ID, she was turned away.

That's because Texas governor Rick Perry signed a law in 2011 that allows polling places to accept a concealed weapon permit for voter identification but does not accept student IDs. It's pretty clear who the Republican-controlled Texas state government wants to vote. In state after state, GOP legislatures and governors have been passing new and restrictive voting laws ever since President Obama came into office to make it harder for people of color, poor people and young people to vote.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That's the message that Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton took to Texas Southern University on Thursday. In a speech to 2,000 people at the historically Black college in Houston, Clinton told Watson's story and proposed dramatic steps to make it easier for people like Krystal to vote.

Clinton's boldest proposal is a plan for universal, automatic voter registration for every citizen in every state in the union. "Everyone, every young man or young woman, should be automatically registered to vote when they turn 18 — unless they actively choose to opt out," she said.

That makes a lot of sense. The United States is one of only a few democratic nations that place the entire burden of registering to vote on individual citizens, according to a study from the Brennan Center for Justice. That helps explain why 93 percent of eligible voters are registered to vote in Canada, for example, while only 68 percent of Americans are registered.

"Making voting easier for all eligible voters should be the epitome of a nonpartisan issue," the New York Times wrote Friday. "Unfortunately, stopping people from voting has become a key part of the modern Republican playbook," they concluded.

From Texas to Wisconsin, and all parts in between, Republicans are racing to beat the clock on voting rights. They know that America's changing demographics make it harder for Republicans to win elections when young people and people of color turn up at the polls. So rather than crafting policies to appeal to these voters, Republicans have created laws to block them from voting.

Wisconsin governor Scott Walker, a likely Republican presidential candidate, recently signed a bill to limit the number of early voting days and prohibit it altogether on weekends.

Similarly in New Jersey, governor Chris Christie, another GOP presidential hopeful, vetoed a bill that would have allowed early voting in his state.

In Florida, after helping his brother win the disputed 2000 presidential election, governor Jeb Bush created a list of 48,000 Florida residents to be purged from the voting rolls. Nearly half of those purged were African-American, but only 61 people were Hispanic, in a state where Hispanics make up a significant part of the population and often vote Republican.

Even in mostly Democratic Maryland, the state's new Republican governor, Larry Hogan, vetoed a bill last month that would have restored voting rights to 40,000 former felons who had completed their sentences.

As Hillary Clinton said on Thursday, "Republicans are systematically and deliberately trying to stop millions of American citizens from voting. What part of democracy are they afraid of?"

Answer: They're afraid of Black people, young people and progressive Latinos voting in large numbers. Nearly 90 percent of Mitt Romney voters in 2012 were white, a troubling number considering the share of white voters in presidential elections is steadily declining.

That's why Republicans are passing these new laws. It's not about voter fraud. The Bush administration conducted a five-year study and found virtually no evidence of voter fraud. Subsequent studies and bookshave confirmed these results. It's about rigging elections.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This is America. We can't go around lecturing the world about democracy if we don't practice it here at home. We have little credibility to push for electoral reform in Africa, Latin America or the Middle East when we've made it so difficult to vote in the U.S. that 50 million of our own citizens aren't even registered.

Maybe it's a self-serving political move that Hillary Clinton is calling for 20 days of early voting nationwide and asking Congress to pass legislation to fix the damage to the Voting Rights Act done by the Supreme Court in 2013. She's also calling for online voter registration and establishing the principle that no one should ever have to wait more than 30 minutes to vote.

But Clinton's interest in these issues is not new. She co-sponsored the Count Every Vote Act, a bill in 2005 that the New York Times called "the gold standard of election reform." That bill would have made election day a federal holiday and restored voting rights to ex-felons.

Whatever the motivation for Clinton's latest proposal, she's right on the mark. Voting is the bedrock of democracy. African-Americans died for the right to vote.

Hillary Clinton Calls the Republican Bluff on Voting Rights // NY Mag // Jonathan Chait – June 5, 2015

Yesterday, Hillary Clinton endorsed automatic voter registration for all 18-year-olds. Expanding access to voting rights is a civil-rights issue that can be justified entirely in good-government terms. At the same time, it is also a completely partisan issue. The Republican Party is in favor of making voting more inconvenient in the correct belief that winnowing the electorate operates to its partisan advantage.

The Republican Party prefers to frame its stance on voting rights as a deep concern for preventing voter fraud. The most common response to this is to point out that voter impersonation is vanishingly rare — since 2000, 31 instances of it have been found, out of a billion ballots cast. But the true nature of its concern reveals itself most clearly when the party's mania for suppression can be detached from its professed concern for preventing voter fraud and examined in naked isolation.

In theory, there are a number of ways one might make voting more convenient without enabling fraud. One of them is to expand early voting. A bipartisan commission, co-chaired by Democratic campaign lawyer Robert Bauer and Republican campaign lawyer Ben Ginsburg studied voting extensively and issued a 2014 report that, among other recommendations, endorsed more early voting. The authors, who engaged in months of public hearings and consultations with officials, found that voters are willing to tolerate waits to vote if they can pick a convenient day. "What does emerge from evidence about the experience of voters is that their tolerance for wait times is considerably higher with early voting," the report found, "Having chosen the day and time for voting that is convenient for them, early voters are described as being in a more 'celebratory' frame of mind than under the often rushed circumstances they face on Election Day when they must vote at a specific location on a specific day." This makes perfect sense — if you can pick a day when you're not too busy, you can stand a longer wait than having to queue up on a day you don't pick when you might not have time to spare.

The official Republican response rejected the endorsement of early voting. Letting people vote early, the Republicans reply, "diminishes the importance of Election Day." While the bipartisan commission found that Americans enjoy the freedom to pick a convenient time to vote, the Republican Party declared that this is not the case — "Most Americans continue to prefer to vote alongside their neighbors and fellow citizens at the polls on Election Day so reform needs to start there." This is a bit like saying most Americans prefer vanilla, therefore chocolate should not be allowed. If people prefer to vote on Election Day, they can.

Now, perhaps the Republicans are simply moved by a sentimental attachment to Election Day, and they don't want it to get less special-feeling by giving people the choice to exercise their rights at a more convenient time. In that case, there is also a solution that meets the party's concern: make Election Day a national holiday. Clinton has endorsed that idea, too, and it's a long-standing liberal standby. But Republicans also oppose making Election Day a national holiday. As the conservative pundit John Fund has explained, making elections a national holiday might lead to people skipping work the preceding Monday. Also, Fund argued, "There's no doubt that many people in our increasingly mobile and hectic society want voting to be as easy and convenient as buying fast food. But too much of anything can be bad — just ask someone who has gorged on drive-thru burgers and fries." So since convenient fast food can be bad for you, convenient voting must be bad, too.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Automatic voter registration, which anybody could choose to opt out of, is another idea that would reduce bureaucratic impediments to voting without enabling fraud. It will be fascinating to watch the party generate arguments against this. The current official party response amounts to simple ad hominum criticism of Clinton (Republican spokesman: "Her exploitation of this issue only underscores why voters find her dishonest and untrustworthy," etc.).

In the meantime, conservatives bothering to express their knee-jerk hostility have fallen back on actual conviction, which is that voting should be restricted to a better class of people. An additional registration requirement, writes National Review's Daniel Foster, "improves democratic hygiene because the people who can't be bothered to register (as opposed to those who refuse to vote as a means of protest) are, except in unusual cases, civic idiots." People who don't have the flexibility to take extra time away from work to jump through whatever bureaucratic hurdles the Republicans throw in their path, or the familiarity with local agencies to navigate them smoothly, are too shiftless and ignorant to be trusted with the franchise.

And so Clinton's embrace of voting rights may not have any plausible near-term prospects for enactment. But it serves to demonstrate to the party's core constituents something elemental, and true: At the current moment, there is only one party that respects their rights as citizens.

Hillary Clinton's Campaign Goes Even Gayer // OUT Magazine // James McDonald – June 5, 2015

From the get-go, Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign has worked to frame her as the candidate for LGBT Americans. From the inclusion of gay couples in early campaign videos, to changing her logo in support of the Supreme Court oral arguments for marriage equality, and tweeting her hopes for a 'historic' Pride month, she's certainly living up to that image. Now, she's making it easy for LGBTs to show their support for her in return, with a collection of Pride merchandise. Yaaas, Hillary!

Hillary goes ugly early with racism claims // Fox News // Chris Stirewalt – June 5, 2015

If Hillary Clinton is concerned enough about her candidacy to already be making accusation of racism against her potential Republican rivals, this is going to be a long election cycle for her and for the rest of the country.

Down in Texas for a campaign event aimed at restoring her relationship with black Democrats who rejected her 2008 candidacy, Clinton said that laws requiring voters to show identification at polls were part of "a sweeping effort to disempower and disenfranchise people of color, poor people and young people from one end of our country to the other." Note the language here. It's not a misguided effort with an unfortunate result, it is a deliberate effort to prevent minorities from voting. That's not just racist, that's evil.

Clinton even made it personal, saying potential general election foes Jeb Bush, Scott Walker and Rick Perry were "deliberately trying to stop" minority voters from participating. It's language that might even give voter-ID opponent President Obama some pause, but Clinton tore into her topic with evident relish. In this candidacy, Clinton has seemed at times uncertain and usually vague. When it came to racially charged, partisan attacks, however, she was imbued with a new vitality and was nothing if not direct. In an ironic turn, Clinton accused Republicans of "fear-mongering about a phantom epidemic" as she intoned against urgent dangers to civil rights.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Why would a politician go so bananas over policies that are supported by something like seven out of 10 Americans? The standard media take on Clinton's overheated rhetoric is that she is still determined to avoid her 2008 fate by pandering to, one by one, each of the parts of the Democratic coalition. It's been rolling out at the rate of about one group and one policy reversal or expansion a week. And that is surely the biggest part of this.

But when a candidate, especially a person of pallor such as Clinton, is out making over-the-top charges of racism at this point in an election cycle it certainly does not suggest a confident candidate or campaign. While Republicans might take heart that the woman who remains ahead in hypothetical matchups against anyone in their field is throwing haymakers 17 months before Election Day, they also ought to remember what else this gambit says about Clinton: She will do whatever it takes to win.

House Benghazi committee calls Clinton friend to testify // McClatchy // Anita Kumar – June 5, 2015

The House committee investigating the fatal attacks in Benghazi, Libya in 2012 announced Friday it will interview Sidney Blumenthal, a friend and sometime adviser to former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton.

The June 16 session will be held behind closed doors.

The committee grew interested in Blumenthal after it received thousands of pages of documents from the State Department that showed he and she traded emails on the security in Libya before and after the Sept. 11, 2012 attacks.

Blumenthal, an adviser to former President Bill Clinton, was employed by the Clinton Foundation when he wrote the emails.

"He sent me unsolicited emails which I passed on in some instances and I say that that's just part of the give and take," Clinton told reporters recently at a campaign event in Cedar Falls, Iowa. "I have many, many old friends and I always think that it's important when you get into politics to have friends you had before you were in politics and to understand what's on their minds," Clinton said Tuesday. "And he's been a friend of mine for a long time."

Sale of Michigan company to China may haunt Clinton // Detroit Free Press // Todd Spangler – June 5, 2015

Despite expressing her concerns on the campaign trail now, national Republican party officials are questioning why Hillary Rodham Clinton did not intervene in the controversial 2013 sale of high-tech battery plants in Michigan to a Chinese firm when she was secretary of state and could have done so.

At a campaign stop in New Hampshire last month, Clinton, the leading Democratic candidate for president, decried the sale of A123 Systems — built with millions in government aid — along with those of other new energy firms, to Chinese investors, calling them "unfortunate" and a "serious" problem for high-tech industries in the U.S.

"That does concern me, because a lot of foreign companies, particularly Chinese companies ... are looking to buy American companies," she said in response to an entrepreneur who mentioned A123's sale while commenting that venture capital for new energy technology has largely fled overseas.

Republican National Committee Chairman Reince Priebus, in a statement to the Free Press, called Clinton's remarks "lip service" considering that as the former secretary of state, her department had a "role in signing off on these sales," including A123's to Wanxiang in early 2013.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"She is not being honest with the American people about her record in this critical area of national security and economic policy," Priebus said, suggesting it may not be the last time the bankruptcy sale of A123 and its facilities in Livonia and Romulus come up in the GOP's campaign against her.

Clinton's campaign said she had no role in the review of the sale and referred questions to the State Department, saying only that she "wants us to be the clean energy superpower for the 21st Century, and that means out-competing countries like China so we can keep those jobs and companies here."

Review not taken

It does appear, however, that if Clinton had security concerns about Wanxiang gaining A123's technology, she and the agency she led could have moved to investigate it, which, at least according to congressional researchers, typically leads to about half of all transactions being abandoned.

Several members of Congress, including both of Michigan's U.S. Democratic senators and a bipartisan group of congressmen, urged such a review; as did the Strategic Materials Advisory Council, a group that noted that though Wanxiang had excluded A123's defense contracts from its purchase, it was still obtaining "91 patents for sensitive military and space battery technology."

Only the president can officially block such transactions on national security grounds. But the State Department holds a seat on the nine-member Committee on Foreign Investment in the U.S. — CFIUS — which reviews sales of American assets to foreign investors for any impact on national security.

Hillary Clinton: Give immigrants path to citizenship

A State Department spokeswoman confirmed Thursday that the agency is represented on CFIUS by an undersecretary — not the secretary — and its cases seldom if ever reach the secretary's office.

But agency procedures reviewed by the Free Press and published in the Federal Register also indicate that the "Secretary ... may at any time" fill that role, if he or she so chooses.

The campaign did not respond to a question as to why Clinton didn't play a role in the deliberations, despite her noting as a presidential candidate in 2008, CFIUS's role in "ensuring that technologies ... critical to U.S. national security are not sold off and outsourced to foreign governments."

In 2008, Clinton was critical of the Bush administration for not blocking foreign investors from moving jobs from a former General Motors-subsidiary in Indiana, which made magnets for bombs, to China, saying "not only did the jobs go to China but so did ... the technological know-how."

The back-and-forth is the latest chapter in the continuing political fallout from massive government investments in new energy technologies in Michigan and across the nation beginning around 2009 that promised thousands of jobs but which, in many instances, failed to materialize.

It also continues a line of attack against Clinton by her critics regarding her level of involvement — or lack thereof — in foreign purchases of American assets.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In "Clinton Cash: The Untold Story of How and Why Foreign Governments and Businesses Helped Make Bill and Hillary Rich," Peter Schweizer wrote she had "veto power" over the sale of uranium assets to Russia, though that claim — that she could have stopped it alone — has been debunked.

In her remarks at a Hampton, N.H., brewery on May 22, Clinton clearly was referring to economic competition, not national security concerns, in discussing the sale of A123 and other American businesses. CFIUS does not get involved in cases only related to economic considerations.

State Dept. releases hundreds of Clinton Benghazi e-mails

But any of CFIUS's member agencies — Treasury, Defense, Homeland Security and the others — can request a deeper review to determine if there are national security implications. A 2014 report by the Congressional Research Service found nearly half of those investigated "were terminated ... because the firms decided to withdraw from the transactions rather than face a negative determination."

If Clinton, who resigned as secretary in 2013, wanted to raise concerns about the national security implications of the sale, there was plenty of support for her to do so: In their letter to then-Treasury Secretary Tim Geithner, who served as CFIUS's chair, members of Michigan's delegation said the sale "might constitute a potential threat" to security since the company's "core" lithium-ion battery technology was being transferred.

They also suggested the sale might not be appropriate given that A123, which was based in Massachusetts, had received $133 million in stimulus funds and was granted more than $125 million in state tax incentives and credits to build advanced lithium-ion batteries for its clients. Other members of Congress raised concerns with CFIUS as well.

Expansion in Michigan

A123 went bankrupt after its biggest customer, electric car maker Fisker, fell on hard times. After a battle for control between Johnson Controls and Wanxiang, the Chinese company won the bidding, paying $257 million. In January 2013, CFIUS approved A123's sale without comment.

Treasury, CFIUS's lead agency, declined to comment on the case, citing confidentiality requirements.

Despite the confidentiality rule, the Republican National Committee has filed a Freedom of Information Act request with the State Department asking for "any and all records ... that mention, reference or relate to the sale of A123 Systems to Wanxiang Group."

Under CFIUS's regulations, parties to a sale typically file notice with the committee, which then has 30 days to "identify and address" any national security concerns. If it chooses, the committee may initiate a subsequent 45-day investigation or refer the sale to the president's office for a decision.

It is rare for foreign transaction to be blocked, but it does happen: President Barack Obama blocked a sale to Chinese investors in September 2012 of four Oregon wind farm companies located near a site where the military tests aircraft and unmanned drones.

Meanwhile, the Free Press reported earlier this week that Wanxiang and A123 plan to invest more than $200 million to add capacity in Livonia and Romulus, as well as at plants in China, 21/2 years after exiting bankruptcy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The company, having largely switched over to smaller batteries for hybrid vehicle systems, continues to employ several hundred workers in Michigan.

Having trouble keeping track? Here's the complete look at who's officially running for president in 2016.

On Hillary Clinton's income inequality plan, de Blasio pauses -- and GOPers pounce // NY Daily News // Celeste Katz – June 5, 2015

When it comes to how Hillary Clinton will address income inequality as a presidential hopeful, Mayor de Blasio says he's (still) all ears.

In a radio interview Friday, de Blasio seemed comfortable continuing to reserve judgment on the former Secretary of State's plans for closing the gap between rich and poor.

"People recognize that wealth is getting concentrated in very few hands, and political power is increasingly getting concentrated in the hands of the wealthy and it's unacceptable," de Blasio -- who's tried to stake a claim as a national progressive voice on the issue -- told WNYC radio host Brian Lehrer during a live exchange.

"I've been very impressed so far by some of the things that Secretary Clinton has said on areas like immigration reform, criminal justice reform. Very promising concepts," said de Blasio, a top campaign official in Clinton's 2000 Senate run.

De Blasio has raised some eyebrows with his unwilllingness to issue a full-tilt endorsement of Clinton, who's considered overwhelmingly likely to win the 2016 Democratic nomination.

By comparison, during an appearance in Washington last month, de Blasio hailed Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) as a "powerful voice" on income inequality and called her leadership "extraordinary."

Speaking to Lehrer Friday, he said he felt progressive taxation and "ways that we can raise wages and benefits for people all over the country" were musts for any substantial blueprint.

"These are the kinds of things that have to happen to change the country," de Blasio said, "and I look forward to hearing [Clinton's] vision of how she'll address these issues."

While de Blasio offered effusive praise for Clinton's speech this week on attacking voter disenfranchisement -- "I think it was an inspired proposal; I give her a lot of credit" -- in the selfsame radio interview, Republicans have widely retorted that her comments were divisive and purely partisan.

A Clinton spokesman declined comment, but the America Rising PAC, which plugs itself as dedicated to "exposing the truth about Democrats" through tracking and research, had no such reservations.

“Based on his recent words and actions, Bill de Blasio seems as unimpressed with Hillary Clinton’s campaign as everyone else in America. It doesn’t seem like he’s in any hurry to lend his former boss a hand, which is highly ironic given their long and close history," said PAC spokesman Jeff Bechdel.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"While Clinton struggles to connect with so-called 'everyday Americans' because of her ongoing scandals, vast wealth, and insulated campaign, de Blasio is standing idly by as Clinton watches her poll numbers continue to plummet," Bechdel said.

Alluding to Clinton's upcoming June 13 kickoff, he added, "No wonder her campaign has decided they need to officially hit the 'reset' button at Roosevelt Island – less than two months in, they haven't even convinced their close allies that Hillary Clinton should be president."

Clinton calls for universal, automatic voter registration; GOP not happy // Daily Kos // Kerry Eleveld – June 5, 2015

Hillary Clinton did more than just call for 20 days of early voting Thursday in her address to Texas Southern University, a historically black college in Houston. She threw down.

"Today Republicans are systematically and deliberately trying to stop millions of American citizens from voting," Clinton said during a speech at Texas Southern University. "What part of democracy are they afraid of?"

That was one of the best lines of the speech, second only to this one:

"We need a Supreme Court that cares more about protecting the right to vote of a person than the right to buy an election of a corporation."

In short, Clinton called for a sweeping expansion of voting access for every citizen. Along with adding 20 days of early, in-person voting, she called on Congress to "restore the full protections" that the Supreme Court ripped from the Voting Rights Act. She called for "expanding early, absentee, and mail voting; providing online voter registration; establishing the principle that no one should ever have to wait more than 30 minutes to cast your vote."

And she called for universal, automatic voter registration.

Everyone, every young man or young woman, in every state in the union should be automatically registered to vote when they turn 18—unless they actively choose to opt out. But I believe this would have a profound impact on our elections and our democracy. Between a quarter and a third of all eligible Americans remain unregistered and therefore unable to vote.

None of this made Republicans happy.

The Republican National Committee accused Clinton of being "misleading and divisive," and noted that her home state of New York does not provide early voting. "Her exploitation of this issue only underscores why voters find her dishonest and untrustworthy," RNC spokesman Orlando Watson said in a statement.

Testy, testy.

Meet the 30-year-old woman running Hillary Clinton's field operations // Fortune // Nina Easton – June 5, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

With many of the power players from Hillary Clinton's 2008 presidential run sitting this one out, the big question is: Who's in?

What follows is the latest installment of a Fortune series looking at the the most influential women on Clinton's 2016 team. When this series wraps, we'll turn our attention to the most powerful women on the GOP side of the race.

Brynne Craig, 30, Deputy National Political Director

By the time Brynne Craig started her career, the Rolodex was as much of a relic as those pink "while you were out" message slips. But if Craig, 30, did have an old-style Rolodex sitting on her desk, it would be fat—bulging with names of Democratic foot soldiers all over the country, from phone bank volunteers to precinct captains.

Craig does field operations. She's done that job for presidential candidate Hillary Clinton in 2008, for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee—charged with electing House members—in 2012, and for victorious Virginia gubernatorial candidate Terry McAuliffe in 2013. She also picked up some useful organizing skills working for Democratic nominee Barack Obama after Clinton dropped out in 2008, but the former First Lady is clearly her first political love.

Craig's adoration of Hillary Clinton dates back to her Arizona childhood, when her music-industry father was rooting for Bill Clinton's 1992 victory, voraciously reading newspapers and sharing his opinions with his 8-year-old daughter. "That was the first time I was really aware of politics," she recalls. "We would talk a lot about [the campaign]." Her Republican mother, however, had different ideas: "George [H.W.] Bush was her guy."

Craig liked Bill Clinton, but she really liked his wife. "When I was little, I thought if Hillary ever ran for President I wanted to work for her," she recalls. That moment finally came in 2007, after she graduated from Smith College and joined her campaign in Nevada. It turned to be a high-wire act: With Obama's win in Iowa, and Clinton's dramatic comeback in New Hampshire, the early Nevada caucus—considered a bellwether for western states—was billed as a tie-breaker.

Like Iowa, Nevada runs a caucus rather than a primary, and in 2008 this in-person process was a strange new system to state voters, unlike in Iowa. So a lot of what Craig did was education–Caucus-101 meetings and simulations of caucus days. She oversaw 43 precincts. On election day, Clinton was the top-vote getter (though a complicated process gave Obama more delegates)—making Nevada the only caucus state to fall into her 2008 column during that grueling primary battle.

After Clinton conceded and dropped out, Craig was off to the swing state of Ohio for the general election, where Obama would beat GOP nominee John McCain—and show off an awe-inspiring grass roots operation. "We built a neighborhood team model all across Ohio, voters talking to their neighbors and friends, block by block," Craig recalls. "The lady who was the cashier in the grocery store was the one knocking on your door."

Craig took away from that experience a lesson that holds true even in an age of social media and online communication. "We used to say people will come to a campaign because they believe in the candidates," says Craig. "But the reason they stay is the relationships we have. I still talk to my precinct captains. Social media engages people, but you have to take that second step of going off line and continuing the relationship."

That will come in handy in her current job as part of the "Mook Mafia" –named for her mentor, Clinton campaign manager Robby Mook—where she will need to secure endorsements from local and state officials and keep the campaign's relations with grass-roots groups warm and fuzzy, even when times get tough.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton rakes in $200K in Greenwich // CT Post // Neil Vigdor – June 5, 2015

Hillary Clinton covered the waterfront Friday in Greenwich -- not just rhetorically.

Heavy on domestic and foreign policy talking points -- some aligning her with President Barack Obama (the Affordable Care Act) and others distancing her (the Middle East) -- Clinton huddled with an elite network of contributors to her presidential campaign at the bygone yachting retreat of Boss Tweed.

The 13-mile trip from Chappaqua, N.Y., paid handsome dividends for Democratic contender, who netted $200,000 for her White House bid from about 85 supporters that included the Empire State Building's controlling partner and a retired hedge fund manager as the event host, Hearst Connecticut Media has learned. The reception, held at the $29.7 million Roman villa of Malcolm and Carolyn Wiener, was closed to the media.

Clinton then added to her haul in New Haven, returning to the city where she met Bill Clinton as Yale Law students. Her visit came less than 24 hours after U.S. Sen. Marco Rubio, R-Fla., a potential rival for the Oval Office, raked in $50,000 in Stamford and bashed Clinton over foreign money raised by her family foundation.

"Presidential races are all bruising, and this one will probably involve more spending than any in history, unfortunately," said U.S. Sen. Richard Blumenthal, D-Conn., who went to school with the Clintons at Yale.

Clinton's campaign declined to comment her fundraising trip to Connecticut.

Blumenthal, who was in attendance at both the Greenwich and New Haven fundraisers, said Clinton is tough enough to withstand all that will be thrown at her.

"If you looked at her resume without knowing her name, and saw someone who has been a U.S. senator, secretary of state and a close adviser and confidante to at least two presidents and now brings the unique perspectives and life experience of a woman at a historic turning point for our country, that is a powerfully impressive candidate," Blumenthal said. "That persona, plus her dedication to the country and her grasp of the issues will be important to her winning."

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE

O'MALLEY

O'Malley's efforts on immigration reflect complex political realities // WaPo // John Wagner & Arelis Hernandez – June 5, 2015

Democratic presidential hopeful Martin O'Malley stepped up his efforts to court Latino voters this week, appearing before a Hispanic business group and on Spanish-language television.

The former Maryland governor pledged to tackle comprehensive immigration reform during his first 100 days if he makes it to the White House, and he touted his record in Annapolis, which includes signing legislation that allows undocumented immigrants to get driver's licenses and in-state college tuition rates.

While those and other measures have drawn applause from national immigrant rights advocates — with some declaring O'Malley's record the strongest in the Democratic field — Maryland lawmakers present a more nuanced view.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Latino legislators and other advocates credit O'Malley with providing help at key junctures but add that on some issues, he wasn't doing the heavy lifting. And at some points, particularly during the long, thorny debate over driver's licenses, O'Malley was at odds with the advocates.

As he has positioned himself to run in a Democratic field dominated by Hillary Rodham Clinton, O'Malley has made frequent mention of his record on immigration. He often recounts a battle last summer with the White House, when he denounced the administration's efforts to return migrant children to their home countries after they illegally crossed the border from Central America. And O'Malley has emphasized his decision to limit Maryland's cooperation with federal officials on deportations from a state-run jail.

Del. Ana Sol Gutierrez (D-Montgomery), a native of El Salvador and the first Latina elected to state office in Maryland, was not always pleased with O'Malley on immigration issues. But on balance, she said, "he really has shown leadership."

Others are less charitable, among them former delegate Luiz R.S. Simmons, another Democrat from Montgomery. O'Malley, Simmons said, "has a tendency to jump on the caboose of the train as it's pulling out of the station and put on a conductor's hat and walk to the front."

Haley Morris, an O'Malley spokeswoman, said the candidate has "one of the most progressive track records in the country on issues facing new Americans," noting that Maryland housed more refugee children per capita than other states during the border crisis.

As a 2006 gubernatorial candidate, O'Malley did not focus heavily on immigration. But he supported making driver's licenses available to undocumented immigrants, a position for which his GOP opponent attacked him in television ads, and for granting in-state tuition rates to college students.

A version of the latter legislation, known as the Dream Act, had been vetoed by O'Malley's Republican predecessor in 2003.

O'Malley signaled support for the legislation when it was proposed again in 2007, his first year in office. But the bill stalled in the Democratic-led legislature amid concerns over whether it would reduce slots available for students with legal status.

Although O'Malley made clear that he would sign the bill, he did not make it part of his legislative package, a level of priority that he later gave to bills legalizing same-sex marriage and repealing the death penalty.

Advocates tried again in 2011, bringing waves of "Dreamers" to Annapolis to testify and lobby lawmakers. State Sen. Jamie B. Raskin (D-Montgomery) said it was widely known that O'Malley wanted the bill to succeed, which helped secure votes. The measure passed, and Maryland joined nearly a dozen states with similar measures.

Conservative activists petitioned to have the law put to a voter referendum. During the campaign that ensued, O'Malley provided fundraising and other political support. Voters approved the measure by a wide margin, 59 percent to 41 percent. O'Malley "spoke out on the bill and threw down for the campaign," said Kim Propeack, director of CASA in Action, the political arm of the immigrant advocacy group.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The path to Maryland's current policy on driver's licenses had far more twists. When O'Malley took office, Maryland was among just five states where someone could get a license without having to prove they were in this country legally. Critics charged that the program was open to fraud and that it drew illegal immigrants to Maryland. Moreover, the federal government was clamping down on driver's licenses after the 2001 terrorist attacks.

In 2005, Congress passed the REAL ID Act, which sought to curb state-issued driver's licenses for those in the country illegally. States were given several years to implement the law, and the exact rules and how they would be enforced changed on multiple occasions, O'Malley aides said.

O'Malley, concerned about threats by the federal government not to allow anyone with a Maryland driver's license to board an airplane, announced in 2009 that he would support a halt in issuing full-fledged licenses to undocumented immigrants. Lawmakers passed a bill that discontinued new licenses but allowed those who already had licenses to keep a restricted version of them through 2015. The licenses could not be used as identification to enter federal buildings or board airplanes.

Gutierrez and others argued that Maryland should leave its earlier policy in place, in effect daring the federal government — with Democrat Barack Obama in the White House — to enforce the law.

But other Democrats, including O'Malley, were loath to take the risk. "The collective wisdom at the time was we shouldn't roll the dice on it," said Brian E. Frosh, then a state senator chairing the Judicial Proceedings Committee and now Maryland's attorney general.

Four years later, advocates made a renewed push to overhaul the law, and lawmakers approved a bill to issue licenses — with restrictions — to new applicants and renew existing ones beyond 2015. O'Malley signed the bill.

The political climate had changed considerably by then, several lawmakers said, making them more comfortable with the new approach. It seemed clear that the Obama administration wasn't going to impose punitive measures, and passage of the Dream Act in Maryland in 2011 showed public support for helping immigrants.

Del. Joseline Peña-Melnyk (D-Prince George's) said it took some persuasion to get O'Malley to support the 2013 bill.

"We showed him the numbers, arguing that immigrants are driving to work and taking kids to school and that it was better for them to have insurance and drive legally than to drive without one," she said.

Gutierrez credited O'Malley with being "helpful the second time around."

Since then, O'Malley has spoken out more forcefully on immigration, and he has held up his record as evidence of his commitment to issues of importance to the fastest-growing demographic group in the country.

"One of the greatest indicators of a person's future actions will be how they acted in the past when they had the power," O'Malley told the U.S. Hispanic Chamber of Commerce on Wednesday.

SANDERS

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sanders wants privacy panel in defense bill // The Hill // Jordain Carney – June 5, 2015

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) wants to create a panel to investigate the impact of modern technology on privacy as part of an annual defense bill.

Sanders, who is running for the Democratic presidential nomination, has filed an amendment to the National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) to establish a "commission on privacy rights in the digital age."

The panel would study how the government, as well as private companies, collect data on Americans and how the data is used, and make recommendations on any changes needed to protect privacy.

"Innovations in technology have led to the exponential expansion of data collection by both the public and private sectors," according to the amendment.

Sanders voted against the USA Freedom Act, which reforms the National Security Agency's collection of bulk phone metadata.

He suggested at the time the legislation doesn't go far enough to protect Americans' privacy.

“Technology has significantly outpaced public policy," he said in a statement earlier this week. "There is a huge amount of information being collected on our individual lives ranging from where we go to the books we buy and the magazines we read. We need to have a discussion about that.”

The two-year panel, which would have subpoena power, would also investigate how data collection has changed and any implications on areas including surveillance and hiring practices.

Hawking shirts, buttons, Sanders opens shop // Burlington Free Press // Adam Silverman – June 5, 2015

The "For Sale" sign is out at the Bernie Sanders presidential campaign.

An online merchandise store opened this week, offering a range of products from T-shirts and coffee mugs to bulk packs of yard signs.

"Made and printed in the USA," boasts the product description on each of the two shirts for sale — one light blue, the other white.

"Union-printed in the USA. Car safe! Outdoor durable for 3-5 years," reads the description on the bumper stickers.

Sanders, Vermont's independent U.S. senator who is seeking the Democratic presidential nomination, joins a narrow slice of the already packed 2016 presidential field by jumping into merchandising. Only six of the 14 declared candidates on the Democratic and Republican sides are hawking buttons and hats through official online outlets as of Thursday afternoon.

There are plenty of unofficial vendors on the Web and at campaign events. When Sanders held his kickoff last week at Burlington's Waterfront Park, one man drove from Florida to sell buttons to the crowd of 5,000 to 6,000 supporters. Another came from Montpelier with a rack of hand-screened T-shirts.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton has a comprehensive official online shop, where supporters can select from 32 products, starting at $5. There are traditional items such as shirts and stickers, along with a number of unique offerings that include a onesie for those who haven't quite reached voting age, and a throw pillow for $55 that proclaims, "A woman's place is in the White House."

A section of merchandise is geared toward "Pride" and features shirts, stickers and buttons in rainbow colors.

Like Sanders' site, Clinton's also proclaims a made-in-America and union pedigree for much of the merchandise.

On the Republican side, Sen. Rand Paul, R-Ky., might have the most extensive and elaborate online store of all. His site sells dozens of items across a host of categories — "fun stuff," "car decor" and "Hillary" sections join the more traditional categories of apparel and signs. Among the highlights from the ophthalmologist's campaign: an autographed eye chart for a $500 campaign contribution, and a signed copy of the Constitution for a cool $1,000.

Paul also offers some novelties including an "NSA Spy Cam Blocker" — a $15 cover for webcams on laptop computers — and "Hillary's Hard Drive," a computer drive for $99.95 that represents a swipe at the former secretary of state's use of a private email server to conduct government business.

Supporters of former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee can browse 27 offerings, while Sen. Ted Cruz, R-Texas, has 23 items in his online store. Rick Perry, the former Texas governor, just jumped into the race Thursday and promptly unveiled a bare-bones shop with four products.

As with the Democrats, the Republican stores also promote Made in the USA — but there's hardly a mention of the word "union."

The candidates without stores are Democrats Lincoln Chafee and Martin O'Malley, and Republicans Ben Carson, Carly Fiorina, Lindsey Graham, George Pataki, Marco Rubio and Rick Santorum.

Back at the virtual Sanders storefront, shoppers can choose from 18 items. The least expensive is $5, which can score a button, a bumper sticker or a rally sign. T-shirts go for $15 to $21. The scale tops out at $225, which gets buyers a pack of 25 white or blue "Bernie 2016" yard signs.

A Sanders campaign spokesman did not respond to an email this week asking about the store.

How Bernie Sanders Will Change Your Mind About The Label 'Socialist' // The Elite Daily // Lani Seelinger – June 5, 2015

Bernie Sanders is a democratic socialist. Before your mind goes straight to Stalin's Gulag and Iron Curtains, though, let's talk about what that means.

In a number of different outlets, Bernie Sanders has come upon the suggestion — which in many other cases would be more of an accusation — that he is a democratic socialist. Instead of renaming his views, dancing around the subject or flat out denying it, he embraces it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It is, quite frankly, refreshing.

Before we get to him, though, let's talk about the idea itself. Thanks to the Cold War, Socialism has been a dirty word in American politics for about 70 years now, and Sanders will be fighting an uphill battle to try to change that.

In Sweden, though, the state just proposed extending paid paternity leave to three months. In the Czech Republic, parents can take up to three years of paid parental leave.

In many European countries, both health care and education all the way up through graduate degrees are entirely free.

In Finland, every family receives a special "baby box" for the birth of each child, equipped with everything a parent could need for those first few months — condoms included.

If they already had a child and don't need the box, they can opt instead for financial compensation to the tune of 140 euro. Seriously.

I could go on, but you probably get the idea. Democratic socialism, which these countries' governments all practice to some extent, isn't what we've gotten to know from Soviet spy movies.

It isn't a nanny state that tries to police your every move. It isn't even an arrangement in which the country's citizens have no personal responsibility, as so many Republican candidates have claimed over the years.

It's about support. It's about equality. The idea behind the Finnish baby box is that every child should have an equal starting point, but it doesn't stop there.

The Nordic countries, which includes Finland, Sweden, Denmark, Norway and Iceland, are at the top of scores of desirable measures.

Why wouldn't we want that for our own country? Why wouldn't we want to do away with nasty things like student loan payments, short (and not always paid) maternity leave time and a lack of helpful boxes for our newborn children?

Bernie Sanders is here to tell us we could have all those things for our country and much more… Except for the baby box — as far as I know, he hasn't said anything about that yet.

Perhaps the most surprising thing about all of this is, well, that he's serious.

Just when the Democrats were settling into the idea that Hillary is who they'd be supporting for better or worse, just when they accepted that Elizabeth Warren will not — and I repeat, NOT — be running for president, in steps an old white guy with the same fire that Warren has and the same drive to change American politics as we know them.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Or, as Daenerys Targaryen would say, Bernie Sanders wants to break the wheel.

It's a shame he doesn't have any dragons to back his cause. Instead, he has the examples of successful countries that have put his policies into action, to great success.

On "Late Night with Seth Meyers," he outlined his views more specifically, particularly about why "socialism" isn't a dirty word to him.

Using one example, he explained,

In most countries, health care is a right of all people. I don't see that as a problem.

And the thing is, his form of democratic socialism isn't actually extreme, even in America. In fact, it aligns directly with a lot more of the country than many people seem to have noticed.

His view that the increasing wealth gap is a huge problem in America is one that 63 percent of Americans share. A majority of Americans, like Sanders, believe money in politics is hurting the system.

Sizeable majorities believe higher education is too expensive and that student loan debt is a big issue. Sixty-nine percent of people believe global warming is happening at least partly because of human activity.

He's got a lot going for him: passion, early support and ideas for policies most of the country supports (even if some of those people would normally vote Republican). For all the Democrats who would have supported Warren's fire over Clinton's centrism, this is the guy.

His challenge will be fighting with the buzzwords — in other words, changing the public's view on the word "socialist." Is it possible? Yes, definitely. Will it be difficult? Even more so.

We may not have seen this coming, but it's about time we took note. Bernie's in it to win it.

CHAFEE

Lincoln Chafee May Be Hillary's Biggest Problem // The Atlantic // Peter Beinart – June 4, 2015

In a field of Democratic presidential long shots, former Rhode Island senator and governor Lincoln Chafee, who announced his candidacy on Wednesday, may be the longest shot of all. As an authentic, uncompromising progressive, Bernie Sanders is poised to grab the bulk of those Elizabeth Warren enthusiasts who can't reconcile themselves to Hillary Clinton. As the handsome, articulate, two-term governor of a mid-size state, Martin O'Malley at least looks like a plausible contender one day. Chafee, by contrast, in the words of Quinnipiac University's Monica Bauer, "has the charisma of Walter Mondale wrapped in the political instincts of a small town city councilman, which he once was, and perhaps would have remained, if he hadn't been the son of a famous political dynasty. He is George W. Bush with more intelligence but far less political talent." And like Bush, Chafee was, until very recently, a Republican.

But Chafee could prove Hillary's most intriguing challenger. It's not because he'll garner enough support to give her a scare. If anyone does that, it will likely be Sanders, who according to the New York Times is already

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"gain[ing] momentum in Iowa." What makes Chafee's candidacy intriguing is that he's attacking Hillary on the issue on which she may be most vulnerable: her vote to authorize war with Iraq.

"I don't think anybody should be president of the United States that made that mistake," Chafee told The Washington Post in April. "It's a huge mistake, and we live with broad, broad ramifications today—of instability not only in the Middle East but far beyond and the loss of American credibility."

A version of this attack helped Barack Obama topple Hillary in 2008. That's not likely to happen again, since Democrats care far less about Iraq this time.

But Republicans do. While foreign policy has been largely absent from the Democratic presidential campaign thus far, it's been central to the Republican debate. And this reflects a divide in the country as a whole. A May Wall Street Journal/NBC poll found that "national security/terrorism," which was the top concern of only eight percent of likely GOP primary voters three years ago, now ranks first, at 27 percent. Among likely Democratic primary voters, by contrast, it's less than half that.

Iraq sits near the center of that concern. Every Republican presidential candidate except Rand Paul is telling the same story: By 2008, as a result of George W. Bush's surge, America had won the Iraq War. But then Barack Obama snatched defeat from the jaws of victory by recklessly withdrawing US troops. Since then, the Middle East has descended into the depths of hell, and become a petri dish breeding ISIS barbarians eager to strike the United States.

The best answer to this line of attack is the one Hillary can't give: that America should never have invaded Iraq in the first place. After all, it wouldn't have been necessary to stitch the Iraqi state back together between 2006 and 2008, at a vast cost in money and blood, had the United States not shattered it in the first place. But Hillary can't give that answer because she voted to authorize the war.

That's what makes Chafee's attack intriguing. He was the only Republican senator who voted against authorizing war. Now, as a Democratic candidate for president, he will talk about the collapse of Iraq and the rise of ISIS in a way she can't. And the way Hillary responds to him will preview her response to the Republicans next fall.

Finding a good answer won't be easy. On domestic issues like gay marriage, mass incarceration, immigration, and campaign finance, Hillary has shifted left in the primary, confident that she's keeping pace not only with Democratic primary voters but with the country as a whole. But on foreign policy, the public isn't moving left; it's moving right. And Hillary cannot as easily adapt her views to match that shift because until two years ago, she was secretary of state.

Hillary's greatest challenges may not be policy-based at all. They'll likely stem from questions about her honesty, and the sense that she represents not the future but the past. But if there's one policy question that could prove dangerous, it's Iraq. On that subject, Lincoln Chafee is the canary in the coal mine. If Hillary can't find an effective answer to his attacks, it may be a sign of trouble ahead.

WEBB

Former U.S. Senator Jim Webb (D-VA) has a seven-point plan to save American foreign policy. // The National Interest Evan Gottesman – June 5, 2015

"Our country is in need of a clearly articulated foreign policy statement," Webb boldly declared to an audience at George Mason University.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Senator Webb, who also served as Secretary of the Navy and Assistant Secretary of Defense during the Reagan administration, characterized current U.S. foreign policy as reactive and unstructured. Given this state of affairs, Webb intimated his own platform aimed at grounding America's approach to the world in seven key principles.

1. The United States should be able to identify its national security objectives and value systems.

"I like to see myself as a realist," Webb told audience members, contrasting himself with those "who see war at every corner." Senator Webb affirmed his opposition to foreign interventions that did not serve any discernable national interest or worse, undermined America's global position.

"I was one of the first people to warn of the strategic blunder of going into Iraq," Webb recalled. Indeed, he penned an op-ed in The Washington Post in September 2002 in which he asked readers, "Is there an absolutely vital national interest that should lead us from containment to unilateral war and long-term occupation of Iraq?"

Throughout the years, Senator Webb has maintained a consistent position on foreign interventions. The Obama administration justified the 2011 War in Libya in humanitarian terms via the responsibility to protect, a pretext Webb criticized as "vague."

2. The United States should be able to develop partnerships with trustworthy actors.

Senator Webb posited three criteria when considering aligning with a foreign nation: the country's stability, whether it engages in aggressive expansionism, and how its government treats the citizenry.

Despite listing human rights as an area of interest in fostering overseas partnerships, Webb challenged inconsistent approaches to democracy overseas, citing American engagement with China as a standard. When he returned from a trip to Myanmar, a reporter questioned how he could visit an authoritarian state in good conscience. Webb pushed back: "When was the last time China had an election?"

The senator also recalled a hearing just prior to the Libya intervention. Then-Secretary of Defense Leon Panetta charged, "Any government that kills its own people in nonviolent protests does not deserve to be in power." Webb challenged Panetta: "What is your comment on the Tiananmen Square incident?"

3. The United States should honor treaty obligations.

Here, Senator Webb stressed that Japan and the Philippines, two nations tied to American defense pacts, should be a "preeminent concern."

Senator Webb articulated his view that China's behavior in East and Southeast Asia warrants a robust American presence in the region. He noted the area's uniquely precarious position, describing it as "the only place where the interests of China, Russia, and Japan intersect." Here, Webb believes the United States can be a stabilizing influence while supporting a friendly Tokyo.

Senator Webb is particularly alarmed over China's aspirations in the South China Sea, which Beijing claims in nearly its entirety. "It is vitally in our national interest to communicate strongly with China when it takes expansionist moves in the South China Sea." The dispute in the area could draw the Philippines, a treaty-ally, and other states like Taiwan and Vietnam into conflict with China.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

4. The United States should support its non-treaty allies.

Not all American allies are bound to Washington by formal agreements. Senator Webb affirmed that these non-treaty partners should receive attention too, particularly in the Middle East, a region that hosts many U.S. aligned governments few of whom have formal defense arrangements with the United States.

5. The United States should maintain its superiority in strategic systems.

The United States maintains a qualitative technological edge over a range of potential adversaries. This is visible in weapons systems, nuclear capacity, and space capabilities. Senator Webb affirmed that these technological advantages should not be traded away, even for economic reasons.

6. The United States should preserve and recognize the right of national self-defense.

Senator Webb closely linked this point to issues of terrorism. The United States should be able to strike back against such attacks. This view, Senator Webb explained, is consistent with the United Nations Charter, particularly Article 51, which reads: “Nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations.”

7. Congress must step up and restore its relationship with the executive branch.

Senator Webb identified a shift in war-making power from the Congress to the presidency. He drew on Libya and Iraq as examples of executive military maneuvers that bypassed legislative approval. In both cases, Webb felt that no vital national interest was at stake.

Webb was similarly critical of President Bush’s unilateral negotiations with Iraq. Bush arranged a long-term strategic relationship with Baghdad that Congress never sanctioned. By contrast, the Iraqi parliament voted to approve agreements with Washington.

Whether one agrees or disagrees with the substance of Senator Webb’s foreign policy platform, his positions are undeniably clear and well defined. As Webb explores a 2016 presidential bid, the seven points he articulated on Thursday could form the basis of a wider debate among the candidates on the future of America’s international role.

OTHER

Bankroller of Democratic Voting Rights Cases? George Soros // NYT // Maggie Haberman – June 5, 2015

The billionaire philanthropist George Soros, whose first major involvement in politics was with a large-scale voter mobilization effort in the 2004 presidential race, is funding a Democratic legal fight against restrictive voting laws.

Mr. Soros became involved last year when Marc Elias, one of the top Democratic lawyers specializing in voter protection issues, began exploring a series of federal suits in advance of the 2016 election, according to Mr. Soros’s political adviser, Michael Vachon.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Their goal is to try to influence voting rules in states where Republican governors and Republican-led legislatures have enacted new election laws since 2010, and to be ready to intervene when additional measures may be passed over the next 17 months.

Mr. Soros is prepared to spend $5 million or more on the effort, Mr. Vachon said. Two suits that he is supporting were filed in Ohio and in Wisconsin last month, and he is also funding a case Mr. Elias is involved with in North Carolina.

Mr. Vachon described the Democratic legal effort as an attempt to push back at Republicans who he said were "using the legislative process" for partisan purposes.

"It is disingenuous to suggest that these laws are meant to protect against voter fraud, which is nearly nonexistent," he said. "Clearly they are meant to give Republicans a political advantage on Election Day."

Mr. Elias's clients include four major Democratic party committees as well as Hillary Rodham Clinton's presidential campaign.

"Clearly, fighting the Republican efforts to limit who can vote and when they can vote will benefit Democrats, and it will benefit whomever runs for president," Mr. Vachon said. "But it also primarily benefits democracy with a small 'd.'"

In 2004, Mr. Soros invested millions of dollars into efforts to unseat President George W. Bush, including through a voter mobilization drive called America Coming Together.

He has not yet taken up the question of whether he will give money to the "super PAC" supporting Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Vachon said. But the legal actions filed by Mr. Elias are in keeping with the type of advocacy that Mr. Soros has favored: the nexus of policy, politics and movement-building.

Republicans have argued that the new laws are much-needed protections against election fraud and that the new round of lawsuits is little more than a publicity-seeking exercise intended to mobilize Democratic voters.

But Democrats say the new laws disproportionately affect the poorest voters, minorities and young people. A Government Accountability Office study last October found that states with more stringent voter identification laws had a larger decline in voter turnout than states that did not have such new restrictions.

Mr. Vachon said he was approached by Mr. Elias in January 2014 about supporting a voting rights lawsuit in North Carolina, where student identification cards are not considered acceptable forms of photo ID. The restrictions in North Carolina ended a program in which teenagers filled out a form and were then registered automatically to vote on their 18th birthday. Joining with the N.A.A.C.P. Legal Defense Fund, the Justice Department and the American Civil Liberties Union, Mr. Elias argued that the law was onerous for younger voters in violation of the 26th Amendment, which lowered the voting age to 18 from 21.

The North Carolina case is still pending. But Mr. Elias and Mr. Vachon have discussed filing others in some of the 21 states that have added voting restrictions since the 2010 Republican electoral wave, if those states seek to tighten voting access any further.

"I expect there will be more," Mr. Vachon said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The voting conversation has shifted. That's good news for Dems. //MSNBC // Zachary Roth – June 5, 2015

Over the last year or so, the conversation on voting in America has been shifting. Now, Hillary Clinton's major speech in Texas Thursday has massively accelerated that movement.

By laying out a sweeping and positive vision for voting, Clinton smartly turned the debate away from the restrictive Republican-backed laws like voter ID that have made headlines in recent years, and toward the kind of expansive ideas that could usher millions of new voters into the process—chief among them, automatically registering everyone when they turn 18. That will lend crucial momentum to state-level proposals to increase access, which already have been gathering steam of late. And politically, it will force Republicans to explain why they oppose common-sense efforts to make voting easier.

Democrats are already recognizing that they can take advantage of the broadening conversation to put Republicans in a deeply uncomfortable spot.

Conservatives are noticing the shift, too. "[V]oter ID is yesterday's battleground," wrote Christian Adams, a former Justice Department lawyer and a leading supporter of restrictive voting policies, with a hint of trepidation. "Sure, there are still court cases and bills, but the Left has moved on to bigger and better things."

But finally playing offense on voting isn't just smart politics—though it certainly is that. It also has the potential to transform the electorate.

The hot-button controversies over strict Republican voting laws have obscured a crucial reality: Far more Americans are kept from voting by what might be called softer barriers that have been in place so long that they generate less attention: an antiquated registration system that, among other problems, requires voters to re-register each time they move, leaving around 50 million people unregistered; poorly maintained voter rolls that cause confusion on Election Day; hours-long lines that drive some would-be voters away in frustration and are worst in minority neighborhoods.

President Obama's bipartisan panel on voting, convened in response to the massive lines in Florida in 2012, helped put these issues—as well as the importance of early voting to reduce lines on Election Day—on the agenda. And the record low turnout in last fall's midterms has helped focus the conversation on how to get more voters to the polls. President Obama even mused recently about mandatory voting, which he called "transformative."

Since the start of the year, 464 bills to enhance voting access—many of them modernizing the registration system—have been introduced in state legislatures, according to a tally by the Brennan Center for Democracy. Oregon recently passed a law to establish automatic voter registration, which could create as many as 800,000 new registered voters in that state alone. And other states, including California, are considering following suit.

Clinton's aggressive plan will push those efforts forward. Expect to see more universal voter registration measures introduced in states across the country.

Of course, polls show ID is popular, so it's no surprise that Clinton and her allies would want to focus elsewhere. And to be sure, she offered a full-throated condemnation of the wave of voting restrictions the GOP has imposed in state after state. But in calling out four of her potential 2016 rivals by name, it was noticeable that she focused not on voter ID but more broadly on their support for policies that restrict, rather than expand, the electorate, and that target particular groups.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton said Rick Perry had “signed a law that a federal court said was actually written with the purpose of discriminating against minority voters,” without noting that it was Texas’s strict ID law. And she slammed Scott Walker for cutting back early voting and signing “legislation that would make it harder for college students to vote,”—again without noting that she was referring to voter ID.

In response, Perry sought to turn the focus back to the more familiar terrain of voter ID. “I think it makes sense to have a photo ID to be able to vote,” the former Texas governor said on Fox News Friday. “When I got on the airline to come up here yesterday, I had to show my photo ID.”

And Walker fell back on an oft-used GOP talking point on the issue, asking why Clinton doesn’t support policies “to make it easier to vote and harder to cheat,” and calling her “far outside the mainstream.” (Asked which expansive voting policies Clinton doesn’t support, a spokeswoman for Walker’s PAC, Our American Revival, didn’t respond.)

Ohio Gov. John Kasich, answering Clinton’s criticism of his state’s early voting cuts, noted that New York, the state Clinton represented in the Senate, doesn’t offer any early voting at all, and accused her of “demagoguery.”

But those responses could be hard to sustain once more states move forward with expansive legislation and the conversation gets more specific. Ultimately, Republicans will need to explain why they don’t favor policies to bring more people into the political process. And answering honestly might not be an option.

Things are looking up for President Obama // VOX // Jonathan Allen – June 5, 2015

President Obama's standing with the American public is improving as he nears the final 18 months of his presidency, and a combination of solid economic numbers, finding common ground with Republicans, and a diminished need to serve as the partisan leader of Democrats should augur well for the stretch run.

The economy added 280,000 jobs in May, the largest spike this year, and unemployment remained stable at 5.5 percent, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported Friday. Jason Furman, the chair of the White House Council of Economic Advisers, pointed to the increase of 262,000 private sector jobs in May, and 12.6 million over the past 63 months, as an indication of the health of the economy.

Bureau of Labor Statistics via the White House Council of Economic Advisers

This graph shows how the economy went from hemorrhaging jobs during the financial crisis to adding them consistently over the past five-plus years.

Obama still isn't getting as much credit for the improvement of the economy as he might, but his numbers have been better this year than they were last year. In late May, a CBS/New York Times poll of 1,022 adults found that 45 percent of Americans approved of the way he was handling the economy and 49 percent disapproved. The approval number was between 45 percent and 49 percent in four surveys taken this year by the two news organizations or CBS alone. Last year, his numbers ranged from 38 percent to 43 percent in CBS and CBS/New York Times polls.

"The President has been clear that he believes there is a strong case for us to make, looking at the economic data, about the significant progress that our economy has made since the worst economic downturn since the Great Depression," White House spokesperson Jennifer Friedman said in an email to Vox. "That said, the president believes there is more work that needs to be done to strengthen our economy and further expand economic opportunity for middle-class families."

Not surprisingly, the trends in Obama's overall approval ratings have improved as Americans' views of his handling of the economy have risen because jobs and the economy typically rank as the issues most important to them. Obama's approval numbers have risen and stabilized this year, compared with 2014, as the Gallup daily tracking polls show.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Alec Tyson, a senior researcher at the Pew Research Center, said that while a growing economy can improve Americans' view of the president, lingering worries about their own outlooks can limit that effect.

"It's hard for people to rate the president overwhelmingly favorably when they're facing daily struggles," he said.

No one expects Obama and his Republican adversaries in Congress to start clinking champagne glasses in the East Room anytime soon. But it's harder for Republican leaders to whack him consistently when they find themselves on the same side on headline-grabbing issues. And they've been working with Obama a lot more in the early months of what the White House calls the "fourth quarter" of his presidency.

Speaker John Boehner pushed White House–backed revisions to the Patriot Act through the House last month, with 196 of the 338 overall votes for the bill (58 percent) coming from Republicans. Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell was critical of Obama and the bill — arguing it watered down essential national security protections — but shepherded it through a bumpy ride to enactment all the same. Of the 67 senators who voted for it, 23 were Republicans.

Obama's biggest legislative push this year is on trade, an issue that unites Republicans and divides Democrats. It's got Paul Ryan, the 2012 Republican vice presidential nominee, praising the president.

"I think the president on this particular issue is right, and therefore I think this is good for our country, good for the people I represent," Ryan, a House member from Wisconsin, told CNN's Dana Bash in an interview that aired Friday.

Two tracks

Obama seems to have found the formula he likes for policymaking: work with lawmakers when he can and go around them when he can't. Executive actions on climate change, immigration, Cuba policy, and the like have shown Democrats that he's willing to flex his muscle on behalf of their priorities. Indeed, there's no shortage of Democratic constituencies lining up for help with executive action right now.

But the early legislative agenda, including a "fix" on Medicare reimbursement rates for doctors, trade deals, and the revision and extension of Patriot Act provisions, has lent itself to bipartisanship. There's little doubt that will break down at some point: Democratic leaders are promising to block all Republican spending bills over the GOP's effort to backfill Obama Pentagon cuts with emergency war-funding money.

But for now, Obama's still looking to complement his use of executive power with legislative action.

"He will continue to use each and every tool he has to pursue an aggressive agenda to deliver for working families across the country, both by taking action on his own and by working with Congress in a bipartisan fashion when possible," Friedman said.

Tony Fratto, a Treasury and White House official in President George W. Bush's administration, said working across the aisle could help Obama with the public.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I see the president's approval ratings as mostly a function of the economic environment. As the economy improves and is seen as durable, his approval ratings will be bolstered," said Fratto, whose firm, Hamilton Place Strategies, is advocating for fast-track authority for the president. "A win on trade, which is generally popular, can be seen as a bipartisan win, and that would give a boost. Incidentally, a bipartisan win on trade would boost perceptions of Congress, too."

The triangulation machine

Beyond the allure of bipartisanship, trade has given Obama an opportunity to distance himself a bit from his party's base.

It's been the centerpiece of an increasingly vitriolic war between Obama and Massachusetts Senator Elizabeth Warren. Warren's status as a heroine of the left naturally makes Obama look more centrist when he fights her, and that may be helpful for him going forward.

Their first big row was over Antonio Weiss, the Obama treasury undersecretary nominee initially blocked by Warren. She wasn't pleased when Obama did an end-run around her by giving him a political appointment that didn't require Senate confirmation. Then came her criticism of Obama's trade agenda, to which he fired back last month by saying she is "absolutely wrong" on the merits. And just this week, Warren wrote a harsh letter to Obama's Securities and Exchange Commission chief, Mary Jo White, accusing her of leaving a trail of "broken promises" in not being a tougher Wall Street overseer.

If Obama were looking for a way to show he's not beholden to his party's base, he could hardly find a better one than fighting with Warren.

Handing over the reins

Obama is fond of reminding people that he's not running for president again. It's not a completely liberating epiphany — the desire to protect and nurture his legacy is reason enough not to just follow every whim.

But it's an important observation in this way: As the 2016 presidential race heats up, Obama will become more of a supporting actor for his party and less its leader. That role will fall to the Democratic nominee for president.

That should free him from some of the overtly partisan work he's done in past election cycles — particularly from raising money for himself and hitting the stump as a candidate while he's running the country.

He should benefit from that, too.

Pataki, Chafee, and O'Malley: No Chance In Hell // Town Hall // Matt Vespa – June 5, 2015

What do Martin O'Malley, George Pataki, and Lincoln Chafee have in common? They don't have a chance in hell in winning their party's nomination for president. On the Democratic side, given that Hillary's favorables have taken a plunge, it's no surprise that Chafee and O'Malley decided to follow Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-VT) in challenging Clinton (via WaPo):

A once-sleepy Democratic presidential primary contest is fast coming alive as Hillary Rodham Clinton's poll numbers fall and a diverse array of long-shot opponents step forward to challenge her.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The recent developments mark a dramatic evolution in the 2016 sweepstakes, which until now has been shaped by the large assortment of hopefuls on the Republican side, where there is no front-runner.

The latest Democrat to enter the race is Lincoln Chafee, a onetime Republican and former Rhode Island governor and senator, who launched his campaign Wednesday in Northern Virginia. Though his candidacy is quixotic, Chafee's sharp attacks on Clinton's hawkish foreign policy record — and in particular her 2002 vote to authorize the war in Iraq — could nonetheless complicate her march to the nomination.

Chafee joins an underfunded and jumbled field of Clinton rivals who see the favorite's coziness with Wall Street and political longevity as weaknesses and who think she is vulnerable to a grass-roots contender who better captures the party's liberal soul.

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), a fiery populist who identifies as a socialist, has been attracting some of the largest crowds of any candidate from either party as he summons supporters to join his "political revolution."

Truth be told, it's probably going to remain sleepy. Clinton has the money, the organization, the endorsements, and the polling advantage–to the point where she could just ignore her opponents and deprive them of oxygen, especially when it comes to debates.

With Pataki, well, he would have a chance at winning … if he were running to replace Richard Nixon (via FiveThirtyEight):

Ideologically, he's an old-school Republican (i.e., liberal) running in a modern GOP (i.e., very conservative). He is more moderate than any recent Republican nominee and is the most moderate candidate in the 2016 Republican field, according to our aggregated ideological scores. Pataki is, among other things, in favor of abortion rights and gay marriage. He's somewhat of an environmentalist.

(Barely) to the left of New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, whose candidacy is all but dead, is not the place you want to be given that a plurality of Republicans believe Christie is not conservative enough.

Pataki's ideological score looks more like Richard Nixon's, and Pataki would probably have had better luck running to replace Nixon rather than President Obama.

According to the General Social Survey, 57 percent of Republicans identified as moderate or liberal in 1974. Since then, that figure has steadily declined to 43 percent in 1994 (when Pataki won the governorship of New York) to only 35 percent in 2014. That's large enough to be part of a winning coalition in a primary, but not enough to win.

But the wonks at Nate Silver's data crunching site aren't just hitting Pataki; they had noted that Chafee's anti-war angle is stale, and that Maryland voters really don't like O'Malley.

On Chafee, they're kind of brutal on his prospects:

The problem for Chafee is that this is 2015, not 2007. Back then, the Iraq War was at the forefront of the public's mind. An April 2007 Gallup survey found that 21 percent of Democrats said the Iraq War was the country's most important problem,1 and an additional 13 percent said the “fear of war.” This gave then-Sen. Barack Obama, who spoke out against the Iraq War from the start, a wide opening in his run against Clinton. Among those voters who said the Iraq War was most important, Obama beat Clinton. Clinton beat Obama on the two other major issues (the economy and health care).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Today, few Democratic voters are thinking about Iraq.

In March 2015, just 3 percent of Democrats said the Iraq War was the most important problem in Gallup’s poll. Only 1 percent said the most important problem was the “fear of war.”

Chafee is polling at 1 percent or less nationally and in Iowa and New Hampshire, and there is absolutely no reason to think he will ever be competitive in the Democratic primary.

He also had what’s being called a disaster of a campaign rollout.

As for O’Malley, Clinton sucks the oxygen out his home state numbers, but Bernie Sanders is doing a lot better in Vermont, meaning that while he also doesn’t have a chance in hell of winning the 2016 nomination–he could mount a decent challenge to Clinton. After all, there are enough far lefties in the Democratic base to mount such a campaign; they just don’t have enough voters to win an insurgent campaign yet:

The people who know him best don’t like him. O’Malley is starting way down in the polls, and he’s not well known. And we have evidence that more O’Malley exposure doesn’t equal more O’Malley support. He earned just 3 percent (compared to Clinton’s 63 percent) in a poll of Democratic voters in Maryland conducted in October by The Washington Post and the University of Maryland.

If this strikes you as a surprisingly low percentage for a two-term Maryland governor and former mayor of the state’s most populous city, it should. It speaks to the fact that O’Malley was unpopular enough in deep-blue Maryland that by the end of his second term, Republican Larry Hogan came out of nowhere to defeat O’Malley’s lieutenant governor in the 2014 governor’s race.

Eventual nominees (excluding incumbent presidents) in the modern primary era have always led in early polling in their home states, even when they polled poorly nationally.

O’Malley’s main competitor for second place in the Democratic primary, Bernie Sanders, got 36 percent of the vote and even led Clinton in an October 2014 Castleton Polling Institute survey of Vermonters. That points to a base of support that should allow Sanders to do fairly decently in the primary, even if he has little chance of winning.

There is one silver lining for Pataki, or candidates with his vein of politics; the conservative base of the GOP is shrinking. Only 42 percent of Republicans describe themselves as economically and socially conservative. It’s at its lowest level since Gallup began gauging the party’s base in 2005. Nevertheless, they’re still the largest group representing the Republican Party. The second largest group at 24 percent regard themselves as moderate or liberal on social and economic issues. So, theoretically, there may be some wiggle room for a Pataki candidacy, or one with a similar flavor in the future, but moderates shouldn’t be hoping for any success.

With Pataki, besides his name recognition problem (Pataki left New York’s governor’s mansion in 2006), and the fact that he will probably have zero grassroots support–he’s pro-choice. The Republican base may have seen its conservative cohorts shrink in size, but there’s probably never going to be a presidential candidate from the right that will support abortion rights … ever. As Jonathan Bernstein at Bloomberg wrote, Gary Johnson, Arlen Specter, Pete Wilson, and Rudy Giuliani have all tried to win the GOP nomination with that position and failed.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Moreover, there's the well-known factor that the 2016 field is already diverse, stacked with solid conservatives (certainly better than 2012) for Republican voters to choose from, instead of wasting their time on a Rockefeller brand name that's been damaged since the Goldwater campaign in 1964.

With the Democrats, I would have to say they should hope that Vice President Biden enters the race. It provides the only avenue for them to attack Clinton effectively on a national stage on live television. Biden will probably poll low in the polls, but you really can't deny debating the VP. And with candidates with similar strength in the polls, there's no good argument for the networks to deny them a spot. After all, the motley crew that is the 2016 Democratic primary isn't as large.

This could all be pipe dreams though. I mean, even on a debate stage, they probably still don't have a chance in hell since no one will abandon Hillary. She isn't talking to the media, but even then; bank on pretty much everyone willing to follow her into the pits of Tartarus, despite the fact that her possible ethical and legal baggage would disqualify anyone running for president.

For Democrats, it's settled. For Republicans, the primary wars are revving up–and Pataki will probably fall mid-way through the first round.

In two minds // The Economist – June 5, 2015

A CURIOUS mixture of cockiness and angst grips Democrats as they contemplate the next presidential election season, which—dreadful to relate—is now under way. For their party is at once in a strikingly strong position, and has not looked so weak in years.

Start with the party's strengths. Hillary Clinton, the former secretary of state, senator and first lady, announced that the first big rally of her campaign for the presidential nomination would take place on June 13th, on an island off Manhattan. The event is certain to be packed out. Mrs Clinton is not just very famous; she enjoys poll leads over every Republican thought to be running for the White House (a pack that looks like growing to 16 contenders).

Democrats now also know that Mrs Clinton will face a contest for the Democratic presidential nomination, allowing her to hone her campaign skills and messages. On May 30th Martin O'Malley (above), a telegenic, guitar-playing former governor of Maryland, launched a challenge to her. He spoke at a sun-dappled event overlooking Baltimore harbour, flanked by artfully chosen representatives of fast-growing voter blocs that twice helped Barack Obama to win the White House, including Hispanics, urbanites and young women. Mr O'Malley was introduced by a young, gay Afro-Latino student without legal immigration status, who thanked him for supporting migrant rights and gay marriage in the state.

Nor are fans of economic populism forgotten. Activists have reluctantly concluded that their heroine, Senator Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts, is not running, suspending their "Run Warren Run" campaign. But they are rallying to Senator Bernie Sanders, a snowy-haired tribune of the left who began his campaign in earnest on May 26th, and who has been wowing meetings in Iowa.

On paper, then, the party is well-placed to mobilise different elements of the Obama coalition. The so-far-declared Democratic candidates sound in near-lockstep on big progressive causes. All support gay marriage and the right to abortion. They believe that government must tackle climate change, and want millions of migrants currently in America without legal papers to be allowed to stay and eventually enjoy a path to citizenship.

On one day every four years, when the presidency is at stake, the voter blocs of that Obama coalition pose a daunting challenge to Republicans. Whit Ayres, a pollster advising Senator Marco Rubio, a Floridian Republican running for president, summed up the problem in a recent book: “2016 and Beyond: How Republicans Can Elect a President in the New America”. Demographic groups that form the core of Republican support—older whites, blue-collar whites, married people and rural residents—are declining as a share of the electorate, Mr Ayres notes. In 2012 Mitt Romney, the Republican presidential candidate, picked up 59% of white votes. But he won just 17% of non-white votes. In 2016 America will be still less white, so that even if Republicans match Mr Romney’s performance among whites, they will need 30% of non-white votes to take the White House—a feat the party did not achieve in 2012, 2008 or even in 2004, when George W. Bush, trading on his popularity in Texas, enjoyed the backing of Hispanics in his re-election.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Yet Democrats have serious weaknesses, too. Put bluntly, Mrs Clinton is their only serious candidate for the presidency. The crowd at Mr O’Malley’s launch was neither large nor confident that Maryland’s ex-governor has any chance of overtaking Mrs Clinton. Indeed, many in attendance did not want Mrs Clinton stopped, instead expressing hopes that Mr O’Malley’s entry into the race might simply tug the front-runner a bit to the left. Mr O’Malley drew most applause when he cited claims that big bank bosses would be happy to see Mrs Clinton or Jeb Bush, the former Republican governor of Florida (and a son and brother to presidents) win the White House. “Well, I’ve got news for the bullies of Wall Street,” Mr O’Malley declared. “The presidency is not a crown to be passed back and forth by you between two royal families.” The cheers were mostly venting: a CNN poll on June 2nd showed 60% of Democrats backing Mrs Clinton for the presidential nomination. Her nearest rival, Vice-President Joe Biden, was on 14%, though (especially since the death on May 30th of his son Beau) he shows no signs of running. Mr O’Malley was on 1%.

The CNN poll gives Mr Sanders 10% of the Democratic vote. But activists at Sanders rallies are indulging in a holiday from political reality when they cheer his calls for state-run universal health care, free tuition at public universities and taxpayer-funded elections. That might be a fine platform in France. It is unserious in America (as is the proposal of Lincoln Chafee, a former Republican senator and independent governor of Rhode Island, who launched a Democratic presidential bid on June 3rd, to switch America to the metric system).

Mrs Clinton’s dominance worries even supporters, who know they have few options if she stumbles, or is overtaken by scandals related to her family’s charitable foundation or her use of a private e-mail server as secretary of state, to name just two possibilities. Weeks of news reports probing the finances of Mrs Clinton and her husband, Bill, have already left a mark. Two new polls show sharp falls in the number of Americans who trust her.

In part, Mrs Clinton’s stature explains the Democrats’ lack of a deep bench of swing-state governors or senators with eyes on the presidency. But in part their thin bench reflects a broader weakness in recent non-presidential elections. The reasons are complex. The Obama coalition includes many sporadic voters who skip state and local contests. Lots of Democratic votes are packed inefficiently into super-safe urban districts (many with gerrymandered boundaries). The results are simply brutal. In Washington Republicans enjoy their largest majority in the House of Representatives since 1946, while the elections of 2014 were a bloodbath for Democratic senators in conservative states. Republicans control 69 of 99 state legislature chambers, and 31 of 50 governors’ mansions.

If Democrats are united by their strengths, and on how to woo the Obama coalition, they disagree about how to tackle their weaknesses and win back Middle America. Mr O’Malley and Mr Sanders propose a sharp left turn. Mrs Clinton, by contrast, has been cagey about her views on the policies that divide Democrats. She is right to be cautious. Many numbers favour her party; but many do not.

Iowans Always Complain The Caucuses Are Getting Less Important. This Time They Have a Point. // Slate / / Josh Voorhees – June 5, 2015

here’s handwringing in the heartland. Iowa’s political and chattering classes—and, to a lesser extent, its actual voters—are fretting that their first-in-the-nation nominating contest has lost its luster. Dave Price, the political director for NBC’s affiliate in Des Moines, is the latest to give voice to the angst, writing in this week’s Politico Magazine cover story that there’s a “palpable anxiety in political circles—and even rumblings that Iowa’s king-making days might be over, or at least that the national media, and the rest of the country, will pay less heed this cycle.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Iowa politicos—like their colleagues in New Hampshire, South Carolina, and Nevada—are a particularly nervous breed. They know better than anyone that their early-nominating status translates directly into political chits and campaign cash for themselves and their state party, and that every minute and dollar a presidential candidate spends elsewhere is one that they aren't spending in the Hawkeye State. Still, their fears don't need be altruistic to be accurate.

For Iowans craving the type of caucus clashes that keep candidates and the political press corps camped out in their state for months, there really is reason to worry. Hillary Clinton's continued polling dominance suggests the Democratic frontrunner will probably be able to keep playing things safe in Iowa, as well as everywhere else. Likewise, GOP establishment favorites like Jeb Bush may decide against slugging it out with more conservative candidates in a nominating contest that is dominated by values voters and tea partiers. As the first-in-the-nation nominating contest, Iowa will still matter, but not as much as it did in decades past.

Such campaign cycle-specific headaches, though, are nothing new in Iowa, particularly among Republicans. "Politically speaking, this state is in something of an existential crisis," the Washington Post declared at this point in the last presidential cycle, when it appeared as though Mitt Romney had forgotten where Iowa was on the map. Four years before that, the Hawkeye State's harrumphing was directed at eventual GOP nominee John McCain and his decision to focus the lion's share of his resources elsewhere, an Iowa-ignoring strategy he had deployed with even greater force in the 2000 cycle.

Iowa's real reasons to worry, though, go well beyond 2016. Two long-term game-changers loom large on the horizon. The first is the decision by the Republican and Democratic parties to rein in the number of primary debates. By allowing network execs to use national polls to decide who makes it onto the debate stage and who doesn't, the national parties have effectively created a series of mini-national primaries that will winnow the field long before Iowans have a chance to. The second is the continued rise of super PACs and their dark-money brethren, which have the ability to keep otherwise doomed campaigns afloat far longer than they have any right to be. In primaries past, a poor performance in Iowa or one of the other early-nominating contests would make it mighty difficult for a candidate to raise the type of small-dollar donations he needed to soldier on. That's no longer the case now that a single deep-pocketed patron can cut a seven- or eight-figure check. Iowa, then, might not have the chance to weed out the presidential pretenders in the field, nor the power to force any contenders from the race.

Iowans, though, have little reason to complain. They might be watching their political influence wane, but they and their fellow early-nominating states are still showered with a disproportionate amount of attention and campaign cash. Clinton may be playing hard to get, but Martin O'Malley and Bernie Sanders have already made more than two dozen visits apiece. Meanwhile, the state still has enough of a Republican draw that Rand Paul—Rand Paul!—felt it necessary to find something to love about its government-subsidized ethanol industry. There is no divine right of kingmakers that will preserve the Iowa Caucus forever, but as long as it remains the first contest on the calendar, it will always get to hold court.

GOP

BUSH

Jeb readies for upcoming road trips // Politico // Eli Stokols – June 5, 2015

Jeb Bush's coy game of pretending there's still doubt as to whether or not he'll run for president is ending with a bang — two weeks of aggressive travel and campaigning.

After releasing a new website Thursday morning signaling a June 15 campaign launch, Bush will spend his final week as an unofficial candidate meeting with European leaders in Germany, Poland and Estonia in a trip designed to bolster his foreign policy credentials and give greater definition to his argument that the U.S. should be doing more to help its allies.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The expected announcement would make Bush the 10th declared candidate in the Republican primary.

From Miami, Bush will depart for what's being billed as the "Jeb Announcement Tour." He'll spend the week cycling through the early voting states: Tuesday in Derry, New Hampshire; Wednesday in Pella, Iowa; and Thursday in Charleston, South Carolina.

Bush's oldest son, Texas Land Commissioner George P. Bush, will hold an event Saturday in Henderson, Nevada; while Jeb Bush will not be there, he'll make his first official campaign stop in the Silver State on June 27. The last time Bush visited Nevada, in mid-May, he accidentally stated during an interview with a local TV station that he's running for president — before correcting himself.

While national polls show Bush near the top of the deep GOP primary field, polls in the early states show that he has work to do, especially in Iowa, where he's only made two trips so far this year and currently polls in seventh place.

Memo to Jeb Bush: Avoid foreign quagmires // CNN // Stephen Collinson – June 5, 2015

Jeb Bush is Europe bound. High on the travel agenda: steering clear of the pesky foreign quagmires that have engulfed his GOP brethren on recent trips abroad.

The former Florida governor will visit Germany and also tour Estonia and Poland -- two former Soviet states that offer an easy platform for criticism of the Obama administration's policy towards Russian President Vladimir Putin.

It should be an easy mission for an accomplished politician -- a quick flit across the pond to bolster foreign policy credentials ahead of a likely presidential campaign.

But Bush should choose his words with care if he is to avoid extending a dubious streak that has seen Republican candidates tumble into controversy overseas.

Mitt Romney, the 2012 presidential nominee, endured a disastrous trip to Europe three years ago and committed a huge gaffe by questioning Britain's readiness to host the London Olympic Games on the eve of their taking place.

Romney tried to roll back his criticism but was openly mocked in front of a huge crowd by London Mayor Boris Johnson in unflattering video footage that was beamed back to the United States.

Romney also went to Poland and suffered the indignity of reporters yelling at him to answer for his missteps -- before a top campaign aide was caught on camera telling the press pack to "kiss my a."

Romney's disastrous sojourn earned him the unwelcome headline "Mitt the Twit" in the merciless British tabloid press.

This election cycle has not been kind to potential presidential candidates who venture across the Atlantic either.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal also managed to irk Johnson when he claimed in January that some areas of Europe, including parts of Britain, had become Muslim "no-go zones."

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, meanwhile, found out earlier this year that answering questions abroad about boiling political issues back home can also get you into trouble.

Christie said that parents should have a "measure of choice" about whether to vaccinate their kids, drawing charges that he was equivocating to appease evangelical conservatives.

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker made his own trip to London this year and dodged a question on whether he believed in evolution -- and managed to steer clear of deeper distractions by avoiding questions on pretty much everything else.

Perhaps wisely, Bush is avoiding London, where journalists like nothing more than tripping up visiting American presidential candidates.

Had he braved the wrath of the British media, Bush would likely have faced unwelcome questions about his brother, former president George W. Bush, and the Iraq war, both of which remain deeply unpopular in the U.K.

His visit to Germany will recall then-Sen. Barack Obama's trip to Europe during the 2008 presidential campaign, which saw him deliver a soaring speech before a crowd of hundreds of thousands euphoric Germans in downtown Berlin.

But even Obama, who was wildly popular in Europe, didn't escape controversy. German Chancellor Angela Merkel was apparently annoyed at his campaign's request for him to speak before the iconic Brandenburg Gate, where President Ronald Reagan once cried, "Mr Gorbachev, tear down this wall!"

Obama did not get that privilege until his second term, in 2013, by which time he was much less popular in Europe and, as a consequence, drew a much smaller crowd.

Jeb Bush's struggle with conservatives // MSNBC // Chuck Todd & Mark Murray – June 5, 2015

Jeb is struggling with conservatives more than Romney did at this same point four years ago: Our colleague Dante Chinni notes in the Wall Street Journal that Jeb's standing with conservatives is WORSE than Mitt Romney's in the 2012 cycle. Consider:

Jeb's fav/unfav with conservatives: 33%-28% (April 2015 NBC/WSJ poll)

Romney's fav/unfav with conservatives: 40%-14% (June 2011 NBC/WSJ poll)

Jeb's poll position with conservatives: 3rd (April 2015 NBC/WSJ poll)

Romney's poll position with conservatives: 1st (June 2011 NBC/WSJ poll)

Jeb Bush Facing Crucial Two-Week Stretch // Bloomberg News // Michael Bender – June 5, 2015

When Jeb Bush returns next week from Estonia, the tiny, technologically advanced country that shares a border with Russia, he'll have about 48 hours to shake off the jet lag before a June 15 rally in Miami, where he formally announces his decision to enter the race for the Republican presidential nomination.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That will be the midpoint of a crucial two weeks in which Bush will first try to establish his foreign policy credentials, and then introduce himself to voters. The week before his campaign launch, the former Florida governor travels to Germany, Poland and Estonia; the week after, he will be stumping in Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina.

In case there's any doubt what Bush will be announcing later this month, his spokeswoman Kristy Campbell offered this Thursday: "Governor Bush is thankful for the support and encouragement he's received from so many Americans, and is excited to announce his decision."

"The Bush kids have had a chance to have a front-row seat in history."

Bush's "decision" will come just two days after Hillary Clinton holds her much-ballyhooed first campaign rally in New York City. But if there were any concerns about sharing the spotlight with the other political dynasty in the race—or about the quick transition from Europe to a campaign announcement at Miami Dade College's Theodore Gibson Health Center (a complex that includes a 3,200-seat gymnasium)—they may have been overridden by other scheduling issues.

The fact is, Bush has waited so long to make it official that he's running into a bit of a calendar crunch: The last week of June is expected to bring highly anticipated U.S. Supreme Court rulings on Obamacare and gay marriage, both decisions that have the potential to dominate the political news cycle and force candidates off message as they respond. Then comes the long Independence Day holiday weekend and the start of family vacation season. And then, the first Republican presidential debate in Cleveland on August 6. To have any chance of getting a ticket to be on stage, a candidate has to be officially in the race.

Before Bush becomes the 11th major Republican candidate in the race, he'll have a chance to polish his foreign-policy résumé with a week in Berlin, Warsaw and Tallinn, Estonia. It's the kind of opportunity that some of his potential Republican rivals haven't been able to seize, especially the governors among them.

Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker has curiously claimed that President Reagan's firing of air-traffic controllers who went on strike in 1981 was the most important foreign policy event of the past five decades (and wrongly said the move influenced U.S.-Russian relations).

New Jersey Governor Chris Christie refused to answer questions about foreign policy issues while traveling to England in February. Asked by a Washington Post reporter during the trip about the terrorist threat from Islamic State, Christie said, "Is there something you don't understand about 'no questions'?"

Foreign policy prompted Bush's one major gaffe in the seven months since he served notice in December that he was serious about running for president.

In an interview with Fox News' Megyn Kelly on May 9, Bush said he'd have authorized the 2003 invasion of Iraq even knowing the intelligence was faulty. Bush struggled for the next week to give a clear answer, finally saying on May 14 that he "would not have engaged" in Iraq, knowing what he knows now.

"That's one that shook a lot of people," a Bush fundraiser who requested anonymity to speak about private conversations told Bloomberg. "That's a question you know was coming. It should have been a slam dunk and gone, and it didn't happen that way. But even the most professional of these guys stumble from time to time."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush has also incorrectly claimed that the Islamic state didn't exist when his brother, George W. Bush, was president, and that al-Qaeda had been wiped out.

But expectations for Bush should be high.

A fluent Spanish speaker who lived in Venezuela before entering politics, Bush led trade and advocacy missions to at least 18 countries as governor, including Peru and Israel, as well as a six-day trip in 2005 that included stops in Dusseldorf and Munich, two of Germany's largest cities.

As a former senior advisor to London-based Barclays PLC, Bush says he traveled overseas 89 times to 29 countries in the eight years after leaving office. Last year, Bush started an investment fund with backing from a Chinese conglomerate. He has said he had been traveling about four times a year to China, where his father, George H.W. Bush, served as U.S. ambassador before being elected the nation's 41st president.

"The Bush kids have had a chance to have a front-row seat in history," Bush said at a Republican National Committee rally during his father's 1992 re-election bid. "We've seen the tumbling of the Berlin Wall, the hammer and the sickle going down from the Kremlin on Christmas Day just a few years ago. We've seen so many incredible things happen."

In Berlin, Bush will participate in a question-and-answer session during an economic conference on June 9, where he'll have a prime speaking slot sandwiched between Google Inc. Chairman Eric Schmidt, and German Chancellor Angela Merkel.

Merkel supports the nuclear negotiations with Iran that Bush opposes, but Bush's father remains very popular in the country because of the role he took promoting German reunification while he was in the White House. Outside the former president's library in College Station, Texas is a statue of horses leaping over pieces from the Berlin Wall, a Cold War relic that came down during his term in the White House. Germany unveiled its own monument in Berlin in 2010, known as the "Fathers of German Unity," that includes bronze busts of Bush, former Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev, and former German Chancellor Helmut Kohl.

That legacy may help Bush counter the one left by his brother. The nation's 43rd president remains generally disliked in Europe because of his aggressive foreign policy and unpopular war in Iraq, said Alexander Privitera, a senior fellow at at the Johns Hopkins American Institute for Contemporary German Studies.

While Europeans are "going to be looking for signs of whether he's similar to his brother," Privitera predicted that "there won't be thousands protesting against Jeb Bush. A lot of people will associate him with memories that are overcharged with emotions."

In Poland, Bush will participate in a roundtable with the Polish-American Freedom Foundation, a pro-democracy, free-market group, and meet with senior members of the Polish government about efforts to support Ukraine.

In Estonia, where the Internet phone service Skype was born and where residents can vote and pay their taxes online, Bush will participate in a roundtable discussion about transatlantic security with the International Center for Defense and Security, a group focused on cyber attacks, social cohesion and energy policy in the Baltic-Nordic region. Bush will also tour NATO's Cyber Defence Center of Excellence, and meet Estonians from the e-Estonia Showroom, a briefing center that highlights the country's digital successes.

Bush called Estonia "this really cool, tiny country" during a speech in Florida on Wednesday. He held up the Baltic nation, population 1.3 million, as an example of a relatively simple tax code.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"You can fill out your tax return in Estonia online in five minutes," Bush said. "That should be a worthy aspiration for a great nation."

RUBIO

Rubios on the Road Have Drawn Unwanted Attention // NYT // Alan Rappeport & Steve Eder – June 5, 2015

Senator Marco Rubio has been in a hurry to get to the top, rising from state legislator to United States senator in the span of a decade and now running for president at age 44.

But politics is not the only area where Mr. Rubio, a Republican from Florida, has an affinity for the fast track. He and his wife, Jeanette, have also shown a tendency to be in a rush on the road.

According to a search of the Miami-Dade and Duval County court dockets, the Rubios have been cited for numerous infractions over the years for incidents that included speeding, driving through red lights and careless driving. A review of records dating back to 1997 shows that the couple had a combined 17 citations: Mr. Rubio with four and his wife with 13. On four separate occasions they agreed to attend remedial driving school after a violation.

Mr. Rubio's troubles behind the wheel predate his days in politics. In 1997, when he was cited for careless driving by a Florida Highway Patrol officer, he was fined and took voluntary driving classes. A dozen years later, in 2009, he was ticketed for speeding on a highway in Duval County and found himself back in driver improvement school.

Things got more complicated in 2011 when Mr. Rubio was alerted to the fact that his license was facing suspension after a traffic camera caught him failing to stop at a red light in his beige Buick. His lawyer, Alex Hanna, paid a $16 fee to delay the suspension and eventually it was dismissed.

County records show Senator Marco Rubio and his wife, Jeanette, have been cited for numerous driving incidents over the years.

"Senator Rubio's license has always been in good standing," Mr. Hanna said in a statement provided by Mr. Rubio's campaign. "This matter was resolved by the court system and at no point was the license suspended by the D.M.V."

That was not the last time Mr. Rubio was ticketed. In 2012 he was caught failing to obey a stop sign, but the infraction was dismissed.

Ms. Rubio's driving record is even messier.

According to the records, her driver's license faced suspension on three occasions, including after a 2009 episode where she was driving a white Cadillac at 58 miles per hour on a road in West Miami with a speed limit of 35 m.p.h. She paid a $302 fine and agreed to attend a four-hour course at a local traffic school.

However, Ms. Rubio, who also took a four-hour basic driver improvement course after a careless driving incident in 2000, failed to complete the class and had to pay another $34 penalty.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The lessons apparently did not stick. A year later, in 2010, she was stopped for driving 23 m.p.h. in a school zone where the speed limit was 15 m.p.h. She was fined $185.

It is not clear how the numerous infractions have affected the Rubios' car insurance policy or premiums. On at least one occasion, Ms. Rubio was cited for lacking documentation that her car was insured.

The Rubios have spent more than $1,000 paying traffic penalties over the years, but after Mr. Rubio was elected to the Senate in 2010 they took a different approach to handling their tickets.

Mr. Rubio hired Mr. Hanna, a Miami-based lawyer and donor, whose website sales pitch says, "Have you received a traffic ticket? Don't pay it." With Mr. Hanna's help, Mr. Rubio's last two citations were dismissed and seven of Ms. Rubio's last eight were cleared.

Mr. Rubio's campaign had no comment on the traffic violations or whether Ms. Rubio's license was ever actually suspended.

And not all accidents become police matters. Earlier this year, Ms. Rubio, a former cheerleader for the Miami Dolphins, sideswiped a Porsche Panamera while driving her husband's Ford F-150 truck to a donor event at the Delano Hotel in Miami Beach. According to the Miami Herald, the police declined to take a report on the incident because it was a "minor" fender bender.

If Mr. Rubio is fortunate to make it as far as the White House, there will be many perks that come with the job. Chief among them, however, might be having a driver.

Marco Rubio's Iraq quagmire deepens: This is what a foreign policy wonk looks like? // Salon // Simon Maloy – June 5, 2015

For someone who is running for the White House based on his supposedly sterling foreign policy credentials, Marco Rubio seems to have trouble forming coherent thoughts when it comes to Iraq. A few weeks ago, Rubio offered up a thoroughly nonsensical answer to whether he'd have supported the 2003 invasion of Iraq, explaining that he would have done it, but also that he wouldn't have done it, but also that the invasion was totally worth it. And just yesterday on Fox News, he served up this beautiful nugget of incoherence on what he'd like to see happen in Iraq (courtesy of Business Insider):

Here's the transcript:

RUBIO: The most immediate responsibility we have is to help them build a functional government that can actually meet the needs of their people in the short and the long term. And then ultimately, from that we would hope it would spring—

FOX NEWS HOST: That sounds like nation-building.

RUBIO: Well, it's not nation-building. We are assisting them in building their nation. We have a vested interest in doing that.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The nice part about this is that you don't have to go through the trouble of refuting it – Rubio did that himself. He wants the U.S. to help build a functional government in Iraq, but it's not nation-building, it's just helping them build a nation. That's not his Iraq strategy, it's just the strategy he's formulated for Iraq. It's brilliant.

Rubio is a straight-up neocon, but usually he is a bit slippier when it comes to endorsing George W. Bush's foreign policy without actually copping to its many, many failures. What he said on Fox News yesterday doesn't make sense on any level, but it does undermine his foreign policy vision. By calling for a renewed commitment to nation-building (or whatever he wants to call it) he's acknowledging that the many lives, years, and billions of dollars we devoted to our last nation-building effort didn't work. But President Rubio will do it better this time because he's not nation-building, he's "assisting them in building their nation," or whatever.

So that was bad, but Rubio wasn't quite done stomping all over his own foreign policy views. Like most Republicans, Rubio believes that we had actually "won" the war in Iraq by the time Bush left office, but then Barack Obama came in and withdrew all the troops and snatched defeat from the jaws of victory. He tried making that argument yesterday on Fox News and said something dumb:

RUBIO: What happened in Iraq under this administration is they rallied around Maliki. Maliki was the Shia leader who used his power to go after Sunnis. And that created the environment that was conducive for ISIS to come back in and create all these problems.

It was actually the Bush administration that first "rallied around" Nouri al-Maliki as prime minister of Iraq and propped him up as the country spiraled out of control. The troop "surge" that Rubio and his allies are so enamored of was implemented so that Maliki would have political space to promote reconciliation between warring factions within the Iraqi government. Maliki squandered that opportunity and instead used it to consolidate his own power and crack down on his rivals.

In the Rubio worldview, however, the fault for Maliki's abuses lies solely with Obama. He argues that Obama should have left behind a small residual force of U.S. troops (that the Iraqi government refused to accommodate) to intimidate Maliki into not being the corrupt, petty despot that he was. That doesn't make a whole lot of sense, given that Maliki wouldn't be brought to heel even when U.S. troop presence in his country was at its height and he was under intense diplomatic pressure from the Bush White House.

But that's the heart of the Rubio foreign policy position: the neocon dream of nation-building works, just so long as you don't call it nation-building and completely disregard all the very recent evidence of it not working.

Ted Cruz Labels Walker, Rubio And Jeb As 'Moderate' // The Daily Caller // Alex Pappas – June 5, 2015

Ted Cruz, describing political strategy in a recent newspaper interview, labeled Republican presidential frontrunners Scott Walker, Marco Rubio and Jeb Bush as "moderates" in the primary contest.

Speaking to the Raleigh News & Observer ahead of a weekend visit to North Carolina, Cruz said: "I think Walker and Rubio will become the chief moderate rivals for Jeb Bush in that bracket."

Walker of Wisconsin and Rubio and Bush of Florida would all contest the characterization that they aren't conservative. That's the bracket the Texas senator says he best represents.

"I think my natural bracket is the conservative/Tea Party bracket which is about 25 percent of the typical Republican primary," Cruz said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cruz also told the paper that New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie and South Carolina Sen. Lindsay Graham also fit into the “moderate” bracket.

Same-sex marriage advocates pose 'real and present danger' to Christianity, Sen. Marco Rubio warns //
Christian Today // Marvie Basilan – June 5, 2015

Florida Sen. Marco Rubio has denounced supporters of same sex-marriage, saying they pose a "real and present danger" to Christianity.

In an interview with the Christian Broadcasting Network last week, Rubio said gay marriage advocates are bound to attack the tenets of the Christian faith to justify their cause.

"Today we've reached the point in our society where if you do not support same-sex marriage you are labeled a homophobe and a hater," said Rubio, a Republican Party candidate for president in the 2016 election.

"After they [same-sex marriage supporters] are done going after individuals, the next step is to argue that the teachings of mainstream Christianity, the catechism of the Catholic Church, is hate speech. That's a real and present danger," Rubio said.

Rubio contended that his Catholic faith is the one driving his policy positions on social issues, including gay marriage. He said he and his family once dabbled in Mormonism and the Baptist church but later felt the call to revert back to Catholicism.

Rubio's view on same-sex marriage appeared to be tied to his views on traditional families.

"The family is the original cell of society," Rubio said. "It is the first and most important government. It is the first church. The family is the singular most important institution in society. It existed before government. It existed before laws."

In a separate interview last month, Rubio said same-sex marriage has "no federal constitutional right." Nevertheless, he said he would be present at a gay wedding of someone dear to him.

Much earlier, Rubio said during a CNN interview that if the Supreme Court grants same-sex marriage in all states, "that would be the law of the land that we would have to follow until it's somehow reversed."

Since then, Rubio appeared to have sided more firmly with those opposed to same-sex marriage.

Though his move may bring him closer to the evangelicals of Iowa and South Carolina, some political pundits said his apparent change of heart could have little effect on his candidacy as it came at a time when the Republicans appeared to be losing hope in winning the battle over gay marriage as more states in the US are joining the bandwagon to legalise same-sex marriages.

Nevertheless, Rubio said he is ready to oppose same-sex marriage not only in the United States but worldwide. "If America doesn't lead, what happens? Well, what happens is chaos," he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Regardless of his views on gay marriage and other issues, Rubio said he is leaving everything to God and the American people in choosing the next president of the United States.

PAUL

Rand Paul: "We Shouldn't Do Things to Prevent People from Voting" // Bloomberg News // David Wiegel – June 5, 2015

On Thursday, at a speech in Texas, Democratic presidential frontrunner Hillary Clinton made her first sustained attacks on her potential Republican opponents. She wanted to make voter registration basically automatic, to extend 20 days of early voting in all 50 states, and for Republicans to "stop fear-mongering about a phantom epidemic of election fraud." Among others, she singled out Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker and former Florida Governor Jeb Bush for, respectively, making registration harder and overseeing a flawed purge of voter rolls.

On Friday, some of Clinton's targets swatted her right back. "I don't want to expand [registration] and increase the opportunities for fraud," New Jersey Governor Chris Christie told CBS News during his latest New Hampshire trip. "Maybe that's what Mrs. Clinton wants to do."

Yet hours later, also in New Hampshire, a Republican presidential candidate who rarely passes up a chance to scorch Hillary Clinton took a softer tone on her voting rights pitch.

In a scrum with reporters after opening the first New Hampshire campaign office of any 2016 GOP candidate, Kentucky Senator Rand Paul said he had not seen Clinton's speech, but noted that he had "tried to make it more inclusive so more people can vote." Paul, who has co-sponsored legislation that would lower the bar for ex-felons who want to vote, recounted how he'd testified to restore some Kentuckians' rights. "I've actually lobbied for allowing people to get their right to vote back."

Asked specifically about Clinton's early voting and automatic registration ideas, Paul did not push back. Rather, he suggested that the states need to lead the way.

"I'm not against early voting," Paul told Bloomberg. "I grew up in Texas, where we have early voting, and we're a dominant Republican state -- so I don't think it necessarily favors one party over the other. Each state should decide that. The Constitution and the history of the legal cases has been pretty clear that each state gets to determine the time and manner of the elections. I wouldn't have the federal government interfere and tell any state how to do it. The Fourteenth Amendment, I think, allows the government to get involved if there is a racial bias. I am fine with the federal government intervening in those cases."

Automatic registration, said Paul, was "sort of [up to] time and manner" of the states, as well. "I think each state has their own registration -- and I think Oregon just mails it to you, which I think is a bad idea," said Paul. "You ought to confirm who you are. I'm not against there being a little bit of effort, but we shouldn't make it hard. We shouldn't do things to prevent people from voting, but we shouldn't do things that encourage lapses in the system that allow people who aren't legitimate voters."

Paul had been tripped up by this topic before. In 2014, he suggested that a Republican push for voter ID requirements was "offending" some non-white voters. He has not used that language since. In April, he told an interviewer that "motor voter" laws were problematic because they might let non-citizens get ID cards, usable at the polls. "People tell me that once you get a driver's license you can vote," he said. "That's a problem. The federal government is funding some of this motor voter stuff, so we're looking at ways that we could actually restrict federal funds and say you don't get it unless you're doing the cross tabs on this data."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Pressed by NH1 reporter Paul Steinhauser at his Manchester campaign headquarters opening, Paul refused to say whether his party was making voting more difficult. "I don't know," he said. "All I know is what I'm trying to do, and I think it's a good idea for the Republicans to be a party that is for the vote, that is for allowing people to vote."

WALKER

Is Gov. Scott Walker putting the University of Wisconsin system in jeopardy? // WaPo // Valerie Strauss – June 5, 2015

Are Gov. Scott Walker and the Wisconsin legislature on their way to doing serious harm to the respected University of Wisconsin system?

Let's review.

Walker, who is expected to soon announce his candidacy for the 2016 Republican presidential nomination, has laid out a series of proposals for the system over the next two years, including budget cuts as well as changes to tenure and the governance structure. He calls the package of changes "the Act 10 of higher education," a reference to a 2011 law that, among other things, slashed the power of public employee unions, cut the take-home pay for many public workers and eliminated tenure for teachers.

The governor proposed slashing $300 million over the next two years from the University of Wisconsin system, which is comprised of 13 four-year universities and 13 two-year campuses. A legislative committee went along with his idea to cut higher education funding, but only by $250 million — not much of a reprieve. It is worth noting that Wisconsin is already spending less on higher education than all of its Midwestern neighbors and, according to the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, is one of only six states that have approved or are considering reducing higher education funding for the next fiscal year.

Walker had also sought to create a new "quasi-governmental" body that would run the university system rather than have it under direct state control, but lawmakers nixed that. They are, however, supporting his proposed changes to tenure and the long-successful University of Wisconsin shared governance structure that critics say could turn the system into a pariah in academia.

Specifically, the Wisconsin Legislature's Joint Finance Committee has approved a bill that would move tenure from state statute into the purview of the governing Board of Regents. University administration would be able to fire or lay off faculty or academic staff not only for financial emergencies and just cause, as it now the case, but also "when such an action is deemed necessary due to a budget or program decision regarding program discontinuance, curtailment, modification, or redirection." Not only would it be much easier to lay off faculty but administrators would also have control over decisions involving academic programs and curricula that are now accorded to faculty.

While members of the governing Board of Regents have said publicly that they would still "uphold tenure," faculty say that the law would take precedence over any board policy. On Thursday night, a board panel voted to go along with the proposed tenure change, and it is likely to be approved by the full legislature in June, the Journal Sentinel reported.

The newspaper quoted Tony Evers, a regent and State Superintendent of Public Instruction, saying that if the legislature approves the broad language in the proposed change, "Tenure will be gone as we know it and I think it's a step backward for our relationship with faculty members." Just like for K-12 teachers.

A statement Tuesday issued by the Public Representation Organization of the University of Wisconsin Faculty Senate said:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"If such language is passed by the full Wisconsin legislature, it will cripple the UW's ability to attract and retain quality employees, devalue the educational credentials of future UW graduates, and create new financial challenges for the UW System."

The University of Wisconsin system has long enjoyed shared governance among faculty, students and administrators, a dynamic that these changes would shatter. The New York Times wrote in this story:

Yet in academic circles nationwide, there was concern this week that the proposed changes in Wisconsin could bolster the forces pushing universities to operate more like businesses, eliminating departments or courses that do not attract many students or much research money.

"Increasingly, the excuse of financial difficulty has been used as a reason to overpower the faculty, with a lot of people in administration saying we need to be flexible," said Henry Reichman, vice president of the American Association of University Professors. "If you just took the Wisconsin language on eliminating tenure, and moved it from the statute into board policy, you could argue that there would be no problem. But the shared governance change seems to undermine the whole structure."

This Journal Sentinel story on the controversy quoted Rudy Fichtenbaum, president of the American Association of University Professors, as saying that many politicians don't understand tenure:

"Tenure is about protecting academic freedom, not a guaranteed job for life. Protecting academic freedom is important to protecting the public interest. ... Without academic freedom, the university will be there to serve the interests of whichever political party is in power. The regents are appointed by the governor, and they determine priorities."

Earlier in the year Walker created a related controversy when he submitted a budget proposal that included language that would have changed the century-old mission of the University of Wisconsin system — known as the "Wisconsin Idea" and embedded in the state code — by removing words that commanded the university to "search for truth" and "improve the human condition" and replacing them with "meet the state's workforce needs." Walker was recently sued by a nonprofit watchdog group alleging that he is refusing to make public documents relating to the mission change effort.

The fierce debate over Republican plans for higher education in Wisconsin dovetail with changes in K-12 education that the state superintendent said will decimate public schools by refusing to spend more money on public education for the first time in more than 20 years while giving millions of dollars more to expand a private voucher program, slashing higher education funding, and weakening licensing rules for teachers.

Walker would sign budget with no borrowing for roads // AP // Scott Bauer – June 5, 2015

Gov. Scott Walker, who steadfastly opposes raising taxes or fees to pay for roads, would sign a state budget that includes no borrowing for highways and other transportation needs in Wisconsin, resulting in significant delays to ongoing and planned projects, his spokeswoman said Friday.

While that is not his preferred option, Walker spokeswoman Laurel Patrick said if the Legislature decides to remove $1.3 billion in borrowing the governor proposed, Walker would sign it.

That's a "pretty stark concept," said Rep. John Nygren, co-chairman of the Legislature's budget-writing committee.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Assembly Speaker Robin Vos first publicly voiced the possibility of doing away with the borrowing on Wednesday, saying that would be an option since Walker refuses to consider raising the gas tax or vehicle registration fees. Vos offered the idea to Walker in a private meeting that day, which was also attended by Republican Senate Majority Leader Scott Fitzgerald.

"When Speaker Vos floated the idea of the Legislature removing all bonding for transportation from the state budget, it was communicated that this would have a devastating impact on the transportation fund and transportation projects across the state as a ripple effect," Patrick said in an email.

Without the $1.3 billion, every road project would likely be affected: from megaprojects like the Zoo Interchange in Milwaukee, the Interstate 39/90 expansion from Madison south to Illinois, the I-94 expansion from Milwaukee south to Illinois, as well as other state highway work, bridge repairs and freight rail maintenance, according to information provided by Walker's office.

Nygren, a Republican from Marinette and co-chairman of the Joint Finance Committee, said he doesn't want to delay roads projects because that will only put greater pressure on lawmakers in two years to figure out a way to deal with the pent-up demand.

Nygren and other Republicans have talked about reducing the level of borrowing by between $300 million and $800 million.

Republican lawmakers and Walker are at an impasse, and the budget remains stalled over it. Nygren described negotiations on transportation funding as "a little bit of a stare off at this time."

Another outstanding issue is whether to repeal of the state's prevailing wage law - which sets salaries for workers on public works jobs - or just scale it back. And a financing deal to pay for a new Milwaukee Bucks arena reached with Walker, Milwaukee officials, Republican legislative leaders and team owners was just released Thursday.

Both the prevailing wage and arena issue could be decided outside of the budget, but transportation funding must be included in the two-year spending plan.

Regarding the Bucks deal, Nygren and other Republicans have said they want to give the public, and lawmakers who must approve it, time to understand it before rushing to a vote.

"There's no real big sense of urgency to get this to Joint Finance," Nygren said.

The Joint Finance Committee originally planned to complete its work last Friday, but the Republican-controlled panel did not meet this week and it has no meetings scheduled for next week.

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker fires up NC GOP //The News & Observer //Taylor Knopf – June 5, 2015

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker kicked off the North Carolina GOP state convention Friday night in a packed Raleigh Convention Center ballroom.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Walker spent most of the day in Raleigh, speaking to a Civitas Institute donor crowd, doing TV media interviews at the state legislative building and celebrating National Doughnut Day with Lt. Gov. Dan Forest at Raleigh's downtown Krispy Kreme.

During his speech at the convention, Walker gave his pitch for why he would be a good candidate for president.

The governor said that of the large number of great Republican candidates there are two groups: fighters and winners.

The fighters he defined as those in the U.S. Senate who fight hard but have yet to win anything. The winners he defined as current and former governors, who are good at winning elections but have not consistently fought the big fights.

"If we were to get into this race, it would be because I think there is a yearning in America for someone who can fight and win for hardworking taxpayers," Walker said.

"We have fought the good fight and won those fights, not just at the ballot box three times in four years in a blue state, but more importantly we have won every single one of those fights we engaged in."

Walker has not formally declared his candidacy but said he would announce his intentions after Wisconsin passes its state budget.

Walker hit on his usual three-point vision for the future of the United States – growth, reform and safety – while sharing some of his accomplishments as governor of the Badger State.

Economic growth occurs when government steps aside and empowers the people, Walker said.

"People like Hilary Clinton think the way you grow the economy is by growing Washington," he said. "The rest of us in reality need to tell Washington that true growth happens in cities and towns and villages all across this great country. People create jobs, not the government."

Since Walker took office, he said unemployment went from 9.2 percent in 2010 to 4.6 percent this spring.

He said reform should be measured by how many people are no longer dependent on the government. And safety is how Walker refers to issues of national security.

"National security is something you read about in the newspaper, safety is something you feel," he said.

Walker said that the biggest safety threat is radical Islamic terrorists and that it is only a matter of time before there is another attack on American soil. The nation needs a leader who has the courage to take the fight to the enemy before it comes here, he said, receiving standing applause from the 600-plus members of the dinner crowd.

With front-row seats, Alex Kehayes, a commissioner on the Chowan County Board, said he favors Walker because of "his record to get a lot done with massive opposition."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"It's early in an open race, but the fact that someone shows up, looks me in the face and talks to me goes a long way," Kehayes said, showing a picture of himself with Walker from earlier.

Ed Higgins, from New Hanover County, said he hopes Walker becomes the Republican nominee.

"Governorships better prepare individuals for the hard decisions presidents make, unlike being a senator," Higgins said. "He stands up to unions and takes the hard fight to them, but at the same time he carries the favor of his constituents, as shown when he was re-elected after they recalled him."

An expected 1,800 to 2,000 Republicans from around the state traveled to the capital to hear the N.C. GOP's speakers.

Saturday will feature U.S. Sen. Ted Cruz, Donald Trump, and a few Tar Heel speakers including Gov. Pat McCrory, Forest, House Speaker Tim Moore, Sen. Thom Tillis and Labor Commissioner Cherie Berry.

The convention will wrap up Sunday morning with a prayer breakfast and Dr. Ben Carson.

Carson and Cruz are officially running for president in 2016, and Walker is widely expected to run as well. Recent media reports suggest Trump may enter the crowded field for the GOP nomination.

The N.C. GOP will also elect new state-level leadership, which occurs every odd year. The party will vote in a new state chairman who will represent the state at the Republican National Convention.

At the state convention, candidates are nominated and voted on by county delegates, which will take place after the 2 p.m. speakers Saturday. The three candidates who ran campaigns for state chairman are Craig Collins, AJ Daoud and Hasan Harnett.

CRUZ

Ted Cruz Wonders About Jeb Bush's Viability // NYT // Maggie Haberman & Kitty Bennett – June 5, 2015

Senator Ted Cruz of Texas has said he will not take shots at his Republican rivals for the presidency, but on Thursday he questioned descriptions of Jeb Bush as a "front-runner" and wondered whether Mr. Bush could win an early state in the nominating contests.

Mr. Cruz, who declared his 2016 presidential candidacy in March, made the comments in an interview with the Fox News host Neil Cavuto. Mr. Cavuto asked if Mr. Cruz had to win one of the first three states — Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina — to be viable.

"If you look historically since World War II, no one has ever won the nomination without winning at least one of those first three," said Mr. Cruz, who was a policy adviser on George W. Bush's first presidential campaign in 2000.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“That has certainly been history. You know, I think it’s an interesting challenge for a number of other of these candidates.”

He continued: “The media describes, for example, Jeb Bush, frequently, as the front-runner. It becomes an interesting question when you ask, which of those states does he win?”

Mr. Cruz added that he would compete “vigorously” in all of those states. He did not directly answer a question about whether he would compete in Florida, home to both Mr. Bush and another contender, Senator Marco Rubio. But he said he was competing nationwide.

The remarks about Mr. Bush come as he is on the cusp of becoming a formal candidate, after months of a sometimes-difficult exploratory phase. Mr. Cruz has raised large sums for the “super PAC” supporting him, but he has been standing in place in most of the polls.

Ted Cruz's problems with Latinos run deeper than his policy positions // Reuters – June 5, 2015

n a less diverse Republican presidential field, Ted Cruz, the make-good son of a Cuban immigrant, would be viewed more for what he is — a candidate with a legitimate shot at making U.S. history as the nation’s first Latino president in 2016.

Instead, the senator from Texas finds himself in a strange position as he sees himself eclipsed both by Senator Marco Rubio, also a Cuban-American, and former Florida Governor Jeb Bush, a fluent Spanish-speaker married to a Mexican-American, as early favorites among Hispanic Republicans who could play an increasingly influential role in the nomination process.

To Latinos, Cruz often feels more like an afterthought. And while that’s largely attributed to his hard-right stance on immigration reform, prominent Hispanic conservatives offered insight as to why his problems with Latinos run deeper. Rubio, they said, has embraced his ethnic identity in a way that Cruz, who speaks little Spanish, has not or will not.

“At times, Senator Cruz finds it difficult to identify or engage with his Latino heritage,” said the Rev. Samuel Rodriguez of the National Hispanic Christian Leadership Conference, a key conservative group that Bush addressed in April.

"He does not elevate or magnify his Latino voice in the same way Marco Rubio does."

Said Javier Palomarez, the CEO of the U.S. Hispanic Chamber of Commerce, an organization of Hispanic business leaders. "Rubio speaks the language. Both are sons of immigrants, but one has held onto the culture and language.”

A SHIFTING ELECTORATE

Hispanic voters could matter in this year’s Republican presidential race like never before. Nevada, with a one-quarter Latino population, holds the third Republican primary on the calendar, with contests in Colorado and Texas not far behind.

Because no clear front-runner has yet to emerge, the nominating process could stretch longer than usual and involve more states, meaning that the traditional early states of Iowa, New Hampshire, and South Carolina, which largely have white Republican electorates, will hold less sway.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

More than that, it's critically important for the party to attract Hispanic voters, something it failed to do in 2012, when Mitt Romney garnered a meager 27 percent of the vote in the general election.

Rubio's pollster, Whit Ayres, estimates the party will need to garner at least 40 percent of the Hispanic vote in 2016 to win, as the share of America's white electorate declines.

